When you first began to write I do not know, nor can I say when your earliest stories appeared. I see, however, that the first edition of your first book, "Many Cargoes," saw the light in 1896—I am particular to say the first edition, because a publisher's note circulates the information that "Many Cargoes" is now in its thirty-second edition. In succeeding years you have issued twelve more books, and you have utilised some hours of your leisure in writing a play, "The Beauty and the Barge," which brought you into repute as a dramatist. It is not given to all writers to win success in two branches of letters. Your output, then, is considerable for one who is in the prime of life. It is considerable, though not enormous. For instance, a friend of mine, with whom you (as I happen to know) have a bowing acquaintance, who turns out biographies by the score, could beat your books, in the scale, by about a stone and a half. But a baker's dozen of volumes of stories as the result of sixteen years' labour is what anyone may be proud of, and when, sir, the stories have the freshness, originality, the quaint, quiet humour with which you invest your literary work, it is an output of which not only the author must be proud, but with which his readers are delighted.

I have heard it said by critics, whose creative work would not give them the right to fill your inkstands, that you are not versatile, and that you confine yourself to one small niche, a certain aspect of nautical life. Yet, without turning to your books, I can recall the dramatic "Jerry Bundler," the comic "Monkey's Paw," and, above all, "Three at Table." "Three at Table" is, in my humble opinion, which I venture to obtrude upon you, the best story you have ever written, as it is perhaps one of the simplest. When the proud father of the lad who got disfigured at a fire gives the toast, "The health of the children my son saved!" I experience the same feeling of choking as when I first read it sixteen years ago. It is, however, certainly true that your theme is, more often than not, the bargee and the captain and crew of coasting vessels, and of this you have made yourself a master. When Anthony Trollope was asked at what period of his life he had lived so long in a cathedral city as to have become so intimately acquainted with the ways of a close, he replied that, as a matter of fact, he had never resided for any length of time in any cathedral city except the metropolis, and he was not well acquainted with any clergyman. Whether you write from knowledge or from instinct, I have not the remotest conception; but I am sure that the truth of your character-drawing has never, by any person competent to judge, been called into question.

What is so wonderful, however, is not that you should draw a sailor, but that you should be able to draw so many sailors, and that they should all be as true to life as they are different in every way other than following the same calling. And what you have done for the sailor you have done for his womenfolk, for his wife, his daughter, and his sweetheart. You show us the man on board, you show us him in his home, you show us him in his retirement, you show us him happy and sad, successful and in failure.

If I may venture to introduce the personal note, I shall say that you belong to the true school of novelists. You regard it as your business to show us life as you see it, and men and women as they appear to you; not to present your readers with your views on economic subjects or the sex problem. No one has succeeded in extracting from you, at least not in public, your opinions on Home-rule, horse-racing, or drink. The best that the adroitest of honorary secretaries of literary clubs can do is once in a way to lure you into the chair, and even then your speech is most incommendably brief. You have no axe to grind, philosophic, philanthropic, or political—or, if you have, you do not grind it in your novels. You are content to give pleasure to your few millions of readers. You give them an extensive portrait gallery and a vast number of amusing tales; and you let them partake of your subtle humour, of your sense of the ludicrous, and of your carefully veiled feeling for romance. Arguing from your books, I venture to assert that you have a love for innocence, a respect for kindness and generosity, a profound admiration for bravery, and a keen sympathy with those who have gone under in the struggle. These qualities underlie the writings with which we are all so familiar. If, sir, I do not dwell especially on your humour, it is only because it is universally recognised and appreciated.

I am, Sir,

Yours faithfully,

LEWIS MELVILLE.

ANNOUNCEMENT OF OUR SERIES OF COMPETITIONS

IT is one of the objects of EVERYMAN, expressed in the sub-title of the paper, to get at the facts of national life. We speak glibly of the classes and the masses, lumping them together as if they were abstract entities; but we know very little of the concrete conditions of life of those classes and those masses. One of the most urgent desiderata of social science is an accurate knowledge of those conditions, with their infinite variations in time and space, according to professions and surroundings.

With a view to furthering such knowledge, we offer a prize of Three Guineas each for the best contribution, not exceeding 2,000 words, on any one of the six following subjects:—

|----------------------------|----------------------|
| 1. The Civil Servant. | 4. The Male Teacher. |
| 2. The Anglican Clergyman. | 5. The Composer. |
| 3. The Foreign Missionary. | 6. The Miner. |

The papers should be descriptive rather than controversial, and we would recommend a division into paragraphs, with a view to inducing orderly sequence. We would also recommend a brief synopsis summing up the main points dealt with. It is desirable that the competitions be written from direct observation. The experience of a miner will be more welcome than a contribution by a politician who once in his life visited a coal-mine.

Entries should be clearly written, and preferably typewritten, should bear the number of the Competition, and should reach the

COMPETITION EDITOR, "EVERYMAN,"

21, Royal Terrace, Edinburgh,

by July 1st. Other subjects will be announced later on.

MASTERPIECE FOR THE WEEK

WILLIAM CANTON'S "A CHILD'S BOOK OF SAINTS" * * BY E. HERMANN

I.

WHEN this beautiful book first made its appearance, wisecracks were found to say that, had it not been for its two predecessors, "W. V.: Her Book," and "The Invisible Playmate"—two gems of child literature which set their author among the small group of writers whom we deem it almost an insult to praise, because we love them—its title would inevitably have doomed it to failure. "What modern child (or grown up, for that matter)," they asked, "wants to read about Saints?" Where the name does not conjure up a stained-glass sort of person, it is redolent of the pineapple rum with which the red-nosed Mr. Stiggins reinforced his mortal frame. The critics were wrong. So long as little St. Francis is known and loved of men, so long human souls reach out a wistful left hand to the beauty of holiness, though the sturdy right may grip the excitement of sin; so long the golden legend will draw and lure their hearts. The modern child may laugh at fairy tales and refuse to be interested in anything less substantial than real motor-cars and guns which actually shoot people. The modern adult may be inebriated with the rhythm of passing things, preoccupied with materialities, all but dead to the whisper of the soul. Yet, taking humanity, whether young or old, at large, it has an irrepressible craving for the spiritual, just in proportion as it is still natural and not dehumanised by surrender to that phantom world where "things sit in the saddle and ride mankind." After all, there is nothing so unchangeable as the changeful heart of man.

II.

Thus it came about that "A Child's Book of Saints" captured and held a large and growing public. That "W. V." was in some measure responsible for its initial success need not be denied. But the charm of the new volume was such as to blaze its own trail into the very heart of that "Holy Assembly" of readers who still know how to wonder and to dream.

Eighteen legends are retold in this book—told with a charm so spontaneous and unconscious that it seems to have invented itself, and with a loving insight which has recaptured the lost secret of mediæval sainthood—that wondrous blend of meekness and majesty, romance and grim realism, passion and renunciation, self-expression and self-surrender, courage and shrinking, adventure and seclusion, and all those baffling contradictions which make the histories of the Saints, rightly read, more thrilling than any tale that ever entered into the imagination of man. Arid rationalists may smile pityingly, obstinate materialists may snort their angry disapproval, but so long as human nature remains the time will never come when the tale of St. Francis will no longer be told, when eyes shall no longer moisten at the sorrowful longing of Waldo, when hearts shall not quicken at the perils of the Seven Years' Seekers, when the clamour of the 'Ancient Gods Pursuing shall not trouble, when the great Love of Prior Oswald shall not be as a light and a fragrance to the soul, and when the piping of Kenach's blackbird will cease to enchant. It is not a question of creed or Churchmanship. All who have a fine taste for spiritual adventure, who delight in the wisdom that reneweth herself in beauty, who are in love with Love and have found the treasure of the humble—all children, that is, whether by nature or by the Second Birth, will understand and prize these stories of the Saints.

III.

Mr. Canton is a master of style, and of that larger thing which we must call verbal evocation, for want of a better word. He can conjure up the very spirit and atmosphere of those old-gold Ages of Faith in which his Saints moved, and he does so in exquisite words. A crowd of examples come to the mind. There is the description of "the first glimmer of dawn, when all wild creatures are tame, and the earth most lovely to look upon," and of Prior Oswald's great Cross, with "the face of our Lord crucified turned to the west, and His arms opened wide to the sea and the passing ships," so that "beneath the flying sails, far away, the mariners and fisher folk could see the cross in the sky, . . . and so the name of Christ was known in strange waters and in distant havens." Or, for a blood-stirring tale, what could be more "in the spirit" of mediæval religious warfare than the telling of how "the long line of thanes, slumbering in wild caves and dark ways of his soul," awoke in Rheinfried, and how "with a mighty drive of his fist he struck the man-at-arms between the eyes, so that he fell like a stone." Passages of rare and haunting flavour abound throughout the book, which is not so unlike that high stone Cross which Rheinfried saw, round whose bare stem a vine folded beauteous tendrils, with birds and small wild creatures nestling among the leaves.

IV.

There is only one way of doing anything like justice to such a book—the way of quotation. And here an embarrassment of riches paralyses one's power of choice. But take a chance gem quarried out of the Gaelic tale of Kenach's Little Woman:—

"What bird is this that sings so sweet before day in the bitter cold?" said the Abbot. 'Surely no bird at all, but an Angel from heaven waking us from the death of sleep.'

"It is the blackbird, Domine Abbas," said the young monk. 'Often they sing thus in February, however cold it may be.'

"O soul, O Diarmait, is it not wonderful that the senseless small creatures should praise God so sweetly in the dark? . . . Gladly could I have listened to that singing, even till to-morrow was a day; and yet it was but the singing of a little earth wrapped in a handful of feathers. O soul, tell me what it must be to listen to the singing of an Angel, a portion of heaven wrapped in the glory of God's love!'

"Now after days of clear and benign weather a shrill wind broke out from beneath the North Star, and brought with it snow and sleet and piercing cold. . . . Harsh cold and sleeplessness were their lot in the cave, and as he shivered, the Abbot bethought him of the blackbird in her nest, and of the wet flakes driving in between the leaves of the ivy and stinging her brown wings and patient bosom. And lifting his head from his pillow of stone, he prayed the Lord of the elements to have the bird in His gentle care, saying, 'How excellent is Thy loving-kindness, O God! therefore the children of men put their trust under the shadow of Thy wing.'

One would dearly like to go on to the end of Kenach's story, and then to complete the impression by quoting from one of the warlike and adventurous tales, but space does not permit. One thing must be added. These stories were first told and then written down for the delectation of the unforgettable "W. V." And the only way to get the full, deep core out of this "Child's Book of Saints" is to read them to a child in the green depth of some sun-chequered woodland, or in the magic glow of a quiet fireside.

LE SECRET DE LA SAGESSE

JE vais vous révéler en peu de mots un grand mystère de la vie humaine. L'homme s'épuise par deux actes instinctivement accomplis qui tarissent les sources de son existence. Deux verbes expriment toutes les formes que prennent ces deux causes de mort : VOULOIR et POUVOIR. Entre ces deux termes de l'action humaine, il est une autre formule dont s'emparent les sages, et je lui dois le bonheur et ma longévité. Vouloir nous brûle, et pouvoir nous détruit ; mais SAVOIR laisse notre faible organisation dans un perpétuel état de calme. Ainsi le désir ou le vouloir est mort en moi, tué par la pensée ; le mouvement ou le pouvoir s'est résolu par le jeu naturel de mes organes. En deux mots, j'ai placé ma vie, non dans le cœur qui se brise, non dans les sens qui s'émoussent, mais dans le cerveau qui ne s'use pas et qui survit à tout. Rien d'excessif n'a froissé ni mon âme ni mon corps. Cependant j'ai vu le monde entier. J'ai appris tous les langues humains, et j'ai vécu sous tous les régimes. Ma seule ambition a été de voir. Voir n'est-ce pas savoir ? . . . Oh ! savoir, jeune homme, n'est-ce pas jouir intuitivement ? n'est-ce pas découvrir la substance même du fait et s'en emparer essentiellement ? Que reste-t-il d'une possession matérielle ? Une idée. Jugez alors combien doit être belle la vie d'un homme qui, pouvant empreindre toutes les réalités dans sa pensée, transporte en son âme les sources du bonheur, en extrait mille voluptés idéales dépouillées des souillures terrestres. Ce que les hommes appellent chagrins, amours, ambitions, revers, tristesse est, pour moi, des idées que je change en rêveries ; au lieu de les sentir, je les exprime, je les traduis : au lieu de leur laisser dévorer ma vie, je les dramatise, je les développe ; je m'en amuse comme de romans que je lirais par une vision intérieure. N'ayant jamais lassé mes organes, je jouis encore d'une santé robuste. Mon âme ayant hérité de toute la force dont je n'abusais pas, cette tête est encore mieux meublée que ne le sont mes magasins. Là, dit-il en se frappant le front, là sont les vrais millions. Je passe des journées délicieuses en jetant un regard intelligent dans le passé ; j'évoque des pays entiers, des sites, des vues de l'océan, des figures historiquement belles ! Comment préférer tous les désastres de vos volontés trompées à la faculté sublime de faire comparaître en soi l'univers, au plaisir immense de se mouvoir sans être garrotté par les liens du temps ni par les entraves de l'espace, au plaisir de tout embrasser, de tout voir, de se pencher sur le bord du monde pour interroger les autres sphères, pour écouter Dieu ? Ceci, dit-il d'une voix éclatante en montrant la peau de chagrin, est le pouvoir et le vouloir réunis. Là sont vos idées sociales, vos désirs excessifs, vos intempérances, vos joies qui tuent, vos douleurs qui font trop vivre ; car le mal n'est peut-être qu'un violent plaisir. Qui pourrait déterminer le point où la volupté devient un mal, et celui où le mal est encore la volupté ? Les plus vives lumières du monde idéal ne caressent-elles pas la vue, tandis que les plus douces ténèbres du monde physique la blessent toujours ? Le mot de sagesse ne vient-il pas de savoir ? et qu'est-ce que la folie, sinon l'excès d'un vouloir ou d'un pouvoir ?

THE SECRET OF WISDOM

I WILL tell you in a few words the great secret of human life. By two instinctive processes man exhausts the springs of life within him. Two verbs cover all the forms which these two causes of death may take—To Will and To have your Will. Between these two limits of human activity the wise have discovered an intermediate formula, to which I owe my good fortune and long life. To Will consumes us, and To have our Will destroys us, but To Know steeps our feeble organisms in perpetual calm. In me Thought has destroyed Will, so that Power is relegated to the ordinary functions of my organism. In a word, I have set my life not in the heart, which can be broken, nor in the senses, that are too susceptible, but in the brain, that cannot waste away and survives everything else. Moderation has kept mind and body unruffled. Yet I have seen the whole world, I have learned all languages, and lived in accordance with every régime. My one ambition has been to see. Is not Sight in a manner Insight ? And to have knowledge or insight, is not that to have instinctive possession, to be able to discover the very substance of fact, and to unite its essence to our essence ? Of any material possession, what remains but an idea ? Think, then, how glorious must be the life of a man who can stamp all realities upon his thought, place the springs of happiness within himself, and draw thence uncounted pleasures in ideals unsoiled by earthly stains. Troubles, loves, ambitions, losses, and sorrows, as men call them, are for me ideas, which I transmute into waking dreams ; I express and transpose instead of feeling them ; instead of permitting them to prey upon my life, I dramatise and expand them ; I divert myself with them, as if they were romances which I could read by the power of vision within me. As I have never overtaxed my constitution, I still enjoy robust health ; and as my mind is endowed with all the force that I have not wasted, this head of mine is even better furnished than my stores. "The true millions lie here," he said, striking his forehead. "I spend delicious days in communings with the past ; I summon before me whole countries, places, expanses of sea, the fair faces of history. What are all the disasters that wait on your erratic whims, compared with the magnificent power of conjuring up the whole world within your soul, compared with the immeasurable joys of movement, unstrangled by the cords of time, unlogged by the fetters of space ; the joys of beholding all things, of comprehending all things, of leaning over the parapet of the world to question the other spheres, to hearken to the voice of God ? There," he burst out vehemently, "there are To Will and To have your Will, both together"—he pointed to the bit of shagreen—"there are your social ideas, your immoderate desires, your excesses, your pleasures that end in death, your sorrows that quicken the pace of life, for pain is perhaps but a violent pleasure. Who could determine the point where pleasure becomes pain, where pain is still a pleasure ? Is not the utmost brightness of the ideal world soothing to us, while the lightest shadows of the physical world annoy ? Is not knowledge the secret of wisdom ? And what is folly but a riotous expenditure of Will or Power ?"

SAMUEL AUGUSTUS BARNETT

AN APPRECIATION * * By P. W. WILSON

I.

THOSE of us who enjoyed some intimacy with Canon Barnett felt that he stood alone among our friends, and was in his way the greatest of them all. Others were bent upon ambitions or success, on social reforms or various causes. He had his interests also, but his real pursuit was wisdom. He set himself deliberately to acquire anew the art of life, that one art which the rest of us neglect. Hence his methodical habits, his neatness of person, his promptitude in answering letters, his prudence in money matters, his sedulous cultivation of friendships. Hence, too, his deliberate contempt for preferment, his avoidance of asceticism, his keen humour, and his belief in travel. He was not a theologian, nor even a scholar of the front rank, but he had a Puritan's belief in God, and argued with amazing coolness and courage from God to the affairs of man. He did not lack affection, but was totally devoid of sentiment, which he detected on the instant with unerring insight, and as quickly condemned. What he tried to define for himself and others was personal duty, over which problem he pondered intensely, becoming in the end, not exactly a pessimist, but certainly a prophet of warning—an utter foe to complacency. By duty, he did not mean giving a copper to a crossing sweeper, but something much more exacting. He believed in each one of us taking up one case and seeing it through at whatever cost. He distrusted the good that is meant for thousands, all at once.

He had, of course, the immense advantage of private means. This meant that he could hold his own in Whitehall as well as in Whitechapel, and spare time for Oxford. He held that the poor should visit the universities, and that the universities should visit the poor. Out of that idea arose Toynbee Hall in a district inhabited at that time less by Jews than by Christian criminals, if the term be permitted. As the alien population gathered around the settlement, it was remarkable how all nationalities trusted this man of duty, who did not dogmatise on formulas, but—with his colleagues—gave his best, and left it there. For it was the best always at which he aimed. If lecturers were wanted, no one less than Alfred Milner or Professor Gardiner would do. If it be music, the programme must be severely classical, and the performance adequate. So with Art, as exhibited at the gallery in the Whitechapel Road. The temporary collections were on the average the best in London. Strange to say, he was colour blind, and had himself no taste for music, but by intellectual reasoning he proved to himself what value these things had for others.

II.

At Toynbee Hall, his men worked the whole district. No charity, was their motto, and in no parish was there less pauperism. The rule might seem at times a little hard, but it won the respect of the poor, and to increase the sum-total of respect, especially self-respect, was Canon Barnett's underlying method. He was very particular always to practise exactly what he preached (not that he did much preaching, save when he could not avoid it). He disapproved of costly funerals for others, and left particular instructions that his was not to be at the Abbey, but in his old church at St. Jude's, with his old curates to conduct the service.

III.

Of course, he did not undervalue ability. In that respect his discernment was as clear as the discernment of Jowett of Balliol. He ceaselessly endeavoured to get his men on to newspapers, into Parliament, and among the departments of State. He made it his business to know influential people, so as to divert their mental and pecuniary gifts into what he considered to be the most practically useful channels. He raised large sums of money, because everybody knew that it would be well expended, and this reputation for benevolent frugality was unquestionably the asset which enabled his wife, Mrs. Barnett—a woman in her way as remarkable as he was as a man—to achieve one of the greatest pieces of town planning in the world. I was one of the first to hear about the Hampstead Garden Suburb. The Barnetts' "cottage" on the Heath overlooked an immense tract of valuable building land belonging to Eton College. The dread of unsightly rows of workmen's dwellings inspired Mrs. Barnett to undertake the colossal task of raising enough money to save the foreground for an extension of Hampstead Heath. Frankly, I forget what exactly was the sum so collected, but it was somewhere about £50,000. This preliminary having been accomplished, the Barnetts set about acquiring a much larger tract of land for model building. With the help of friends, like Mr. Alfred Lyttelton and Sir Robert Hunter, they formed a trust, and to-day there are, I suppose, many thousands of people housed under conditions which represent the high-water mark of health and beauty. The same kind of thing has been done by great firms like Cadbury's and Lever's; and Letchworth—not a suburb, but a city on its own, with factories complete—was in being. But it is, I think, admitted that the Hampstead Garden Suburb represents a notable advance in such social efforts. Pilgrims from all over the world visit the place—the latest being the Empress Dowager of Russia, with Queen Alexandra. Canon Barnett himself was the first to attribute the housing achievement to his wife—a colleague of Octavia Hill—for he possessed to the full, what is not always the case in such marriages, the readiness to acknowledge, and indeed assist, his wife's incessant initiative. Jealousy was not in his nature, and least of all would she have been its subject.

IV.

If I were asked what was his greatest quality, I think I should suggest his wonderful detachment. A man who has founded a settlement in Whitechapel may be pardoned for feeling a parent's pride over his offspring. It was enough for Canon Barnett that what he did was good in its day. He never forgot even for an instant that the needs of men are changing, and that institutions may lose their usefulness. I must not be understood to imply any such reflection on Toynbee Hall—quite the reverse—but this selfless practice of examining achievements, including his own—of trying all things by severest tests—made him at once a singularly refreshing talker and profoundly formidable critic. He belonged to what is called the broad school, but he did not concern himself greatly with minutiæ of scholastic inquiry, still less with minutiæ of ritual, being content to reverence all that demanded it. High Churchmen did not always love him, nor did Nonconformists fully appreciate his social sense; and I must in candour record that he was not always impressed by the long prayer and the still longer sermon of the Free Churches. He was not at his best in the pulpit, an ordeal that requires voice and physique as well as thought and brains. It was, perhaps, for this reason that his aphorisms, which, if collected, would make a classic, have not up to the present been accounted as permanent literature. In the usual sense he was not an essayist, but he was a man of many sayings, indicative of a searching vision—short, yet pregnant of great truth—summing up a nation or a century in a daring and yet considered generalisation. He never wrote his reminiscences—at least, I think not—which is a great loss, for he knew all manner of statesmen and their secrets, and at many turning points of progress his counsel assisted the trembling balance.

FROM LONDON TO PARIS

A NATIONAL HIGHWAY

By G. ALEXANDER

THE recent articles in the Times on the defects of the Dover-Calais service to Paris, and the correspondence voicing the dissatisfaction of the public, would seem to suggest wider considerations than those which explicitly came to the front. There were two heads of complaint against the existing state of things, and, allowing for a certain amount of picturesque exaggeration, both seem to be abundantly justified.

Speed, or rather the lack of speed, is the first thing brought against the South-Eastern and Chatham Company, and to a lesser degree against the Nord Company of France. No one wants a reckless and dangerous rush, regardless of caution and safety. But, even so, is there not room for doubt whether we are at present getting the maximum of speed consistent with security? The best on the English side is 1 hour 35 minutes for 76½ miles, while the other seven trains to and from Dover, and the four to and from Folkestone, do not come up to this by several minutes; and even this best is not only inferior to the Cornish express, and to most of the North-Western expresses, but falls well behind the Great Eastern train to Harwich for the Hook of Holland, which is marked at 1 hour 22 minutes for 68¾ miles. The curve at Tonbridge and the great amount of suburban traffic are, of course, well known, but other lines also have their obstacles, and the Continental traffic by Dover and Folkestone is such an important item that it would seem to justify both altering the line at Tonbridge Junction, and holding up any other traffic that might be in the way. Probably, however, if we are to have greater speed we ought to have more modern and heavier types of engines and coaches.

As to the other gravamen, viz., the discomforts inflicted on the passengers, many of the remedies suggested would appear to be feasible enough, if only a little pains were taken to secure better arrangements. The examination of the luggage by the Custom House officers "en route," shelters at the landing-places, dining-cars, a train of Pullman cars instead of miscellaneous coaches of various ages and designs, are surely all within the bounds of possibility. But here we are faced with the question of capital expenditure, and with the fact that the South-Eastern and Chatham Company is not a wealthy one, and hence naturally inclined to make the profits of a practical monopoly counterbalance poor returns elsewhere.

And this brings us to our main point. Is not the South-Eastern and Chatham Company an exceptionally good case for Government ownership? Here we have the chief high road between England and the Continent in the hands of a corporation which is, apparently, unable to make the most out of it for the public, and can hardly be forced to do so without hardship and special pressure. What is the value of the whole concern? This, of course, is ground that is hardly safe, except to an expert financier, so we will not venture far.

The following facts are, however, at anyone's disposal: The nominal capital of the South-Eastern stands at about £33,000,000, and that of the London Chatham and Dover at about £30,000,000. But the price of the different kinds of stock is so much below par that it would seem scarcely rash to think it could all be acquired by the State for not so much over £30,000,000. And the net profits are over £2,000,000 a year. Very likely the State would not make that amount of profit out of it, but at all events it could make quite an adequate profit to pay the interest on the capital outlay.

In any case it would be a striking and favourably placed experiment in State railways, and would be quite worth watching for a period before the country were to embark upon, or even consider, the vast and perhaps impracticable task of taking over the British railways as a whole, with their £1,300,000,000 of nominal capital.

But we are very far from thinking that this exhausts the case in favour of the nationalisation of the South-Eastern and Chatham. Is there not a strategic aspect of the question as well? Lord Kitchener and other scientific Generals know well the important part that railways play in the modern campaign. Now, it so happens that this line is more closely in touch with our military stations than any other. Dover, Shorncliffe, Canterbury, Chatham, Woolwich and Aldershot are all situated at different points on this system, and in all these cases, except the last, it is the only line that runs to the place.

Perhaps it would be no inconsiderable advantage to have the line connecting all these places, as well as others of some military importance, in the hands of the Government. Besides, improvements would then be made for military reasons which would never be justified for financial reasons—for example, better arrangements for Woolwich, a loop-line east and west at Redhill, and similar things. And with regard to the conveyance of troops, it is quite possible that the saving of expense would be a considerable amount.

Railway affairs are not usually thought to lie in the region of sentiment. Still, there is no doubt that it is far from flattering to national feeling that the first acquaintance of a foreign visitor with English railways, sometimes vaunted as the best in the world, should be under the conditions which obtain at present at Dover or Folkestone, where an exceptional amount of trouble and inconvenience has to be faced in order to get into an exceptionally uncomfortable and out-of-date train. When we are proud of our railways, we have in mind, perhaps, the go-ahead dash of the Great Western, or the machine-like regularity and smoothness of the North-Western. Why can we not have equally good trains on the chief high road to the Continent?

TRY to think of a bright, strong, and compact little machine weighing but 5 lbs., and you may be able to form an idea of the new and wonderful aluminium 'Blick' Typewriter, which is carried in its handsome leather case, with compartments for stationery by many when travelling.

When one considers that the ordinary Typewriter weighs about 30 lbs., one marvels at the lightness, compactness, and durability of the 'Blick,' which, for clear, rapid, visible, and perfect writing, stands without a rival, even when classed with other typewriters that cost twice or thrice as much.

But the convenience of its portability is one of its strongest features; and that is why the clergy, war correspondents, journalists, and literary and military men, commercial travellers, and many others, have so readily adopted the 'Blick.' Then, in the boudoir or library the 'Blick,' which is always bright and ready for use, is to many indispensable.

You can write on the 'Blick' in any language, including all European and most Oriental, such as Hebrew, etc., and in any style or size of type. Moreover, you can use any of the various types on the same machine, changing at will and in an instant from one to the other.

The mastery of the 'Blick' can be accomplished in an hour. Only a little practice, and you will be able to write with the speed of an expert.

For a week's free trial at your home write to the address given below, and a new aluminium 'Blick' will be sent by return. You will be able to use it at once.

If you do not care to keep the machine after the free seven days' trial, you can return it, and you will be under no obligation whatever. The company undertakes to pay cost of carriage both ways to any part of the U.K., accepting all risk of damage in transit.

An illustrated booklet (No. 10) will be sent post free on application to the 'Blick' Co., Ltd., 9 & 10, Cheapside, London, E.C., or to the West-end Branch, 369, Oxford Street, London.

MATEO FALCONE * * * BY PROSPER MÉRIMÉE

PART I.

I.

On leaving Porto-Vecchio, and going towards the north-west, towards the interior of the island, you see the land rising rather suddenly, and after three hours' walking through winding paths, obstructed by great masses of rock, and sometimes intersected by ravines, you find yourself on the border of a very extensive "bush." The bush is the country of the Corsican shepherds and whoever is at variance with the law. You must know that the Corsican husbandman, in order to save himself the trouble of manuring his field, sets fire to a certain stretch of wood; so much the worse if the flames spread farther than is necessary; come what may, he is sure of having a good harvest, by sowing on this ground fertilised by the ashes of the trees that it contains. The ears picked off, the straw is left, as it would give trouble to reap it; the roots that have remained in the ground without being consumed grow up in the following spring, and these very thick sprouts in a few years reach a height of seven or eight feet. It is this kind of tangled undergrowth that is called the "bush." It is formed of different kinds of trees and shrubs, mixed and confused as it pleases God. It is only with an axe in the hand that a man can open up a passage there, and some of the bush is so thick, and so dense, that the wild sheep themselves cannot penetrate into it.

If you have killed a man, go into the bush of Porto-Vecchio, and you will live there in safety, with a good gun, some powder and shot; and do not forget a brown cloak provided with a hood, that will serve as a coverlet and a mattress. The shepherds will give you milk and cheese and some chestnuts, and you have nothing to fear from the law or the relatives of the deceased, except if you need to go down to the town to replenish your ammunition.

Mateo Falcone, when I was in Corsica in 18—, had his house half a league from the bush. He was a man, for the country, rather well off, living like a noble—that is to say, without doing anything—from the produce of his flocks that the shepherds, kind of nomads, led here and there to feed among the mountains. When I saw him, two years after the occurrence that I am just going to relate, he seemed to me to be fifty years of age at the most. Imagine to yourself a man, small but sturdy, with crisp hair, black as jet, an aquiline nose, thin lips, big fiery eyes, and a complexion of a dark brown colour. His skill as a shot was considered extraordinary, even in his own country, where there are so many good marksmen. For example, Mateo would never have shot at a wild sheep with buck-shot; but at a hundred paces he would bring it down with a ball in the head or the shoulder, as he chose. At night he used his weapons as cleverly as during the day, and this feat of skill told of him will perhaps appear incredible to those who have not travelled in Corsica. At eighty paces a lighted candle was placed behind a transparent paper the size of a plate. He took aim, then the candle was extinguished, and, at the end of a minute, in the most complete darkness, he fired, and pierced the transparency three times out of four. With such superior attainments, Mateo Falcone gained a great reputation. He was said to be as good a friend as he was a dangerous enemy; besides being obliging and given to charity, he lived in peace with everyone in the neighbourhood of Porto-Vecchio. But it is told of him at Corte, where he had taken a wife, that he had rid himself very forcibly of a rival who was considered as formidable in warfare as in love; at least, Mateo was credited with a certain gunshot that had surprised this rival as he was shaving himself in front of a little looking-glass hung at his window. The trouble dying down, Mateo got married. His wife, Giuseppa, had at first presented him with three girls (which annoyed him), and at length with a son, that he named Fortunato. He was the hope of the family, the inheritor of the name. The daughters were well married; their father could count, in case of need, on the poniards and the muskets of his sons-in-law. The son was only ten years old, but he already promised to be of a pleasing disposition.

II.

One day in autumn Mateo went out early with his wife in order to visit one of his flocks in a glade in the bush. Little Fortunato wished to accompany him, but the glade was too distant; besides, it was necessary that someone remained in order to watch the house. His father, therefore, refused. We shall see if he had not cause to repent of it.

He had been away for some hours, and little Fortunato was stretched peacefully in the sun, gazing at the blue mountains, and thinking that on the next Sunday he would be going to have dinner with his uncle, the corporal, when he was suddenly interrupted in his meditations by the sound of a firearm. He rose and turned towards the side of the plain from which the noise came. Other gunshots succeeded it, fired at irregular intervals, and always approaching nearer and nearer. At last, on the path that led from the plain to Mateo's house, a man appeared, dressed in a peaked cap such as the mountaineers wear, bearded, covered with rags, and dragging himself with difficulty, leaning on his musket. He had just received a shot in the thigh.

The man was a bandit, who, having set out at night to go and fetch some powder from the town, had, on the way, fallen into an ambush of the Corsican dragoons. After a vigorous defence, he had succeeded in making his escape, closely pursued, and firing from rock to rock. He was but little in advance of the soldiers, and his wound put him out of condition to reach the bush before being overtaken.

He approached Fortunato, and said to him:

"You are Mateo Falcone's son?"

"Yes."

"I am Gianetto Sanpiere. I am pursued by the Yellow Collars. Hide me, for I am not able to go farther."

"And what will my father say if I hide you without his permission?"

"He will say that you have done well."

"Who knows?"

"Hide me quickly; they are coming."

"Wait until my father has returned."

"What, wait? Curse it! They will be here in five minutes. Come, hide me, or I'll kill you!"

Fortunato answered him with the greatest coolness:

"Your gun is not loaded, and there are no more cartridges in your bandolier."

"I have my stiletto."

"But can you run as quickly as I?"

He jumped up, and put himself out of reach.

"You are not the son of Mateo Falcone! You will, then, allow me to be captured in front of your house?"

The child appeared touched.

"What will you give me if I hide you?" said he, drawing near.

The bandit searched in a leathern pouch that hung at his belt, and drew from it a five-franc piece, that he had doubtless reserved in order to buy powder. Fortunato smiled at the sight of the piece of silver; he took it, and said to Gianetto:

"Fear nothing!"

He soon made a big hole in a pile of hay lying near the house. Gianetto cowered down in it, and the child covered him in such a way as would allow him air for breathing, without, however, arousing suspicion that the hay concealed a man. He bethought himself, moreover, of a native craftiness rather ingenious. He went and took the cat and its kittens, and placed them on the pile of hay, in order to make believe that it had not been disturbed for some time. Then, noticing some traces of blood on the path, near the house, he covered them carefully with dust, and, that done, he lay down again in the sun with the greatest calmness.

Some minutes afterwards, six men in a brown uniform with a yellow collar, and commanded by an adjutant, were before Mateo's door. This adjutant was a relation of some kind of Falcone (you know that in Corsica they observe the degrees of relationship much more than elsewhere). He was called Tiodoro Gamba, and was an active man, much dreaded by the bandits, of whom he had already tracked several.

III.

"Good-day, little cousin," said he to Fortunato, on coming up: "how you have grown! Did you see a man pass just now?"

"Oh! I am not yet so big as you, cousin!" replied the child, with a simple look.

"That will come. But did you not see a man pass, tell me?"

"If I have seen a man pass?"

"Yes, a man with a peaked cap of black velvet and a vest embroidered with red and yellow?"

"A man with a peaked cap and a vest embroidered with red and yellow?"

"Yes, answer quickly, and don't repeat my questions."

"This morning M. le curé passed in front of our door on his horse Picro. He asked me how papa was, and I told him. . . ."

"Ah! You little rogue; you are playing the knave! Tell me quickly which way Gianetto went, for it is he that we are searching for; and I am certain he took this path."

"Who knows?"

"Who knows? I know that you saw him."

"Can you see who passes when you are asleep?"

"You were not sleeping, you rascal; the shots must have wakened you!"

"You think, then, cousin, that your guns make such a noise? My father's musket makes a deal more."

"The devil confound you, you cursed scapegrace! I am sure that you have seen Gianetto. Perhaps even hid him. Come, comrades, enter the house and see if our man is not there. He was only going on one foot, and he has too much sense, the rascal, to try and reach the bush while limping. Besides, the traces of blood stop here."

"And what will papa say if he knows that you have entered his house while he was away?"

"Rascal!" said the adjutant, taking him by the ear, "do you know that it only remains for me to make you change your tune? Perhaps if I were to give you twenty strokes with the flat of my sword you would speak then."

And Fortunato still sneered.

"My father is Mateo Falcone!" said he with emphasis.

"You know well, little rogue, that I can carry you off to Corte or to Bastia? I will make you sleep in a dungeon, on straw, with irons on your feet, and I will have you guillotined, if you don't tell me where Gianetto Sanpiero is."

The child burst out laughing at this ridiculous threat. He repeated:

"My father is Mateo Falcone."

"Adjutant," said one of the dragoons quite low, "do not let us fall out with Mateo."

IV.

Gamba appeared distinctly embarrassed. He spoke in a low tone with his soldiers, who had already searched the house. This was not a big job, for a Corsican's cabin consists only of one square room. The furniture is made up of a table, the beds, some boxes, and the utensils of the chase or the household. Meanwhile, Fortunato caressed his cat, and appeared to enjoy maliciously the confusion of the dragoons and his cousin.

A soldier approached the pile of hay. He saw the cat there, and carelessly gave a thrust with his bayonet into the hay, shrugging his shoulders the while, as if he felt that his precaution were foolish. Nothing moved; and the face of the child did not betray the slightest emotion.

The adjutant and his troop began to swear; already they were looking seriously at the side of the plain, as if disposed to return the way they had come, when their chief, convinced that threats would not produce any effect on the son of Falcone, wished to make a last effort, and to try the power of flattery and presents.

"Little cousin," said he, "you seem a wide-awake fellow! You will go far. But you're playing a dirty trick on me; and if I were not afraid of making trouble with my cousin Mateo I should carry you off with me."

"Bah!"

"But when my cousin will have returned, and I tell him of the affair, for your punishment for having lied, he will give you the whip till the blood comes."

"We'll see!"

"You will see. . . . But stop, . . . be a good boy, and I'll give you something."

"I say, cousin, I'll give you some advice, and it is this: if you delay longer, Gianetto will be in the bush; and then it will take a cleverer man than you to go and search for him."

The adjutant drew a silver watch, worth about ten crowns, from his pocket; and, noticing that little Fortunato's eyes sparkled on seeing it, he said to him, while holding the watch suspended at the end of its steel chain:

"You rogue! You should indeed have a watch like this one hung round your neck, and you could walk through the streets of Porto-Vecchio as proud as a peacock; and the people would ask you: 'What time is it?' and you would say to them: 'Just look at my watch.'"

"When I'm big, my uncle, the corporal, will give me a watch."

"Yes, but your uncle's son has one already . . . and of a truth it is not so fine as this one here. . . . But, then, he is younger than you."

The child sighed.

"Very well; do you want this watch, little cousin?"

Fortunato, looking longingly at the watch with the corner of his eye, resembled a cat that has been offered a whole fowl. As she feels that she is being made a fool of, she does not dare to put out her paw, and from time to time she turns away her eyes in order not to be liable to succumb to the temptation; but she licks her chops every moment, and seems to say to her owner, "My, but your joke is cruel!"

However, Adjutant Gamba seemed to offer his watch in good faith. Fortunato did not put out his hand, but he said to him with a sad smile:

"Why do you make a fool of me?"

"By God! I'm not making a fool of you. Only tell me where Gianetto is and the watch is yours."

A smile of incredulity escaped Fortunato, and, fixing his black eyes on those of the adjutant, he endeavoured to read there the faith that he must have in his words.

"What? I'll lose my epaulette," cried the adjutant, "if I do not give you the watch on this condition! My comrades are witnesses, and I cannot go back on my word."

While speaking thus he always brought the watch nearer, until it almost touched the pale cheek of the child. The latter's face showed clearly the struggle that was going on in his heart between covetousness and the respect due to hospitality. His naked bosom swelled with emotion, and it seemed almost to choke him. Meantime, the watch was swinging, turning, and sometimes knocking against the front of his nose. "At last, little by little, his right hand rose towards the watch; the tips of his fingers touched it, and it rested entirely in his hand, without, however, the adjutant letting go the end of the chain . . . the face was azure . . . the case newly polished . . . in the sun it seemed all on fire. . . The temptation was too great.

Fortunato also raised his left hand and indicated with his thumb, over his shoulder, the pile of hay on which he was resting. The adjutant understood at once. He let go the end of the chain; Fortunato felt himself the sole possessor of the watch. He rose with the agility of a deer and removed ten paces from the pile of hay, that the dragoons began to throw down at once.

It was not long before the hay was seen to move, and a bleeding man, poniard in hand, came out; but when he tried to lift his foot his wound benumbed it and would not permit him to remain standing. He fell. The adjutant threw himself on him and snatched away his stiletto. They at once bound him securely, in spite of his resistance.

Gianetto, lying on the ground, and tied like a fagot, turned his head towards Fortunato.

"Son of . . . !" said he to him, with as much contempt as of anger.

The child threw him the piece of silver that he had received, feeling that he had ceased to merit it; but the outlaw had no appearance of paying attention to this move. He said to the adjutant with the greatest coolness:

"My dear Gamba, I cannot walk; you will be obliged to carry me to the town."

"Just a little ago you ran quicker than a buck," retorted his cruel conqueror. "But be easy, I am so pleased to have caught you that I could carry you a league on my back without being fatigued. For the rest, my friend, we are going to make you a litter with branches and your cloak; and at Crespoli farm we shall find some horses."

"Good," said the prisoner, "put a little straw into your litter also, so that I may be more comfortable."

CORRESPONDENCE

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Owing to the large number of letters received it is necessary for correspondents to write briefly if their letters are to appear.

THE CONTINENTAL SUNDAY.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Two leading errors heavily discount the article on "The Continental Sunday" in your issue of June 6th. (1) That it is possible for the individual to have a true day of rest independently of the community of which he is a member. (2) That promiscuous rest days are or can be any substitute for the Sabbath as observed by nations with appreciable religious vitality.

Those whose work entails alternate day and night duty tell us how practically impossible it is to get any true rest in the day-time, when the general whirl and bustle of life is going on all around them. It is only because the observance of Sunday as a day of rest is general, that it is a day of rest at all in any available sense. The calm, all-pervading peace of the Holy-day, due to the suspension of the rush and humdrum of ordinary work-a-day business life, is not only necessary to the health of the human soul, but to that of mind and body also. Those who can think of it only as a day of exemption from business duties, to be spent in mere frivolous recreation and physical enjoyment, do not know what Sunday is, and are to be commiserated on their conscious deficiency. Sunday, properly understood, is related to a special department of human consciousness—the moral and higher spiritual emotions, the neglect, disregard and consequent atrophy of which is dehumanising, and most disastrous in its effects upon human nature in all its relations, including physical health. To those deficient in religious consciousness the observance of religious rites may appear meaningless ceremonial, as art appears so to the inartistic, but the deficiency is in themselves. Thus, John Henry Newman was right in saying that atheists are less than ordinary normal men.

Although Christ said, "The Sabbath was made for man, not man for the Sabbath," in regard to doing any good required of us upon it, He recognised it as the spiritual day, for various passages show that He resorted to the temple on it.

"Six days I work, and eat, and sleep,
An automatic grind;
Emancipation Sunday brings
To body, soul, and mind."

So wrote a toiler in a prize competition some years ago.

"The rush of life is to be diligent in business; the hush of life is to be fervent in spirit," said the late Marianne Farningham.—I am, sir, etc.,

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—It is very refreshing to meet in print a cleric who, whilst maintaining the dignity of his calling, is sufficiently imbued with the growing democratic spirit of the age as to be actually broad-minded. I do not use the word "broad-minded" in its hackneyed sense, but rather as an expression of surprise that, for the ninety-and-nine Sabbatarian priests, the one just man has discovered himself. The Rev. Father Adderley needs no trumpet to proclaim his whereabouts, because he has out-heralded the herald in the bold to smokers of choice cigars

10,000 of these 10/- cabinets of samples from the Largest Mail Order Cigar House in the World FREE

Send no money

Here is a unique opportunity for every smoker to experiment with twenty cigars and find—at no cost to himself—just the cigar which suits his palate and his purse.

This deliberate choice of the right cigar at the right price after the most careful selection is a far better method than the old extravagant way of carelessly buying single cigars. The casual way is an expensive way since the smoker is often tempted to pay a higher price than he originally intended when he entered the shop, because he does not see anything he fancies at his own figure.

Smokers, therefore, will eagerly seize this splendid opportunity of finding "just the right cigar."

How to get the Cabinet

Send no money. Just apply on your headed note-paper (or enclose your visiting card), together with the Request form, and the Cabinet will be sent to you at once, post paid.

If, after smoking all the twenty cigars it contains, you decide to purchase a box of 100 (even if only at 15/- per 100), no charge whatever is made for the 10/- Cabinet of Samples.

On the other hand, if you should not wish to purchase 100 of these cigars, then you have to send 6/6 only for the 10/- worth of samples.

In other words, we will share the cost of the experiment with you.

So you see you get something either way.

You get 10/- worth free if you order 100 cigars.

You get 3/6 worth free if you only keep the 20 samples.

Please understand there is no obligation to purchase 100—you do just-as-you-please.

The expense entailed in the distribution is naturally so great that we must adhere strictly to the "one-man-one-cabinet" rule, and anyone who wishes for a second cabinet must pay the full price of 10/-.

A Cabinet of Pleasure

Martins "Cabinet of Samples" contains 20 cigars of all sizes, all shapes, all flavours, and all prices. You are, therefore, sure to find a cigar that is just your idea of what a good cigar should be.

There is the Regal Ideales, over half a foot long. There is the famous Upmann at 75/- per 100 and the Regal (Royales), at 100/- per 100, the kind of cigar that is smoked by Ambassadors or Cabinet Ministers at the Savoy or the Ritz.

But few men can afford to smoke such magnificent tobacco all day and every day, and so the Cabinet includes little after-breakfast cigars—the Porto Santo at 15/- per 100 and the Chez Nous at 18/- per 100, which can be smoked in the Tube or in the train on the way to the office.

You are the Judge

If you like a cigar—it's a good cigar. If you don't like it—it's a bad cigar. There is no getting away from that fact, no matter what any expert may say.

This sample box contains twenty cigars of different shapes, different sizes, different flavours and different prices; therefore you are sure to find in this box a cigar that is just your idea of what a good cigar should be.

And that is our reason for making you this generous offer.

utterance of his views. A sacerdotalist who so far forgets his sacerdotalism as to be rational.

The very words "Continental Sunday" (or "Continental" anything else) seem to quite upset the recognised English canons of good taste, and to send a thrill of horror through the denizens of this island. Our ultra-traditional breasts rise with indignation at any attempt to bring about a more satisfactory state of things, or to tamper in any way with the prescriptions of our forefathers.

One wonders how long this hypocritical, smug self-righteousness is to continue, because the average Englishman cares no more for the observance of Sunday than the "heathen Chinee," but as an institution for enabling him to wear his best clothes it is admirable, and therefore deserves commendation.

Mind you, I do not cavil at those who sincerely regard Sunday as their opportunity of getting nearer to spiritual things, but I have nothing but contempt for that section of the community who defend the day as a means of promulgating their "gospel" of Sabbatarianism, and very often Sabbatarianism gone mad.

In interestedly discussing Father Adderley's article with a friend, he comes to the following conclusion, which now adorns my copy of EVERYMAN, and which I quote for its terse straightforwardness of opinion: "If people want to go to church on Sunday, let them go; but, at the same time, if other people want to enjoy themselves, let them have the facilities and opportunities for doing so. If every person is guaranteed one day's rest in the seven, it does not make any difference whether it be Sunday or any other day so long as he gets it."

I wonder how many there be who concur?—I am, sir, etc., A. LEO. PEACOCK.

New Brighton,

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—For six years I was a 'bus and tram conductor, and so know just what it means to have to work on Sundays. I wish that the Rev. James Adderley, who wrote the article "The Continental Sunday," in your issue of the 6th inst., had a like experience. He would have learned that no other day in the week can make up to a man of religious inclinations the loss of Sunday.

He says, "We all agree that we want a weekly rest. Why should we quarrel over the particular day, and why should we try to coerce our fellows in the name of religion?" May I reply, "Why should I or others be coerced, in the name of rationalism, into working to provide enjoyment or amusement for other people on the day which, in spite of the Rev. James Adderley, I believe to be set apart by God as a day of rest?"

Let the writer of the article be as rational and as broad-minded as he likes; but not at the expense of my conscience or labour, please.—I am, sir, etc.,

THE SUFFRAGE QUESTION.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Your correspondent, E. P. Thomas, speaks as if Cabinet ministers and ordinary M.P.'s had some kind of right to withhold just legislation, in order to punish a few people of whom they disapprove. How can this be? These gentlemen are the paid servants of the State, and receive wages for making laws, just as a carpenter is paid for making a door or a dressmaker for making a frock. Neither the carpenter nor the dressmaker can morally take the money and refuse to do the work. Nor can M.P.'s do so in honour either, nor is it necessary. The State is surely amply provided with means of keeping ordinary people to their duty—armies of policemen, judges, magistrates, courts of law, prisons—and if this apparatus fails, new laws can be passed, and soldiers in the last extremity called out to enforce them. What more can be wanted? Surely the House of Commons may well confine itself to its own obligations. Mr. Thomas talks of members not being coerced. But the fact that they are taking money coerces them. Honesty coerces them, honour coerces them.—I am, sir, etc., L. E. TURQUAND.

Anckerley, S.E.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Your four anti-Suffrage correspondents have given us a very miscellaneous set of arguments on their side as against one militant. May I try to equalise the balance?

In the first place, the writer of your original article is surely under a misapprehension when she considers that the militants are trying to demonstrate that women are not inferior to men in physical force. Of course, men are superior in this respect; elephants beat them both. It is precisely for this reason that the militants are demonstrating, with complete success, that physical force is, in this matter, worse than useless. They have forced the Government to this final appeal, the only ground of admitted superiority that they have left; and they have shown, in the most practical manner possible, that, where a just cause is concerned, coercion and persecution only further it.

This brings me to a sentence, at the end of Mr. Thomas's delightful letter, in which he sees no guarantees that "similar methods . . . will not be employed to further causes of questionable worthiness." Let me assure him that he will have to go far before he will find another cause whose advocates are prepared to undergo the tortures that the militants have undergone; and if he does find such a cause I hardly think its worthiness will be questionable. But suppose there were such an admittedly bad case, there would be no question of forcible feeding; the prisoners would be simply allowed to die. After all, Gamaliel's advice is, as Miss Shillito says, the best in this affair.

Mr. Thomas's other two points are typically Victorian. There is, first of all, this horrible conception of a complete divorce between a man's views and his actions, or "tactics," as Mr. Thomas calls them. I am afraid that many members never had the views they professed on this question, but if they had, my simple nature demands that they should have stuck up for them.

Then, again, there is this picture of the stern, strong man "enforcing his will," a picture which I regret to say always makes me laugh. And yet it is no laughing matter when one realises the uncomfortable truth that it is generally the woman who, by a careful study of the art of playing on man's sex instincts, has done most of the "enforcing." It was her only way.

With regard to the other letters, lack of space prevents me from doing more than recommend to Mr. Jones' attention the fact that the Labour Party is solid for the vote. I utterly disagree that we could well do without our University women, or even without the militants.—I am, sir, etc.,

“EVERYMAN” HOLIDAYS.

“EVERYMAN” PARIS HOLIDAY.

A WEEK'S PERSONALLY CONDUCTED TOUR TO PARIS.

Those readers of EVERYMAN who have been delighted by the articles recently appearing in our columns from the versatile pen of the editor, on PARIS, in the “Historic Cities of the World” series, have doubtless turned longing eyes to this city of a thousand fascinations, and have ardently wished to see all that it offers in the way of enjoyment and knowledge.

TO PARIS WITH “EVERYMAN”

EVERYMAN tours make your ambition possible. We have arranged with a private touring company for a delightful week in Paris for our readers, leaving London on July 12th, with many magnificent excursions and opportunities to explore this historic city, for an inclusive sum of £5 5s.

THE CITY BEAUTIFUL.

Paris is undoubtedly the most interesting of Continental cities; to-day it is a vast metropolis of almost three million souls, and offers to travellers within its gates sights and scenes surpassing any in the world.

We are apt to speak of Paris as a city of gaiety, of reckless pleasure, and irresponsible amusement.

This it may be, but it is infinitely more than this; it is a city of entrancing historic interest, a city of stately buildings and glorious streets, of magnificent parks planned around a river unrivalled for beauty in the whole of Europe.

HISTORY.

Every inch of Paris is historic, memories of the past cluster closely around its streets and buildings. The bright centre of Paris, the Place de la Concorde, has taken the place of the Place de la Revolution, where the guillotine once stood, and the Eiffel Tower rears its ugly head above the Champ de Mars—the black prison of the Conciergerie, where Marie Antoinette once languished, still frowns from the island in the Seine, and the shabby gardens of the Palais Royale enshrine the memory of Camille Desmoulins and the early days of the Revolution.

PARIS AT NIGHT.

The evening at Paris is the most impressive of all. Seated at a table at the Café de la Paix by the Opera, a Parisian will tell you you are at the centre of the world, and, if you wait long enough, every one of your acquaintance will pass in time. Be this as it may, the gay, laughing procession—the myriad lights—and the subtle, though compelling, atmosphere of Paris—haunt the recollection of the visitor beyond any other memory.

VERSAILLES.

VERSAILLES—its history so closely intertwined with that of Paris as to make it almost part of the Mother-City—is an important feature in the programme of the visitor, and EVERYMAN has arranged for a long day to be spent in the great palace of Louis Quatorze, and in the Park, with the Trianons and the toy village where Marie Antoinette played with her Court whilst the Revolution raged in the Faubourgs of the City.

EXCURSIONS.

The excursions in connection with the Paris week are exceedingly interesting and varied. Visits to Churches, Public Buildings, Picture Galleries, etc., alternate with drives and steamer trips.

ALL-DAY DRIVE in Paris, visiting the Church of Sacre Cœur, Parc des Buttes Chaumonts, Cemetery of Peré la Chaise, Place de la Bastille, Porte St. Denis, Porte St. Martin, the Opera (exterior), the Madeleine, Les Invalides and Napoleon's Tomb, Pont Alexandre III., the Trocadero, and Grand and Petit Palais (exterior), Champs Elysees, Arc de Triomphe, Park Monceau.

ALL-DAY DRIVE to VERSAILLES through the Bois de Boulogne, the Park of St. Cloud, and Ville D'Avray, visiting Palace and Park of Versailles, the Grand and Petit Trianons, the State Carriages, etc., returning via Sèvres.

SECOND ALL-DAY DRIVE in Paris, visiting the Hotel de Ville (exterior), Palais de Justice, St. Chapelle, Notre Dame, the Latin Quarter, the Pantheon, St. Etienne du Mont, St. Sulpice, the Luxembourg, the Bois de Boulogne, Bagatelle, the Grand Cascade.

STEAMER TRIP to ST. CLOUD.

INEXPENSIVE.

And the cost of this delightful week, including Return Travelling from London (via Newhaven and Dieppe), Second-class throughout, all Hotel Expenses (three meals daily), two Whole-day Drives in Paris, Whole-day Drive to Versailles, Steamer Trip to St. Cloud, Admission Fees to all Places of Interest visited, Services of Conductor, is only £5 5s.

“EVERYMAN” TOURS

to such interesting places as Lucerne and Grindelwald, Montreux-Territet, Chamonix, Rouen, and the Seine Valley, Flanders and the Ardennes, Holland and the Zuyder Zee, Bruges, etc., etc.

“EVERYMAN” INDEPENDENT TOURS.

The EVERYMAN system of independent tours is a most attractive form of touring abroad without a conductor, and yet with all the advantages of a conducted tour. The traveller forms his own party, or travels alone, and EVERYMAN makes all his arrangements and takes all worries and anxieties off his hands.

AN ATTRACTIVE SYSTEM.

The fundamental principle of this System is that the traveller should journey with as much comfort and absence of worry as if accompanied by the actual Courier.

Every traveller is supplied with a chart showing in separate columns, each day of his Tour, clearly: where he will Breakfast, where Lunch, where Dine, where Sleep, when he must leave such and such a place, the time the train leaves, what station, the time the train arrives at his next stopping-place, and any remarks necessary to help him in pursuing his way. This chart shows him all his journey from the point of departure to his return, so that he is able to say to any, from whom he wishes to hear, “shall be at — on the —th.”

CHOOSE YOUR OWN ROUTE

After the traveller has decided on his route, we quote him a rate for the whole journey, including every necessary expense, such as Hotel Accommodation (bedroom, light, and attendance), Breakfast, Lunch, and Dinner, Railway and Steamship Fares, Conveyances to and from Hotels and Stations, Guides where necessary and wanted, Carriage Drives and Excursions, etc.; and the only expense outside this is the traveller's own wine and gratuities. These two items, depending as they do on the individual, clearly cannot be included in the general charge.

AND YOUR OWN HOTELS.

Thus, then, the traveller is supplied with a chart for his journey, and knows just how much it will cost him, and carries nothing but a case with his name on, which is his identification to Hotels, and, of course, his Railway Tickets.

No coupons are carried, and the traveller may select his own Hotel prior to starting, if he has a preference.

Should he, in the course of his journey, wish to vary the itinerary and stay longer or less time in one place than at first arranged for, all he need do is to send on a postcard to his next stopping-place, and to EVERYMAN office, saying he will arrive so many days later or will arrive so many days earlier than they had already been advised of from London.

THE “EVERYMAN” BOOK.

A postcard will bring you the EVERYMAN book, which tells you all about our delightful Continental Holidays. Drop us a line to-day, and we will send it you at once.

G. L. BROWN.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Your correspondent, D. T. Jones, is evidently suffering from extreme youth when he speaks of his experiences of the women's movement. I am surprised he exhibits such ignorance of the rank and file of the workers in the movement, and if he would only take the trouble to read the daily papers, he would see there are no three particular types of women, but that all classes of women are in the work, from the women who sweat their lives out in the brick-making industry of the Black Country, at 7s. 6d. per week, to the Lady Constance Lyttelton.

The women of the countryside are in the movement, the wife of the mill-hand and the miner are there, and gradually the women, who, from the safety of comfortable homes, have been indifferent to this great question of the franchise for women, are awaking to the fact of their responsibility in the matter, and they are inquiring the reason why the militants suffer the hellish tortures to which they have been consigned during the past year or two.

Mr. D. T. Jones would do well to study the question from the woman's standpoint. His last statement, concerning "Statesmanship," is too good to be meddled with.

Wishing you every success with EVERYMAN.—I am, sir, etc., Manchester.
JOHN PACKER.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I should like to say a few words in reply to the letter, written by "C." in your issue of May 30th. He says that the movement to grant women the suffrage "is only supported by a very small minority." Now the figures he quotes show that on the percentages of those who voted for and against there is a difference of only 25 per cent. Further, he says "it is hardly necessary to say that those in favour of the extension of the suffrage would be most likely to reply." But surely those sincerely against are just as likely to assert their views as those in favour.

With regard to his point about militancy, I think Mr. Campbell's letter in the same issue, where he points out that before militancy the whole question was disregarded, is sufficient.—I am, sir, etc.,

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—With your permission I will quote a passage from Monsignor Benson's "Dawn of All," which is, to put it briefly, a forecast of what the world will be like sixty years hence, when, according to him, it will have become Christian in practice as well as in theory:—

"It was the enfranchisement of women that turned the tide once and for all."

"Do you mean that all women have the vote?"

"They are under the same conditions as men. There's a severe educational test now, of course. Not more than about one in seventy adults ever get the vote at all. But the result is that we're governed by educated persons."

I agree with Monsignor Benson that what we really want is that the franchise shall be thrown open to all classes and both sexes equally, for it is absurd to talk of democratic government that leaves half the nation totally unrepresented. But from the many that are called let the (comparatively) few be chosen. At present those who are to make the laws that we all have to obey are selected mainly by the uneducated and the half-educated. I do not agree that the educational test should be severe, for that would be unfair to the working classes, who have little leisure for study, and yet many of them are better acquainted with the social, industrial, and economic conditions of their class than mere rhetoricians. The severer test might be left for those who aspire to become candidates. I should like to ask our universal providers whether they would be willing to run their business on the lines on which the business of the nation is conducted, e.g., to let their managerial staff be elected by the rank and file of the employees, quite irrespectively of any fitness for the post. When a vacancy occurs in the said staff, do they institute a sort of "General Post," the ironmongery manager being sent to the lace department, and so on, which seems to be the method adopted when changes in the Cabinet are necessary. Would they consent to dispense altogether with female assistance, every department being run by men only? If not, why not, since those methods are thought good enough for the business of the nation? Are men really satisfied with their so-called representative system? Mr. Jones says: "Statesmanship is quite as discerning as it ever was," so I can only suppose they must be.

Personally, I think it matters very little whether a measure for woman suffrage or a measure demanding an educational test for electors and candidates is brought in first, as either would necessarily be followed by the other as a natural consequence; but whichever it is, "if 'twere well done when 'tis done, 'twere well it were done quickly," for the present situation is intolerable.—I am, sir, etc.,

OSCAR WILDE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Surely no one who knew Oscar Wilde will think of judging him by the same judgment we try other men by? What would be absurd self-opinion in an ordinary man was not so in him, because to speak so was his peculiar manner, and as such was recognised by all who knew him. I am not saying that this was an admirable trait in his character, for it certainly was not so, but Oscar Wilde is not to be measured by ordinary men's measure. He was as far above the generality of his fellows in many things as his prose was above that of the greater part of his contemporary writers. I do not think it was pride which led him to speak so of it. He was perfectly convinced, as most of his admirers were, that it was the best after Walter Pater's, and so he merely said so. I never heard that he claimed any intellectual gifts which he did not possess. The fact is that he gloried in them, and made no secret of it. After all, why should he? If a man can write anything comparable with the "Ballad of Reading Gaol," I cannot see why he should not be proud, in a literary sense, of it.—I am, sir, etc., works into Russian, and can state that his books were among the best selling fiction in this country. Some of Oscar Wilde's masterpieces, such as "The Picture of Dorian Grey," "De Profundis," "Salome," published in popular editions at 10 kopecks (2½d.) each, have had a circulation (in the last four to five years) from eighty to one hundred thousand each, and are still selling briskly. Wilde's comedies are constantly on the repertory of the Moscow and St. Petersburg Imperial State Theatres, not counting the innumerable provincial stages.

I can assure you that you will not find one educated person in Russia who has not read Wilde's works. I have received in the last seven to eight years hundreds of letters from quite unknown people all over Russia, with the expression of the strongest and sincerest admiration for one of "the greatest writers of the world."

I must frankly acknowledge that nearly all the letters of my correspondents, ranking from all classes of Russian life, contain many bitter comments on the treatment Wilde received in the hands of his countrymen.—I am, sir, etc.,

GEORGE BORROW.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—As he affirms himself to be a beginner in the subject, perhaps "D. B. G.," who writes in your issue of the 6th inst., will allow me to comment upon his letter.

(1) It has long been known to serious students of Romani that Borrow's knowledge of that language was not so thorough nor so unique as he himself liked to fancy. See, inter alia, F. H. Groome's Introduction to "Lavengro," 1901.

(2) The nomads of Caithness, as of the other counties of Scotland, are not pure-blooded gypsies, or even posh-rats, but tinkers, and their language is not Romani, but Cant. The sources of this speech are Romani, Shelta, Gaelic, Old English Cant, and local dialect words. I have gathered together from all the sources known to me (varying in date from 1819 to 1912, and in locality from Northumberland to Orkney) a list of over eight hundred words, and the proportion of Romani is about one-fourth. If "D. G. B." does not intend to publish his list himself, I should be deeply indebted to him if he would allow me to incorporate it in my glossary, which is to be published, with what Borrow would call "notes critical and philological," in the Journal of the Gypsy Lore Society.—I am, sir, etc., Orkney.
ALEX. RUSSELL, M.A.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Your correspondent "D. B. G." may be interested to learn that the gypsy tongue does not "flourish unheard of in our midst." On the contrary, the existence of the gypsy language is a matter of common knowledge.

"D. B. G." should read Borrow's "Romano Larelil" (Murray, 1s.), which gives a vocabulary of Romany used amongst the gypsies of this country in Borrow's time, together with many interesting notes on the manners and customs and the origin of this singular people. In this book will be found probably all the words recorded by "D. B. G." in his intercourse with the gypsies of Caithness. Leland's book, which is generally considered to be more scientific, and Burton's notes on the gypsies in his "The Jew, the Gypsy, and El Islam," will also interest "D. B. G."

In Borrow's time the vocabulary of the Romany in this country consisted of about 1,400 words, and, true to his prophecy of the decline of gypsyism in this country, this number has decreased until at the present time few gypsies are familiar with their own tongue.

On the Continent the gypsy vocabulary is more extensive, and has been studied scientifically, and although Borrow's work is out of date, it still remains unique from the fact that its author was the first "gorgio" to study and reduce to writing the gypsy language, and to indicate its affinity with Sanskrit and suggest the Indian origin of the gypsies.

The word "gypsy" is a corruption of "Egyptian," by which name the Romany called themselves when they invaded this country in the fifteenth century. The artful story of their expulsion from Egypt was believed, and they were protected by the best families (which accounts for the names of Boswell, Lovel, Stanley, etc., common amongst them) until the reports of certain Romany practices were noised abroad, when severe laws were enacted against them and persecution became common.

The "Gypsy Lore Society" (what better memorial could Borrow wish?) was formed for the study and protection of gypsies, and your correspondent will find much that will interest him in the society's publications and aims.

In conclusion, may one venture to ask that the versatile Editor of EVERYMAN will command Mr. Hermann to write an article on the peculiar influence of the gypsies upon Borrow?—I am, sir, etc., W. S. London.

TRAFFIC IN WOMEN.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Your correspondent "C. N. B." seems to assume that if women had votes the White Slave Traffic would instantly, or at any rate soon, vanish, and quite overlooks the point of the letter to which she replies, which pointed out that, with all their talk, the women have no method to suggest of making it vanish. One very important point nearly always overlooked in such discussions is the fact that the whole business is as much the will of the women concerned as the men, as is shown by the results of efforts to lift them from that life to a higher one which would involve harder work. Let me quote from Nelson's "Life of General Booth" of the work of the Salvation Army: "Upon professional vice it has, indeed, little influence. An eloquent little table in one of its latest reports confirms Mr. Charles Booth's judgment of the hopelessness of that particular problem. The table runs:—Number of girls spoken with on streets, 3,706; sent to Salvation Army Homes, 18." Presumably all these were offered a chance of honourable life and work, and, if they would not take it, is it likely that if they and the rest had votes they would use them to abolish or make harder their own means of livelihood, which they choose not to abandon when the chance is given?

No doubt it is terribly true that many girls, through lack of proper instruction, are entrapped, and then in fear go off from those who should help them, but their number is probably not greater than the young men whom they in turn entice, and some of whom, in their turn, become those to entrap others. And who is most to blame? We must admit that there are evil men, and women, in the world, and in one sense the blame is theirs; but to simply blame them won't improve them. In another sense those mothers who don't properly educate their daughters and exercise proper guardianship over them until they reach an age of responsibility, and who cause their daughters to so

AN APPEAL TO EVERYMAN

THE PROBLEM OF THE CRIPPLED CHILD.

The recent letter from Sir William Treloar in our columns, following upon Miss Matheson's appealing verses, must have brought the problem of the crippled child before our readers, in a newer and stronger light than ever before.

Pathetic indeed is the thought of so many little ones deprived of all the beauty and nobility of life, representing so great a contrast to the picture of a sound and healthy nation that idealists have brought before us, and the fact that there is a hospital in this country where over ninety per cent. of cases are cured, should make such an institution the objective of the helpful in no half-hearted manner.

This Institution, the Cripples' Hospital and College, at Alton, Hampshire, represents, perhaps, the sole effective bulwark against the ravages of tuberculosis of the bones and joints—one of the most dreadful and painful diseases which could possibly attack a little child.

We learn that since the opening of this Institution, no fewer than six hundred and fifty children suffering from osseous tuberculous disease have been discharged cured, and as healthy and strong as any child one could wish to see.

This work is going on every day, but this is not directly the most effective way of assisting in the cause of the children. The plain fact is that there is—as Sir William Treloar pointed out—a list of waiting applicants so large that some of the little sufferers have to await admission for so long a time that their chances of recovery are very seriously jeopardised.

This distressing state of affairs can only be remedied by effecting an increase in the nursing staff, and this is impossible until proper accommodation can be found for them.

Sir William Treloar says, our readers will recollect:

"The forty cots now vacant could be at once filled, and many more young lives saved, if additional nurses could be engaged and accommodated.

"Her Majesty Queen Alexandra, who graciously takes a keen interest in the welfare of the Institution, has generously headed the list of subscribers to the Nurses' Home with a contribution of £100. In these circumstances, I would earnestly plead for your readers' help towards establishing the Nurses' Home."

An appeal such as this cannot be lost upon EVERYMAN readers, who are assured that their contributions will be used economically and well in the furtherance of so great a cause, especially as the great London and provincial hospitals, owing to the length of time occupied in effecting a cure, have to treat such cases as out-patients, with consequently unsatisfactory results.

Sir William Treloar will be very thankful to acknowledge contributions, however small, from EVERYMAN readers, who are earnestly asked to send what they can.

regard them that in trouble they will flee from those to whom they should turn, are as much to blame.

Votes and laws may defend the weak, and man-made laws are now severe for the purpose of preventing evil men from taking advantage of mothers' neglect of duty in such matters; but it is almost impossible to prevent people doing anything which is the wish of both persons so long as they don't interfere with anyone else. The only way that will be successful is the religious method. Educate the people to high ideals. Give the young men and maidens a noble conception of life, especially of the ideal principles of marriage, and the beauty of home life, and the respective duties of each sex in relation to the home, and they will be safe. Then, by enlarging the number of those who hold such ideals, the whole world will be saved in time. This is work that can be best advanced by the influence of women. It is a hundred times more potent than making laws, which can never go much ahead of public opinion, and so every effort that women withdraw from that to devote to politics is 99 per cent. wasted energy.—I am, sir, etc.,

A. B. C.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Miss Nina Boyle urges us to give woman the vote, so that she can "try what can be done," presumably to end white slavery. Man, she thinks, has grievously failed in this respect. But what about woman? Her record is every bit as black as man's, although her sin may be of omission instead of commission. Miss Boyle's remedy is apparently the "law." You cannot make people moral by Act of Parliament. But you can accomplish much by example, by suasion, and moral force. It is just this which woman makes no serious attempt to use. She cannot now plead ignorance of facts which are well known. As a Suffragist she does not want to. Such facts are useful to her (she imagines) as a lever for obtaining the vote. When she has the vote she will compel man to live a different life. Till then she will still continue her customary treatment of the "white slave" and the "consumer." The one may still look in vain for the real helping hand from the real sister, still have no better alternative than the Rescue laundry. The other, woman will still receive as an honoured guest, as a fit companion for her growing girls and boys, a fit husband for her grown-up daughters—for herself!

If all the energies which militant Suffragists dissipate on property-wrecking, if the vital force they squander on hunger-striking were used in a great and sane campaign against the White Slave Traffic—against the consumer and for the white slave—they would earn the undying gratitude of every decent-minded man and woman in the country. More than this. Honourable men of every shade of political opinion would say, "If this is what woman can do—has done—shall we not welcome her to our counsels, take advantage of her assistance in making and administering laws for the benefit of our race?"

Is it not worth her while to try this saner method of conversion?—I am, sir, etc.,

THE SURPLUSAGE OF WOMEN.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—In an article on "The Surplusage of Women" "A. D." seems to overlook one important and real factor causing this surplus of women. It is not only on account of there being too few men to go round, due to all causes whatsoever, that women enter the field of labour, claiming equal work with men, and take active part in public movements. Many of them do work, splendid work we could ill dispense with, far better than men, and work which can only be done by those who are able to devote their whole lives to it.

But the real reason why fewer women marry is that the women of to-day almost everywhere have far higher ideals as regards love and marriage, and, being able to work, prefer to live on what they earn by honest toil than marry unworthily for the sake of a homestead. Women have more courage and spirit now than to sit idle doing nothing, waiting for a love they perhaps may never find, leading useless lives when there is so much beautiful work to be done, for when woman's share in life is fully recognised and its true worth acclaimed, then will Love come into his own, and shall we cease to claim that labour which is not our province.—I am, sir, etc.,

THE DECLINING BIRTH-RATE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I am quite perplexed by Mr. P. W. von Herbert's statement, that "while the fall in the birth-rate is real, that in the death-rate is illusory." Can Mr. Chiozza Money and the Registrar-General and the Medical Officers of Health all be wrong in their observation that the death-rate is really falling? And how explain the fact that, as you say on p. 258, "the population of England and Wales has been increasing by leaps and bounds since the beginning of the nineteenth century, and the increase has never been greater than during the first decade of the twentieth century"? Mr. von Herbert's answer would seem to be the lugubrious one that the "fall in the (illusory and so-called) death-rate only shows an increase in life duration"! What are we, your happy and hopeful readers, striving for but "an increase in life duration"? So may the birth-rate go on falling until the poor, as well as the rich, are able to enjoy "an increase in life duration."—I am, sir, etc.,

PEOPLE AND PUPPETS

THE author of "Queed" has issued a new novel. His previous book was so notable a production that the occasion of a fresh work excites interest to a marked extent. Mr. Sidney Harrison showed such force and power in his first achievement that one anxiously awaited the second fruits of his talent. V. V.'S EYES (Constable, 6s.) does not bear out the brilliance of the author's promise. A clever book, instinct with subtlety of style and marked capacity for characterisation, it lacks the directness and the dramatic reality of "Queed."

The hero is in effect a Christ-like character, untouched by human frailty, unflawed by human passion or desire, and though we admire the skill with which the author handles his puppet, the fact remains that the lame slum doctor on whom Mr. Harrison has lavished so much care and skill remains a puppet to the end of the chapter. V. V., the nickname bestowed on the hero by his devoted patients, those dwellers in the slums for whom he sacrifices his life, is a man with a mission. He does not preach in words; he makes converts by the force of example, and brings people of divers temperaments and opinions to his point of view by being "better" than they. He is in effect a modern Nemesis, who exhibits to the untruthful and unthinking the pitiable effects of their mistakes and misdeeds. In this capacity he appears to the heroine, Carlisle Heth, a beautiful, high-spirited young woman, who asks nothing better than to make a brilliant marriage. She and her mother have made plans for the enslavement of Hugo Canning, an aristocratic and wealthy young man. He is the typical hero of romance, and, remembering the author's rare talent for creation, one grudges the elaboration spent on the development of this walking gentleman.

Carlisle has a summer flirtation with a youth name Jack Dalhousie. She brushes him aside when Hugo appears, and Jack, in a passion of jealous resentment, demands an explanation. He swims out to the boat where she is exhibiting her grace and skill for the benefit of Hugo, who is momentarily expected on the scene. She treats him with indifference and contempt, and he jumps overboard, upsetting the boat in his rage. He swims to shore unconscious she is in the water, and learns with horror what he has done. He had been drinking, and was not responsible for what had happened.

Rumour brands him as a coward, and he is cut generally by society. V. V. appears to Carlisle, and implores her to tell the truth of the matter. She refuses, not once or twice, but three times in succession, until at last the force of circumstance compels her. Jack commits suicide, and in a passion of regret she clears his memory, and incidentally loses her lover, Hugo Canning. That the book is well written goes without saying. Mr. Harrison has an incision of style, and a pungency of phrasing that make him notable. Where it not that he has furnished us with a standard whereby to measure his achievements, we should have unstinted praise for his new novel, but "Queed" restrains us. The minor characters of the story are drawn with vividity and humour. Mrs. Heth, the woman whose eyes and brow seemed spirituelle, until a glance at her powerful chin and firm, closed mouth obliterated the adjective, is the most successful type of the modern woman who applies to matrimonial schemes the same vigour and capacity she uses with such effect in the money market. Carlisle herself, complex and exotic, wearies a little with her childish moods and fancies, her perpetual straining after "the best." The little daughter of the slums, who dances in and out of V. V.'s life, is a triumphant vindication of Mr. Harrison's skill. She is alive from the first moment we meet her, dressed in her fantastic scarlet skirt, till we leave her with regret in the chamber where the slum doctor lies dead.

For the end of V. V. is inevitably tragic. He loses his life in saving a poor old negro woman in an accident at the Heth factory, owned by Carlisle's father, who cannot afford to rebuild his works and lavish money on his expensive daughter at one and the same time. Carlisle, at the finish, surrenders to the dominance of V. V.—the dominance that lies in his eyes, the eyes that look you through and through.

It is in the closing scene that the author regains in some measure that sweeping eloquence that stirred one so profoundly in his first book. He fills his canvas with a conflicting crowd of human emotions, then throws the light on a single figure and sets a phrase as signpost for the whole.

"Her eyes went once over the dingy street, the memorable scene. Thought shook her in poignant pictures. . . . Herself one day prostrated by calamity . . . not one heart that had taken her sorrow as its own. And beside that picture, this: a great company, men and women, old and young, silent beneath a window: and somewhere among them the sounds of persistent weeping. . . . She turned her veiled face towards Pond, and spoke indistinctly.

"All these . . . are they all . . . his friends?"

"There sprang a light into the Director's hawk eyes, changing his whole look wonderfully.

"They're his mother," he said, "and his brothers and his sisters."

And with that swift and daring piece of imagery Mr. Harrison once more comes into his kingdom.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

Is murder under certain circumstances legitimate? Briefly, that is the subject of Mr. R. O. Prowse's latest novel, JAMES HURD (Heinemann, 6s.). The book is certainly an exceedingly clever piece of psychology, and gives one furiously to think. James Hurd and his wife Evelyn have a charming little boy, Warrie, who meets with an accident when he is only five years, and the injuries he receives result in his health becoming permanently undermined, and his brain affected. For two years they watch him, hoping against hope that he will recover, but from all sources they learn he can never again become normal, though he may live to grow up, and be a misery to himself and to all those who love him. The question is, would it not be more merciful for death to come? After many heart searchings, James Hurd comes to the conclusion that it is his duty to release his child, and he makes up his mind to do so. The author shows a very keen perception of the limitations of a man's courage when he makes Hurd tell his friend that he kept putting off and putting off the journey to London to fetch the drug, because he could not face the horror of such a journey knowing what he was going for—the deed itself had not such terrors for him as this journey. In the ultimate Hurd is saved the pain of the actual deed, though he is virtually guilty. The boy falls over a cliff, and his father watches him go without putting out the hand which would have saved his life. Evelyn, who has had the same beliefs as her husband regarding the taking of the little life, though she does not reproach her husband in so many words, finds it very hard to forgive, her love for her husband and for her child fighting with her love of life. The book is a fine piece of work, and ends on exactly the right note, in telling how the boy, as he was before the accident, always lives in the memory of his parents—the terrible two years of grief and pain becoming gradually quite effaced. For is it not perfectly true that one only remembers the best and the happiest of those loved ones who are departed from our midst? The ethics of the matter are not as admirable as the style. Life is the one thing that no man has the right to take from another—under any conceivable circumstance. In warfare the unit becomes merged in the whole; they are not men, but armies fighting. But to kill, in order to relieve pain or end suffering, is to commit the unforgivable sin against humanity.

THE SENTENCE OF SILENCE (Howard Latimer, 6s.) falls far short of the power and force of the author's previous novel, "The Daughters of Ishmael," one of the most arresting novels published in recent years. The case presented in Mr. Kauffman's latest book does not afford the scope for such a powerful indictment. The theme indeed is one that does not lend itself to dramatic treatment. The reticence still practised in the upbringing of children in regard to matters

CAN YOU SPEAK WELL IN PUBLIC?

An Indispensable Guide to the Art of Public Speaking.

To one man the chance of making a speech affords the opportunity for an enhanced reputation; to another it is nothing but a danger. For the man who stutters and stammers, and finally sits down after a speech principally consisting of "ums" and "ers" scarcely enhances his reputation as a keen-witted member of the community, or as a man whose intelligence and resource can be depended upon in a business crisis.

For that reason, the publication of "The Book of Public Speaking" is an event of the greatest importance. For it is the first comprehensive work upon this important subject ever published in this country. It provides at once a collection of the greatest speeches of the world's greatest orators, and at the same time a reliable guide to the Art of Public Speaking, written by men who are themselves famous as speakers of the highest merit.

How to Speak in Public.

These articles and their contributors include:—

- | | |
| Rt. Hon. T. J. MACNAMARA, M.P. , on "How to Make an Effective Speech"; | A. C. BENSON, M.A., C.V.O., F.R.H.S. (President of Magdalene College, Cambridge), on "The Art of Lecturing"; |
| ARTHUR BOURCHIER, M.A. (the well-known Actor), on "How to Prepare and Deliver a Speech"; | ALBERT CREW (Barrister-at-Law), on "The Conduct of and Procedure at Meetings"; |
| J. L. GRIFFITHS (U.S.A. Consul-General, London), on "After-Dinner Speaking"; | GENERAL EDITOR, A. C. FOX-DAVIES (Barrister-at-Law) |

But "The Book of Public Speaking" is of the greatest interest even for the man who never has to speak in public, because it presents for the first time an entirely new form of literature of enthralling interest. Its handsome covers contain the cream of the greatest speeches of modern times.

The World's Greatest Speeches.

There is hardly an orator of note of recent years who is not represented in the work; there is scarcely a subject of importance or of interest that is not dealt with in some one or more of the speeches. Political Speeches, Religious Addresses, After-Dinner Speeches, Scientific and Literary Lectures—all have been brought together to form a work of enthralling interest to all intelligent people. Among the great speakers whose speeches are included in the work are:—

- | | | |
|----------------------|--------------------|--------------------|
| Lord Rosebery | Joseph Chamberlain | Lord Fisher |
| Lord Beaconsfield | Max O'Rell | Abraham Lincoln |
| H. H. Asquith | R. Waldo Emerson | Justin McCarthy |
| A. J. Balfour | Harold Cox | Viscount Milner |
| W. E. Gladstone | Woodrow Wilson | M. Poincaré |
| Sir Edward Clarke | G. Bernard Shaw | Whitelaw Reid |
| Andrew Lang | Charles Dickens | Theodore Roosevelt |
| D. Lloyd George | John Bright | Philip Snowden |
| Winston Churchill | Chauncey Depew | Ian Maclaren |
| Mark Twain | Sir A. Conan Doyle | Augustine Birrell |
| Spencer Leigh Hughes | Sir Edward Grey | Sir A. W. Pinero |
| Sir Henry Irving | Earl Halsbury | Etc., etc. |

For the Public Speaker.

The value of the work to the Public Speaker can hardly be over-estimated. Each one of the speeches included in the work serves as a model for the construction of a successful speech that can be studied with advantage by the practised speaker and the novice alike.

of sex is to be deplored, and undoubtedly tends to give a certain morbid bias to the child's mind. But to erect a tragedy, for the moral wreckage of Daniel is practically a tragedy, on the fact that a boy is told that babies are found under gooseberry bushes, is to strain the issue to vanishing point. Dan's parents carry reticence to an extent rarely met with in these days. The Puritan atmosphere of America as shown by Mr. Kauffman must be characterised as stifling. The lady who referred to the "limbs" of her piano, legs being an immodest word, is still abroad in the land, and the victim of this environment of ignorance and morbidity finds her very difficult to reckon with. He meets with a series of sordid adventures, at times unnecessarily so; he emerges from these experiences to fall in love with Judith, the child of a neighbour, whom he had known as a boy, and to whom he had been attracted in his early youth. Judith has also suffered at the hands of parental reticence, and has passed through adventures of a varied description. She has bought her knowledge in the same hard school as the man she marries, and, as might be expected, he fiercely resents it, for, as the author shows, to the end of time, or until the reconstruction of society, there will be one moral code for the man and another for the woman. The tragic injustice of it all is expressed in a pregnant phrase.

"At 10 o'clock that evening, in their hotel room in Boston, Dan was facing his wife with horror in his white lips and hatred in his voice. 'What have you been?' he was demanding. 'Tell me the truth. By God, don't you dare to lie to me. What have you been?'"

"And Judith, his wife, his mate, was looking up at him with puzzled wonderment and fear. 'I thought you knew,' she was saying; 'I told you. I thought you understood. What have I been? Nothing that you've not been. What right have you to ask?'"

A good title is the first essential for a popular novel. Mr. Victor Bridges has made a good selection in THE MAN FROM NOWHERE (Mills and Boon, 6s.). The hero drifts into the story in a fashion that intrigues the interest and opens up a whole avenue of possibilities. Improbabilities there are of course—we expect them in a novel of this type—but the hero is a pleasing and plausible person, and we pardon the marvellous things that come to pass, because the author has grasped a fact too often overlooked by the modern fictionist. He has learnt that the reader desires to be amused, and that so long as he is not bored by platitudes or wearied by an unending change of sensational incidents will readily forgive the long arm of coincidence for occasionally overstretching its reach. There are times when Mr. Bridges achieves a pictorial success. He throws the figure of Jack Burton against a background of adventure, and though highly coloured the scene serves to throw out the hero's strong points. Mercia, the heroine, is a lovable girl, and, what is more important, a very human one. Jack's adventures take him in many and strange places, notably South America, where he encounters desperate scoundrels whom he gets rid of with dispatch. The book is written in a bright, taking style, and deserves full measure of success.

Mr. J. C. Squire is one of the most successful of modern parodists. He has, indeed, passed that most difficult test of all, wherein the parodist achieves something that in the matter of style might be credited to the original author whom he satirises. STEPS TO PARNASSUS (Howard Latimer, Ltd., 3s. 6d. net) includes some of the best work this brilliant young writer has done. His dramatic sketches are inimitable, and the most successful is the skit on Maeterlinck, entitled "Pelissier and Mariane." The dialogue has caught the spirit of what the author calls the Higher Drama, and the dialogue reminds one irresistibly of the great mystic at his best. Lovers of Maeterlinck will recognise the master's manner, but while Mr. Squire appeals irresistibly to the sense of humour, there is in him nothing of spite or of the caustic spirit that is found in more sardonic critics. We quote the following as the most admirable of the author's many examples. Pelissier: "Yes, I think we have lost our way. . . . I dreamt last night that I was walking, walking amid the meshes of an enormous net of bushes and plants which sucked and throttled me so that I could hardly breathe, . . . and you, you were there too, Mariane. I could hear you somewhere making little cries, the cries I have often heard you make when you have found some wounded thing; some bird, perhaps, that the cruel cat has been tormenting."

This and the parody of John Masefield are the most characteristic selections. Brilliant and versatile, the book will appeal to all those who appreciate the gift of satire, rarest of all among literary men of to-day.

The threatened invasion of England by Germany is still a popular topic among sensational writers. The latest addition to war-scare fiction is THE SECRET OF SARM (Smith, Elder and Co., 6s.). The authors, Messrs. Hugh Money-Coutts and W. R. MacDonald, have thought out a thrilling plot and elaborated in plausible succession a series of incidents, set forth with a wealth of detail and a precision of statement that are most effective. So realistic are certain scenes that we are almost cheated into the belief that an alien army is in our midst, and that we are honeycombed by a regiment of spies. The tension of the story is relieved by the occasional humorous reflections of the hero, and the love motive is simple but effective. The book as a whole is pleasantly entertaining, and provides a due number of thrills.

Henry G. Bohn

Founder of the World Famous Bohn's Libraries.

IT was a happy comparison of Emerson's when he said that Bohn's Libraries had "done for literature what railroads have done for internal intercourse." For it is incontestable that the inauguration of the Standard Library by Henry George Bohn in 1847 marks an era in literary, and indeed in social, history. To Bohn belongs the credit of first making accessible to the general public, in convenient form and at a popular price, translations and reprints of the great masterpieces of the world's literature. It is scarcely too much to say that Bohn did for his age something of the same service that Caxton himself did for his.

☛ Bohn began his career as Continental buyer for his father, and it was characteristic of his energy and courage that at the height of the Napoleonic wars he was busy purchasing books out of the many family libraries which in those times of crisis came into the market. After some years in his father's employment he eventually set up for himself, acquired the well-known premises in York Street once the residence of De Quincey, and quickly won a great name as a pioneer in the process by which the greatest literature has become the heritage of the people.

☛ In 1864 the Libraries were bought by Messrs. Bell and Daldy (now G. BELL AND SONS, LTD.), since when no pains have been spared to extend and improve the Series. "Bohn" has remained a great reality, and become a great tradition, the name is a proverb among booklovers, not without honour among schoolboys, and full of memories and associations for the scholar.

Carlyle's Opinion :

"I may say in regard to all manner of books, Bohn's Publication Series is the usefulest thing I know."

Emerson's Opinion :

"The translations of Bohn's Library have done for literature what railroads have done for internal intercourse."

HISTORY IN THE MAKING

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

PEACE has not endured long in the Balkans, and the real value of that much-belauded diplomacy, whose triumph was so loudly proclaimed, is now apparent. The Allies, as a cynic remarked, could be relied on not to fight only so long as they were united in fighting a common foe, and Abdul the Damned must smile sardonically as he reads that his warnings to Europe are fulfilled, and that now, when the restraining hand of the Unspeakable Turk is removed, the Allies are at each other's throats. It is impossible, we fear, to take a rosy view of the present situation, complicated as it is by the grave danger that Roumania may decide to take a hand in the desperate game. As for the idea that the combatants can be brought to reason by refusing them supplies of money, little reliance can be based on this slender hope. Money is very necessary to a country at war; but before now nations have dispensed with it—and won; and when the enemy is as insolvent and as desperate as oneself, money talks, like reason, only in whispers. The truth is, that in the Balkans new and young nations are carving out their destinies, and they will have to learn respect for each other—even at the cost of war.

Readers of EVERYMAN will be interested to learn that our Special Commissioner's articles on the excessive interest charged under our present pawn-broking system formed the basis of a question which Dr. Leach, M.P., addressed on Monday last to the Home Secretary, whom he urged should appoint a Select Committee of inquiry to investigate the evils we have described. Mr. McKenna invited Dr. Leach to produce the evidence on which the articles were based. This is being done, and it is hoped that, as a result, an official inquiry will take place. It may have memorable results.

The death of M. Rochefort removes, not only one of the most picturesque and bizarre figures that our modern world has known, but one of the most powerful journalists who ever lived. Rochefort was a force in France when our fathers were young men, and his pen shook the power of the third Napoleon years ago, as, half a century later, it shook the Republic itself. M. Poincaré was a President after his own heart, but, as one remembers with a pang, the old warhorse was too enfeebled to join in the fray for him. Rochefort had, doubtless, many faults of temper and a certain hectic narrowness of vision; but he was a consummate journalist, a great patriot, and, like Heine, "a faithful warrior in the emancipation war of humanity." R.I.P.

Mr. Lloyd George's Insurance Amendment Act has not aroused any delirious enthusiasm. Mr. Kingsley Wood, an admitted authority, opines that it is but the precursor of countless other measures, and that, in fact, an amending Bill will, for many years to come, be an annual Parliamentary event. Without adopting this gloomy prophecy, it cannot be said that the measure even faintly approaches finality, or that it begins to meet the growing and serious criticisms of the friendly societies in a matter that vitally concerns them. Perhaps, however, it is hoped that these may be forgotten in the excitement of the coming Land Campaign, which it is now positively stated will open this autumn.

The decision which Mr. Justice Darling this week delivered in the action brought by Mr. Holmes Dallimore against the Musicians' Union marks a new and most important era in the endless chapter of labour litigation, the last phase of which was the Trades Disputes Act. Since then the confident and comfortable belief obtained in labour circles that under no circumstances could a Trade Union be sued for its torts. Alas! the finding of the jury disposes of that happy fiction. They found that as no "trade dispute" was in progress, the Act did not apply, and that the trade unionists sued were liable under the law of the land. Unless we are mistaken, the Dallimore decision is likely to play as vigorous a part in the near future as did the famous Taff Vale case, the cause célèbre that brought the Labour party into being. If it stands on appeal, Parliament will certainly be asked to set it aside. Meanwhile rumour has it that the Government are postponing for this session their Bill to amend the Osborne judgment. It looks as if the Labour party were going to be so busy that they would really have to agree among themselves.

The Leicester election has had the result of delighting everybody. The Liberal papers proclaim the result as "splendid" because their candidate was returned. The Tories are equally happy because his majority was reduced, and the Labour party are content because their option over the second seat remains intact. The memorable telegram despatched to the Labourites on the eve of the poll has roused a heated controversy and occasioned many speeches. Mr. Ramsay Macdonald has been heckled, and Mr. Keir Hardie, one of the veterans of the Labour party, has been asked to give an explanation of the telegram he did not send. The excitement has now abated, however, and unless an occasion arises favourable to its resurrection, we may consider the incident closed. The only people who might conceivably complain are the electors, who find themselves represented by a gentleman returned by a minority of votes.

WHY NOT FIFTY-TWO BANK HOLIDAYS?

THE ETHICAL AND MATERIAL BENEFIT OF A FIVE DAYS' WORKING WEEK

By HENRY WRIGHT

I.

THE Law, whether we like it or not, is stepping in more and more to regulate our lives. There is a definite reason for it. We cannot protect ourselves from each other! Combines of brain are more than a match for combines of physique. The pen is mightier than the sword. The combines of brain in a commercial age can and do make helpless the rest of the community.

Somewhere down about the middle of the Victorian age this fact was discovered. And somehow, as there was abroad a spirit of righteousness among statesmen, as a whole, there came to be passed Factory Acts and labour protection Acts of all kinds. Whole armies of inquisitive officials were appointed to look after the weaker brethren, and see that the new kind of feudal lords and clever "supermen" of the commercial age did not actually destroy prematurely the "hands" superior brain and education had put into their power. Of course, such an intrusion on the "devil-take-the-hindmost" methods of society may weaken it, but still, if we are really now going to try to live up to the Sermon on the Mount, we must take the consequences, whatever they may be!

II.

But, naturally, such an intrusion upon the doctrine of laissez faire did cause much dissatisfaction. It seemed a shocking thing to many in those Victorian days that a man could not do what he liked with his own—his own being the "hands" which came to him and articulately asked—yes, asked—for employment. If, as in the old feudal or African slave times, he had captured his "hands," and held them by force majeure, that would have been a different matter, and all society would now rise against the wrong and barbarity of it. But the "hands" came to him, and begged and prayed for work; from the child of ten or twelve up to the old creature of seventy, they tumbled over each other, and heaped themselves upon the employer. Naturally, as a result, they asked less and less in wages, leisure, and good air to work in. Naturally, also, the employer accepted the lowest bids. Nay, was he not doing the pleaders for his work a good turn? Otherwise they would have starved or gone to the workhouse, to be a burthen on the rest of the community. But somehow, in spite of this really philanthropic attitude of the Man with the Brain, in providing food for the otherwise starving, each Government, Conservative and Liberal, began to step in more and more between master and man. The reign of factory inspectors began. And it has gone on from bad to worse for the "weakest to the wall" state of society! Children are prevented from earning their living! Men and women are not allowed to work in buildings sanitary inspectors have not certified as free from foul air. So, as I have said, things went on from bad to worse, or from good to better, until the climax came when even hours of labour were restricted! And there is some talk now of a minimum wage for even these restricted hours! Well, we must accept our age as we find it. Short of revolution, of which I see no signs, which shall restore to us the good old days of the Manchester school, we must submit to our Governmental system—almost equally subversive of entire freedom of the individual in this respect, whichever party is in power. We must cut our coat according to our cloth—that is, cut our hours of labour to our laws. Now the climax seemed to have come with the last half-holiday Act. But has it? I doubt it! What about a whole holiday Act? A weekly Bank Holiday Act! Have you reflected how near to it we have been brought? Suppose the working hours on the legal half-holiday day are from 8 to 1—that is, five hours. And there are five whole working days of eight to nine hours (feeding times included). Now it only needs an hour longer on each of those working days to make up the time required to clear off the five hours and leave a whole day vacant. And no less work done in a seven days' week!

III.

I don't know how the voting would go if it were put to all workers as to whether they would rather work an hour extra on five days a week if in exchange they had, as a result, clear from Friday night until Monday morning for their very own. But I am inclined to think the entire vote would go in favour of this change. It would mean liberty, glorious liberty, for nearly one-third of every worker's time—two days and three nights of every week he could call his soul his own. A Bank Holiday every week of his life! And, if he was paid by time or piecework, no less wages for himself and no less work for his employer. The ramifications of business are so enormous it would take up too much space to unravel how each trade and undertaking would be affected. But you have two hard-pan facts to go upon. First, that no less actual work would be done if you conceded the one hour a day extra on the five working days; second, the visible fact that somehow on four occasions at least of the year all the world manages to get its business done in a five days' working week. If the industrial world can do it four times a year, can it not do it fifty-two times, especially with the guarantee that in the seven days' week no less work shall be done? It is marvellous how society adapts itself to changes. Everything is impossible till it is tried. And then, when it is tried, and the country is expected to go to the dogs as a consequence, it is found the income tax payments rise, the death-rate falls, and we wonder how people could have lived with no cinemas, railways, tubes, Cook's excursions, and half-holidays!

Now, this matter of the death-rate would, I think, be seriously affected by the five-day week, and I am sanguine enough to think even the income tax would grow healthier and fatter. Opponents will say, up would go the death-rate, because no workman could stand a Bank Holiday every week! Of course he would drink himself into the grave. Now that is just one of the slanders inflicted on the working man by what may be called the Bank Holiday fringe of working men—the one or two per cent. who, at the end of the day, intoxicated as much, mind, by unusual fresh air and an unused sense of liberty as by beer, make Bank Holiday night hideous. So, my friends of the leisured classes, might you do the same if you were only let out of imprisoned circumstances four times a year instead of every day of your lives.

IV.

But even that excitable fringe is going down yearly. Police courts again and again report that "there were no Bank Holiday charges," or that they were "unusually small." And as the too-much-fresh-air-all-at-once-plus-beer drawbacks diminish, the fresh-air-pure-and-unadulterated benefit increases. I think no one who has been inside a large business concern, or a small one either, can have failed to be struck with the benefit in physique the Bank Holiday brings. Even the one day seems to have perceptibly added to the strength and spirits. Monday after Sunday is a bad working day for the majority. But with a two days' holiday coming together, the fatigue is got over on the first day, and the next is the day of solidifying the recuperation of the faculties. So that Bank Tuesday finds bright looks and good tempers, while Monday often finds dullness and bad tempers. The rest begun has not been completed, and leaves the animal morose!

Brain workers, of course, are a law unto themselves, and most of these important labourers do their work on a five days' week. The City, the heart of the commercial world, is left on Saturdays largely to the "fetch-and-carry" part of its denizens. It is deserted by an ever-increasing percentage of those who make the City what it is. They will be found at home or abroad, as the case may be, but not at the office. They may be using their brains, but it is to the tune of golf-balls or to the soft splash of the waves of the sea. At any rate, they are getting in fresh energy from air, earth, and sky, because they know the five working days will benefit.

Now, if the important work of the world can be done under a five days' régime, why should not the unimportant?—especially as these parental-tyrannical Government days we live under have brought the thing within sight. It is too bad of this stern father to leave matters at a stage just short of doing a tremendous benefit—that is, just short of giving us all a Bank Holiday every week in exchange for a paltry extra hour's work on our five working days!

V.

When you come to think of it, it is really surprising that when at this fell work of curtailing the liberty of the subject Governments did not see how much more satisfying to the majority a whole holiday would have been. And I think it would have stopped an enormous lot of grumbling on the part of the victims! One of the little items of Bank Holiday benefits, I have noticed, is that many of the released working men are really rather glad to get back to work after two whole days' leisure, especially those who have no hobbies or no allotments of their own to cultivate. They have had time to recognise there is some interest in work, after all. Partly from habit and partly from liking, they renew work with zest. Ah, that zest! If employers only knew what it means, and how it will turn the eight hours' day into a sixteen hours' day in results, they would have "bottles" of it laid in for their workmen's use, even if it were the price of champagne! Some firms, I notice, have, indeed, set up a "bar," with bottles labelled "profit-sharing," as a zest tonic!

The five-day week should cure the strike habit, too, which is growing to such appalling proportions. With three nights and two days their very, very own, the intelligent working men, who lead strikes for shorter hours as much as for higher wages, would have a share of the liberty and fresh air of their masters in which to exercise for their own ends that superior education which makes them kick at eternal brainless handwork. Instead of drinking and lazing away their free Saturdays and Sundays or Mondays, they would employ them in some change of occupation which, on Mr. Gladstone's authority, is the best of all rests. At any rate, they would have time to look round and think and be their own masters for nearly one-third of their time. That should cure them of the sensation of perpetual slaving, which is at the root of modern strikes!

Out of this class of emancipated intelligence you might even get wonderful results. Out of these leisure hours whole new processes of human progress might be evolved. Darwins, Kelvins, Stephensons, Edisons, might be multiplied ad lib. There is no end to the things the intelligent working man might do to help the world's progress if you gave him not only a day's rest, but a day's work that suited his own special bent. It would lead to the Individualisation of the whole community if you gave it time to think. Those who do think would have time to recoup their physical powers and exercise their mental powers, even if only doing beast of burthen work five days a week.

Of course, newspapers would fall in with the five-day week! And that would be a further help to Individualisation. For two days people would be thrown back on their own brains. That should help to evolve original and new ideas, of which we are told there is such a lack in these times—both in business and in literature.

VI.

But what about the milkman?—to use him as an example of the humble but needful work that must go on seven days a week. Well, to begin with, he wouldn't be any worse off than on his present four Bank Holidays, and all the people who drink his milk would be forty-eight days better off. Undoubtedly we have got over bigger stumbling-blocks in social progress than providing the milkman with a five-days' working week. Shall we call the milkman an intermittent worker? There are many trades which have intermittent workers. Very often a shopkeeper has to sit an hour without a customer, or a cabby without a fare, or a barrister without a brief. It is true, they are on the rack and rank—that is, they are waiting for business. Still, they do not reach the stage of exhaustion, unless by way of worry, which is often inevitable in six days' continuous work. They have not steady manual or brain work. They rather belong to the leisured class, who do a bit of work when so disposed. I don't envy either the slack barrister, cabby, or shopkeeper; but if you could take the worry element away, they certainly have "a sort of" leisure millionaires might envy.

But the tendency of modern life is more and more to bring work into masses, and it is this tendency to concentrate and produce in quantity which has brought about all that interference with personal liberty that has given us half-holiday and factory Acts. When we all lived in our own homes and grew our own food and made our own clothes and were our own masters, we were in the position of the none-too-busy-but-just-enough-to-keep-occupied class.

But that is all over now, and we live by the social lump, and we are beginning to find out that by the social lump we must be cured of social evils. I cannot help thinking, if we have found regulation of hours of labour good for six days, that if we now SWUNG ROUND, and left five days to look after themselves, as to hours of labour, and turned our attention to the possibility of giving everyone two glorious free days, we should have a vastly brighter, stronger, healthier community.

COUNTRIES OF THE WORLD

PERSIA ❁ ❁ BY J. M. HONE

I.

THE configuration and climate of Persia lend themselves to simple and rapid exposition. Persia is a tableland, 2,000 to 5,000 feet above sea level, and in area about a million square miles, the main features of which are long ranges and detached mountains. The east side only is all plain. Of Persian lakes the most important are Urumiah in the north-west, Bakh-tegan in the south centre, and Seistan in the east, all of them salt and wanting in outlets. Of Persian rivers, the Karun, which joins the Shatt-el-Arab, at the head of the Persian Gulf, in Mohammerah, is alone navigable. The more fertile parts of the interior, west and south-west of the great Iranian plateau, are watered by snow streams, which establish irrigation channels, and finally lose themselves in the desert sand. Persian rose-gardens seem to be largely a poetic licence; but the climate of the tableland is favourable, cold and bright in winter, temperate in the intermediate seasons, and the main centres of population, being usually situated in the vicinity of hills, are protected from excessive heat in summer. Persia has five neighbours—Russia and Turkey on the west, Turkestan, Afghanistan, and Baluchistan on the east.

II.

Ethnologically described, Persia is a chaos of races, and eludes definition. Ancient Iran ended with the Parthians. The new era began with the Sassanides; Semitic influence then became preponderant. Henceforth Persia was, as Gobineau says, an Oriental empire, in the moral sense of this expression. To-day broad division is made between the Turks, Arabs, and Kurds as alien varieties, on the one hand, and the Persians proper on the other. The population of the country is roughly estimated at 7,000,000. Arabs, Turks, and Kurds number about half this total. These elements are largely nomadic, yet they have strangely influenced the course of Persian history. The present Kajar dynasty is Turkish, and, though now in its decline, once showed itself to be possessed to a considerable degree of the gift for government. The older elements, who claim the Iranian tradition, but have probably been largely Mongolised and Semitised, reveal different characteristics according as they inhabit plain or mountain. Thus, the Bakhtiari, who have lately dominated the Persian situation, boast of courage, physique, and a high sense of honour, if not of administrative power; but this and the other mountain tribes of the south-west are nearer to the Arab than to the regular Persian type. The genuine Persian, sometimes called Farsi, is a town dweller, an artist, a sceptic, a lover of pleasure, a courtier, a man of subtle intellect but unreliable will. Quick to grasp European ideas, it was he who projected the recent revolution; but he lacked the practical capacity and industry, and perhaps the political integrity, to "make good."

III.

The traveller from Europe to Persia via Russia and the Caspian enters the Shah's Empire at the port of Enzeli. The shore is moist, rich, and unhealthy, famous for the production of silk, with jungles in which wild beasts abound. The chain of the Elburz descends rapidly towards the "lake at the world's edge," in the midst of magnificent forests. The traveller crosses the Elburz, gains the tableland, and discerns the domes of the Persian capital. Teheran, with its 200,000 inhabitants, stands upon a stony plain, with one of the greatest of Asian mountains, Demavend, the highest peak of the Elburz range, 18,600 feet, in close proximity. From Teheran to Ispahan is 400 miles across desert, a carriage journey of five days. Ispahan was once the capital of Iran, is still a great religious centre, and has a population of 100,000. Shiraz, capital of the province of Fars, is the next stage; from Shiraz the traveller descends gradually through the gorgeous scenery of the Kotals into the Persian Gulf, the shore of which is, in contrast to that of the Caspian, dry, stony, and devoid of cultivation. The line of this itinerary, the one usually chosen by sightseers from Europe and India, represents one of the main arteries of Persian life, and connects the two chief outlets of foreign trade, the Caspian or Russian, the Gulf or British. But it does not touch Tabriz, the capital of the province of Azerbaidjan, which is situated 400 miles north-west of Teheran, nor the interesting district around Lake Urumiah, nor the Kurdish country near Tabriz. Meshed, the holy city, capital of the province of Khorassan, a stone's-throw from Turkestan; Kermanshah and Hamadan, in the west centre; the fertile Karun valley, and Mohammerah, at the head of the Persian Gulf, important in connection with the projected extension of the Baghdad railway—all these must also be the goals of separate expeditions from the Persian capital.

IV.

The scenery of Persia is often monotonous; yet, if we want proof of the fascination of the country, we find it in the abundance of the literature of Persian travel and its high level of excellence. Ruins, sculptured rocks, mosques, and tombs preserve the memory of the Acheminides and the Sassanides, of Tamerlane and Darius. Nor is the Shah's empire without contemporary culture. Manners and learning survive, in spite of miserable political conditions, with the influences that formed the spirit of the race. The heroes of Firdousi still act upon the popular imagination. Reverence is paid to-day to Sadi and to Hafiz. The mollahs retain their subtle theological sense. Social life and customs preserve their distinction.

V.

It is only lately that Persia has become an acute problem for the European diplomatist. But for a hundred years and more Great Britain has regarded supremacy in the Persian Gulf as a corner-stone of her foreign policy, and, since Napoleon dreamed his dreams, has realised that Persia might be used by the other Powers as a stepping-stone to India. Persia was an absolute monarchy. But with a court of Kajar princes, who paid the Shah for the privilege of being the satraps and tax collectors of the provinces, there was really no organisation of government in the country. Teheran was the scene of an obscure diplomatic rivalry between Great Britain and Russia. Yet Persia escaped internal revolution and foreign conquest. She had wily foreign ministers in her Shahs, who knew how to play off Muscovite against Britisher, and the rich, even though they acquired their wealth most unscrupulously, had habits of generosity and tolerance which, with the fatalism of the people, made the situation seem tolerable enough. The Kajars had, moreover, to reckon with the Church—with the mollahs, seyyids, and montjeheds, who had complete power in religious matters, and could even enter the domain of civil affairs with authority. Here, indeed, we face the salient feature of Persian life, the most significant factor in Persian history—religion. Shiism, the persecuted form of Mohammedanism, political in origin, as it may be traced to a dispute over the Prophet's successor, made its home on the plateau of Iran. It has given the Shah's subjects a common memory and a common tradition. Without it there were no Persian nation to-day, for the Iranians of the ancient world failed after the Arab conquest to assimilate the new ethnical elements, and Persia had, therefore, passed into history but for the cohesive agency of the martyr faith. To-day, with the exception of about 125,000 Jews and Armenians, the whole population—Arab of Arabistan, Turk of Azerbaidjan, Iranian of Ispahan—is Shiite. We must also thank Shiism for the fact that, alone amongst Mohammedan nations, Persia continues to contribute to the spiritual heritage of the world. Shiism permits the practice of reading into the Koran any meaning that may be chosen. Thus it has served as a vessel for all the religious ideas of Persian genius—Dualism, Gnosticism, Manicheism. Thus it reflects the teachings of Indian philosophy.

VI.

The advance of Germany into Asia Minor, the Anglo-Russian entente, and internal revolution are the three main considerations from which one forecasts the future of Iran. Contact with Europe and the influence of the more enlightened mollahs produced the crisis which forced the Shah Muzaffer-ed-din to open a Parliament in Teheran. His son, Mohammed Ali, attempting to regain absolute power, lost the throne in 1909 under circumstances that are still fresh in the public memory. But the victorious Constitutionalists failed to achieve the regeneration of their country. Disorder continued to spread. Russian troops entered Azerbaidjan, and are to-day in occupation of a great part of Northern Persia. The Mejliss, or Parliament, has been dissolved. The Regent for the little boy Shah resides in Paris. The Exchequer is empty, and the State non-existent. The tribes of the centre and south act upon their own sweet will. British prestige declines. Cabinets meet at Teheran, break, and are re-formed; at most they are but the instruments of the Russian legation.

VII.

Persian Nationalists claim, with a good appearance of truth, that the Constitution was not given a fair chance. They assert that Russia, proving false both to spirit and letter of the Anglo-Russian agreement, intrigued against the Mejliss, and thus deliberately created the pretexts upon which her armies have entered Azerbaidjan. They maintain that Great Britain, submitting to the apparent exigencies of the European situation, permitted Russia to compass the destruction of Persian independence. It is difficult to see the end. Russia is in no hurry to "conquer" Iran. But she takes every opportunity of extending the limits of her occupation, and of consolidating her power in the north, and it is too late for Great Britain to protest except at the risk of the entente. Sir Edward Grey is equally reluctant to accept the other alternative—a British occupation in the south, where our sphere of influence, as defined by the Anglo-Russian agreement, lies—although the disordered condition of these parts occasions considerable loss to British trade. Such a step would tend towards the establishment of an Anglo-Russian protectorate in Persia and coterminous frontiers. Things drift. A Blue Book on Persian affairs has just been published. So puzzling is the situation depicted therein that even Imperialists are preaching a counsel of despair, and advocate the absolute abandonment of British interests in the south of Persia.

VIII.

But events will march when the foreign capitalists and financiers have matured their plans for the industrial exploitation of Iran. Persia stagnates for want of railways, and in the building of railways lies her chief hope of prosperity. Inland trade has hitherto been carried on caravan tracks or on the few roads which British and Russian enterprise has provided. At present almost half the population of Persia is nomadic, and the growth of an industrial middle class needs encouragement. But the Persian Government has not the money wherewith to encourage vast undertakings, and the rich grandees will not invest in a scheme which must finally direct itself against the corrupt conditions, now prevailing, on which they thrive. The Concessionaires are, therefore, foreigners. Various projects are being considered. Of these, an Indo-European railway is the most sensational—a complete overland route from Paris through Persia and Baluchistan to Delhi. Objections are lodged against the proposal from the strategical standpoint of Great Britain. It would finally, it is said, involve the occupation of Khorassan by Russia, and menace British dominion in India. Apart from this project, a Russian company has already surveyed a line from Yulfa to Tabriz, the country to be served being within the limits of the present Russian police control. A British company has a two years' option to build a railway from Mohammerah, at the head of the Persian Gulf, to Khoramabad, the idea being an eventual junction in Hamadan with the Russian railway, extended via Kasvin, and a branch line from Kasvin to the capital. Finally, the Potsdam Agreement of 1910 between Germany and Russia provides for the construction of a railway from Teheran to Khanikin, on the Turkish frontier, via Hamadan, with Khanikin as a terminus of the Baghdad line. It is likely that the various interests concerned in these schemes will bring their influence to bear upon the British and Russian Governments for a settlement of the Persian question upon stable lines.

THE CASE FOR THE MISSIONARY

By DR. PERCY DEARMER

I.

THE most vital and fruitful movements of an age are sometimes little noticed by the world at large till that age is past. It may be that future generations will look back upon the present century and hold it remarkable for having achieved the Christianisation of the world. This may seem strange to those who judge the direction of the tide by the surface-currents of politics and "events of the day." The newspapers refer but little to foreign missions, the average man often still has impressions of quaintness in connection with the missionary (who, in the days of our youth, was supposed to go about with a white choker, top-hat, black gloves, and large umbrella), and ignorance about the work is profound except among those who are definitely enthusiastic on the subject. Yet students of missionary statistics tell us that Christianity is spreading in Asia as rapidly as it did in Europe during the first centuries of our era.

If this be so, the fact is fraught with immense consequences, not only for the non-Christian races, but for Christendom itself, since an Asiatic Christianity would react enormously upon the religion of Europe. And certainly, whatever may be the future rate of conversions, Asia has now definitely come within the orbit of Christendom; no more will it be said of her that "She let the legions thunder past,

Then plunged in thought again."

The "unchanging East" is changeless no longer. Whether she accepts that which is best in us or not, she is taking over our inventions and our methods, and even our horrid clothes.

II.

This fact alone has changed the aspect of missionary work, and has rendered obsolete the "Why-can't-you-let-them-alone?" argument of those Europeans who dislike foreign missions. It used to be said that we ought to leave the non-Christian races in the undisturbed enjoyment of their ancestral creeds and ideas. This was at best an obscurantist argument; for if we ought to refrain from bringing new facts before an Asiatic, we ought by the same reasoning to refrain from bringing new facts before anybody, and we ought to abolish our schools and have "Everyman's Encyclopædia" burnt by the common hangman. There was really a good deal of half-acknowledged contempt in the argument—his own religion was good enough for the Asiatic, it kept him in his place, and why should we unsettle him by disturbing his ancestral ideas? Now, those who believe that all men are equal in God's sight cannot share that contempt: for them nothing is too good for the Asiatic, nothing that God has given for the enlightenment of mankind. They cannot but take the missionary position; for to them their Christianity is the most precious thing they possess, and therefore they are bound by the first principles of altruism to offer it to others. How can they offer their inventions, their methods of government and education, and not offer also that religion which has been the soul of Western progress?

But, whatever else may happen, the non-Christian races are not going on in the undisturbed enjoyment of their ancestral ideas. If the missionary did not upset them, the statesman and the scientist, the merchant and the soldier would. Asia would in any case borrow those detestable instruments of slaughter which are the result of our advance in science, and which would make a hell of the world, did we not know that their use is wrong because our religion is against the very principle of war, and did we not try our best to keep the peace. The obscurantist argument of leaving the rest of the world alone has become obsolete in our own time.

III.

What, then, ought we to do? Ought we to tell Asia (for instance) about Herbert Spencer and not about Christ? There are some people living in Christendom who dislike the religion which is as the very air they breathe, and to which they owe whatever is best in them. Such people are apt to select the faults of Christian nations and the virtues of other peoples, and then to proclaim the inferiority of the civilisation to which they belong. Naturally, they are angered at the very thought of foreign missions; but the plain facts are against them, and we may leave them to the growth of a wider judgment. There remain, however, a large number of men who retain a prejudice against missionaries which has not any such definite basis. There used to be much justification for the prejudice. Missionary enthusiasts were often narrow and ignorant, provincial in their ideas, and unlovely in their dogmas. The name of Exeter Hall used to be applied (doubtless unjustly) to this type of sincere but uncultivated religion. Some obscure centres used to send out half-educated men, whom no bishop would have accepted for ordination in an English diocese, to preach their crude ideas among cultivated Indians or Chinese. In fact, men were not seldom admitted to foreign work who were considered not up to the standard of work at home. The temptation was great to a young man who found himself something of a hero in his own church or chapel, and, with little discipline or education, was promoted to be a "missionary to the heathen." He often did extremely well, and English travellers have told me that men of this type generally lead most self-sacrificing and useful lives. Still, they were met on the great steamships, and often did not create a favourable impression, and they discounted for many minds the example of the many real saints and scholars who go out to be missionaries.

IV.

But that inferior type is disappearing, and with it the imperfect mentality which used to be common. The Churches are now sending of their best, and the heroic men and women who, by the thousand, have given up everything to serve their fellow-men are the typical missionaries of to-day. Moreover, the missionary point of view has greatly changed. Those who wish to know how much it has changed can judge for themselves by reading the new "International Review of Missions" (Oxford University Press), or the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel's magazine, The East and the West, which is already ten years old. The missionary world of to-day is as wise, as fair, as statesmanlike as any other great department of human thought and activity. There is no crudeness now about the chief missionary organs, and no fanaticism; but there is the spirit of an intense faith and enthusiasm. And no one who knows the student world will deny that this missionary enthusiasm has caught the younger generation as it never did before.

V.

And what is the missionary principle in its simplest and least controversial form? It is this. There came into the world a Man called Jesus Christ. Apart from all theological questions, it is agreed by all intelligent non-Christians that His character was one of peculiar holiness and beauty; that He has had an extraordinary power in winning the devotion of mankind; that He claimed to enlighten and bless mankind; and that the nations who have followed Him have been enlightened already in a remarkable degree. This being so, it is clearly to the interest of all other nations that they should know about this wonderful Man who has made so deep a mark on human history: they ought in their own interests to know, and they have a right to hear, and to judge for themselves. And we who have behind us centuries of the Christian experience have no right to keep it back, but have a duty to tell them.

THE AVERAGE MAN.

THERE are few authors of to-day who attempt to visualise the man in the street, who try with any degree of success to estimate his weaknesses, appraise his strength, prove his ambitions and the secret desires of his heart. Monsignor Benson, in THE AVERAGE MAN (Hutchinson, 6s.), has achieved a triumph. He casts his story in a commonplace setting, and the men and women of whom he writes are the type one meets in the train, the tube, going home or to the office. We are accustomed to associate the genius of this author with tales of the supernatural, and those who read with a thrill of horror the great scene in "The Necromancers" will be arrested by the skill with which the psychology of Percy is developed. For the novel is in effect a drama of the emotions. The play is enacted in the heart of the average young man of the piece. Percy, swept by every wind that blows, goes with Reggie to a service in a Catholic Church, and, under the eloquence of Father Hilary, is filled with a conviction of sin, and received into the Catholic Church. The progress of Percy on the road of self-illusion and indulgence is admirably sketched. His parents come into a fortune, he is translated into a country house, with wealthy friends and agreeable surroundings, where he takes the colour of his surroundings, responds to the latest influences, and as easily drifts from Catholicism as he drifted into it. We all of us know Percy—who has not met him, liked him, and ultimately despised him? Unfairly, we admit, for of the many who swim with the tide, how few there are with strength to stand against it?

Side by side with the egotistical weakling, swayed by each emotional breeze, the author has painted for us a man who belongs to "the clumsy, slow, sensitive, obstinate type, whose sense of duty is their sole motive." Mr. Main had been a curate in the Church of England, and at the cost of all earthly advancement, he had joined the Romish Church—simply because he thought it was right!

"This kind of man simply was not looking for sympathy; he took his burden as an obvious and inevitable thing; he must just struggle with it, and, if he felt, he did not expect to be sympathised with. . . . Father Hilary had seen, only this afternoon, a horse fall in Church Street under a heavy load, and lie there, with patient, uncomplaining eyes. He remembered this now."

And this faithful, wonderful picture of a man's soul stays with us long after the image of Percy has passed away. For, after all, surely it is Mr. Main who is the average man, as Monsignor Benson has discovered him.

J. K. P.

GEORGE ELIOT * * * BY C. SHERIDAN JONES

I.

THERE used to be a delightful legend extant in literary London a generation or so ago of a certain ever-superior and didactic philosopher, a man of middle age and of a growing reputation that, later, was to spread through Europe. He was laying down the law very emphatically upon the subject of woman's suffrage. Suddenly he was challenged by a young lady member of the party.

Now, the philosopher was a "putter-down," a man of encyclopædic knowledge and of terrible exactness; a thrill of sympathetic horror ran through the assembled savants when the young lady entered the lists against him. But she answered him point by point, giving case after case, until the perplexed sage, who was a bad loser, beat a hasty—perhaps a rather undignified—retreat, greatly to the delight of the friends he had so often tossed and gored and trampled on. The name of that philosopher was Herbert Spencer, and the lady was George Eliot.

II.

The incident was followed by a closer acquaintance between the two antagonists, and Spencer, in his softer, not to say more human, moments, thought of himself as a possible suitor for her hand. It is dreadful to think what might have happened had Spencer persisted in his suit—dreadful, that is, for George Eliot. The bickerings, the quarrels, the humiliations that would have followed on life with that impossible man—how the modern biographer would have gloated on the feast spread before him! But it would have had its consolations for us, for, while George Eliot had much of the serene detachment, the almost inhuman impassivity that characterised the author of "Justice," she had, in a greater degree than any other woman novelist, that divine gift of humour which he so lacked. What a picture she would have drawn of the philosopher shouldering his way along the platform at Paddington, so intent on preserving his latest MS. that he had attached it by string to the middle of his body (the said MS., of course, was being dragged along the platform to the annoyance of the tripping passengers), insisting on travelling in a hammock slung across the compartment so that he did not feel the vibration, and with the porters and officials only reconciled to these idiosyncrasies by the vociferated fiction of his companions that the elderly eccentric was Earl Spencer.

III.

The scene and the man seems almost to have happened for George Eliot to describe, for, as I have always thought, it is in her humour, so quiet, so deadly, so restrained, and withal so pitying and so genial, that the greatest of all our women writers is at her best. Other novelists, when they depict the foibles of mankind, make us forgive them. George Eliot makes us love her characters for their very limitations. We love Hetty Sorrel for her very childish vanity and weakness. We love Maggie Tulliver for the very qualities that undo her. Even poor muddle-headed Mr. Brooke, whose speech on the hustings one can never forget, we think of with kindly emotion. A very different novelist, Samuel Warren, it may be remembered, placed one of his characters, Tittlebat Titmouse, in exactly the same dilemma as the unfortunate candidate. The crowd pelted him. They only laughed at Mr. Brooke. That, it seems to me, is the cardinal difference between George Eliot and other writers. If it is true that to understand is to forgive, then her humour taught us the greatest lesson man can learn.

IV.

No doubt it is the fact that this humour of hers lit up the somewhat sombre recesses of an austere nature, reared amid even gloomy surroundings, that makes it so distinctly precious. Robert Evans, her father, who was agent to Colonel Newdigate, was a Tory of a school that has long passed away. "I was accustomed," says his daughter, "to hear him utter the word 'Government' in a tone that charged it with awe, and made it part of my effective religion, in contrast with the word 'rebel,' which seemed to carry the stamp of evil in its syllables." But a "rebel" George Eliot grew up, notwithstanding. Her mother, she tells us, had a "considerable dash of the Mrs. Poyser vein in her": that mother whose family stood for the Dodsons, with those four wonderful aunts, in the "Mill on the Floss."

It was in the pages of the Westminster Review, then famous as the organ of the philosophic Radicals, that George Eliot first broke ice as a literary force. Here she met Spencer, and Spencer introduced her to George Henry Lewes, whom it is interesting to note that she describes as a sort of "miniature Mirabeau" on his first appearance. There have been few unions more romantic in the whole history of letters than that between the young literary aspirant and the middle-aged, careworn, but still brilliant writer, whose sorrows appealed to the young authoress perhaps as much as his genius. It is of her union with Lewes that George Eliot wrote to the old and estranged friends of her austere youth: "From the majority of persons, of course, we never looked for anything but condemnation. We are leading no life of self-indulgence, except indeed that, being happy in each other, we find everything easy. We are working hard to fulfil every responsibility that lies upon us. Levity and pride would not be a sufficient basis for that." Thus George Eliot in her own defence; and it remains to be said only that, when she met him, Lewes' own home had been broken up in sorrow for over two years.

V.

Much has been said in criticism of Lewes' influence on George Eliot's work from an artistic point of view. But this much is certain: that to the day of his death her work drew strength and colour from the society of the man to whom she was devoted. Her days were passed in extraordinary and unflagging industry, and she was assiduous in close and faithful studies, not only of science and philosophy, but of art, music, and literature. George Henry Lewes died on November 28th, 1878, and the entry in George Eliot's diary runs: "Here I and sorrow sit." She read no letters: she touched no work, but remained "a bruised creature, shrinking from the tenderest touch." At length the loneliness of her life was broken. An affection, deep and sincere, sprang up between her and the Rev. W. J. Cross, whom she married, and once again she tasted what she called to her sister-in-law "a wonderful renewal of my life, . . . through your brother's great gift of love to me." Alas! that renewal of life was to last but a little while. In December, 1880, George Eliot joined the "choir invisible," and the greatest woman writer of our language, one of the greatest of the Victorians, passed away on the midnight of Christmas Eve, after a record of achievement unsurpassed in the whole of literature.

PERSONALITY IN LITERATURE * * * BY DANIEL CORKERY

I.

WHEN we see the work of a new writer proclaimed as rich with personality, what are we to expect? Something as violent in its gesture as it is crude in its thought? Something all force, all energy—a figure whose every muscle is tense, swollen, whose hand is raised to strike?

If this class of work be personal what are we to say of classic work? Take Matthew Arnold's poems as a sample of latter-day classic work: could any body of poetry be more instinct with personality? Reject "The Forsaken Mermaid," which I can never think of as Arnold's, and all that remains is full of the poet—is Matthew Arnold himself, and at his best—not petulant, not meanly combative, as in so many of the essays where he is out to score points, but noble if pensive, high-minded if not calm, tolerant if assured. And his poems live.

Such personality as is in them is not to be carried off by violence, not to be achieved by the hysterical. For personality is a far land, won to only by hardy pilgrims. It is style!

II.

To say as much is to come home to the old phrase—the style is the man. Yet surely this is a phrase about which we might think a little more often; we need to realise it anew. But it is at once objected: What is style? It is travelling in a circle to repeat: style is personality. Putting the same statement in another form might, however, bring out more clearly its relation to this discussion: there can be no personality where there is no style. Now, there are styles and styles—surely! But to all styles there is one common denominator—that is discipline. Orpen, Sargent, Lavery, are all three brilliant painters—strong in styles not academic. To all three styles one quality is common—the freedom that comes of discipline. That freedom—may we say that effective freedom?—is the characteristic of all good art work. How different it is with the "strong" "personal" writers! Their boast seems to be the absence of style! If it please you, they achieve, not art, but life! Life, as our finite eyes observe it, is formless, chaotic; so is their work. In this is its greatness!

But Life achieves here and there a perfect flower—a face, a deed, an ideal; and their work does not. That face of beauty, that deed, that ideal—they arise not without travail. Ideal, deed, face—they are not fleurs du mal. An infinity of restraint has preceded their advent. So that if our strong personal writers will not learn of the great ones that have gone before, let them learn of life itself, with which they boast such intimacy.

III.

I have said their work does not achieve a fine flower—not even one. Take Masefield. No one denies his merits. But his apologists—they are hard put to find a passage worthy of quotation. Indeed, his muse goes in rags—not because he deals with what we speak of as low life, but because the artist has not disciplined himself. And these rags become doubly noticeable when a would-be friend plucks a stanza from "The Widow" or "The Dauber" and sets it on a pedestal. Here is a couplet from his poem, "Biography":—

"When the rent chapel on the brae at Slains Shone with a doorway opening beyond brains."

Opening beyond brains! There is the absence of style. What is this art work? Surely this is 'prentice work. And all over Masefield is the like clumsiness of the 'prentice hand. Lacking style, then, as assuredly almost all Masefield's work does, it cannot have in it the abiding charm of personality. What! no personal element in this very outspoken poetry? Little or none. For in reading it what "person" comes to our vision? One who will set down the "truth" and shame the devil; one who in his haste to do so allows himself to write of ruined gateways opening beyond brains; one who sets "truth" down so "strongly" before us that none but the most facile reflections rise to his lips (and it is well, for if any other arose he must feel like rewriting his whole output—which would be no small job!). This, then, is the Masefield that arises into vision as we read his work.

But this personality is common to almost every realist who ever wrote! It is not, indeed, the personality of the great realists—Flaubert and Maupassant; but it is the common personality of all the lesser realists—the "splashing" realists. Personality, however, must be unique; it cannot be common to two writers—let alone a whole school. Therefore the conclusion is that the work of this poet lacks personality. Before Masefield achieves great work he must humbly step down and learn that second thoughts are best. The 'prentice boy came to Blake saying, "I wish to be bound," or words like these. "Do you work in fear and trembling?" said the master. "Indeed I do," said the lad. Then the master made room at his bench for him. But who works nowadays in fear and trembling?

IV.

The fact is that your "strong" "personal" writer is a simple soul. He thrusts greatness—this is, personality—upon himself. He goes cross-gartered like Malvolio. Cuts as fine a figure in his own eyes. "I will be strange, stout, in yellow stockings and cross-gartered, even with the swiftness of putting on." But Time qualifies the strangeness and reduces the stoutness: the writer of "Barrack-Room Ballads" lives to write "Puck of Pook's Hill," and Masefield may yet be kind enough and wise enough to give us a small book of lyrics as finished as Mr. Yeats's.

Style is the test of personality. It is a mark to be shot at. If a writer cannot make his narrative vivid except by throwing restraint to the winds, nor real except by means of photography, then the root of the matter is not in him.

G. K. CHESTERTON * * * BY RICHARD CURLE

I.

To write critically on Mr. Chesterton is one of the hardest of things. It is perfectly obvious that he has a remarkable literary gift and that much that he produces is extremely able and suggestive, and yet the inevitable end to reading him is a kind of weariness akin to despair. For, in the long run, there is hardly anyone who gives one a stronger impression of being fundamentally wrong-headed. To put it plainly, his philosophy of life is the philosophy of a humane, just, and kind-hearted democrat, but when he comes to apply his philosophy in detail, he is as likely as not to announce something as truly democratic, which to everyone else in the world (save, perhaps, Mr. Belloc), would appear exactly the reverse. That type of thinker is always dangerous. Mr. Chesterton is really one enormous contradiction—you never know where to have him. He hates moderns, but he, himself, would have been impossible in any other age; he loathes oppression, but he believes in dogmatic religion; he abhors cruelty, but he loves the Middle Ages; he is a passionate advocate of freedom, but he thinks such a thing as facilities for divorce an obnoxious form of slavery.

II.

But, indeed, in almost everything he writes there lurks the germ of a contradiction, just as there lurk these interminable, sparkling, and barren paradoxes. The fact is, Mr. Chesterton is one of the most brilliant literary men of his time, and one of the most curiously futile. What can be said of a man who thinks misquotation a kind of merit and who puts paradox above all other forms of truth? It has sometimes been asked whether it would be possible for Mr. Chesterton, by giving up journalism and by taking infinite pains, to produce a really fine, a really monumental book. But anyone who asks such a question has entirely misunderstood the whole point of view of our author. For Mr. Chesterton would probably consider that such a course savoured of decadency. For him journalism is the greatest and the sanest of the arts—or, rather, it is above all arts. For the very word "art" appals him—he immediately has horrible visions of green women drinking absinthe, of debauchees in flowered dressing-gowns discussing art for art's sake, and such like atrocities.

III.

Even in his own writing it looks almost as if Mr. Chesterton were purposely slipshod. And yet, through it all, how easy it is to see that he has an amazing power of language, a graphic and poetic power, far too rare to be wasted constantly on such trivialities. But if Mr. Chesterton were to read this last sentence he would at once observe that the trivial things were, of course, the only important ones . . . it's impossible to catch him out! And then his ideas (when he can keep off polemics), how whimsical they are, how fantastic, how original, and how excessively funny! For, after all, he is a supreme humorist. Some of the little essays that he contributes to The Daily News are exquisitely and joyously amusing. For Mr. Chesterton is one of those happy writers who are not malicious in a general way. He has, indeed, dislikes which are apt to vitiate his geniality, but, as a rule, he is astonishingly good-natured. When you expect him to be angry, he comes up smiling, though, occasionally, when no one is on the watch for trouble, he will blaze out at some unfortunate millionaire or piece of Government legislation.

Is it impossible even to write of Mr. Chesterton without the hint of a paradox? There seems to be one in what has just been said; and here is another. In spite of the marked personality and egoism of his work, it is, nevertheless, free from vanity. Mr. Chesterton is essentially modest—violent, if you like, opinionated, dogmatic, but, still, modest. One feels convinced that he would be just as willing to argue with a bootblack as with a Cambridge professor, and much more willing to argue with a bootblack than with a peer; and, moreover, one feels that he would really at heart not look upon himself as better intellectually than the bootblack. And yet one has just this doubt: suppose the bootblack were an Imperialist, a Tariff Reformer, an admirer of Mr. Chamberlain, a Christian Scientist, a hater of Dickens, a scoffer, and a despiser of inns, what would Mr. Chesterton think then? One can only say that he would certainly prefer a bootblack with such opinions to a duke with them.

IV.

These likes and dislikes of Mr. Chesterton are, truly, one of the strangest things about him—not in themselves, but in the fierceness with which he holds them. His fondness for beer and cabmen, his hatred of empire-builders and stylists, is a species of intellectual passion. In the white heat of his love or scorn he carries his passion beyond reason, beyond comprehension. And thus, like all extremists, he is for ever spoiling his own case. It is to be regretted, because his case is often the case of the poor and the down-trodden. For Mr. Chesterton has something in him of the understanding and compassion of Dostoevsky and Walt Whitman, although he has not by any means their universality. For on various subjects he does seem to see red, and when you see red you lose pity. It is, for instance, doubtful whether Mr. Chesterton could realise that there is anything human in Mr. Rockefeller, an Expert, a Johannesburg Jew, or a Post-Impressionist. And, like so many men, it is the smaller things, apparently, which chiefly rouse his fury. He can tolerate atheism, but he cannot tolerate the Feeble-Minded Bill; he can forgive a murderer but he cannot forgive a eugenicist.

V.

Mr. Chesterton, as everyone knows, is a voluminous writer. He has at least twenty-three books to his credit—fiction, poetry, criticism, essays, social studies. Perhaps the most impressive is his little book on G. F. Watts, perhaps the least impressive his latest novel, "Manalive." But one and all are steeped through and through with G. K. Chesterton, saturated with him, flooded with him. There is no getting away from that overwhelming subject, whatever may be the ostensible one. Not only the heroes of his novels, but all the characters of his novels, are either G. K. C. or G. K. C.'s pet aversions in concrete form. And thus throughout.

But, though his personality is so invariably evident, it does not follow that his ideas are all his own. To speak frankly, so many of them resemble the ideas of Mr. Belloc, that either Mr. Chesterton has influenced Mr. Belloc, or Mr. Belloc has influenced Mr. Chesterton. And, as Mr. Belloc's prejudices are even stronger than those of Mr. Chesterton, it looks as if Mr. Belloc's influence had been the mastering one. It is not apparent that this fanatical son of the Catholic Church, this disbeliever in Congo agitations or in the innocence of Dreyfus or Ferrer, would be an ideal mentor, but certainly he seems to have been a successful one.

VI.

But to finish. Mr. Chesterton, in his books, has shown us what he is—a man of wide kindliness, of versatility, of genuine eccentricity mixed with common sense, and of distinguished originality, and yet a man, who, like Meredith and like Shaw, is too clever, too perverse, ever to reach the highest rank in literature. But the last word remains with Mr. Chesterton—even if he could reach that rank he wouldn't!

LITERARY NOTES

THE forthcoming LETTERS FROM A PUBLISHER TO A SON ought to prove excellent reading. The author, presumably a penitent Barabbas, promises in his synopsis to go fully into the methods of dealing with unhappy men of letters. We may hope to have some interesting revelations, especially as the book is to be issued first to publishers and authors only. It was Rider Haggard who described a firm of publishers who kept an army of tame authors in a series of hutches, only letting them out to eat an occasional cabbage leaf, in the shape of a small cheque, and to this day the tradition lingers. We quote a delightful extract from the synopsis of warning and advice to those about to submit a new work:—"No books to have 'reform' in their titles." "No satires on Party Government." "No symbolical or allegorical writings." Up to the present the anonymity of the author of the "Letters" has been preserved, though there are rumours which point to one gentleman in particular who has lately attained success in the publishing world. When the revelation comes it will cause some slight sensation.

The Memorial to George Gissing has occasioned some heart-burning and many arguments. Of the many sensitive geniuses who have shrunk from the criticism of their fellows, none perhaps was more exquisitely sensitive than the author of "New Grub Street." He never attained in life his full meed of recognition, and there is something discordant in the suggestion that the memorial should take the form of a gift to an institution, even when that institution is so closely associated with the author as was Owens College. Men of his type inevitably court a certain reticence, and if the money subscribed could have gone to the help of authors struggling as Gissing struggled in the early days, it would seem a more fitting tribute to the man who understood, as perhaps no one else has ever understood, the pain and disappointment inseparable from literary achievements. It has also been suggested that the money would be more appropriately expended in educating George Gissing's son than in educating other people.

Mr. Arnold Bennett is already engaged on a sequel to "Hilda Lessways," and Messrs. Methuen announce the publication of another novel by the same author, called THE REGENT, also a sequel, in this case to "The Card." It has been said that sequels are a mistake in life as in literature, and we feel that Mr. Bennett is endangering his reputation as a novelist by so continually resurrecting characters that have already been disposed of.

According to this author, quite the most ridiculously easy thing in the world to write is a play. There is more weariness, Mr. Bennett declares, in the writing of one novel than of ten plays, and the fictionist lavishes a wealth of descriptive power and detail in creating a situation that the playwright sums up in the two words: "Enter heroine." This may or may not be the case. What is certain is that the dramatist reaps by far the richer harvest. To get even a paltry £1,000 for a novel is quite a coup for a novelist, even a novelist of merit. But the author of a third-rate play may receive that sum ten times over, in royalties, and yet have "more to come." "The Silver King," it is said, still brings Mr. Henry Arthur Jones a handsome income, and Mr. Bernard Shaw, once told the writer that his first play brought him more of the good red gold than all his pamphlets, brochures, and books put together. Moreover, even if a play be a failure, and run only for a few weeks, its earnings amount to a figure that compares favourably with the royalties on a novel that has sold moderately well. Indeed, these days a novelist, other than the "best sellers," does not make a princely income. Emphatically, the play's the thing!

There will in a little time "be wigs on the green," or whatever may in Scotland correspond to that fine Irish figure, for hands are about to be laid on the horns of very sacred altars. Robert Burns and Walter Scott are the altars in question. Burns's claims to be, in any sense, a national poet are about to be examined by one who holds that not only did he not improve the songs of the people, but did, in many respects, spoil them. The contention, we understand, is that what pass as Burns's finest poems are, in many cases, degradations of fine songs current in the North-East of Scotland, and eminently in that part called the Mearns, from which part of Scotland Burns's father came. Mr. Henderson has been, to a certain extent, over the ground about to be more thoroughly traversed; he made considerable use of the MS. collection made by Herd, an Edinburgh lawyer's clerk and a Mearns man.

Scott will be examined not so much from a literary as from a biographical point of view. The story of his rise to the position of a Border laird, his relations to Archibald Constable, the Ballantynes, the Duke of Buccleugh, will be reviewed, and, above all, his conduct at the time of the calamities that came upon him with the failure of Hurst Robinson. Letters from and to Lady Louisa Steuart will be cited, and it will appear that Scott, so far from buckling to the work of undoing with his right hand the harm that that right hand had wrought, had to be coerced to do his plain duty in the matter of fulfilling binding engagements.

It is understood that Mr. Cecil Chesterton is relaxing his mind after the strain of his recent trial at the Old Bailey by completing a book which will be virtually a history of the party system (which he and Mr. Belloc assailed in their joint volume) during the nineteenth century, and will be called THE DECLINE AND FALL OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS. Its publication was, we are informed, arranged for by Messrs. Constable some time back, and it would have appeared this spring but that more exciting incidents in the author's career have delayed his publication. If Mr. Chesterton is going to deal with politicians of the past (who are protected by no law of libel) as he is in the habit of dealing with those of to-day, the volume should prove very lively.

MASTERPIECE FOR THE WEEK

JANE AUSTEN'S "PRIDE AND PREJUDICE" ❁ ❁ ❁ BY W. R. THOMSON

It is worth noting that "Pride and Prejudice" was written in one century and published in another. Like Shakespeare's being of large discourse, it looks before and after. It is an eighteenth-century book that bids farewell to the eighteenth century and faces the new time. If one may dare to think of Jane Austen as joining in "Auld Lang Syne" at a festive gathering of the immortals, then her left hand would be extended to Fielding and her right to Thackeray. And between these jovial gentlemen the lady, while thoroughly enjoying the proceedings, would be quite composed and entirely herself. And if Meredith were seen immediately beyond Thackeray, that would also be fitting. For is not Lady Catherine de Bourgh the great-aunt of Sir Willoughby Patterne?

"The party then gathered round the fire to hear Lady Catherine determine what weather they were to have on the morrow." No one can fail to detect the family likeness.

I.

"Pride and Prejudice," lying quietly in its drawer awaiting the hour of recognition, is a symbol of its author. There is no hurry in Jane Austen's world. People converse at breakfast and afterwards walk in the shrubbery. Later, they order out the carriage. Romance has not yet "brought up the nine-fifteen." Jane Austen wrote when Europe was in turmoil; but no echo of the din disturbs her readers. The stream of John Bull's life moves sluggishly on; the roar of the French rapids is unheard. Jane Austen will not raise her voice to attract attention. If one wishes to hear what she has to say, one must seek her out, and, after formal presentation, enter into converse with this lady of the olden time who is also so modern. And, in the stillness of the Steventon rectory garden, one will be impressed by the exquisiteness of her clear-cut talk, her delicate satire, her sense of the human comedy. Meredith tells us that as the Comic Muse sat beside Vernon Whitford and his wife she was "grave and sisterly"; but, taking a glance at the others, she "compressed her lips." Jane Austen's lips were often compressed as she took a glance at Mrs. Bennet or Miss Bingley, at Lady Catherine or Mr. Collins, as she restored Mrs. Bennet to "her usual querulous serenity," or watched Lady Catherine parting with Elizabeth. "I take no leave of you, Miss Bennet. I send no compliments to your mother. You deserve no such attention. I am seriously displeased."

II.

Goldwin Smith placed Mr. Collins and Lady Catherine among the "minor characters" of "Pride and Prejudice." But there will always be readers who regard them as the hero and heroine of the piece. They reveal Jane Austen's most characteristic gift. Mr. Saintsbury is nearer the mark when he says that Mr. Collins is not a merely farcical character, but belongs to "the highest and most Shakespearian comedy." Nor was Mr. Saintsbury the first to mention Shakespeare in speaking of Miss Austen. Macaulay had written: "Among the writers who, in the point which we have noticed, have approached nearest to the manner of the great master, we have no hesitation in placing Jane Austen, a woman of whom England is justly proud. She has given us a multitude of characters, all, in a certain sense, commonplace, all such as we meet every day. Yet they are all as perfectly discriminated from each other as if they were the most eccentric of human beings. There are, for example, four clergymen, none of whom we should be surprised to find in any parsonage in the kingdom, Mr. Edward Ferrars, Mr. Henry Tilney, Mr. Edward Bertram, and Mr. Elton." And he goes on to remark that they were all liberally educated, they were all young, and they were all in love. But it is very much more to the point to remember that Mr. Collins was in love, that he made his "declaration in form," and that, while making it, he said, "Nothing now remains for me but to assure you in the most animated language of the violence of my affection." No one wants specially to meet any of the four clergymen mentioned by Macaulay. But who does not wish to meet Mr. Collins, and to be conducted by him round that garden at Hunsford, "to work in which was one of his most respectable pleasures," or to see him when the phaeton from Rosings comes to the parsonage door? Nor must we omit the unforgettable glimpse of Sir William Lucas in the background, "in earnest contemplation of the greatness before him, and constantly bowing when Miss de Bourgh looked that way." Mr. Collins is sheer joy from start to finish—the one man in the world worthy of Lady Catherine's patronage. Hand him over to Dickens and he becomes a Chadband. But on Jane Austen's page he is kept within the limits, her art imposed, a more credible figure than Chadband and quite as laughable. The creation of Mr. Collins, Lady Catherine, and, one may add, Mr. Bennet separated Jane Austen from the romanticists of her time. Satire is the foe of sentimentalism. There are no mysteries, no dark corners in Jane Austen's world. "I am not romantic," said Charlotte Lucas on the eve of her marriage to Mr. Collins, "I never was. I ask only a comfortable home." A little romance would have lightened Charlotte's burden. In the haze of romance Mr. Collins might have seemed a great ecclesiastic. But in Miss Austen's world the mists fly before the sunshine. She is the first of our nineteenth-century realists.

III.

Jane Austen was proud of her heroine, Elizabeth Bennet, and we must share her feeling. It is usual to say that Elizabeth represents "Prejudice." No doubt; but surely that is the least one can say of her. She is far more than the symbol of an abstraction. She has sprightliness, arch humour, courage and genuine tenderness of heart. Indeed, as a real human being she is the foe of the abstract, and humanises Darcy, who, for a time, is little more than the symbol of "Pride." While he is in that perilous condition, he is sometimes a bore, and sometimes an ass; Elizabeth succeeds in the long run in making him tolerable. Her wit played round and pierced his solemnities, and finally love transformed him from a landed proprietor into a man. "'I wonder,' said Elizabeth, 'who first discovered the efficacy of poetry in driving away love.' 'I have been used to consider poetry as the food of love,' said Darcy. 'Of a fine, stout, healthy, love it may,' replied Elizabeth. 'Everything nourishes what is strong already. But if it be only a slight, thin sort of inclination, I am convinced that one good sonnet will starve it entirely away.'" That was precisely the kind of bright, sane talk that Darcy needed.

IV.

There is no scenery in "Pride and Prejudice"; only human nature. We go from Longbourne to Meryton, but get no hint of the appearance of the village, save that it has a street and a milliner's shop. We pass from Hampshire to Hertfordshire, and no touch of colour enlivens the journey. The projected excursion to the Lake Country would, we feel, have yielded nothing of Wordsworth quality. No wind blows across Jane Austen's world, piling the clouds into mountain ranges, or unveiling lakes of gold in the evening sky. When we remember what the southwest wind and the sunset meant, say, to Meredith, we realise the new spirit that came into literature as the century progressed. Perhaps Miss Austen distrusted the tendency to enthuse over the terrors and beauties of nature. "What are men to rocks and mountains?" cried Elizabeth, when the Lake Country journey was mooted. But Miss Austen preferred men and women to rocks and mountains. The travellers went to Derbyshire instead, but Derbyshire is as Hertfordshire. "It is not the object of this work to give a description of Derbyshire, nor of any of the remarkable places through which their route lay. . . . They are sufficiently well known." The utmost that Miss Austen will tell us of springtime is that "every day was adding to the verdure of the early trees." The conclusion, of course, from all this is not that Jane Austen cared nothing for nature, but that she knew by a sure instinct where her strength lay. "No, I must keep to my own style, and go on in my own way," she said once when asked to write an historical romance, adding, "I may never succeed again in that, I am convinced I should totally fail in any other." One wonders if she were conscious how gloriously she had succeeded in her own way.

V.

Talking of a well-known authoress once to a friend, Charles Lamb said, "If she belonged to me I would lock her up and feed her on bread and water till she left off writing poetry." He went on, "A female poet, a female author of any kind, ranks below an actress, I think." Had Lamb read "Pride and Prejudice," published seven years before? Is it possible that he knew Mr. Collins without delighting in him? But Scott wrote: "Read again, for the third time at least, 'Pride and Prejudice.' That young lady has a talent . . . the most wonderful I ever met with. The big bow-wow strain I can do myself, but the exquisite touch . . . is denied me." Everybody knows how splendidly generous Scott could be. In speaking as he did of Jane Austen he was also just.

THE RE-BIRTH OF THE DANCE

By HERMAN SCHEFFAUER

THE dance, too long degraded to a mere social amusement, promises once more to become an art, a spiritual rite, a symbolical ceremony, full of strange significance and hope for man. Out of the Oriental sensuality, the frivolous prettiness, the meaningless struttings and vulgar caperings of society and the stage, wonderful figures have arisen, gifted with beauty and inspiration. Nymphs from Greek vases spring to life before our eyes; the pale forms of pre-Raphaelite virgins sway like spirits to beautiful rhythms; gods and heroes leap like magnificent panthers to stately and inspiring measures.

This new passion, which is the oldest that an industrial civilisation ever smothered in the heart of mankind, has sprung to its most vigorous life in two lands that lie as the poles apart—in Russia and in California. From the sunny Golden State come dancers like Isadora Duncan, who first enraptured Europe, and brought the classic dance to such perfection that savants were inspired to write rapturous books. Out of St. Petersburg, dancing like flames against the black, tragic background of their land, came Pavlova, Mordkin, and the marvellous boy Nijhinsky. It is especially these men-dancers who may be said to be the heralds of a new freedom, a new spontaneity, a new joy in life. They have come to teach men that the individual dance is not a thing for women and children alone, nor a mere function for displaying dress or agility. The dance is once more to be a feast for the heart and soul as well as for the eyes, a tribute to beauty, an interpretation of life. With their light and graceful feet these dancers of a new era inscribe on the earth a message of joy.

England, growing wiser, and beginning to lay aside her Puritan restraint and mournful conventions, is—somewhat pathetically!—teaching her young folk the morrice-dances which were tripped when England was really “merrie.” In the slums of New York the little children—Jewish, Roumanian, Russian, Hungarian—dance the folk-dances of their parents. But the American plods in the market-place at desk or counter, or rushes along the highways of life in motors of the utmost horse or man-power. Neither in body nor in spirit has he caught the rhythmic of the true dance, its grace, grandezza, its high and really holy purpose. He must, as Heine declares, be taught to worship with his legs. Nations that cannot dance in spirit have lost the youth of their youth. Youth ought to dance before the generations of humanity like David before the hosts of Israel. Age ought to turn in priestly rounds about the altars of life. For the dance need not mean butterfly madness, nor only joy and abandon. As an exposition of the soul of a people, of their relationship to nature, as a proof that their lives beat time with the pulse of Eternity, it possesses a deep solemnity and spiritual meaning. Even the Tango swings true to the rhythm of the blood.

Perhaps this truth is working upon the souls of the people who sit in the theatres at night gazing with something like æsthetic rapture upon these new disciples of the dance. Perhaps that glorious and happy restlessness of the limbs may allay much restlessness of the nerves. But it is only necessary that our hearts learn to dance in the nobler sense. Then strange sounds will be heard in the halls of Life. It will be Life herself applauding us with her hands.

JEAN VALJEAN *

JEAN VALJEAN était d'une pauvre famille de paysans de la Brie. Dans son enfance il n'avait pas appris à lire. Quand il eut l'âge d'homme, il était émondeur à Faveroles. Sa mère s'appelait Jeanne Mathieu ; son père s'appelait Jean Valjean ou Vlajean, sobriquet probablement, et contraction de Viola Jean.

Jean Valjean était d'un caractère pensif sans être triste, ce qui est le propre des natures affectueuses. Somme toute, pourtant, c'était quelque chose d'assez endormi et d'assez insignifiant, en apparence du moins, que Jean Valjean. Il avait perdu en très bas âge son père et sa mère. Son père, émondeur comme lui, s'était tué en tombant d'un arbre. Il n'était resté à Jean Valjean qu'une sœur plus âgée que lui, veuve, avec sept enfants, filles et garçons. Cette sœur avait élevé Jean Valjean, et tant qu'elle eut son mari elle logea et nourrit son jeune frère. Le mari mourut. L'aîné des sept enfants avait huit ans, le dernier un an. Jean Valjean venait d'atteindre, lui, sa vingt-cinquième année. Il remplaça le père, et soutint à son tour sa sœur qui l'avait élevé. Cela se fit simplement, comme un devoir, même avec quelque chose de bourru de la part de Jean Valjean. Sa jeunesse se dépensait ainsi dans un travail rude et mal payé.

Le soir il rentrait fatigué et mangeait sa soupe sans dire un mot. Sa sœur, mère Jeanne, pendant qu'il mangeait, lui prenait souvent dans son écuelle le meilleur de son repas, le morceau de viande, la tranche de lard, le cœur de chou, pour le donner à quelqu'un de ses enfants ; lui, mangeant toujours, penché sur la table, presque la tête dans sa soupe, ses longs cheveux tombant autour de son écuelle et cachant ses yeux, avait l'air de ne rien voir et laissait faire.

Il gagnait dans la saison de l'émondage vingt-quatre sous par jour, puis il se louait comme moissonneur, comme manoeuvre, comme garçon de ferme bouvier, comme homme de peine. Il faisait ce qu'il pouvait. Sa sœur travaillait de son côté, mais que faire avec sept petits enfants ? C'était un triste groupe que la misère enveloppa et étreignit peu à peu. Il arriva qu'un hiver fut rude. Jean n'eut pas d'ouvrage. La famille n'eut pas de pain. Pas de pain—à la lettre—et sept enfants.

Un dimanche soir, Maubert Isabeau, boulanger sur la place de l'église, à Faveroles, se disposait à se coucher, lorsqu'il entendit un coup violent dans la devanture grillée et vitrée de sa boutique. Il arriva à temps pour voir un bras passé à travers un trou fait d'un coup de poing dans la grillée et dans la vitre. Le bras saisit un pain et l'emporta. Isabeau sortit en hâte ; le voleur s'enfuyait à toutes jambes ; Isabeau courut après lui et l'arrêta. Le voleur avait jeté le pain, mais il avait encore le bras ensanglanté. C'était Jean Valjean. Ceci se passait en 1795, Jean Valjean fut traduit devant les tribunaux du temps "pour vol avec effraction la nuit dans une maison habitée." Il avait un fusil dont il se servait mieux que tireur au monde, il était quelque peu braconnier ; ce qui lui nuisit. Jean Valjean fut déclaré coupable. Les termes du code étaient formels. Il y a dans notre civilisation des heures redoutables ; ce sont les moments où la pénalité prononce un naufrage. Quelle minute funèbre que celle où la société s'éloigne et consomme l'irréparable abandon d'un être pensant ! Jean Valjean fut condamné à cinq ans de galères.

* "Les Misérables," de Victor Hugo.

JEAN VALJEAN *

JEAN VALJEAN belonged to a poor peasant family of La Brie. In his childhood he had not been taught to read, and when he was of man's age he was a pruner at Faveroles. His mother's name was Jeanne Mathieu ; his father's Jean Valjean or Vlajean—probably a nickname and a contraction of Voilà Jean. Jean Valjean possessed a pensive but not melancholy character, which is peculiar to affectionate natures ; but altogether he was a dull, insignificant fellow—at least apparently. He had lost father and mother when still very young. His father, a pruner, like himself, was killed by a fall from a tree. All that was left Jean Valjean was a sister older than himself, a widow with seven children, boys and girls. This sister brought Jean Valjean up, and so long as her husband was alive she supported her brother. When the husband died the oldest of the seven children was eight years of age ; the youngest, one ; while Jean Valjean had just reached his twenty-fifth year. He took the place of the father, and in his turn supported the sister who had reared him. This was done simply, as a duty, and even rather roughly, by Jean Valjean ; and his youth was thus expended in hard and ill-paid toil.

At night he came home tired, and ate his soup without saying a word. His sister, Mother Jeanne, while he was eating, often took out of his porringer the best part of his meal—the piece of meat, the slice of bacon, of the heart of the cabbage—to give to one of her children ; he, still eating, bent over the table, with his head almost in his soup, and, his long hair falling around his porringer and hiding his eyes, pretended not to see it, and let her do as she pleased.

He earned in the pruning season eighteen sous a day, and, besides, hired himself out as reaper, labourer, neatherd, and odd man. He did what he could. His sister worked too, but what could she do with seven little children ? It was a sad group, which wretchedness gradually enveloped and choked. A hard winter came, Jean had no work, and the family had no bread. No bread—literally none—and seven children.

One Sunday evening Maubert Isabeau, the baker in the church square at Faveroles, was just going to bed when he heard a violent blow on the grated and glazed front of his shop. He ran out in time to see an arm passed through a hole made by a fist in the gratings and window-pane ; a hand seized a loaf and carried it off. Isabeau rushed to the door ; the thief ran away at his hardest, but the baker caught him and stopped him. The thief had thrown away the loaf, but his arm was still bleeding ; it was Jean Valjean.

This took place in 1795. Jean Valjean was brought before the courts, charged "with burglary, committed with violence, at night, in an inhabited house." He had a gun, was a splendid shot, and a bit of a poacher, and this injured him.

Jean Valjean was found guilty, and the terms of the code were explicit. There are in our civilisation formidable moments ; they are those in which penal justice decrees a shipwreck. What a mournful minute is that in which society withdraws and consummates the irreparable abandonment of a thinking being ! Jean Valjean was sentenced to five years at the galleys.

MATEO FALCONE * * * BY PROSPER MÉRIMÉE

PART II.

While the dragoons busied themselves, some in making a kind of stretcher with some branches from a chestnut tree, the others in dressing Gianetto's wound, Mateo Falcone and his wife appeared all at once at the turn of the path that led to the bush. The woman moved along laboriously, bent beneath the burden of an enormous sack of chestnuts, while her husband, with a dignified air, only carried a musket in his hand and another in his bandolier; for it is unworthy of a man to carry any other burden than his arms.

At the sight of the soldiers, Mateo's first thought was that they had come to arrest him. But why this idea? Had Mateo, then, had some differences with the law? No. He enjoyed a good reputation. He was, as they say, "in specially good repute"; but he was a Corsican and a mountaineer, and there are few Corsican mountaineers who, in searching their memories well, but find some peccadillo, such as shooting, stiletto thrusts, and other bagatelles. Mateo, more than any other, had a clear conscience, as for more than ten years he had not directed a gun against any man; but, all the same, he was careful, and he put himself in a position to make a good defence, if it should be necessary.

"Wife," said he to Giuseppa, "put down your sack and hold yourself in readiness."

She obeyed at once. He gave her the musket that he had in his bandolier, as it might have hampered him. He loaded the one that he had in his hand, and advanced slowly towards the house, going along the trees that bordered on the road, and ready, at the slightest hostile demonstration, to throw himself behind the biggest trunk, from which he would be able to fire from cover. His wife walked at his heels, carrying his reserve musket and his cartridge-box. The work of a good housewife, in case of a struggle, is to load her husband's firearms.

On the other hand, the adjutant was much troubled to see Mateo advance thus, with careful steps, the musket in front and his finger on the trigger.

"If by chance," thought he, "Mateo should turn out to be a relation of Gianetto, or if he were his friend, and should wish to defend him, the charge of both muskets will reach us in double quick time, just as sure as a letter in the post, and if he were to aim at me, notwithstanding the relationship! . . ."

In this perplexity he played a very courageous part: this was to advance alone towards Mateo, in order to tell him of the affair, approaching him like an old acquaintance; but the short space that separated him from Mateo appeared terribly long.

"Hallo, my old friend!" cried he; "how are you, old chap? It's me, I am Gamba, your cousin."

Mateo, without answering a word, had stopped, and as the other spoke he slowly raised the barrel of his musket, so that it was directed towards the sky at the moment the adjutant joined him.

"Good-day, brother," said the adjutant, holding out his hand. "It is indeed a long time since I have seen you."

"Good-day, brother."

"I came over in order to say good-day to you in passing, and also to my cousin Pepa. We have made a long journey to-day; but we must not complain of fatigue, for we have made a famous capture. We have just seized Gianetto Sanpiero."

"God be praised!" cried Giuseppa. "He stole a milch goat from us last week."

The words gladdened Gamba.

"Poor devil!" said Mateo, "he was hungry."

"The scamp defended himself like a lion," continued the adjutant, a little mortified; "he killed one of my troopers, and, not content with that, he broke Corporal Chardon's arm; but that is no great harm, he is only a Frenchman. . . . After that, he was so well hidden that the devil himself would not have been able to discover him. But for my little cousin Fortunato, I should never have been able to find him."

"Fortunato!" cried Mateo.

"Fortunato!" repeated Giuseppa.

"Yes, Gianetto was hidden beneath that pile of hay yonder; but my little cousin showed me the trick. Accordingly, I shall tell his uncle, the corporal, so that he may send him a nice present for his trouble. And his name and yours will be in the report that I shall send to the attorney-general."

"Curse it!" said Mateo, quite low.

They had joined the detachment. Gianetto was already laid on his litter and ready to leave. When he saw Mateo in the company of Gamba he smiled a peculiar smile; then, turning towards the door of the house, he spat on the threshold, saying:

"The house of a traitor!"

It would only have been a man that had made up his mind to die that would have dared to pronounce the word traitor with reference to Falcone. A good stiletto thrust, that would not need to have been repeated, would immediately have paid for the insult. However, Mateo made no other movement than that of carrying his hand to his forehead, like a dejected man.

Fortunato had entered the house on seeing his father arrive. He soon reappeared with a bowl of milk that he offered, with downcast eyes, to Gianetto.

"Get out!" cried the outlaw to him, in a terrible voice.

Then, turning towards one of the dragoons:

"Comrade, give me a drink," said he.

The soldier took his flask in his hands, and the bandit drank the water that was given him by a man with whom he had just exchanged shots. Then he asked that they would fix his hands in such a way that they would be crossed on his breast, instead of having them tied behind his back.

"I like," said he, "to lie comfortably."

They hastened to satisfy him; then the adjutant gave the signal for departure, bade good-bye to Mateo, who did not reply, and descended with rapid steps towards the plain.

Nearly ten minutes elapsed before Mateo opened his mouth. The child looked with an anxious eye, sometimes at his mother, sometimes at his father, who was leaning on his musket, and regarding him with an expression of suppressed anger.

"You begin well!" said Mateo at last, in a calm voice, but terrible to those who knew the man.

"My father!" cried the child, coming forward, the tears in his eyes, as if to throw himself on his knees.

But Mateo cried to him:

"Away from me!"

And the child stopped and sobbed motionless several paces from his father.

Giuseppa approached. She had just noticed the watch-chain, the end of which came out from Fortunato's shirt.

"Who gave you that watch?" she asked in a severe tone.

"My cousin, the adjutant."

Falcone seized the watch, and, throwing it forcibly against a stone, broke it in a thousand pieces.

"Woman," said he, "is this child mine?"

Giuseppa's brown cheeks became brick-red.

"What do you say, Mateo? And do you know whom you're speaking to?"

"Very well, the child is the first of his race that has committed treason."

Fortunato's sobs and hiccoughs were redoubled, and Falcone kept his lynx eyes fixed on him continually. At last he struck the ground with the butt-end of his musket, then he threw it over his shoulder, and again took the road for the bush, calling on Fortunato to follow him. The child obeyed.

Giuseppa ran after Mateo and seized his arm.

"He's your son," said she to him, in a trembling voice, and riveted her black eyes on those of her husband, as if to read what was passing in his heart.

"Leave me," replied Mateo: "I am his father."

Giuseppa embraced her son, and entered the cabin weeping. She threw herself on her knees before an image of the Virgin, and prayed fervently. Meantime, Falcone marched some two hundred paces along the path, and stopped at a little ravine, into which he descended. He sounded the ground with the butt-end of his musket, and found it soft and easy to dig. The spot appeared to him to be suitable for his purpose.

"Fortunato, go in front of that big stone."

The child did as he was commanded, then knelt down:

"Say your prayers."

"My father, my father! Do not kill me!"

"Say your prayers!" replied Mateo in a terrible voice.

The child, stammering and sobbing through it all, repeated the Pater and the Credo. His father in a strong voice responded Amen! at the end of each prayer.

"Are these all the prayers that you know?"

"My father, I also know the Ave Maria and the litany that my aunt taught me."

"It is rather long, but no matter."

The child finished the litany in a voice scarcely audible.

"Are you finished?"

"Oh! My father, pardon! Forgive me! I will never do it again! I shall ask my cousin the corporal ever so much to pardon Gianetto!"

He was still speaking; Mateo had cocked his gun and taken aim at him, saying:

"May God pardon you!"

The child made a despairing effort to rise and clasp his father's knees; but he had not time for this. Mateo fired, and Fortunato fell dead at once.

Mateo, without casting a glance at the body, returned by the path towards his house to fetch a spade in order to bury his son. He had scarcely gone a few steps when he met Giuseppa, who was running, alarmed at the sound of firing.

"What have you done?" she cried.

"Justice."

"Where is he?"

"In the ravine. I am going to bury him. He died a Christian; I shall have a mass celebrated for him. I would like you to tell my son-in-law, Tiodoro Bianchi, to come and live with us."—Translated by W. W. Tunbridge.

CORRESPONDENCE

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Owing to the large number of letters received it is necessary for correspondents to write briefly if their letters are to appear.

"RAINGLESS" WHEAT.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—In "Notes of the Week," in your issue of April 25th, you predict "a diversion of, at any rate part of, the present stream of emigrants to South Africa," owing to the sensational results achieved by Dr. Macdonald, the Government expert, and his staff in growing wheat in the dry belt of the Transvaal, on which not a drop of rain had fallen from seed time to harvest.

Dr. Macdonald and his staff have done splendid work in South Africa, and have opened the eyes of the people to the wonderful possibilities of the country. But a settler needs more than possibilities. Possibilities are of no use to him without land on which to turn them into actualities, and where is he to get land in South Africa at a figure which will give him as good a return on the cash he invests as he will be able to get in Western Canada or Australia? All the land in the healthy parts of the Union has long since been taken up, and we cannot further encroach on the native territories without grave injustice. Lord Milner bought land all over the country for closer settlements, ten or twelve years ago, but, owing to the high price which had to be given for the land, his closer settlements tell the same dismal story as the small-holders' allotments in England.

I live near the White River Settlement, started at great expense to the British taxpayer just after the war, and there is not a single settler left there now, and the irrigation canal, buildings, etc., are all falling to pieces; and the other settlements can tell much the same tale.

The average size of the farms in the Union, according to Dr. Macdonald, is 5,000 acres, and in a majority of cases the finest crop the farmer grows is the beard on his own chin.

The Transvaal Consolidated Lands Company own 3,333,000 acres in the Transvaal—nearly a twentieth of the whole country. Mr. W. McCallum, presiding at the annual meeting of the Transvaal Landowners' Association in Johannesburg last month, said: "This gradual increase in white settlement, slight though it is, coupled with the eradication of pests, better means of communication, etc., is having an effect on the price of land which is gradually improving, and I think we may safely look forward to that improvement being maintained."

Exactly! Each settler Dr. Macdonald persuades to come out here will help on with the improvement. He will put up the price of land a bit against the next one, and the more the merrier—for the land companies; and unless we follow the lead of the other colonies and tax land values, the future of the white races in South Africa—well, there isn't any.

At present more people are leaving the Union than are coming into it, and even the Dutch are emigrating; but the taxation of land values and a gradual separation of the whites and blacks are questions which are at present exciting a great deal of attention out here, and if we can only manage to carry them through we will then see a turn in the tide, and the blood and wealth so freely spent to win this grand

HOLIDAY TRAVEL.

"NOT THE AIMLESS WANDERING THAT YIELDS EXCITEMENT, CONFUSION OF IDEAS AND PHYSICAL EXHAUSTION, BUT THE CAREFULLY PLANNED, LEISURELY, DIGNIFIED TOUR THAT PROVIDES REST, RECREATION, INSPIRATION, CULTURE."

"EVERYMAN" HOLIDAYS.

EVERYMAN, I WILL GO WITH THEE
AND BE THY GUIDE, IN THY MOST NEED TO GO BY THY SIDE.

THE success that has attended the EVERYMAN Continental Holiday Tours, arranged in conjunction with a Private Touring Company, is a striking tribute to the confidence that the readers have in their journal. The first parties are now enjoying all the advantages offered by EVERYMAN TOURS. Some of our readers have gone to Lucerne and Grindelwald, some to Rouen and Paris, others to beautiful Bruges, and to Flanders and the Ardennes. And we know that their holidays will be all that a holiday should be, for all that is humanly possible to make them so has been done.

WITH "EVERYMAN" TO HOLLAND.

A really splendid conducted holiday has been arranged in quaint, picturesque Holland. Parties leave Victoria Station on July 25th and August 15th.

THE CHARM OF HOLLAND.

No country is more suitable for a short holiday than Holland; it is a small country; it is said that the whole of it can be seen from the top of a high tower, and the tourist has the satisfaction of knowing that he can see most of the country during his stay.

AS GOOD AS VENICE!

Holland is, moreover, a country unique, and offers that entire change only to be obtained in a strange land among strange people. Holland is unlike any other country. Thackeray talks of a week spent in Holland revelling amid its quaint attractions. There was the journey by rail "through the vast green flats, speckled by cows and bounded by a gay frontier of wind-mills"; the Hague is "the prettiest little brick city, with the pleasantest park to ride in, the neatest, comfortable people walking about, the canals not unsweet, and busy and picturesque with old-world life;" and Amsterdam is "as good as Venice, with a superadded humour and grotesqueness which gives the sightseer the most singular zest and pleasure."

THE DUTCH FOLK.

The strangeness of Holland is most refreshing. Everywhere are to be seen windmills and canals; cattle are grazing in the rich pastures, many of them "dressed" in a queer kind of jacket; the rows of trees planted along the dykes look like the toy-trees out of a Noah's Ark; the peasants are dressed in quaint costumes, and wear extraordinary head-dresses, the hoofdijzer, a gold and silver helmet, looking like a second skull. Here and there are to be seen the Storks, treated with much respect by the kindly Dutch folk.

THE ZUYDER ZEE.

The greatest interest of all circles around the quaint villages on the shores of the Zuyder Zee. Leaving Amsterdam, a short boat journey brings the visitor into a veritable Land of Comic Opera. At Volendam, and again at Marken, the picturesque costumes of the villagers and their quaint environment are the delight of artists and photographers.

EXCURSIONS.

Many excursions have been arranged, including visits to Amsterdam, steamer trip to Zaandam, the "Village of Windmills," all-day steamer trips round the Dead Cities of the Zuyder Zee, to Volendam, the Island of Marken, trip to Haarlem, visit to the Groote Kerk, a day at the Hague, visit to Delft, etc., etc.

INCLUSIVE COST.

The cost, including all hotels (three meals a day) and travelling expenses (second class throughout), admission fees, etc., drives in Amsterdam and the Hague, steamer trips to the Isle of Marken and the "Dead Cities of the Zuyder Zee," and to Dordrecht, trips to Haarlem, Delft, and Scheveningen, and services of conductor, is only £5 19s. Inclusive fee to cover all gratuities and portage of luggage, 4s. 6d.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

Many parties are now complete, and others are being rapidly filled up. To avoid disappointment it is advisable to provisionally book your place AT ONCE.

UNIQUE SYSTEM OF INDEPENDENT TOURS.

The EVERYMAN system of independent tours is a most attractive form of touring abroad without a conductor, and yet with all the advantages of a conducted tour.

AN ATTRACTIVE SYSTEM.

The fundamental principle of this System is that the traveller should journey with as much comfort and absence of worry as if accompanied by the actual Courier.

Every traveller is supplied with a chart showing in separate columns, each day of his Tour, clearly: where he will Breakfast, where Lunch, where Dine, where Sleep, etc.

CHOOSE YOUR OWN ROUTE

After the traveller has decided on his route, we quote him a rate for the whole journey, including every necessary expense, such as Hotel Accommodation (bedroom, light, and attendance), Breakfast, Lunch, and Dinner, Railway and Steamship Fares, Conveyances to and from Hotels and Stations, Guides where necessary and wanted, Carriage Drives and Excursions, etc.

AND YOUR OWN HOTELS.

Thus, then, the traveller is supplied with a chart for his journey, and knows just how much it will cost him, and carries nothing but a case with his name on, which is his identification to Hotels, and, of course, his Railway Tickets.

No coupons are carried, and the traveller may select his own Hotel prior to starting, if he has a preference. Detailed information will be gladly sent.

THE "EVERYMAN" BOOK.

A postcard will bring you the EVERYMAN book, which tells you all about our delightful Continental Holidays. Drop us a line, to-day, and we will send it you at once.

THE MAN WHO IS CURING THE NATION'S EYESIGHT.

LONDON SPECIALIST'S WONDERFUL DISCOVERY.

Particulars Now Available to the Public.

A well-known London specialist has made a remarkable discovery, which already is making a sensation wherever the result of its use is known.

It is nothing less than the discovery of a wonderfully simple yet scientific method for restoring tired, old eyes to their once-youthful, clear-seeing power, and curing weak eyesight.

Everybody who for the first time is told about the new discovery is asking, "Will it do my sight good?"

The answer in practically every case is "Yes."

As Mr. John Levison, the discoverer of this wonderful eyesight cure, says, "Everyone may cure his or her own trouble at home, inexpensively and speedily, by following Unnatural position of the short-sighted.

Natural easy position when reading or writing.

out the instructions I give, which are so simple that a child could understand, yet so effective as to be of benefit, no matter how bad the sight may be."

Mr. Levison particularly invites those who wear glasses to write to or call upon him for his advice, and especially writers and students who find their sight overstrained by reason of their occupation.

He makes no charge for this advice, whether to callers or to postal inquirers.

Most successful has the new discovery proved for:—

- | | |
|--------------------------------|----------------------------|
| 1. Failing or Weakening Sight. | 6. Watery Eyes. |
| 2. Short Sight. | 7. Discharging Eyes. |
| 3. Old Sight and Blurring. | 8. Unequal Eyes. |
| 4. Twitching Eyes. | 9. Aching Eyes. |
| 5. Hot Eyes. | 10. Red and Inflamed Eyes. |

11. Eyesight Headaches.

Particularly those advanced in years find benefit from Mr. Levison's method, and already a great many people of fifty, sixty, or seventy years write him stating they can once again see clearly. Their tired eyes are re-strengthened, and they need no longer wear glasses.

Mr. Levison has thought how he could best reply to the great number who have written to him, and he has now prepared printed particulars which clearly set out what this wonderful method is and what it will do for those with weak sight. Copies of these particulars may be obtained either by calling on Mr. Levison personally or by writing to him at The Levison Eyesight Institute, 64, Wigmore Street, London, W.

It will be of particular interest to readers to learn that the authoritative medical journal, the Family Doctor, warmly approves of his clever discovery, and advises all who have weak or failing sight to write for the particulars he is for the time being prepared to send on receipt of a penny stamp for reply.

WOMAN IN THE FINANCIAL WORLD.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—My attention has been directed to a letter in your issue of the 20th June headed "Woman in the Financial World," and signed by Reginald H. S. Cobbitt, who describes himself as a "Chartered Accountant," although his name does not appear in the latest issue of the list of members of the Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales. In endeavouring to correct a statement made in your article under the above heading, he makes another statement which in turn needs correction. It is perfectly true that the Institute does not admit women to its examinations. It is not true, however, that numerous associations of accountants have sprung up in late years. Only two associations have come into existence, of which this is one, and they have fully justified their right to exist by their success. The London Association of Accountants is the only association in the British Isles which admits women to its rank, and it might even be interesting to your readers to know how it came to do so. The profession of accountancy does not largely attract women, or otherwise they would by now either have been attached to some Institute or had a society of their own; but a few years ago the Institute of Chartered Accountants endeavoured to get a Bill through Parliament limiting the right of practising very considerably, and chiefly in favour of their own members, and in endeavouring to get influential support from the Government it was pointed out that they ought to include women. The promoters thereupon said that if the Bill could be passed they would admit women. The Bill, owing to its inherent unfairness, did not get anywhere near passing. The Council of this Association thereupon very properly reasoned that if it was good enough for the Chartered Institute to admit women if the Bill was passed, it was good enough for the London Association to admit them in any event, and so they did, and their enlightened policy has been justified by results.—I am, sir, etc.,

THE MONT DE PIÉTÉ.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—In his interesting article on the French Mont de Piété, your Special Commissioner did not mention an important adjunct to that Institution. I refer to the 2,000 odd persons who flourish by lending money on its tickets.

The French authorities have tried to suppress them by legislation, but have failed to do so, and the customers of the Mont de Piété continue to borrow money at a low rate, and then to raise additional sums on the tickets at 50 or 60 per cent. In estimating the value of the Mont de Piété this fact has to be remembered, and I must query your Commissioner's dictum that the advantage is so unquestionably with the French system.

He mentioned the delays caused by its necessary centralisation, and he might have included the matter of distance, and the possible tram fare to get to it. In the big cities of Great Britain, including London, a pawnbroker can generally be found not very far off, and competition makes it necessary for him to do his best to accommodate his customer.

Your Commissioner makes the rate of interest in Great Britain to work out very formidably; but to take the worst-looking case—a loan of 1s. for three days, on which the $\frac{1}{2}$ d. for the ticket and $\frac{1}{2}$ d. interest amount to 1,014 per cent. per annum—it is possible that such a transaction may really mean a loss to the pawnbroker in a business of average size.

Your Commissioner forgets that, in addition to writing the ticket, he has to make a complete entry of the transaction in a book, do the parcel up so that it may be in good condition if left for twelve months, and have it carefully stacked in his warehouse, so that it can be quickly found when wanted.

The warehouse has to be kept clean, and the parcel has to be insured against fire and burglary to the extent of principal and interest, and 25 per cent. on the amount of the loan. I question whether the 1d. is sufficient to cover the cost of all this, unless the number of pledges taken in is very large. To take a similar case, I do not think that the railways have a gold mine in their cloak-rooms, though 2d. a day is charged for each article and no money is advanced.

Again, are there many retail businesses that can be profitably conducted on a lower basis than 25 per cent. gross profit on their sales?—a much higher rate than the 25 per cent. per annum of the pawnbroker.

As regards the sale by auction of unredeemed pledges, I do not understand your Commissioner's point. By law, the sales have to be well advertised, the auctioneers are men of high standing in their profession, and it is to their interest to get the best prices possible; but if the pawnbroker does not sit beside them, or send them a catalogue marked with his reserve prices, they must sell without reserve, and leave him entirely in the dealers' hands. If the dealers will not give what he believes to be a fair price, what is the pawnbroker to do but to buy the pledge in and try to sell it elsewhere?

The reason why there is not often a surplus for the pledger in Great Britain is that competition leads pawnbrokers in most cases to lend well up to the market value.

I believe it to be true that, of all tradesmen who do business with the poor, the pawnbroker makes the smallest profit out of them.—I am, sir, etc.,
London, W. A PAWNBROKER.

THE CURSE OF USURY.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—As one possessing an intimate acquaintance with usury in slumland, may I be permitted to supply a little item overlooked by your Special Commissioner?

In his table giving the percentage of interest accruing to pawnbrokers, he has omitted to reckon with a charge that is levied without legal approval. Beyond the charge for the ticket and the charge for interest protected by law, the pawnbroker imposes a rental tax (if one may so call it). It works this way: A woman pawns a petticoat or a pair of boots, and the charges, as given by your Commissioner, are imposed. But a girl pawning her best blouse, which she wants taken care of, is charged an extra penny for "hanging up" or putting away in a drawer. This makes a very material difference in the table of profits.—I am, sir, etc.,

FANNY BURNEY'S "EVELINA."

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—On reading the interesting "Master-piece for the Week" in EVERYMAN of June 20th, by Anna Branson, on "Evelina," I think it may interest your readers to know that the house occupied by Dr. Burney, in the garret of which "Evelina" was written, and situated in St. Martin's Street, W.C., is now advertised for sale. The interest attaching to this building is, however, not confined to it being the birthplace of the celebrated novel; before Dr. Burney's time it was—for the last seventeen years of his life-time—the dwelling-place of Sir Isaac Newton. Does it not seem almost a scandal that the house whose history is so bound up with national progress should come under the auctioneer's hammer? The difficulties of purchase are, I understand, extremely great, inasmuch as the narrow street is bound to be made into a wide thoroughfare. But surely, even if it has to be pulled down, the least that can be done is to mark, in some conspicuous manner, that on this site stood the house occupied by the leader of British Science and the great authoress who—as your contributor so truly says—"made the path smooth for Maria Edgeworth, Jane Austen, Charlotte Brontë, and the many other women who have been mighty with the pen."—I am, sir, etc.,

GEORGE BORROW AND THE GYPSIES.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I am glad to see that your correspondent "D. B. G." has raised the question of Borrow's knowledge of gypsies. May I be permitted to suggest that Borrow's knowledge of Romanes was no more thoroughgoing than his other philological researches? I believe it is the opinion of competent latter-day "Romany Ryes" that he did not so completely express the gypsy spirit as is generally supposed, e.g., the description of the gypsy female character has been far more adequately treated by men like Francis Groome or Leland.

I met last vacation an old gypsy, a nephew of Jasper Petulengro, who told me he well remembered Borrow, and in his boyhood had frequently stayed near Oulton Hall during Borrow's residence there. "Yes, my dear," he once told me, "Mr. Borrow was a fine gentleman; but he 'penned' (told) a lot of hukkaben (lies) about us Romanes."

With regard to the vexed question of origins, blessed beyond men is he who can speak with certainty of the first home of the Roms. I think, however, one thing is certain, and that is that they did not emanate originally from Egypt. Leland suggested that they came from Northern India, and thought they seemed identical with a wandering low-caste tribe called the Dons or Roms. "D. B. G." will find in Leland's "English Gypsies and the Language" a chapter on evidences of their Indian origin. The tenacity with which the gypsy has preserved his pride of race, his contempt for "gorgios" (Gentiles), and, above all, his hatred of mumpers (half-breeds), bespeaks a sense of caste which is at least remarkable.

The Romany word for water (pani) is, I believe, the same as the Hindustani word, and "jukhel," a dog, leaves no doubt of their starting from, or long residence in, the land of the jackal. There are, of course, many words in the gypsy language which have been drafted into it in the course of their wanderings

Is "D. B. G." aware that there is another language of the road, which is Celtic in origin, and contains many archaic Gaelic words, "Shelta," or the Tinker's language? That was discovered by Leland, and Borrow does not appear to be aware of its existence. The vocabulary is not nearly so extensive as Romanes.

I presume "D. B. G." knows the story of the gypsies appearing in Europe in the fifteenth century, doing penance for having refused hospitality to the Virgin and her child while in Egypt.

It is a poor Romanichel who couldn't pooker a hukkaben to a gorgio if there was any chance of making any dloovu (money) out of it!—I am, sir, etc.,

IVAN TURGENIEV.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Your readers are thankful for all the good things in EVERYMAN which you are giving us week by week. Amongst these we are specially thankful for the series of splendid character sketches, and amongst the best of these is the one in your last issue, on Ivan Turgeniev, by Charles Sarolea, who always writes with such a well-informed mind and an illuminating style.

I do not, however, understand how Mr. Sarolea can say that Turgeniev has no creative faculty. I admit that his great power is that of minute and comprehensive observation. It is said that his tales are a magazine of small facts, anecdotes, and descriptive traits taken from life. He seemed to keep a diary of what he saw, and of his sense impressions. But does that argue the absence of the creative faculty? Does creation mean to bring something out of nothing?

When we see the wonderful imaginative and emotional force he brings to bear upon his facts, traits, etc., by which they are transfigured by the alchemy of his wonderful genius, I think we have a revelation of creative power of a high order. Henry James, in his able study of Turgeniev, says: "No romancer has created a greater number of the figures that breathe, and move, and speak, in their habits as they might have lived; none, on the whole, seems to us to have had such a masterly touch in portraiture, none has mingled so much ideal beauty with so much unsparing reality." I think all who know the great Russian novelist will agree with this dictum.—I am, sir, etc.,

THE TRAFFIC IN WOMEN.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—I should like to draw the attention of all interested in the above subject to an article entitled "The Truth About White Slavery," which appears in the June issue of the English Review.

No one who carefully considers the evidence there set forth will fail to be convinced of the truth of the author's contention that the various tales of the forcible abduction of young girls which have been current are wholly fictitious, and have been recounted to a too credulous public for the purpose of showing the helplessness of women—of course without the vote.

All the so-called evidence on which the Flogging Act was passed has been subjected to a searching inquiry, with the result that the members of the "Pass

SPARE TIME OR WASTE TIME ? * * * BY JOHN PERCIVAL

WAS it not the late Archbishop of Canterbury who asserted that such a thing as spare time should not exist? According to Dr. Temple, famous divine, scholar and teacher, all time which was not utilised for some definite good, for some actual progress, was waste time.

Have you "spare time" or "waste time"? In these days of keen competition for the very right to earn one's daily bread, this is an important question for all.

Perhaps you will say that you have a very little spare time each day, certainly not in long enough periods for it to be worth anything. Well, this little fact will show you what can be done in odd moments. One of the missionaries in India, in the early part of the last century, was a member of a religious community. During the time it took him daily to walk from his room to the dining-hall for meals he first of all committed to memory the entire Psalter and the Gospel according to St. John, and then translated them both into Hindi, his translation being to-day the standard version of those portions of the Scriptures. Working about six minutes daily, he completed a task which would satisfy many a scholar's life-ambition. He was neither better nor more learned than his fellows, but he had no spare time. Every moment was of value.

"Dost thou love life?" wrote old Ben Franklin in his "Poor Richard." "Then do not squander time, for that is the stuff life is made of."

What do you do with your odd minutes? Do you use them to further your progress in life? Have you reached the highest post you are fit for? Have you exploited every one of your possible talents and made the most of them? If not, you are not getting the full value out of your life.

Can you use your unoccupied moments to rise to greater power and wealth? Certainly you can, if you wish to. Naturally there are few callings which can be pursued at odd times without the use of special books, special appliances, or suitable surroundings; but pen and pencil and paper are portable. If you find ideas for stories crowd into your head, jot them down, and when you get a little leisure elaborate those notes into short stories. Send one or two to some reliable teacher, and he will tell you if it is worth your while to be trained properly in journalism. Many of our most popular writers have commenced in this way.

But, personally, I am inclined to think that the business of writing advertisements is the best for odd moments, and it is certainly the most lucrative.

One has only to sit down and consider the millions spent annually on advertising to realise the tremendous field open to the trained advertisement-writer. And the demand is steadily increasing. Here, then, is an ideal opportunity of converting spare hours into golden guineas. I know the possibilities of the advertising field, and I say emphatically that were I a young man again I would not hesitate to qualify for the advertising profession. I know of one young man who earned as much as £100 a year, and more, in his spare time by writing advertisements. I know another man who gives one evening a week to advertisement-writing, and receives a guinea for the evening's work. Another couple, to my knowledge, in receipt of a regular salary, augment their income to the extent of £20 or more monthly by devoting four or five evenings per week to the work. What is there to make these men so successful? Brains they certainly have, but in no greater degree than many a 30s. per week clerk. Their secret was training. Experience was good, but, as Roger Ascham says, "By experience we find a short way by a long wandering. Learning teacheth more in one year than experience in twenty," and I know of no better training in advertisement-writing than that afforded by the Practical Correspondence College, 77, Thanet House, Strand, London, W.C. I have been permitted to examine the Course, and also to look through the criticisms of students' work, and I was thoroughly impressed with the practical and sound system of tuition. The College claims to have gained a sound reputation for honest and thorough tuition, and the fact that the principals will only accept as students those who show definite aptitude for the work (as evidenced by letters I saw advising unsuitable applicants not to enrol), is undoubtedly a policy which is bound to promote the interests of the Practical Correspondence College.

Readers of EVERYMAN who realise the vital importance of increasing their earning capacity, and of utilising their spare time in the most profitable way, will be well advised to write to the Secretary of the Practical Correspondence College, 77, Thanet House, Strand, London, W.C., for a free copy of "Brains and Ink," and if advantage is taken of the Course, then Dr. Temple's ideal will be fulfilled, and you will have no "waste time," because you no longer have "spare time."

This investigation has revealed the truth that the social evil has been greatly exaggerated by the Suffragettes to gain their ends. MR. LILLY ON INDIANS.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Mr. W. S. Lilly having now completed his tirade upon Indians, I hope you will allow me to refute some of the statements made by him in his article published in the current issue of EVERYMAN.

The advocacy and justification of similar ideas in one respect were put before your readers only recently—namely, the gospel of Imperialism; only more seductively put, under the pretext of benefiting civilisation. Your correspondent's argument resolves itself into saying that the Indians are not competent to govern themselves, and that the subject race should in nowise question the policy of the powers that be, but should silently assent to the doings of the executive without one word of murmur. But even a conquered people have their rights, and will assert them when the time arrives, despite the rage, threat, and oppression of the despot. Bureaucratic activity and viceregal zeal misdirected has combined to rouse the slumbering Titan of discontent and despair of an aggrieved and helpless nation.

Furthermore, he says that by educating them we are only poisoning their minds against us, and breeding discontent. It is also clear that, by quoting M. Maindron, he agrees with the latter when he says, speaking of the Indians, "Their power is the pen." Apparently he fears the intellectual superiority of the Indian over the Englishman, given equal opportunities!

Anglo-Indian policy has been to strike a blow at the growing power of the educated and advanced classes. Was not the Education Act really meant more than anything else to restrict higher education, by making it more costly, and to officialise the governing bodies of the Universities, which had been enjoying some degree of independence?

Again, the Official Secrets Act was passed to muzzle the Indian press, and also the passing of the Seditious Meetings Act drove resentment underground, and was the cause of the origin of the anarchic school of thought. Killing a rising nationality is no ordinary crime, and it seems as though British democracy has taken an opiate dose of slumbering apathy, leading to profound ignorance and indifference, upon which ministers and proconsuls trade.

I am well aware that if we left India to-day the Indians could not control themselves; but, given their rights now, the day is not far distant when they will be able to do so.—I am, sir, etc.,

S. Wales.

INDUSTRIAL SCIENTIFIC MANAGEMENT.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Your correspondent, Mr. Burke, appears to overlook an important factor in the development of "Industrial Scientific Management," namely, industrial monopoly in the shape of huge trusts and combines. In business, at the present time, co-operation is rapidly taking the place of competition. The advantages to the producers of a co-operative policy are becoming more and more apparent, and no doubt by the time we have scientific management, we will also have all our industries monopolised by huge trusts. In any case, the co-operation of employers seems to me to be an elementary principle of "Industrial Scientific Management."

Industrial monopoly would, of course, eliminate competition, and enable the producers to demand almost any price for their productions; therefore Mr. Burke is mistaken in his contention that many of the surplus workers would be employed in advertising and pushing sales, as that occupation depends for its existence on competition.

The problem of how to employ those superfluous workers is a very perplexing one, but, as the introduction of "Industrial Scientific Management" will be a gradual process, I have no doubt it will gradually solve itself with the changing conditions of life. Human beings have always shown a remarkable capacity of adapting themselves to their surroundings.—I am, sir, etc.,

J. J.

Glasgow,

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I venture to add a word on this subject, because one at least of your correspondents seems to have rather misunderstood what I consider was Mr. Fels' attitude on this subject, and his object in writing.

Unlike Mr. Johnstone, I did not understand that Mr. Fels was writing against Industrial Scientific Management, but that he was pointing out the effects of such a system, which effects he admirably epitomised in his paradox.

What Mr. Fels wanted to show would not happen Mr. Johnstone affirms would happen, for he says that if one man can be made to do the work of three, the other two are free to turn their hands to useful production of some other kind. But when these two turn to other productive occupations, they find the same process going on, the twos being turned away, the ones remaining.

Nor are we much aided by Mr. Burke's statement that the larger profits would mean keener competition, more advertising, and larger selling staffs. The connection between big profits and keen competition is far from obvious, and the statement, like most statements beginning with, e.g., "There is no getting away from the fact that . . ." needs examination, but will scarce bear it.

A man stranded on a barren rock is free to produce the wherewithal to live; scarcely more free will be those unfortunate individuals displaced by Industrial Scientific Management.

Nevertheless, freedom to produce is the one thing necessary, and that entails at least equality of access to the resources of nature, the source of all production; and that in turn necessarily involves the abolition of private property in land.—I am, sir, etc., and Mr. William Johnston respectively. I shall be glad if you will permit me to take up a little of your valuable space to enable me to deal with the criticisms of these gentlemen.

Mr. Burke appears not to have taken in the gist of my contention re the scientific management of industrial enterprises, for in his opening sentence he remarks that I stated a case against this system, whereas I did nothing of the kind, though I maintained that any system of speeding up in industrial establishments, while it would increase the output, and consequently tend somewhat to help the wages of the employees, the ultimate effect would be to throw people out of work, without their having any certainty of employment elsewhere under present conditions. The system of speeding up would, of course, mean reduced cost of production, and a correspondingly increased profit to the factory; but I deny that this would lead to greater consumption, except in an artificial way. Mr. Burke entirely and significantly ignores the ethics of employment which I have attempted to impress upon the readers of your journal.

Mr. Henderson is, I think, wrong in his belief that "industrial scientific management would herald the adoption of universal co-partnery," if he makes that suggestion under existing conditions. It is my honest belief that, if scientific management were brought to such a point of perfection as to double the present output with the same amount of labour, it would have little or no effect on bringing the workers into partnership with the "bosses." The latter might throw a larger sop to the workers in the shape of extra wages, but, as only a few control the earth and the franchise growing out of the possession thereof, the many would still be disinherited, Mr. Henderson's "common sense and moral right" to the contrary notwithstanding.

In the contentions I made in my article I was a great deal farther away from theorising than perhaps Mr. Johnston has any idea of, because access to land will do what I claimed, and is, in fact, doing it at the present time in several countries to the extent of such access. In Jutland (Denmark) the wages of agricultural labourers are 15 per cent. higher than in any other part of the country, and no man is able to trace any reason for this, except that land is easier to get in small areas than in any other part of that enterprising little country. An agricultural labourer will not accept from an employer lower wages than he can earn by applying his own labour to the earth under his own management.

I commend Messrs. Burke, Henderson, and Johnston to a careful reading with open minds, as well as with open eyes, of a book which many more than I consider one of the bibles of the world—Henry George's "Progress and Poverty." Indeed, George is one of the modern prophets of the world. Messrs. Dent and Sons, Ltd. have put "Progress and Poverty" in suitable company in their "Everyman's Library." If this is asking too much of my three critics, then I beg that they will read my article again.—I am, sir, etc.,

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

RAINBOW LIGHTS (Duckworth, 6s.) is a series of impressions in one of the least literary of the many Yankee dialects. Soliloquy is the form affected, punctuated with innumerable dashes, interjections, and well peppered with asterisks. Mr. de Silva's style is a very trying one. We are reminded of a jolting omnibus of the old-fashioned horse type, wherein one's progress was impeded by jars and irrelevancies. A quotation from the volume will emphasise our point: "But it makes me kind of mad when I hear a business woman break out. She'd ought to know more than that. It's easy to talk. Some of them's fond and some of them isn't . . . and the wonder to me is that any of them's fond at all. It is easy to be fond of the baby when you've all there is to share with it . . . but when you are earning your four dollars a week . . . and finding yourself . . . and then there's another to find for . . .!"

THE REPENTANCE OF DESTINY (Duckworth, 6s.), by Shway Dinga, is all about ancient Burma. It is presumably written by an Asiatic, but though the manners and customs of the people show due regard for local colour, there is none of the convincing charm and tragic intensity of that beautiful book on Burma entitled "The Soul of a People," by Henry Fielding. The story in the present volume reads somewhat like melodrama of our own times. Tun Min, the son of Ko Mung, "a blood-stained Burman," was dedicated to the priesthood. He found himself unable to endure the rigorous discipline. "A lonely mind in a holy setting" did not appeal to him, and he went out into the world. He fell in love with Min Kalé, an outrageous little flirt with many lovers and not a few adventures. She is not attracted by Tun Min, but realises he will make a comfortable husband, and becomes engaged to him. The engagement is short-lived, and the culmination of her intrigues is her suicide by poison and the murder of her latest lover. In the ultimate Tun Min goes back to the religious life. He finds even a monastery too populated for him, and becomes a recluse "in a lonely cave on the road to Hsipaw, in the Shan Hills," where he sees the years go by, with very little food and no intellectual relaxations. The author does not give us a reassuring or comforting picture of Tun Min, the anchorite. He is no more convincing in his last phase than in his first.

"We leave him alone in his cave as a cold statue, with his eyes fixed on the waving forest, which they see not, and his soul centred on the eternal verities, illumined by the pure light of Contentment and Peace."

THE LIFE OF JOHN BRIGHT (Constable, 15s. net), by Mr. G. M. Trevelyan, is an epitome of some of the most striking political events in the history of Queen Victoria's reign. The volume is carefully arranged, and contains much curious information that has hitherto failed to come to light. He sketches the part that the great orator played as Cobden's principal lieutenant in that great agitation which culminated in the repeal of the Corn Laws with telling effect. One realises the unique quality of Bright's genius, a genius

THE CURE OF CONSUMPTION.

DR. EDWIN W. ALABONE'S TREATMENT.

An abundance of proof exists to show that by the use of the special inhalation treatment promulgated by Dr. Edwin W. Alabone, of Highbury Quadrant, London, N., it is possible to effect an absolute cure in the great majority of cases of persons suffering from that terrible disease consumption, which makes such appalling ravages throughout the kingdom. Unsolicited testimonials have been received from hundreds of restored patients, residing in all parts of the country, and they have gladly furnished particulars of the remarkable cures effected in their own cases by its means, thus establishing beyond every possibility of doubt the fact that consumption—the great national scourge—is capable of being overcome.

Owing to the numerous unsuccessful attempts which have been made in the past to discover an effectual remedy for tuberculosis, the dogma of the incurability of phthisis still remains deeply rooted in the minds of the public, but there are unmistakable signs that knowledge in regard to the curative value of the treatment under consideration is steadily increasing, and there is at the present time hardly any part of the civilised world where the results of Dr. Alabone's treatment have not been attested to. This is shown by the letters which have been received from cured patients dwelling outside the United Kingdom.

One of the chief means by which the knowledge of the intrinsic value of this treatment is scattered broadcast is through those persons who were formerly consumptive, and who fully realise that their lives were saved by its adoption, telling others, so that they, too, might experience the same permanent benefits. Relatives and friends who have seen patients before and after the use of the treatment have been able to fully appreciate the great change for the better; the patients have in a most remarkable manner been transformed from a state of living death into sound health, and, upon careful examination both by Dr. Alabone and other consultants, it has been found that all traces of the disease had disappeared.

For more than forty years now Dr. Alabone has been carrying on warfare against consumption, asthma, bronchitis, and other chest diseases. Years ago, before he set himself exclusively to studying phthisis, he was consultant to several institutions, and, after he left the hospitals, he received testimonials from many of the foremost members of the profession, the wording of which makes it quite clear that he held a high position in the medical world.

The highly satisfactory results attendant upon his fight against tuberculosis have, as might be expected, caused him to have some opponents even amongst his professional brethren. Their number, however, is fast decreasing, and there can be little doubt but that shortly his treatment will be universally adopted. There are to-day a large number of physicians who possess the fullest confidence in it, and who regard it as their bounden duty to recommend it to their consumptive patients. It is as well to point out that some of those who could at one time be numbered amongst his detractors are now his most ardent supporters. This constitutes further proof, if more be needed, of its immense value to sufferers.

It has never been claimed by Dr. Alabone that his treatment for consumption is infallible; some cases may not recover, and this is not to be wondered at, seeing that most of his patients start the treatment at a point in their illness when, after having tried every other, including the open air, their cases have been pronounced as hopeless. There should be no procrastination in cases of consumption; it is always wise to act promptly, as the disease is a particularly deceptive one, and not infrequently when patients are thought to be improving they are in reality becoming worse. A word to the wise is sufficient.

As a matter of fact, thousands of persons who were formerly victims of this disease owe their complete return to good health to this treatment, and any sufferer from phthisis who elects to try it may rest assured that he has wisely chosen, and that he will have the best possible chance at present known of completely recovering from the malady.

A letter received from a cured consumptive living in the county of Bucks contains the paragraph quoted below. This particular patient had been pronounced incurable by the local physician, and it was pointed out to him that he was too far gone for anything to do him any good. A perusal of the paragraph will show that the patient was not too far gone, for, under Dr. Alabone's treatment, he was freed from all traces of that dread disease, and this is what the patient writes:—

"The proof that my cure is complete is assured by the verdict of five doctors who have sounded me since, and can detect no disease of the lungs or chest at all!"

"I must add that my recovery is generally regarded as marvellous by my friends," is a statement culled from a letter written by a London gentleman, who, as in the former case, had been declared to be incurable.

Dr. T. Young, L.R.C.P., L.R.C.S., writes: "Dr. Alabone's treatment for consumption has proved a great success in my own case, after having been given up by several eminent physicians. I am convinced, not only by my own experience, but from evidence of other cases I have seen, that it is the remedy so long sought for."

An immense number of similar cases could be mentioned did the space at disposal admit of doing so, but readers will find any particulars they wish to obtain in the following works by Dr. Alabone:—

in striking incongruity with his origin and surroundings. Among the Quakers one hardly looks to find an artist, yet Bright of all men can most truly be called an artist in words, a superb and compelling orator. It is a book that everyone interested in the great men who moulded the last century should endeavour to procure.

Messrs. George Allan and Co. have re-issued LOVE'S COMING OF AGE, a series of papers by Edward Carpenter. The book had a marked success on its first appearance, and contains so much that is of permanent value in the discussion of that vexed question, the relations of the sexes, that it should in its present form (3s. 6d.) find a ready sale. The author has a delicate style, fragrant, yet strong, and his advice to those who are contemplating marriage is infused with an understanding and a sympathy that makes a wide appeal. He says, most truly, that there should exist one other person in the world towards whom there should be no sense of mine or thine in property or possession, and between whom and oneself there should be a spontaneous rebound of sympathy with all the joys and sorrows and experiences of life. "For such a union love must lay the foundation, but patience and gentle consideration and self-control must work unremittingly to perfect the structure, . . . there falls a sweet, an irresistible trust over their relation to each other which consecrates as it were a double life, making both feel that nothing can now divide, and robbing each of all desire to remain when death has indeed (or at least in outer semblance) removed the other." Over the tumult and jangle as to whether man or woman is the superior being, whether or no husband or wife pays the heaviest price in marriage, these words stand forth, embodying for all time the ideal of a perfect union, a union that, as the author points out, can be obtained with patience, gentle consideration, and self-control.

BEFORE THE DAWN (Chapman and Hall, 6s.), by Miss Katherine James. This is a romance of Italy in the stirring times of Garibaldi and his men. The plot of the story is rather weak, and makes somewhat stringent calls upon the credulity of the reader. Thus we learn that these two brothers are so much alike, even to a scar upon their forehead, that it is almost impossible to tell them apart. Needless to say, this particular coincidence is the cause of much misunderstanding and complications, more especially as one brother is an altogether decent person, who is quite content to act the scapegoat for the many misdeeds of his trying relation. Miss James is on apparently familiar ground when she is content to draw scenes of Italy, and her accounts of the revolutionary sorties are vividly depicted. Monica, the niece of a fraudulent Italian count, falls in love with an Englishman, one of the brothers referred to above, who joins Garibaldi's soldiers. She hears various tales of misdoings, which she believes are the work of her lover, but are really those of his brother; but in the end everything is put right. Leone, Monica's cousin, who is passionately in love with her, is arrested at the instigation of the Pope, on account of his revolutionary sympathies, and cast into prison, from whence he escapes by the connivance of the Englishman; but upon learning that his cousin loves his saviour, he joins the Franciscan Monks, in which capacity he is enabled to render very valuable assistance in frustrating the machinations of a scoundrelly lawyer and a Jesuit priest, who have designs upon Monica's fortune and person. The priest is particularly well drawn, and calls forth reluctant admiration for the ingenuity of his plots, in which he seeks to involve the destinies of Monica, Leone, and even that of his compatriot and partner in iniquity, the lawyer.

War stories have a family likeness, and there is nothing in Mr. James Blyth's latest venture to single it out from the mass of novels dealing with battle, murder, and sudden death. It is an echo of the Russo-Japanese war, and certainly that campaign, as described in its pages, seems a very long way off. We have plenty of Japanese names, but the little brown men are never clearly visualised. Indeed, the characters might as well have been labelled with any other nationality and have suffered very little. The story is written in the first person, and this form enables the author to conceal his inequalities of plot and to fill in blanks of the story with personal touches, reminiscent or anticipatory. Occasionally there is a touch of the dramatic, and we feel that Mr. Blyth would arrive at better results were he to concentrate on the short story in place of the novel. Certain chapters, with a little trouble, could be made into quite readable sketches, and the first person, which is wearisome if continued over many pages, could be used legitimately in a more condensed form.

The author of "The Dop Doctor," Richard Dehan, who is none other than Miss Clo Graves, has just issued a volume of short stories. Some of these are reprints, others are original. The style is crisp, and the author shows to most advantage in the shorter tale. There is undeniable power in the manner in which certain episodes are treated. The same grip that was used with such telling force in the novel that first introduced us to Richard Dehan is shown in "Mrs. Creighton's Convert." The bad man of the piece, who turns from his wickedness, and becomes a Catholic priest, is sketched with a truth and significance that removes the central incident far from the charge of commonplace. Perhaps the most appealing and intimate of the numbers in this volume is "Gou gou." The author has a rare faculty of reading a child's heart, and the small boy's grief at the separation from his father, and his stubborn resistance to the tears that ache to flow, is admirably portrayed. Gou Gou's mother has divorced his father, and he learns that he is never again to see the big man whom he idolises. The mother, sore at her own treatment, sternly represses his desire, and at the finish the small child hides himself in a motor car that has just brought him and his mother away from their home. The car is returning to his father. That is enough for Gou gou; he wants only to reach the man that fills his heart. He goes to sleep, and en route is joined by Mrs. Arbuthnot, who is journeying to Dover to join the man she loves. The child tells her of his desolation, and she comforts and consoles him, hushing him once more to sleep. When the car arrives at its destination the lady has gone, leaving a note behind her, pinned to the bunch of violets on Gou Gou's serge jumper. It is this note that makes the sketch: "I could have taken your wife's husband away from her without a pang of remorse; but I cannot rob your boy of his father! Please do not write to me or attempt to see me. I am determined that we shall not meet again."

This charming fragment is but one of many excellent things in THE HEADQUARTER RECRUIT (Heinemann, 6s.).

It is difficult to see exactly what useful purpose Mr. Canning's study of MACAULAY: ESSAYIST AND HISTORIAN (T. Fisher Unwin, 7s. 6d. net) is likely to serve. A sympathetic, yet fair and critical study of the great Whig rhetorician is, indeed, long overdue, for Macaulay, overpraised in his own time for qualities which he did not possess, is in danger of lacking in ours the very high honour that is due to his real greatness. But Mr. Canning's book is not a criticism: it is rather a paraphrase interspersed with digressions. Now Macaulay, of all writers, bears paraphrase least well; for in him the telling phrase is everything. Now Mr. Canning is not only no master of the telling phrase, but he seems to have a perfect genius for the impossible phrase—the phrase that lets the sentence down with a crash. For example, everyone remembers Macaulay's picturesque account of the character of the Highlanders which introduces his account of the exploits of Dundee. True or false, it is an admirable example of his powers of graphic description. We hardly recognise it in Mr. Canning's version, when he says that "these mountaineers were often eager plunderers, irritable, revengeful, and very peculiar in their habits"! As for digressions, we really do not see why Macaulay's fine rhetorical passage concerning the antiquity of the See of Rome, with its well-known prophecy of the "traveller from New Zealand," should be made the occasion of remarking that Macaulay does not "allude to the Greek, Armenian, or African Churches," or why the writer should proceed to supply the defect by several pages of irrelevance, illustrated by quotations from Dean Stanley.

The author of "Convict 99" has just published another novel, DUCKS AND DRAKES (Ward, Lock and Co., 6s.), which certainly lacks nothing in the way of sensation; it bristles with incident and dramatic situations. There is the orthodox and beautiful heroine, who is the constant victim of the shameless machinations of a terrifying villain, and there is a young man, with "perfect features and speaking eyes," who falls violently in love with the heroine, but is afraid to claim her as his bride, because he is poor and she is the rich daughter of a wealthy man. There is also a mysterious one-armed man, in reality a long-lost lord, and the father of the impecunious hero, who unfortunately loses his memory at a critical moment, and is borne forth to prison on a false charge, where complications arise on account of the aforesaid lost memory. The reader will observe that the book is written in the accepted fashion of the sensational novel, and he need therefore be under no apprehension as to the ultimate fate of the hero and heroine, for they live happily ever after, and the villain is sent to perdition, whereby Miss Marie C. Leighton maintains her reputation. The reader who desires relaxation in this form will be by no means disappointed in the quality of the story. It is brightly, not to say breathlessly written, and will doubtless be quite acceptable on a railway journey, or during the holidays, to those who desire to be kept awake.

There has of late grown up a cult in the world of fiction dedicated to the prize-fighter. It has been said that the only objection that can be made to the founder of a school is the school, and the fact that Mr. Bernard Shaw has written "The Admirable Bashville" seems to serve as an excuse for the everyday fictionist to serve up his wares of the ring. The hero of THE WHITE HOPE (Chapman and Hall, 6s.) is a most unconvincing prize-fighter. He is a prig of the first water added to a form of "matchless beauty." The author, indeed, raves about the "subtle, sinewy grace of the man's lines and the dazzling brilliancy of his skin." Sandwiched between these descriptives we have long prosy speeches, unrelieved by a glimmer of humour or a suggestion of reality. It is a dull book, and the subject, though sensational, holds nothing of the dramatic.

The Quest of the Unknown.

There is no stranger thing in human life than that impelling force which, for want of a more comprehensive name, we term "the spirit of adventure." From time immemorial men have been lured from the calm serenity of home life forth into the vast solitudes of the unknown. Yesterday it was the Arctic, to-day it is the Antarctic, to-morrow—who can say what it will be?

Of these lone wanderings, the Travel Section of EVERYMAN'S LIBRARY furnishes some record. Appended are a few selected volumes:—

TRAVELS OF MARCO POLO.

Introduction by JOHN MASEFIELD.

The explorations of the Venetian merchant (1254-1324) in Central Asia and as far as the court of the Great Khan Kublai (Coleridge's "Kubla Khan") at Peking, where he remained nearly twenty years.

"Even now, after the lapse of six centuries, his book remains the chief authority for parts of Central Asia, and of the vast Chinese Empire."

HAKLUYT'S VOYAGES (8 vols.).

With Index.

Introduction by JOHN MASEFIELD.

"The Principal Navigations, Voyages, and Discoveries of the English Nation," collected by Richard Hakluyt (1552-1602), is our English epic. "It is a great and noble poem, which commends the sailors of our nation for their courage and singular activity. The poets of that great period, living in the kingdom of imagination, have left the deeds of our heroes unsung. It was left to Richard Hakluyt to bring together the stray records of them that future ages might admire, and coming generations imitate the high heart of those who tried the fortune of the sea."

ANSON'S VOYAGE ROUND THE WORLD IN 1742.

Introduction by JOHN MASEFIELD.

COOK'S VOYAGES OF DISCOVERY.

Nothing could be more interesting or thrilling than the narratives of Captain Cook's three great voyages between 1768 and 1778. His enterprise and daring added materially to the existing knowledge of geography, and proved the non-existence of a southern continent.

TRAVELS OF MUNGO PARK.

Dr. Mungo Park, one of the earliest and bravest of African explorers, born in Scotland 1771, was drowned in the Niger 1806.

NARRATIVE OF A JOURNEY TO THE SHORES OF THE POLAR SEA (1819-1822).

By SIR JOHN FRANKLIN. Introduction by CAPTAIN R. F. SCOTT, C.V.O., Leader of the National Antarctic Expedition.

Sir John Franklin, greatest of Arctic explorers, born in 1786, died in the attempt to discover the North-West Passage, from which his expedition of 1845 never returned.

SPEKE'S DISCOVERY OF THE SOURCE OF THE NILE.

Speke (1827-1864), who accidentally shot himself on the very morning when he was to have defended his statements against the scepticism of that other great explorer, Burton, was said by Sir R. Murchison to have "solved one of the problems of all ages."

THE BIBLE IN SPAIN.

By GEORGE BORROW. Introduction by EDWARD THOMAS, and a Map showing Borrow's Journeys.

Borrow (1803-1881) was by nature a linguist and a man of action. As linguist he was employed by the British and Foreign Bible Society to circulate the scriptures in dark corners of Europe; as man of action he produced his literary masterpiece, that amazing picaresque romance of gypsy Protestantism, in which he recorded his adventures, not altogether in the service of the Society, in Spain and Portugal (1836-1839).

FIRST FOOTSTEPS IN EAST AFRICA.

By SIR RICHARD BURTON. Introduction by H. W. NEVINSON.

Burton (1821-1896) was famous not only as a traveller, but as the master of thirty-five languages, and translator of the "Arabian Nights." This volume gives an account of one of his earliest expeditions, preceded only by his journey to Mecca. It will be remembered that Mr. H. W. Nevinson, who writes the introduction, is himself the author of a remarkable book on the Congo Slave Trade.

14th June, 1913.

Dear Sir or Madam,

Shermanbury Rectory, Henfield, Sussex.

The London Housing Society, in which I am interested, and of which I am Chairman, is building blocks of flats in localities where they are very much needed, which appears to me to be quite admirable. They are very popular with the working people; before each block is finished there is a long waiting list of those anxious to occupy them. The weekly rents run from 6s. to 16s., according to the accommodation required. The rooms are light, airy and convenient; and what particularly pleases me is the provision of a bath in each tenement.

It is difficult to make an undertaking of this kind known, but the blocks already built and inhabited are in themselves an excellent advertisement.

The demand for accommodation being so great, the Society has secured additional sites in most eligible positions, and we are therefore opening a new share list.

If you could see the houses, I am sure you would wish to co-operate in the undertaking, or to increase your interest in it.

I am, yours truly,

William Sinclair

(late Archdeacon of London.)

The above letter from the Venerable Archdeacon Sinclair (Chairman), emphasises the urgent need for speedy extension of the Society's work, and will be read with interest by all.

FORTY-SEVEN PERSONS IN ONE HOUSE.

During the hearing at Marylebone of a prosecution by the Paddington Borough Council, under the Housing and Town Planning Act of 1909, it transpired that there were thirty-five children and twelve adults occupying a nine-roomed house off the Harrow Road. The house was described as a human habitation, and five of the tenants were summoned for falling to quit after a closing order had been made. These five stated that between them they had twenty-nine children, and Mr. Wingfield, sanitary inspector, pointed out that another tenant had now gone there with six children. This made a total, with the parents of the children, of forty-seven persons occupying nine rooms, three of which were said to be little box-rooms. Mr. Paul Taylor made an order on the defendants to quit the house within fourteen days.

The annexed cutting, taken from a recent issue of the Daily Telegraph, emphasises the extreme urgency of the Housing problem with which this Society is most successfully dealing.

Should you desire to see the official prospectus, this can be obtained by either calling at or writing to the SOCIETY'S REGISTERED OFFICE, No. 49, EUSTON ROAD, LONDON, N.W. Or if you wish to inspect the Society's properties, the fullest facilities will be afforded upon receipt of your request.

HISTORY IN THE MAKING

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE King's triumphal tour through the very heart of industrial England has a significance not easily discernible in the newspaper reports of his Majesty's progress. The visit is not merely an irresistible personal success, it symbolises that regard and concern for the wage-earner which, for all our faults, marks the present age. In visiting cotton mills and calling at glass works and the like the King is faithfully interpreting the best sympathies and the truest aspirations of his subjects.

Not for the first time in its history has the invincible optimism of the Daily Mail been found at fault, for while that journal announces almost daily that the "Cat and Mouse Act" has squelched the suffragettes, we are faced with the unfortunate fact that the ladies against whom it is directed are by no means accounted for. The latest evidence that militancy is not yet a thing of the past may be found in the burning down of one of Sir William Lever's country houses, involving, unfortunately, the loss of many art treasures. It is not our business to express opinions in this column. We merely report facts—facts that do not always lie close to the surface, and are not, therefore, always apparent, but which it is very desirable should be recognised. Unfortunately, the events of the past week show conclusively that, for good or for evil, it is a mistake to conclude that we have done with this much-discussed phase of the suffrage movement.

It is satisfactory to note that, lurid headlines despite, opinion, and especially City opinion, is veering slowly round to the view that the latest war in the Balkans is unlikely to precipitate that European conflagration which alone made its possibilities serious. Great, indeed, is the difference between the present cheery confidence and that gloomy depression which settled on the markets last October when the war began. There is still one possibility, however, that has not yet received adequate attention. Turkey has intimated to the Powers that the outbreak of hostilities releases her from the recent settlement. It will be ironical indeed if, as the result of these dissensions among the allies, the "Unspeakable Turk" again asserts himself and becomes once more a force in the near East.

Not for many years has an event burst on us with quite the same dramatic suddenness as characterised the labour revolt in Johannesburg. Before most of us were even aware that acute differences existed between the mineowners and their employees, we were reading of a condition of affairs not very far removed from civil war. The strikers were armed, and they used their weapons with effect, and for something like three or four days anarchy appears to have ruled in the gold reef city. The prompt intervention of the Government, however, soon brought peace to the Rand, and, according to the latest reports, a more conciliatory spirit prevails on both sides. So far, so good. But is this adequate? Emphatically no. A searching inquiry must be initiated at once into the men's grievances, and reasonable concessions given them. Otherwise it is but too obvious that history will repeat itself.

The news that a syndicate has been formed to "run" a regular passenger airship service from London to Brighton, Paris, and other cities, marks a distinct advance in that most elusive and dangerous science, aviation. Whether the service will ever achieve "the insult of popularity" we cannot say, but the mere fact that it is to be attempted, and capital staked on its success, shows unmistakably the progress that the idea of travelling by air is making. Perhaps our children may go to business by aeroplane. Who can tell? It is only fifteen years since it was held to be impossible to motor on the King's highway.

Mr. Lloyd George's speech at Streatham—the first in which he has dealt with general questions for some time—may be said to open a new chapter in his career, if not in politics, while the fact that he criticised Lord Lansdowne's land proposals with such vigour confirms the view that his party will keep that issue well to the front. It is whispered, indeed, that they propose to stake everything upon it. On the other hand, it is distinctly interesting to note that the Chancellor said nothing as to the actual alternative proposals of the Government. Rumour has it that the Cabinet has still to agree upon these, and that the "Land Inquiry" has developed rather than reconciled the differences between the various schools of land reformers.

Lord Newton's Bill for the better regulation of moneylenders marks another stage in the long and almost ceaseless fight which our civilisation finds itself compelled to wage with usury. The principal feature of this new legislative effort to tackle Shylock is that it forbids him to "tout" for custom by dispatching circulars broadcast through the post, and it is claimed in this connection that many who now succumb to the lure of the moneylender will be saved despite themselves. Much can be said for this contention. But, on the other hand, experience suggests that not until there is provided a practical alternative to the usurer shall we shake off his curse. Credit is a necessity of modern civilisation, and some agency is needed whereby the poor can obtain it on reasonable terms.

MAKERS OF MODERN HISTORY

I.—ROBESPIERRE ❁ ❁ BY CHARLES SAROLEA

I.

THE year 1793 stands out as the Annus Mirabilis of modern history, the year of wonder and terror, of victories abroad, of massacres at home. During those fateful months, Maximilian Robespierre is the absolute ruler of France until the culminating tragedy of the Ninth of Thermidor, when, with shattered jaw, after sixteen hours of agony, he is dragged to the guillotine where he had sent so many thousands of innocent victims.

There is perhaps no other character who has stood so conspicuously in the limelight of history, and who yet remains so mysterious to the bulk of mankind. There is certainly no other character who raises so many perplexing questions. Amongst those perplexing questions I would submit that there are at least three which any student of the French Revolution ought to answer if he is to understand anything in the Reign of Terror.

1. How is it that a man who is generally represented as a type of mediocrity, a man without any of those gifts which are necessary to play a conspicuous part, a man without personal attractions, without charm, without the gift of oratory, without originality, without statesmanship, how is it that such a man should have been raised to the pinnacle of power?

2. How is it that a man of generally peaceful and humane disposition, a poet and a man of letters, timid and sentimental, who once resigned his position as a judge because he disapproved of the death penalty, how was such a man transformed into a bloody tyrant? how was he brought to inflict death ruthlessly and indiscriminately upon young girls and old men and pregnant women?

3. And, most difficult of all questions, how is it that the most spirited of Continental nations submitted for two years to an abominable tyranny, which would have spurred into rebellion even Egyptian fellaheen? How is it that the most frivolous and the gayest of European capitals was made to submit to the rule of a gloomy Puritan, whose every word seemed to be a challenge to the national temperament?

An exhaustive answer to those three questions would give us the explanation of the Revolutionary tragedy.

II.

The rise of Robespierre to supreme power is at first sight one of the paradoxes of history. All the other actors of the French Revolution possessed at least some outstanding quality which helps us to understand their influence. Robespierre had no such quality. He had none of the titanic power of Mirabeau or Danton. He had none of the wit of Camille Desmoulins. He had none of the oratorical gifts of the ill-fated Girondists. He cannot even lay claim to the cynicism and vituperative power of Marat, nor to the fiendish perversity of Fouché and Talleyrand.

Most historians are agreed that the secret of his power and popularity lies, above all, in his absolute integrity. He was omnipotent because he was supposed to be incorruptible. And the explanation is no doubt true so far as it goes; and it is a memorable lesson in political conduct to all statesmen, present and future. It is a striking commentary of Montesquieu's dictum, that virtue must be the foundation of democracy. Robespierre's rule was the "dictatorship of virtue." In a city where suspicion was rife and where corruption was rampant, here was a man who could be absolutely trusted. In an age of equality, where all superiority of rank and wealth was odious, where to be called an aristocrat meant a sentence of death, here was a man who, although invested with plenary power, continued to live in Spartan simplicity. Mirabeau and Danton, with all their titanic gifts, were distrusted because they were known to be venal. Robespierre, with all his mediocrity, possessed the confidence of the people because even his worst enemies could not suspect him of bribery or corruption.

III.

The incorruptibility of Robespierre is certainly one element of the problem, but it is not the whole problem. It explains why the French people trusted him; it does not explain why they believed in him.

The real reason why the Revolutionists believed in Robespierre was that Robespierre believed in the Revolution.

The whole secret of Robespierre's power lies in the mystic region of faith. With all his inhumanity, his pedantry, his egotism, his meanness, his vindictiveness, his cowardice, he had the one great theological virtue of faith—a faith unquestioning and unwavering. And it was his faith and not his works which saved him. When everything was hanging in the balance, when the Revolution was threatened by foes internal and external, the people could turn to the obscure deputy from Arras, firm like a rock, confident of victory, biding his time, challenging danger.

And not only had he faith, but his faith was embodied in a creed, in a doctrine sufficiently vague to attract temperaments the most diverse, sufficiently precise to unite his believers in a common formula. Robespierre is, from first to last, the consistent disciple of Rousseau. He preaches the gospel according to Jean Jacques. The "Social Contract" sums up his political profession. The "Confession of the Savoyard Vicar" sums up his religious creed.

IV.

The two explanations just given may account for Robespierre's unlimited influence, but they do not explain the horrors of the Reign of Terror. They do not explain how Robespierre should have become responsible for the most sanguinary tyranny of modern times. That Robespierre was naturally humane cannot be doubted. He had been steeped in the sentimental literature of the times, and his favourite author was the most sentimental of all. He was so sensitive to suffering that, if we are to believe his sister, he, for months, mourned the death of a favourite pigeon.

Although he was afraid of the sex, although as much as John Knox he abhorred the regiment of women, he was idolised by the women about him, by his sister, by the wife and daughters of the carpenter Duplay. And although he was no Socialist, although he was a strong believer in the rights of property, he sincerely felt for the people.

He was essentially what we would call to-day a pacifist and a philanthropist. When a war with England was in the balance, he firmly declared for peace. As late as 1791 he made an eloquent speech against the death penalty. Yet this pacifist, this opponent of the death penalty, eventually reduced terror to a principle and made the guillotine an instrument of government.

The only explanation is to be found in Robespierre's fanaticism. He probably illustrates better than any other modern statesman the destructive influence of religious bigotry. There is no temperament which is so completely destructive of all feelings of humanity, which is so invariably brought into play to justify every excess of cruelty. For the religious fanatic, obsessed by his creed, is ever ready to sacrifice every other human consideration to the triumph of his principles. He is ready to pour rivers of innocent blood, he is ready to plunge his country into civil war to secure the domination of his sect. He is ever ready to destroy the body in order to save the soul. Fanaticism may be more or less enlightened, the creed may be more or less beneficent, but, from the moment the religious enthusiast is prepared to employ the power of the State to impose his religion, the result is almost invariably the same.

Robespierre believed that the Revolution was not merely a political upheaval, but that it was a revelation from on high, and that it implied a new religion. His one ambition was to establish on earth the reign of virtue, the Cult of the Supreme Being, the Immortality of the Soul. And he also saw that the establishment of the new Deism was imperilled by powerful enemies abroad and by more relentless enemies at home. He was, therefore, perfectly consistent in insisting that those enemies should be crushed at whatever cost. It was the old argument, and the old metaphor of the surgical operation to be performed on the body. It was necessary to sacrifice the putrescent limb if the whole body politic was to be preserved. It was necessary to sacrifice a few thousands of atheists and libertines to redeem the millions. Robespierre belongs to the same type as Torquemada and Philip II., as John Knox and Calvin. He is a combination of the Catholic Inquisitor and the Protestant Puritan. He is the most rigid and ruthless of religious bigots.

V.

But, granting that Robespierre was a bitter fanatic and that his fanaticism was destructive of his humanity, there still remains to explain how a witty and gifted people, in an age of enlightenment, should have submitted to the despotism of this Puritan Inquisitor; how inside the National Convention 600 deputies were cowed into abject compliance; how outside the Convention a whole people obeyed the oracles of the sinister pedant and pontiff. The problem must be admitted to be a most difficult one, and a thinker who would solve it would explain both the paradox of Robespierre and the paradox of French history.

I would submit that the only possible explanation is to be found in the double strain which runs through the French character.

We are too apt to forget that France is not merely the country of wit and epigram, of the chanson and the salon. Deep down in the national temperament there is a Celtic fervour, a relentless idealism, a religious enthusiasm, a theocratic and fanatic spirit. No one will understand French history who does not realise that the French people are by far the most religious people of modern Europe. It is this religious and theocratic spirit which explains the human sacrifices of the Druids in the ancient forests of Gaul, which explains the Gothic cathedrals and the scholastic philosophy, the Crusades and Joan of Arc. It is this spirit which explains the wars of religion. It is this spirit which explains Calvin—the French father of Swiss and Scottish Presbyterianism. It is the same spirit which explains the expulsion of the Huguenots and the bigotry of the Jansenists.

And my contention is that it is the same spirit which asserts itself in the theocratic experiments of Robespierre, in his Cult of the Supreme Being. The special form which the terror did take, its bloody excesses, the power it gave to a handful of scoundrels, are sufficiently explained by the prevailing anarchy which emptied the prisons of their criminal inmates. It is a mere accident of history, which often repeats itself whenever the social order collapses, and which quite recently repeated itself during the chaos of the Russian Revolution.

But the Reign of Terror itself, apart from the special forms it assumed, is not a mere accident; it was pre-eminently a French phenomenon. It was a necessary revelation of national character. It was one of the periodic outbursts of French religious fanaticism. Of that outburst, of that revelation of the French theocratic spirit, Robespierre will remain for ever the most extraordinary, the most repellent, and the most perplexing illustration.

Disconcerting irony of events! If Robespierre had been born in another age and in another country—say, in Scotland or England—he would have been a harmless and highly respected professor of Dogmatic Theology in a Calvinistic college, or an incorruptible Under-Secretary of State in Mr. Asquith's Cabinet. Being born in the sceptical France of the end of the eighteenth century, in an age which was out of joint, he was destined to become in sæcula sæculorum, the incarnation of diabolical cruelty, a monster of iniquity,

HOW THE POOR LIVE

THE SHOEMAKER'S STORY * * * BY THOMAS HOLMES

I.

"NO, I am not entitled to the old-age pension, for I am only sixty-seven. Whether I shall live long enough to claim it is very doubtful, and I don't mind very much if I do not, for I have had a hard life, and now I am past work, and have to sit and watch others work for me. I know that my wife and daughter do their best, but my wife can earn but little, and my daughter, who is a machinist, can only earn ten shillings a week if she makes full time, and very often she has to lose time, sometimes a whole week, because the factory is closed, and then we have nothing.

"I have always been sober and industrious. I have never wasted money in theatres, music-halls, or holidays. I don't smoke. I was considered a good workman, and now here I am past work, sitting and waiting! I keep as cheerful as I can. What's the use of grumbling and making others miserable? I can read, although I went to work when I was but nine years of age."

"Tell me," I said, "more about your early days. Where were you born?"

"I was born in a house in Tagg Street. The rent was 3s. 3d. in those days. My parents were weavers, and part of the little house contained the two hand looms at which my mother and father worked.

"They thought I was a weakly little chap, so they took me from school when I was nine years old and put me to learn shoemaking. I liked the trade well enough in those days, when all boots and shoes were hand-made and you had a chance of putting some skill and brains into them. But now a girl at 10s. a week can do more than a number of men, and brains are not required. I have made some beautiful boots and shoes in my time for actresses and singers, for I was good at light work. But now there are no craftsmen; trades are out of date; machinery is the thing!"

"But you have had a long spell of shoemaking?"

"Yes, fifty-four years; but not enough to qualify me for a pension."

"Tell me of your married life," I said.

"Well, we were married forty years ago, and we had a little home of two rooms in Old Ford Road, for which we paid 5s. per week. Things were dear in those days. Don't you remember, mother," turning to his wife, "how we paid 2s. 8d. for a hundredweight of coal and 2s. 6d. a sack for coke, owing to the war and the strikes in the iron and coal trades? Sugar was 4d. a pound and tea 2s., but bread was the same as now. We did not have much to spare, though both of us worked hard, and sometimes together we earned as much as £2 in a week, but we did not earn that amount very often."

"How many children have you?"

"We have had nine, and eight of them are living; but you had better talk to mother about them."

II.

So I turned to the weary-faced, pathetic-looking woman, and asked for some particulars of her life. She, too, had commenced work at nine years of age, and earned 1s. 6d. a week at bead threading. I drew her gently to her married life. Yes, she had had a hard life, especially when the children began to arrive, for she worked at the shoe trade by day and attended to the children's requirements in the evening. They required a bigger home, so they took a small house in Russia Lane, for which they paid 8s. a week. What with their reduced earnings and their increased rent, she did not know how they had managed.

"I have had nine children, and never could afford a doctor with any one of them."

"However did you manage?" I asked.

"Why, the same as other women. I paid 7s. 6d. for a woman to be with me at the time, and then to come in every morning for a week to wash the baby. For the rest we managed somehow."

But her real troubles began when her husband's health began to fail, for his earnings gradually dwindled until they ceased altogether. They were pretty near starvation then. She had sometimes to find a "friend" (an unlicensed money-lender) and borrow 5s., but that was so expensive, for she had to pay a penny per week for every shilling lent to her. When her children were ill she took them to the hospital, and paid fourpence per week per head for their medicine.

"How did you manage to get new sheets, towels, and blankets, etc.?"

"I never did get any new ones. When I found something that suited me at a second-hand shop I paid so much per week. It took a long time to pay for a blanket. Sometimes I dealt with a 'tallyman' for stuff to make father some shirts or the girls frocks, but that was expensive too."

"I suppose you are all insured against death?"

"Oh, yes; we have all been insured for years. We keep that up."

"Tell me now," I said, "what is your family income per week, and how do you spend it?"

"I have 28s. coming in weekly, and there are seven of us to live out of it. I have 6s. 6d. rent, bread costs 9s., margarine and butter 3s., our Saturday joint 1s. 6d., potatoes 9d., greens (for Sunday) 3d., condensed milk 8d., gas 6d., coal 1s. 4d., a bit of meat or fish each week costs about 3s., and then there is the insurance to pay."

"A pretty tight fit," I said, after reckoning it up. "What do you do about any extras?"

"God knows, for I really don't."

III.

Turning to the husband, I asked whether, in his opinion, it was easier to live now than it was in his young days.

"It is just as hard to live now as it was sixty years ago, in spite of cheaper food. Foreign meat has been a great boon to us. We could not live without it, but rents have increased out of all proportion to our earnings. The house my parents had is now let at three times the rent they paid for it, and every local improvement—even the education rate—puts up our rent. Poor as we are, and though we have no children at school, we know that when we pay our weekly rent we pay our share of the rates also, and a good big share, too. It is the rent and irregular employment that knocks us out, even when we have good health."

Finding him inclined to conversation, I led him on to other subjects.

"Tell me," I said, "what you think of what is called the Industrial Unrest."

"I have not been able to work for five years, and I have suffered a good deal, but my head has always been clear, and I have had plenty of time to think, and my opinion is that no working man can be easy. He sees other people enjoying expensive pleasures and making a display of wealth, and he naturally desires some pleasure and wants to spend some money; but if he does, everything goes wrong at home.

"All the time he has no security of his work continuing. If he has any holidays he gets no pay, so even the multiplication of holidays means suffering in his home. He feels a bit jealous because other people who get much better wages and do much less work receive their pay when holidays come round.

"If he wants better wages he has to strike for them, and again the family suffers. If he does not combine with his fellows and strike occasionally, his wages go down, as I know to my cost, for I am not a trade unionist. If he puts his children into occupations that seem likely to afford them the means of living, he finds that machinery comes along and supplants them; then they are knocked out, and there is more unrest.

"I wish there was no machinery, but it is no good wishing. Machinery has come, and men and women must go. Why don't they kill a lot of us off? But if they did rents would go down then, and there would be less of us to pay rates and taxes."

IV.

He was evidently growing bitter, so I changed the subject, and asked him, "Do you consider that children are better cared for than they were in your early days? Has education done much for them? Are their morals, their manners, and their behaviour better than formerly?"

He paused a moment, and then said, "Why, yes. The children have more pleasures and better times. There are all sorts of enjoyments provided for them, such as country holidays and other things; but there are precious few holidays for their parents, only Bank holidays.

"But," he continued, slowly and dubiously, "I am not sure that all these things have a good influence, because they teach children to look for societies, for things that it ought to be within the power of the parents to give, and they induce some parents to leave to others things that should be pleasurable done by themselves. If they feed the children at school, who pays for it? The ratepayers. Up goes the rent.

"Cannot anyone see," he went on, "that the best way of helping the children is to improve the circumstances of their parents? But no one seems to think of that. Children are not better towards their parents than they used to be, although they are better educated, and for two reasons: first, because the respect due to parents forms no part of their education; secondly, because children are taught to look away from home for their pleasures and requirements; but when you consider the home life of the poor you cannot wonder at these things.

"Our children are all good in their way. Some of them are married, but they cannot help us financially, for they have their own difficulties and privations, and I suppose it will be the same with their children's children, unless we do away with machinery and encourage hand labour. Is there anything else you want to ask me?"

"Yes," I said. "Have you ever read a book called 'Erewhon,' by Samuel Butler?"

"No," he replied. "I have never heard of it. What is it about?"

I told him that it was about a country where all machinery was prohibited.

"If I could have my time over again I should like to live in that country. Perhaps in that country employers do not turn men off penniless after they have done their best for them for fifty years."

So I left him doubled up in his chair, with his right hand in a bandage—a right hand that will not be his much longer, for he told me that the hospital doctors suggested amputation. . . .

V.

In Memoriam

. . . But the poor old shoemaker THAT loved the minor poets, and preferred Dickens to all other novelists, who gloried in Shakespeare and counted King Lear to be the greatest of all his creations, is dead!

His many journeyings to the hospital are ended, his sufferings are past, his poor old body is at rest, and his hand is buried with him.

Machinery no longer troubles him, for Peter is dead! It was my privilege to know him, to meet and talk with him at intervals, and, I trust, to smooth his suffering path to the grave. He was a skilled workman, but his life was one of hardship, pain, and struggle.

Poor old Peter is dead, and I cannot mourn him, although I have lost a friend. I loved him, because, when sitting in his very little back room in one of the meanest streets in London, he said to me, "I think the best piece of writing in all literature is the account of Sidney Carton's ride on the tumbrel to the guillotine"; and he added, "Ah! Dickens loved humanity."

Sometimes the twisted and broken old man felt a little bitter when he thought and spoke of his many years of ill-requited toil and the many privations he had undergone; but this did not often happen, for he managed to forget his pains and privations in thinking of what he had read. His "mind to him a kingdom was," for it contained his storehouse of poetry and drama, of literature and history, and out of it he could produce treasures, both new and old.

"I like to think of what I have read, for it gives me such pleasure," he said to me. "I sit for hours with my back to the window, thinking, thinking, not looking mournfully or regretfully at the past, not thinking fearfully of the future, but thinking of what I have read."

Thinking great thoughts, of beautiful words, of noble deeds of courtesy and love, of truth, the desire of fame, of Dickens's love of the poor, of the sweet songs of the minor poets; thinking of what he had read, with a Bethnal Green "backyard" behind him.

Peter fell on evil days, the clubs of his younger days had failed, he was too old for insurance benefits, he was too young for an old-age pension, he lived but a day or two in front of starvation.

There will be no dispute about his property, no will to prove, no letters of administration will be required.

Truly, my old friend has gone out of the world without making a commotion or disarranging anyone's affairs.

I suppose that one little ripple appeared on the surface of life's great lake, but it was not discernible, save to those whose perceptions were attuned to perceive it.

THE REAL CANADA * * BY G. C. THOMSON

[Mr. G. C. Thomson is a young Scotsman, a native of Perthshire, and an ex-law-student of Edinburgh University. He qualified as a law agent some few years ago, and entered into partnership with his father as a solicitor in Callander, Perthshire. Anxious for a wider field for his energies than the village presented, he decided to go to Canada and take up Canadian law. This he did some three years ago, securing a good position with a leading firm in Winnipeg. After a year or so, during which time he qualified as a Canadian barrister, he moved on to the growing town of Swift Current, and has built up an excellent practice there. He has just been appointed a magistrate over a large area, and is a keen student of all "Empire" topics.]

IT is with Manitoba and the West that the average British immigrant has most to do and desires most to learn. He will find differences from the homeland. For these he must be prepared; and it is here that these notes may perhaps be helpful. If the experienced coloniser finds these generalisings inaccurate, let him accept in advance the author's assurance that they are true of the parts he has seen, and his admission that, as the conditions of our great country are so complex, some of his criticisms could not be applied to the whole West with any justice.

I.

To begin, then, it is quite needless for the emigration agent to tell his too-frequent half-truths about Canada, when the complete truth is, on the balance, so attractive. I like Canada and the Canadian. I was warned by more than one adviser that I shouldn't like either: and as I make friends critically and slowly, it may be taken that neither Manitoba nor Saskatchewan holds terrors for the average "homelander." Of the very Wild West I fear to speak; but the people of the above provinces have few prejudices nowadays against the old countryman; and the individuals who call the stranger an "etcetera Englishman" are chiefly the "rubes" (i.e., the rustics, the hayseeds, the Farmer Gileses) or those in whom good Canadians take little pride. In this Western country one frequently has to ask, "Who is the Canadian?" the nationalities are so endless in number and so quaint in species. A Canadian by birth is almost always an Eastern Canadian, and it is easy to speak well of these Easterners. They are kind-hearted, obliging, acute, and industrious. Moreover, they have a high standard of comfort and savoir vivre, and quite as high a standard of private morality and sobriety. The Canadians are a remarkably law-abiding and order-loving nation. Street fights are hardly known; and such is the force of example, that Orange processions are as decorous as funerals. The Westerner's consideration for women is one of the traits that strike some shame to his British brother. On the whole, the Canadian is a man of broad outlook and of a fine, alert, forceful, straightforward way of doing things. He is quite above pettiness. Canada absorbs innumerable races and handles unexampled enterprises with an energy and a success that only a virile nation can show. It is no small people that is constructing a thousand leagues of railroad every year, and that is conceiving one great motor highway from the islands of one ocean, through mountain peaks and forests and lakes and over gullies and plains, to the cliffs of another ocean three thousand miles away. Nor is that a sunken nation where one Province alone builds two schools for every school day of the year.

II.

Of course, the Canadian would resent being thought a plaster saint. Nor is he. He is as sensitive as a child to criticism, and yet, when put to it, he can hardly defend certain of his habits and deficiencies. His chewing (and even her chewing) is an instance. Your typical Western Canadian chews, summer and winter, in church and in drawing-room. If anything can be said for the habit, it is that it is less objectionable than his expectoration. Then his language is, to use a Canadianism, "a fright"; and gambling is a much more prevalent pastime than at home. The Westerner—not in the lower orders only, but the city fathers and the church deacons—cannot string five words together without sandwiching in a curse or two. A public-spirited citizen told me the other day of regulations his council was making to control billiard-rooms, and prevent gambling, drinking, and profane and obscene language in them. "And, by G . . . d," said he, "I ups and seconds that pretty d . . . d quick!"

III.

The Canadian young man is hardly a being of broad culture. His forte is action rather than thought; and his hobbies are often (perhaps too often) poker, pool, and watching baseball. I doubt if he is one bit more of an athlete or a sportsman than his British brother. He won't walk one yard for pleasure. You will search far over Western Canada before you find one rambling club. The Canadian is not ashamed to tell you that he is off to watch the "ball game"; and he will yell his lungs thin over ice hockey; but the proportion of loungers is grave. Not alone in football has the referee a bad time of it. In general information, too, the Canadian youth is hardly level with the home Briton. Literature makes no appeal to him. He reads nothing but the sporting papers, and is apt to confuse Lamb with mutton, and Browning with boot-polish.

Nor does the public spirit of the Dominion strike a stranger as abundant. It does not find its expression in the Territorial forces, at any rate, which are manned, out of all proportion, by home-born Britons. Certain Canadians suffer from the gratifying belief that the Dominion saved the effete Empire in 1901, and are indignant when told that of the Canadian contingent sent to South Africa eighty per cent. were home countrymen. Nor does public spirit find much expression in local government, where the "best people" are conspicuously absent—too busy making money to bother with such matters. Between the French in the East and the Yankees in the West, Canada's naval ambitions, for example, are not without opponents. There is, though, in every community a small band of patriotic men, who insist on the British flag flying over schools, and generally keep up a standard of patriotism. Recently, for instance, some of these in Winnipeg took action over the display in the local picture palaces of films showing the heroic battles of the U.S. army. The fear was that the rising Canadian would be led to cheer and admire foreign forces instead of his own; and the abuse was actually stopped. The Canadian is loyal certainly, but his is rather a philosophic than an active patriotism.

IV.

The old-country man will enjoy work in Canada in spite of its arduousness. For the ordinary man the opportunities are many times more numerous than at home. There is an agreeable freedom too. Originality is encouraged, and the workman is so much the happier because he is so much the less dependent on any one particular employer. As to business enterprise, it may be admitted that we Britons have much to learn from the Canadian. There is an acuteness about his methods and a desire to meet your whims that is distinctly taking. In advertising, the Canadian has nothing to learn; nor has he in window-dressing, nor in organisation. Then it is a happy change to the home-country man to find himself able to spend a whole afternoon rambling over a gay, attractive "store" without once being badgered to buy. On the other hand, I have come across in every type of business many cases in which the national "hustle" has not given the customer satisfaction. It soon exhausts itself. And I am inclined to think that the tradesman at home, certainly in London, can rush his job no less than the Canadian—and do it better. In any case requiring trouble or research I am sure he can.

There need be no controversy as to an abuse that obtains in the Western Provinces: the dilatoriness of correspondence. The abuse extends to Government offices, in at least one Province. Letters to the various Departments are attended to at the sweet will of the bureaucrats; and if an answer comes back in less than ten days the correspondent can consider himself a favoured party. Another business fault common to the Western Canadian is unpunctuality. He breaks business appointments without remorse and without apology, and considers it distinctly unfashionable to be up to time for dinner or the theatre. Church is as bad. I have seen a lady walk boldly down the aisle into her place in the choir thirty-five minutes after the service had started.

Speaking of church reminds one of the real hold the churches have on Canadian life, and the inestimable service they do—a service splendidly seconded by Canada's progressive Y.M. and Y.W.C.A.'s. I used to think Edinburgh the most zealous church-going place in the King's Dominions, but it must yield to Winnipeg; and even better than Winnipeg comes Toronto, which the wild men speak of as "the Holy City." In some of the Winnipeg churches, if you go punctually to the evening service you will not get a seat. For safety even fifteen minutes before the hour is none too soon. And of a certain Saskatchewan city a minister of experience told me, "Everybody here 'purposes' to go to church." The ministers are bright, hard-working men, and the churches are good clubs for the young. Their commercialism (such as their system of promissory notes for your church contributions!) doesn't always enable them to pay the clergy properly, who, even though their miserable salaries are eked out by compulsory marriage fees, often find themselves tempted out of the church into real estate or politics. Marriage licences in Manitoba are, oddly enough, issued from the Department of Agriculture. So far the authorities have not adopted the writer's suggestion to rename it the Department of Husbandry.

THE MEANING OF DAWN

By J. W. MARRIOTT.

THERE is an exact yet evasive moment in the night-time which dissevers day from day. It occurs long before dawn—before a bird chirps or a leaf stirs. But everyone who has spent a summer night out-of-doors must have felt the critical instant, for the earth itself seems conscious of the change. Somehow a sceptre has changed hands in the darkness, and everything knows, though nothing whispers. A vital tremor runs through the world; yet nothing moves. It is like the sigh of a sleeping babe, which betokens the approaching end of slumber.

The great moment passes in listening silence. Then things faintly begin to stir. A tree whispers softly to its neighbours to find if they are awake. A solitary blackbird whistles; a distant cockerel crows. The telegraph poles grow a shade blacker, and slowly separate themselves from the darkness. It is like the developing of a negative in the photographer's dark-room. The sharp, black outlines of a house appear against a brightening background. The sky grows from jet to Indian ink; then to indigo; from indigo to violet; then breaks into mother-of-pearl, and glows into commingling tones of grey. A red line lies on the horizon, as if a furnace door were left ajar. The east is flushed with primrose rays of coming morn, with its hints of immeasurable splendour and unutterable joy. Then finally the whole of the wide eastern firmament breaks into wild cascades of white and ravishing light. It is a miracle which is repeated every morning. It is a vision which is more rapturous every day.

When I went out in the night-time to witness once more this unwearying wonder, it was so dark that I could hear the cattle munching, while I could not discern their shapes. I stood on a railway bridge watching the vivid greens and reds of the signals, like magic stars of ruby and emerald, and the unearthly phosphorescence which began to gleam on the rails. I saw the paling lights of the signal-box and the darkening outlines of houses silhouetted on the embankment. There was a sense of cold purity, almost of austerity. It was lonely too; but not the dreadful loneliness where one half expects to find a corpse; rather the sacred solitude where one more than half expects to meet an angel. This morning there were no garish colours and voluptuous splendours, but there was a sanctity about the sombre monochromes as of some vast Temple of Light. Tomorrow the dawn may flash and flame with all the magic of Aladdin's palace. History may repeat itself, but Nature never does. She has a prodigality of schemes and infinite versatility.

Moreover, there is a distinct psychological difference between the feelings inspired by sunrise and sunset. It is not the gloaming of nightfall, but the twilight of morning which is so intense with longing and passion. The whole emotion of this mystic hour has been captured by our great poets. It was in the quarter-light of dawn when Romeo pleaded with Juliet and the lark was confounded with the nightingale. It was when the planet of love began to faint "in the bed of a daffodil sky" that the lover of Maud attained his climax of exultant pain.

Night brings us into the shadow of mystery. The thought of our greatness is shrivelled into gnat-like insignificance in the sight of a myriad worlds—jewelled sun-clusters and clouds of starry spray. One is brought face to face with Immensity and Eternity. "What is man that Thou art mindful of him?" The silent spaciousness of the heavens compels the thought of our own microscopic littleness—the futility of all endeavour, the vanity of all human dreams.

But Dawn comes like a messenger of God. Our world is no longer blotted out by darkness, but whitens and widens into Infinitude. Our earth is transfigured with unspeakable glory, and the thronging worlds above hide their faces for very awe. For a short time our world seemed lost—like the hundredth sheep that went astray. But the ninety-and-nine are forgotten in the joy with which it is found again at dawn. Night loses the earth in a universe of constellated multitudes; but Dawn, when we are yet a great way off, runs out to bless us with open arms.

WILLIAM ARCHER: CRITIC AND PHILOSOPHER

I.

It is nearly twenty-five years ago that the Reading Room of the British Museum, the scene of many strange literary encounters, used to be haunted by a "tawny young man," a youth of infinite industry and originality, who has since achieved fame and fortune, but who was then unknown to most of the frequenters of that hive of literary activity, as he was to literary London. He soon attracted attention, however. He used to read—so the legend runs—"the score of Wagner and the economics of Karl Marx, either intermittently or simultaneously," and gradually his devouring industry and forceful personality won him many friends among the journalists and men of letters, who worked day by day under the great dome, and who were quick to recognise the mettle of the new recruit. One of those friendships thus formed has lasted ever since, although it opened with the project—a project dangerous to friendship—of "writing a play together," a play that should put the modern stage right about the current conventions of the drama. The "tawny young man" was to do the dialogue; his friend was to provide the plot. Alas! the play was never completed. But the friendship, one is interested to learn, still endures: a friendship that has not only proved rich in memorable and delightful associations, but has reacted upon the thought, the literature, above all, on the drama of our time to a marked degree. The "tawny young man" was Mr. Bernard Shaw, while his friend was William Archer.

II.

I am not sure that we are not to be congratulated upon the fact that the play planned by the two young literary adventurers was never finished. Doubtless it would have proved a most interesting production; but I rather incline to the view that the world would ultimately have been the loser. If we contrast the two collaborateurs, we must confess, I think, that in one important respect at all events the advantage lies with Archer. G. B. S. we know—for has he not himself told us?—has "got" Socialism. His genius is under the spell—I had almost said the obsession—of one solitary, dominating idea. But the subject of our sketch has escaped all such fanaticism—perhaps because he escaped Shaw. He is a man, not of one, but of innumerable enthusiasms, that range from Ibsen to national defence (did he not become "a volunteer to save his son from being a conscript"?); from the "nuspeling" to Francesco Ferrar; from the old Celtic drama to modern German prose; from America, with its teeming, restless, hectic population, that he has so admirably pictured, to the cold fastnesses of lonely Scandinavia. He is a lawyer, a scholar, and a sportsman: a man who has travelled much, in space as well as in spirit, and observed closely; who speaks many languages, and preserves through all his varying moods and phases the stimulating, clarifying vitality of an intellect singularly clear and penetrative, even as it is wonderfully receptive.

III.

Of course, as I need hardly point out to readers of EVERYMAN, the master passion of William Archer's life has been the theatre, not the conventional, stereotyped vulgarisation of the drama which passes current under that name, but a really national theatre that shall fulfil at least some of the functions which the institution served in ancient Athens and modern France. I suppose there is no man who has done more to stir the dry bones of our enthusiasm in regard to the project of a national theatre than the critic who virtually introduced Ibsen to the English stage and whose dramatic essays and excursions rank among the finest contributions to contemporary literature. Archer's view of the importance of the drama is quite simple.

"I should like," he says in one of his essays, "to see in England a body of playwrights, however small, whose works are not acted but printed and read. They might, of course, belong to every species of dramatic composition enumerated by Polonius or Geneste, but the large proportion of them, following the natural bent of the age, would probably deal with phases of modern life. In this sphere there would be room for comedy as light as Marivaux, and drama as intense as Augier, but always, except in the merest farce, there should be at least an undercurrent of seriousness. Even the merest farce, be it noted, should be free from puerility and vulgarity, but with this reservation it might be as wild and fantastic as Labiche himself, if it were only half as witty." The work, he adds, should be related to some moral, social, political or religious topic, . . . and "then the comedy of no manners, the farce of puns, and quiprosquos, the drama of furniture and firearms would cease to be the staple of our dramatic production."

IV.

It is to this great object that Archer has devoted the best years of his life, the best efforts of his brain. He has always kept steadily before the great B.P., the important fact—obvious, but now forgotten, though supremely important—that "the source of art is in the life of a people." "Tragedy!" Sir Arthur Pinero told him once in the course of a memorable interview—"there is nothing that can be properly so esteemed in low life, because there is no height from which a common person can fall; consequently, no irony of circumstances, no refinement of suffering." Thus the dramatist. The reply was crushing. "The fall from happiness to misery," said Mr. Archer, "is the essence of tragedy, and that fall may not involve any change in outward circumstances or material prosperity." The well-being of the soul and the well-being of the bank account are, as he pointed out, two different things, and the peasant's tragedy may be just as affecting as the peer's, even as Jude the Obscure moves us more than all the kings and princesses of Ruritania. Once we allow this great fact to be lost sight of, once we allow the catholicity of the drama to become obscured, then immediately we get plays that are trivial, meaningless, tawdry, and the theatre ceases to have any serious value in our lives.

V.

Mr. Archer has worked with almost religious enthusiasm to make the national theatre not only a possibility, but a concrete fact, and his book written with Mr. Granville Barker on the subject, shows him to have all the zeal and passion for detail which marks the "practical mystic." He assumes that the total expenses of the season, including 363 performances, amount to £71,091, against which he estimates that the average receipts would amount to £175 per night; the deficit would be about £7,000. This deficit, of course, would be for the first season only, and Mr. Archer estimates that with a guarantee fund of £150,000, to carry the enterprise over the preliminary, lean years of its existence, the project could be placed on a sound commercial basis. That sum, as he remarks, should be easily forthcoming. When once the factors are assured on such a liberal scale as to stir the imagination of the community and afford a fair presumption of success, there is little fear, as he points out, of the scheme falling to the ground for lack of guarantors. On the other hand, one may be pardoned for doubting whether the general leavening of our plays, with broader and more humanising influences, has not rendered this separate institution more or less supererogatory.

VI.

One of the most interesting volumes for which Mr. Archer is responsible is that entitled "Real Conversations," which record his talks with some of the most interesting and vivid figures of our time, who have chatted with him on literature, art, and politics. I have always thought the interview which records his impressions of Professor Masson, the biographer of Chatterton, quite the best. There is one delightful passage in it in which Archer records Masson's account of Shakespeare trying to read Macaulay's Essays, and finding so many objects, notions, and social customs with which he was unfamiliar that he would be literally staggered. Like the old Glasgow man who was impressed by the prodigious copiousness and rapidity of Lord Jeffrey's utterances at the Bar, he would exclaim, "Mercy on us! That man has spoken the English language twice in three hours!" And that brings me to my last point concerning the scholar and the critic of whom I have been writing. Archer is, before everything else, a journalist; but he is one of the few who have achieved success in that ephemeral profession whose writings will be readable three centuries hence. They deal not with passing objects, but eternal verities; for his most fugitive article is always concerned with ideas. It is that which makes Archer pre-eminent among writers for the Press: that and one other fact. He has nothing of that extreme exclusivism which marks so many distinguished publicists. He recognises fully that—to quote his own words—"not only must the people climb up, but the artist must, in a certain sense, climb down. He must not wrap himself in arrogant self-sufficiency, but must honestly endeavour to interpret the world in terms understandable to the man of normal, unsophisticated perceptions."

It is because he has done that that William Archer is not only a great scholar and critic, but one of the most remarkable journalistic forces of our time.

VII.

Somebody once observed that if he were a millionaire, and wanted to bribe "W. A.," he should commission him to translate the whole of Ibsen's plays. As a matter of fact, Mr. Archer had anticipated the bribe by already translating practically everything of Ibsen's that was worth preserving. It was a really colossal achievement, involving months, after the most anxious care and concentration, at a time when the public were either hopelessly indifferent to or violently prejudiced against the creator of "Borkman." It would, however, be a great mistake to think of Mr. Archer as fanatically limited by the master whose genius he did so much to discover. "He sees life steadily, and sees it whole." No one genius, however supreme, would ever distort his vision. It is, in fact, Archer's greatest claim on our regard that, being many-sided, he is unsoured by fanaticism; full of enthusiasms, but never controlled by them; original, but not perverse; cultured, but never pedantic. He is, in fact, that best of all combinations—the journalist who has not ceased to be a man of letters.

THE VILLAIN IN LITERATURE

By C. SHERIDAN JONES

I.

I SUPPOSE it is largely because courage has "lost the genius of indignation" that the last decade or two have witnessed so deplorable a decay in the villains of our fictionists. Thackeray, one remembers, startled our grandfathers by describing his masterpiece as "a novel without a hero." We, in our time, have gone far beyond this revolution. Nowadays our novels are destitute, not merely of heroes, but of villains worthy the name, for the characters who nominally fulfil that function act from motives so intricate and abstruse as merely to excite boredom. For real, full-blooded villains one must turn to the novelists of the last generation but one—to Wilkie Collins and to Charles Dickens; to Thackeray and George Eliot; above all, perhaps, to that master of narrative, Charles Reade, who could paint a consummate scoundrel with a convincing skill that no other novelist ever equalled.

This decay of villainy in our novels is all to the bad. "Give me, sir," said Dr. Johnson, "a good hater." We may take it that a generation which cannot bear to have its hate excited even in fiction is not very likely to look grimly and squarely at the facts of life. We can trace much of the present sloppy optimism that characterises politics to this same defect of our race—a good-natured, easy-going confidence that refuses to think of man as being deliberately bad, but insists that they are misled or the victims of circumstances, or that they have "yielded to temptation." The great masters of the art of fiction knew better. Their bad men are unmistakably bad, and stand out from the canvas in all their moral deformity. And yet, strange to say, they are often more likeable men than the psychological puzzles latter-day novelists delight in. Take, for instance, the immortal creation of Quilp. That Quilp was evil, fundamentally and horribly evil, there can be no shadow of doubt, but one delights, all the same, to recall his idiosyncrasies and to rejoice in his cranks, quips, and oddities. Who has not shed tears of laughter over the scene in which the dwarf's relatives are, with Mr. Brass, discussing the appearance of the man whom they fondly think is deceased?

"With regard to the descriptive advertisement," said Sampson Brass, taking up his pen. "It is a melancholy pleasure to recall his traits. Respecting his legs, now—?"

"Crooked, certainly," said Mrs. Jiniwin. . . .

"Legs crooked," said Brass, writing as he spoke. "Large head, short body, legs crooked—"

"Very crooked," suggested Mrs. Jiniwin.

"We'll not say very crooked, ma'am," said Brass piously. "Let us not be hard upon the weaknesses of the deceased. He is gone, ma'am, to where his legs will never come in question. We will content ourselves with crooked, Mrs. Jiniwin."

"I thought you wanted the truth," said the old lady. "That's all."

"Bless your eyes, how I love you!" muttered Quilp. "There she goes again. Nothing but punch."

"This is an occupation," said the lawyer, laying down his pen and emptying his glass, "which seems to bring before my eyes like the Ghost of Hamlet's father, in the very clothes that he wore on work-a-days. His coat, his waistcoat, his shoes and stockings, his trousers, his hat, his wit and humour, his pathos and his umbrella, all come before me like visions of my youth. His linen!" said Mr. Brass, smiling fondly at the wall, "his linen, which was always of a particular colour, for such was his whim and fancy—how plain I see his linen now!"

"You had better go on, sir," said Mrs. Jiniwin impatiently.

"True, ma'am, true," cried Mr. Brass. "Our faculties must not freeze with grief. I'll trouble you for a little more of that, ma'am. A question now arises with relation to his nose.'

"Flat," said Mrs. Jiniwin.

"Aquiline!" cried Quilp, thrusting in his head, and striking the feature with his fist. "Aquiline, you hag! Do you see it? Do you call this flat? Do you? Eh?"

II.

Somebody once described Quilp as being energy without soul, conscience, or feeling—in a word, the old mediæval devil personified. One feels for him some of that attraction, with which we are inspired often enough in real life, for a man one profoundly distrusts. Perhaps his soul had not partaken quite of the same cimmerian blackness as, say, Thackeray's Deuceace or Jonas Chuzzlewit. For one recalls, of course, in connection with the Dwarf, the friendship that had sprung up between him and Tom Scott. "How born or how bred, or how nourished upon blows and threats on one side, and retorts and defiances upon the other, is not to the purpose. Quilp would certainly suffer no one to contradict him but the boy, and the boy would assuredly not have submitted to be so knocked about by anybody but Quilp." And when the Dwarf meets his dreadful end the boy is the one sincere mourner he has. But what boy that was born of woman would have shed a tear over Jonas or Deuceace? The test, after all, is no bad one. Children and animals, it is an old saying, turn from a man who is wholly given over to the powers of darkness.

In part, I fear, we must hold the genius of George Eliot answerable for the progressive deterioration in our scoundrels to which I have directed attention. If Raffles is not a quarter so convincing as Bill Sikes, or Jimmy Valentine so amusing as Jingle, we must attribute it to that sympathetic study of dynamic wickedness which she drew for us in Tito Milemma. Thousands of people have closed "Romola" convinced that Tito was really a nice young man, who would have turned out quite well if he had only been tactfully handled; whereas, in actual fact, he was an unspeakable cur, and, as Dr. Johnson said in another connection, "there's an end on't." Mr. Bernard Shaw, in this matter as in so many others, has placed his finger on the spot. It is only the English villain, he says, who seeks a reason, an excuse for his misconduct. Him we have typified in Iago, who makes speeches all through the play defending his treachery. The Italian villain, on the other hand, is best exemplified by Don John in "Much Ado About Nothing"—a man who does evil for no ulterior end, but merely because he likes it.

Victor Hugo gives us in "Toilers of the Sea" a most arresting study of a man who, slowly and laboriously, builds up, by steady conduct extending over many years, a reputation for meticulous honesty merely in order that he may have an opportunity of committing a robbery on a grand scale. He gets clean away with his booty—to die a violent death within twenty-four hours—poetic justice that does not often descend on villains even in fiction. There is, in fact, only one other death quite like it in the whole of fiction—when Carker is destroyed:—

"He paid the money for his journey to the country place he had thought of; and was walking to and fro alone, looking along the line of iron, across the valley in one direction, and towards a dark bridge near at hand in the other: when, turning in his walk, he saw the man from whom he had fled emerging from the door by which he himself had entered there. And their eyes met.

"In the quick unsteadiness of the surprise, he staggered, and slipped on to the road below him. But, recovering his feet immediately, he stepped back a pace or two upon that road, to interpose some wider space between them, and looked at his pursuer, breathing short and quick.

"He heard a shout—another—saw the face change from its vindictive passion to a faint sickness and terror—felt the earth tremble—knew in a moment that the rush was come—uttered a shriek—looked round—saw the red eyes, bleared and dim, in the daylight, close upon him—was beaten down, caught up, and whirled away upon a jagged mill, that spun him round and round, and struck him limb from limb, and licked his stream of life up with its fiery heat, and cast his mutilated fragments in the air."

This scene, together with Edith's flight and Carker's journey after her, was due, in large part, to the sound, critical judgment of the author's friend, Lord Jeffrey. Dickens's original plan was to let Carker and Edith fly together. But Jeffrey persuaded him to abandon the idea, and, instead, the master gave us that extraordinary chapter, "the hour of Mr. Carker's triumph," when Edith spurns the man who has betrayed her husband, and leaves him to suffer the death I have described.

III.

I have said something of the facility with which Charles Reade used to depict thoroughgoing scoundrels, and readers of "Foul Play" will agree, I think, that it has never been equalled as a complete study of gentlemanly villainy. Coventry, too, in "Put Yourself in his Place," the aristocratic lover of Grace Carden, who intercepts his rival's letters, plans to have him murdered, and very nearly succeeds, commits burglary, arson, and a few other crimes, is a wonderfully vivid and convincing figure, the progenitor of that type of well-bred adventurer with which modern melodrama is so plentifully besprinkled, from the Spider in "The Silver King" down to the Raffles of our own time. Further back we find the corresponding figure in Ainsworth's "Rookwood," Dick Turpin, the gentlemanly, dashing highwayman, who, in actual fact, so it is asserted, robbed poor women in lonely farmsteads and did not ride to York. It was, by the way, the success of Ainsworth and his imitators that caused Dickens to write "Oliver Twist," the only effort, as he expressed it, since Hogarth to depict the thief as he really is.

R. L. S. achieved real greatness in depicting villainy. Where in the whole of literature can we find a more complete presentment of a man lacking that something which separates the normal human from the moral lunatic than in "The Master of Ballantrae," unless, indeed, it is in that masterly trifle, "A Lodging for the Night":—

"Have you any money?" asked the old man.

"I have one white," replied the poet laughing. "I got it out of a dead jade's stocking in a porch. She was as dead as Cæsar, poor wench, and as cold as a church, with bits of ribbon sticking in her hair. This is a hard world in winter for wolves and wench and poor rogues like me."

"I," said the old man, "am Enguerrand de la Feuillée, seigneur de Brisetout, haily du Patatrac. Who and what may you be?"

"Villon rose and made a suitable reverence. 'I am Francis Villon,' he said, 'a poor Master of Arts of this university. I know some Latin, and a deal of vice. I can make chansons, ballades, lais, virelais, and roundels, and I am very fond of wine. I was horn in a garret, and I shall not improbably die upon the gallows. I may add, my lord, that from this night forward I am your lordship's very obsequious servant to command.'"

"God pity you," said the Lord of Brisetout at the door.

"Good-bye, papa," returned Villon, with a yawn. "Many thanks for the cold mutton."

"The door closed behind him. Villon stood and heartily stretched himself in the middle of the road.

"A very dull old gentleman," he thought. "I wonder what his goblets may be worth."

To read that is to see depths in human nature, and to shudder over them.

MASTERPIECE FOR THE WEEK

CHARLES DICKENS' "THE PICKWICK PAPERS" ❁ ❁ BY HUGH SINCLAIR

I.

IN a broad and obvious sense the "Pickwick Papers" is a book of the past. The London of Sam Weller has disappeared, and this is not a mere matter of brick and mortar. Though every building which figures in the "Pickwick Papers" still existed, and old Weller's coach had kept the motor-bus off London Bridge, the London of Charles Dickens would still be a city of the past. For it is not merely the stones of the old place, but the spirit and temper, the moral outlook and intellectual vision that have changed, and changed very radically in some important respects. And it is the same with the English country-side. Changed social and economic conditions have almost crushed the Wardle type of country household out of existence, and what with the dearth of domestic service, and the decay of domestic tastes, Christmas time finds us joining hands to the strains of "Auld Lang Syne," not with our kith and kin under the old roof-tree, but with complete strangers, whom we have never seen before, and do not wish to see again, at the Savoy Hotel, or some such palace of gourmandise. And that is not the final explanation. The truth is that we have come to prefer the ready-made convenience of hotel parties to the toil-involving joys of family gatherings, that (in a whisper be it said) we would not altogether greatly enjoy the hearty bonhomie of old Wardle, and feel ourselves bored, where our sensibilities are not jarred, by much of the talk of Dingley Dell.

II.

Yet, strange to say, it remains true that no changes, however deep-going, have availed to oust the "Pickwick Papers" from the affection of almost every class of readers all over the world, no translation being bad enough to obscure its irresistible attractions. Even where the humour of it is but imperfectly understood, the book is loved. Neil Munro, in his charming tale, "The Daft Days," makes Kate, the Highland maid-servant, take to the "Pickwick Papers" at first sight, although the fun of it was almost beyond her. "Poor Mr. Puckwuck!" she would cry at every misadventure of the hero's—"Oh, the poor wee man!" and every character was as real to her as the folk in her native Colonsay. And the picture is drawn to the life; one could match it from one's own experience. The fact is, that however much of the purely local, accidental and freakish there was in Dickens' later work, he was something more than the genial showman in the "Pickwick Papers." With all his revealing accuracy of detail, his shrewd actual observation and faithful realism, perhaps on their very account (for the ephemerality and distortions in some of his later books spring not from an excess of local colour, but from lack of steady and accurate vision), he has given us in this book, not the London and England of a certain period, but the great unchanging world, or, if one prefers it, the small and changeless heart of man.

III.

Most people would maintain that it is the genius of its humour that makes the "Pickwick Papers" an indethronable favourite, but one rather feels inclined to say that it is its genius of sheer human kindness. Nothing is more conspicuous in late Victorian and present-day literature than the want of the spirit of kindness. It shows a richly variegated map. Here we have power, there prophetic passion, there an almost uncanny insight, yonder the polish of consummate artistry. Above all, it is marked by cleverness, raised often to its most desolating and exhausting potency—cleverness that is blinding as a meteor, and as barren; cleverness that disconcerts, humiliates, scourges; cleverness that spends itself in satire or persiflage, scourging us and sneering at us in turn, and leaving us perhaps wiser, but certainly sadder, men. It is this plague of cleverness more than anything else that sends us tumbling joyfully into the capacious arms of the not intellectual but wondrously kind Mr. Pickwick and his friends. We open the "Pickwick Papers" every now and again, ostensibly because it is a book one can open at any page and at odd moments, and because its old-fashioned fun is so restful. But if the truth were told, we take refuge in its kindly benevolence from the afflicting touch of our heartless literary cleverness. Of course, we get many a laugh out of it, but what we really crave for is the homely touch of unfeigned goodwill which is on every page. There is no sting in all the book—no barb of wit that wounds love, no sacrifice of friendliness to epigrammatic smartness. Mr. Pickwick is a limited being, one must confess, and old Wardle still more so. We really could not talk to them for half an hour without being acutely irritated by their purblindness on many questions on which we have a monopoly of enlightenment, and by their quite pitifully pedestrian outlook as compared with our own flight of ideality. Yet we could never quarrel very deeply with either of them, because they have that pearl of kindness for which our jaded souls are seeking. Old Wardle—thick-skinned country gentleman of the old, rough-hewn type—beams round the board for sheer joy at seeing not a single unhappy face; beams on the family, friends, poor relations, servants, fat boy, with the same obtuse but hearty goodwill. We know that the feudal system is all wrong, and that very probably old Wardle's men and tenants are not living under ideal conditions, and that old Wardle does not bother his thick old head about it. We know he ought to be running a model estate and village, and losing some of his superfluous flesh in pleading the cause of the poor and wronged in Parliament. But somehow we forget these serious defects of his character as we watch him dispensing unlimited and sincere hospitality to a small crowd of happy folk. Social reformers are so common in these strenuous days, and old Wardles so very rare.

IV.

Then there is Mr. Pickwick himself—a synonym for unadulterated kindness of heart. His kindness goes deeper than Wardle's—witness his conduct in the Fleet, his treatment of the nefarious Jingle, and his general and unflinching championship of all who are desolate and oppressed. Yes, in an unscientific, haphazard way, he is a "social worker." That he does not study blue-books and minority reports is a pity, of course; but somehow we forgive it when we see his eyes brim at the misery of the Fleet prisoners, and we entirely forget it when we see him gaily careering down the slide for the edification of the party, dancing with the poor relations in turn, allowing himself to be kissed by all the young girls, and adding its very soul to the merry party. It is perhaps a harder thing to be a social reformer on the great scale; it is certainly a very desirable and noble thing; but to be just a kind, simple-minded old gentleman, with the blithe, trustful heart of a little child, is such a rare and precious thing that we must love it when we see it. In fine, to be in the company of the Pickwick folk is to be where one can talk freely, and be one's kindest if not one's deepest self, sure that every courtesy one receives comes from the heart, and that there will be no backbiting or detraction when one's back is turned.

V.

But if the deeper reason for our enduring love of the "Pickwick Papers" is its healing kindness, the immediate attraction is, of course, its genuine and unforced humour, humour guiltless alike of malice and of subtlety. The genius of it is unmistakable. Here we have a long series of comic characters and situations drawn with as broad and gaudy a brush as in any crude sporting novel, yet with a trueness of life which the most polished satirist might envy. Exaggeration of the jovial, farcical kind there is in plenty: the contagion of a rollicking, high, spontaneous nature sweeps the reader from chapter to chapter. Yet there is a scrupulous severity of art behind this easy effectiveness. How consummate that art, may be seen in the brilliant achievement of Sam Weller. Had we not been introduced to Mr. Weller, senior, we would have vowed that, like Topsy, Sam just "grewed." Yet what a gradually hoarded fund of severely disciplined observation and expression went to set him walking through those pages. The incarnation of the spirit of comedy, there is, on the other hand, nothing so pathetic in all the book as his devotion to his master; and to have woven a strand of genuine pathos—not stage sentiment—into so broad-meshed a comic web is a supreme triumph of Dickens' genius. Another signal instance of a certain deliberate artistry at the back of what seems pure, spontaneous drollery is seen in the fat boy. On the surface a human eating machine, he is in reality a diplomatic intervener in love affairs, with a slow but unerring instinct for the significance of a sentimental situation. That food alone can wake him up is a base libel for which his calumniators have to suffer on several distinct occasions. And when the sentimental soul of him triumphs so supremely over the solid flesh as to provoke him to a bit of love-making on his own account, and that after a distinctly satisfactory dinner, be it noted, when even the most spirituel of us are inclined to nod, his avowal of love seems clumsy only by the side of so finished an artist as Sam Weller. "What a nice young lady Miss Emily is!" said Mary. "I knows a nicerer." "Indeed?" said Mary. "Yes indeed," said the fat boy. "What's her name?" enquired Mary. "What's yours?" "Mary." "So's her's," said the fat boy; "you're her." It may lack subtlety, but it has the saving grace of being quite unmistakable, which, after all, is the essential in such matters.

VI.

Dickens saw things in an obstinately one-eyed way—that is at once his strength and his weakness. In the "Pickwick Papers" he takes us among all sorts and conditions of men, yet it is only a very small corner of life he gives us. To a thousand and one aspects and tendencies of contemporary life he was blind. In all this long book there is not one character who represents some of the great moral and spiritual movements that were troubling men's souls then, as they do now; in all his travels Mr. Pickwick never seems to have met one such. When we are brought into contact with the spiritual world, it is through the gross and greasy medium of the Rev. Mr. Stiggins. Personally, I do not object to the introduction of Stiggins. He is undoubtedly true to life, and his castigation is quite legitimate and wholesome. What one does resent is that Dickens could live at a time in which evangelical religion was a great character-producing force, and see only a long succession of Stigginses. But that question takes us far beyond the "Pickwick Papers," and evokes thoughts quite out of tune with the jovial Pickwickian mood, which is so good for us all.

TO FIAMMETTA

(With a Gift of Flowers)

LOVE has been crowned with flowers since time began,
With many coloured flowers of man's desire;
Temples she hath in fields Elysian
With asphodel her altars to attire;
And on the lowlier earth full many a shrine
Where men uplift white lilies in her praise.
And some the lotus bring—and some entwine
The wild red blooms of youth in passionate sprays.

Ah! Ladye, were it given to wander through
The unravaged gardens of the golden age,
Flowers would I bring you lovelier in hue
Than these that fade beneath this rhyming page;
Yet in decay they have some tender grace,
Because I plucked them dreaming of your face.

EVERYMAN'S FRENCH PAGE

BY VICTOR HUGO

L'ONDE ET L'OMBRE

UN homme à la mer!

Qu'importe! le navire ne s'arrête pas. Le vent souffle, ce sombre navire-là a une route qu'il est forcé de continuer. Il passe. L'homme disparaît, puis reparait, il plonge et remonte à la surface, il appelle, il tend les bras, on ne l'entend pas; le navire, frissonnant sous l'ouragan, est tout à sa manœuvre, les matelots et les passagers ne voient même plus l'homme submergé; sa misérable tête n'est qu'un point dans l'énormité des vagues.

Il jette des cris désespérés dans les profondeurs. Quel spectre que cette voile qui s'en va! Il la regarde, il la regarde frénétiquement. Elle s'éloigne, elle blêmit, elle décroît. Il était là tout à l'heure, il était de l'équipage, il allait et venait sur le pont avec les autres, il avait sa part de respiration et de soleil, il était un vivant. Maintenant, que s'est-il donc passé? Il a glissé, il est tombé, c'est fini.

Il lutte pourtant, il essaie de se défendre, il essaie de se soutenir, il fait effort, il nage. Lui, cette pauvre force tout de suite épuisée, il combat l'inépuisable. Où donc est le navire? Là-bas. A peine visible dans les pâles ténèbres de l'horizon. Les rafales soufflent; toutes les écumes l'accablent. Il lève les yeux et ne voit que les lividités des nuages. Il assiste, agonisant, à l'immense démente de la mer. Il est supplicié par cette folie. Il entend des bruits étrangers à l'homme qui semblent venir d'au-delà de la terre et d'on ne sait quel dehors effrayant. Il y a des oiseaux dans les nuées, de même qu'il y a des anges au-dessus des détresses humaines, mais que peuvent-ils pour lui? Cela vole, chante et plane, et lui, il râle. Il se sent enseveli à la fois par ces deux infinis, l'océan et le ciel; l'un est une tombe, l'autre est un linceul. La nuit descend, voilà des heures qu'il nage, ses forces sont à bout; ce navire, cette chose lointaine où il y avait des hommes, s'est effacé; il est seul dans le formidable gouffre crépusculaire, il enfonce, il se roidit, il se tord, il sent au-dessous de lui les vagues monstres de l'invisible; il appelle.

Il n'y a plus d'hommes. Où est Dieu? Il appelle, quelqu'un! quelqu'un! Il appelle toujours.

Rien à l'horizon. Rien au ciel. Il implore l'étendue, la vague, l'algue, l'écueil; cela est sourd. Il supplie la tempête; la tempête imperturbable n'obéit qu'à l'infini. Autour de lui l'obscurité, la brume, la solitude, le tumulte orageux et inconscient, le plissement indéfini des eaux farouches. En lui l'horreur et la fatigue. Sous lui la chute. Pas de point d'appui. Il songe aux aventures ténébreuses du cadavre dans l'ombre illimitée. Le froid sans fond le paralyse. Ses mains ce crispent et se ferment, et prennent du néant. Vents, nuées, tourbillons, souffles, étoiles inutiles! Que faire? Le désespéré s'abandonne, qui est las prend le parti de mourir, il se laisse faire, il se laisse aller, il lâche prise, et le voilà qui roule à jamais dans les profondeurs lugubres de l'engloutissement.

O marche implacable des sociétés humaines! Pertes d'hommes et d'âmes chemin faisant! Océan où tombe tout ce que laisse tomber la loi! Disparition sinistre du secours! O mort morale! La mer, c'est l'inexorable nuit sociale où la pénalité jette ses damnés. La mer, c'est l'immense misère. L'âme, à vau-l'eau dans ce gouffre, peut devenir un cadavre. Qui la ressuscitera?

THE WAVE AND THE SHADOW

MAN overboard!

What matter! The vessel does not stop; the wind blows, and that dark ship must keep her course. She sails on. The man disappears, then reappears; he sinks, and rises again to the surface; he calls; he waves his arms, but no one hears. The ship, trembling beneath the hurricane, strains and works in every timber; the sailors and the passengers do not even see the castaway; his wretched head is only a speck in the immensity of the billows.

He hurls cries of despair into the depths around him. What a spectre is that retreating sail! He stares at it—stares at it with frenzy, as it is lost in the distance, fades, and disappears. He was on board just now, he was one of the crew, he moved about the deck like the others, he had his share of air and sunlight, he was a living thing. Now what has happened? He slipped, he fell, and all is over.

He struggles to save himself, to keep himself afloat; he makes an effort, he swims. That paltry force, just now exhausted, combats the inexhaustible. Where is the ship? Yonder, scarce visible in the horizon's pale shadows. The storm gusts smite him, the foam of every wave overwhelms him; he raises his eyes and sees only the livid masses of the clouds. In the agony of death he feels and shares the measureless madness of the sea. He is tortured by this madness, he hears sounds strange to human ears, which seem to come from the other side of the earth, and from some mysterious and terrible region beyond. There are birds in the clouds, just as there are angels high above human sorrows; but what can they do for him? The bird flies, sings, and soars; and he—he has the death-rattle in his throat. He feels himself doubly buried in those two infinities, sea and sky—the one his tomb, the other his shroud. Night descends; he has been swimming for hours; his strength is at an end. That ship—that far-away thing where there are men—is blotted out; he is alone in the awful twilight-gulf. He sinks, he stiffens himself, he struggles, he feels below him the monstrous billows of the invisible. He shouts aloud!

"There are no more men. Where is God?" he shouts aloud. "Help! Help!" he shouts incessantly. Nothing on the horizon, nothing in heaven. He implores the expanse of waters, the waves, the seaweed, the shoals; but they are deaf. He calls on the tempest to succour, but the imperturbable tempest obeys the Infinite alone. Around him are darkness, sea-fog, solitude, stormy and unconscious tumult, and the ill-defined furrows of fierce waters. In his breast are horror and fatigue; beneath him the abyss without a foothold. He dreams of the fearful adventures of the corpse in the limitless realm of shadow. Cold immeasurable paralyses him, and his hands shrivel up, close, and grasp nothingness. Winds, clouds, gusts, breezes, stars, all useless! What is to be done? He abandons himself in his despair, and in his weariness chooses death—lets himself drift and drive; he yields, and is whirled forever in the dreary engulfing depths.

O implacable march of human society! Lost men and lost souls along the road—ocean into which falls all that the law lets slip. O moral death! The sea is the inexorable social night into which the penal code flings its condemned; the sea is infinite wretchedness. The soul drifting in its eddies may become a corpse. Who will reanimate it?

LITERARY NOTES

THE latest recruit to the ranks of lecturers is, we understand, Mr. Yeats, who is contemplating a tour in America. Novelists long ago discovered that it paid them better to talk about the way they wrote their books than to write them, and it is a striking fact that the great master of the art of fiction, Charles Dickens himself, made ten times the amount from the lecture-chair that he achieved by the sale of his masterpieces. The readings, however, proved so terrible a strain that he broke down under the fatigues, and only resumed the work against the reiterated warnings of his medical advisers, who told him that he must inevitably shorten his life if he continued. Up to the present poets have not been conspicuous as lecturers, and it will be interesting to see whether Mr. Yeats is able to hold his audiences after their first curiosity has been satisfied. A well-known novelist told the writer the other day that, curiosity once satisfied, the author, in his opinion, "could not stay the course," unless he had quite exceptional gifts as a platform man, and these few litterateurs possess. "Reading maketh a full man, speaking a ready man, and writing an exact man."

* * * * *

Admirers of Mr. H. G. Wells (who include everybody) will be glad to learn that he has returned to the writing of those delightful stories about the Moon and the inhabitants of Mars, and is now engaged on the conception of a work which will arrest and amaze all the thousands of readers on both sides of the herring pond and in the Colonies who, from the days of "The Invisible Man" and "The Time Machine" onwards, have followed with avidity that startling series of imaginative triumphs which have blended science and romance.

* * * * *

Perhaps the most popular of his novels outside these stories of new worlds is "Love and Mr. Lewisham," the book which marked the departure from his old scientific method. All the world loves a lover, and it is not a little significant that, both as regards Mr. Wells and another "advanced" artist, the first capture of the popular suffrage was with the eternal feminine, Mr. Bernard Shaw having held thousands spellbound with "Man and Superman" who would have been bored to extinction by "Widowers' Houses," or, let us say, "The Man of Destiny." Upon Mr. Wells's shoulder has fallen the mantle of George Gissing, the novelist of the "ignobly mean," to use the phrase of that incomparable stylist. It is interesting to note that "H. G." shares with his admirers the preference for his first wide success.

* * * * *

Lovers of the literary drama will be glad to learn that Mr. Henry Arthur Jones, who for some months past has been suffering from a troublesome internal complaint, has returned to London with his health fully restored. Recently Mr. Jones was asked which of his plays he preferred. He replied with a quiet twinkle, "Always the one I am writing."

* * * * *

It may, however, be stated authoritatively that the work of which he is proudest is that delightful comedy, "The Liars," of which Mr. A. B. Walkley has said that it compared not unfavourably with the immortal screen scene in "The School for Scandal."

Miss Christabel Pankhurst still provides plenty of gossip in journalistic as well as political circles. The latest rumour is that she has been asked to write a serial story for a leading magazine in collaboration with a well-known novelist in marked sympathy with the women's movement. The scene, we understand, is to be laid in Paris, and the leading characters, drawn straight from life, are likely to arouse some excitement and a great deal of criticism. The Suffragettes have included a number of successful literary women in their ranks, though as a rule their work has not shown signs of the militant spirit. Miss Elizabeth Robins scored a success with "Votes for Women"; but Miss Cicely Hamilton's record achievement was undoubtedly "Diana of Dobson's," the play of shop-girl life.

Mr. Hilaire Belloc's latest volume, "The Stane Street," is going very well indeed. The output of this author is astonishing, both as regards quality and quantity. His versatility is amazing, and he will turn from the dictation of an article on foreign affairs to the completion of one of his inimitable satires with an ease and fluency that is unique. He is at present engaged on a "Life of Napoleon," the publication of which is likely to make a considerable stir in literary circles. Mr. Belloc is not content with anything less than the best possible sources of evidence, and has travelled miles in order to obtain access to original documents relating to the Napoleonic wars. He has traversed the route taken in the invasion of Russia, examining the line of march with the scientific exactitude that, allied with his intimate knowledge of military strategy, makes his articles on the art of war at once convincing and arrestive.

Among the many reprints that are being issued we wonder there is not a greater demand for the works of Mr. Israel Zangwill. One of the few readable novels of politics is intimately associated with this author's name. "The Mantle of Elijah" was at one and the same time a clever drama and an epitome of the burning questions of the day. Mr. Zangwill is a writer who understands to the full the value of a sense of humour; it is only when this enthusiast for Women's Suffrage is speaking on behalf of Votes for Women that he seems to lose that irresistible capacity for laughter that wells up in his delightful sketch, "The English Fladpick," and is so notable a quality of "Merely Mary Ann." It was in the old days of The Star that Zangwill scored a marked success as a fictionist. He wrote "The Great Bow Mystery," one of the cleverest of modern detective tales, and he wrote it under unique circumstances. Every journalist knows the stimulative effect that the whirl of the printing presses exercises on the brain. Mr. Zangwill thought out the development of his plot during the watches of the night, and wrote his copy red hot in the early morning while the second edition of the paper clamoured for his instalment. He made a point, however, of reading first very carefully the suggestions sent to him day by day from his baffled readers, not one of whom, however, hit on the solution of the mystery. The story is live in every word unto this day, and, recalling the dreary mass of turgid fiction that issues monthly in the pages of our magazines under the title of "Detective Stories," we are constrained to wish that the author of that wonderful work, "The Children of the Ghetto," would go back for a little space to Fleet Street and give us another drama of crime and its detection.

THE CURÉ OF SAINT CRESPIN

By PIERRE CRIQUETOT.

IT was the sunset hour—that hour wherein faintly we taste the joys of the Place of Achievement or the anguish of the Place of Remorse. As on the Great Day, according to our deeds we shall enter the Garden of Great Peace, so at even, if we have done well throughout our little day, we are filled with quiet content. But if we have idled and done ill, the fading light reproaches us. Gladly we would stay the setting sun. All the unaccomplished trivialities seem then of great account; all the irrevocable, wasted moments seem then twice-precious time. "What hast thou done with thy day?"

"Stay, oh Sun! stay yet a little while!" But inexorably the sun passes from our sight along that golden road over the dancing waves. Even so at the Last Day, if we have wasted our life, we shall enter the Kingdom of Everlasting Regret, where repentance is of no avail, neither prayer.

All was still in the little village of Saint Crespin. Only there was the regular swish of the sea as it rolled up the beach, grinding the rough pebbles smooth, the quiet lowing of cattle, the half-subdued, sleepy sound of fowls quarrelling for the night's resting-place, and the far-away moaning of "La Vache à Malet."*

Suddenly the spell was broken; the wind stirred among the young leaves, bringing with it a fresh smell of wood-smoke and scattering the snowy pear-blossom. A star blinked lazily, an old dame in a close mutchi drove her cow round a bend of the road, a workman, his cider-jug at his back, whistled as he trudged homewards. Then the Angelus pealed out its three single notes, and the steady tolling began.

I climbed some rough steps, passed a battered, mossy cross, and so came to the little grey stone church with its crooked spire.

The door stood open, so I entered and watched the steady, swinging movements of the curé as he rang the heavy bell. The parish of Saint Crespin was very poor, and the curé perforce was his own bellringer. He stopped the bell in master fashion, allowing no after-clang, and steadied the rope, which strained and writhed like a great serpent in the grip of its charmer, so that I knew him to be a strong man, for the ringing of the Angelus and, above all, the correct stopping of the ponderous bell require not only skill but strength.

After he had replenished the Veilleuse, he walked to the door and stood waiting for me to pass out, his hand on the huge key. Once outside the church, he put on his little black skull-cap, from beneath which his tight grey curls stuck out ludicrously. He was a somewhat stout person, apparently about forty years of age. His soutane, hitched up by his recent exertions, disclosed a pair of distinctly bowed legs clothed in feminine black stockings, and large, carpet-slipped feet.

For a moment he watched me with his searching, ever-changeable grey eyes, then abruptly he asked me where I intended to spend the night. Hesitatingly I murmured some question as to inn accommodation. The corners of his mouth twisted sarcastically, but he made no reply, except by pointing to a door in the wall of the little God's acre. The wall was high, and built of flints and chalk, among which flourished a small variety of yellow wallflower. Over the tiles, set cave-wise, which formed the coping of the wall, peeped an early rose or two. A purple lilac, grown into a veritable tree, weighed down with its own burden of blossom, seemed generously to invite theft. All this I noticed as the curé fumbled with the rusty latch. At last the door opened, and he motioned me to follow him. Obediently I did so, and was glad, for on the other side of the wall lay the presbytère set in a garden of gardens.

A narrow path twisted in a friendly and informal manner round lilac and laburnum bushes, in whose shade lingered a few belated primroses. Here and there was a tiny speck of blue, a hiding violet, and near by, carelessly among the grass, grew hyacinths and wild daffodils.

Here were no formal beds; each flower grew as it listed. Later in the year there would be abundance of roses, wild thyme, and lavender.

The path twisted widely round a great bush of blackthorn in full flower, and suddenly we came to the very doorstep of the presbytère. It was a small square house, in nowise remarkable for structural beauty, but nature had clothed it abundantly with early honeysuckle, jasmine and clematis, all grown together in such a glorious tangle that the walls were hardly visible. The steep, red-tiled roof, with its three dormer windows, was partly covered with creepers and crowned with a row of irises, just showing purple.

Still silent, the curé opened the door, and we entered a tiled passage which gave access on the one hand to the curé's study, on the other to his dining-room, and was terminated by the kitchen.

"Ernestine!" suddenly shouted my host. "Ernestine!" and yet again "Ernestine!" This time an austere, grey-haired woman appeared, knitting industriously.

"Lay another place, Ernestine; monsieur sups with us, and he will sleep here too. See that the room is in order."

"Yes, monsieur l'abbé."

And Ernestine disappeared, soon to reappear bearing a splendid silver-scaled salmon-trout, caught that day in the nets on the shore.

During supper we talked of many things. Like most silent people, the curé, when once he got upon a subject that interested him, was extremely loquacious.

It chanced that I questioned him as to the history of the patron saint of the village; thereat his eyes twinkled in a manner most unclerical, and he replied:

"Saint Crespin? a cobbler by trade—'tis said the angels supplied him with leather when, because of his generosity, he had not the wherewithal to buy materials. It seems to me it would have been simpler if the angels had given him ready-made shoes. But they are very picturesque, these old stories—do not let us laugh."

"Then your religion does not enjoin your belief in the legends of the saints?" I ventured.

Instantly he became serious once more.

"For many years I believed like a child, accepting without doubt all that I was told." He paused, and gazed at me with thoughtful, unseeing eyes; then he continued:

"My father was a fisherman; he owned a boat, and my two brothers and myself acted as crew. One night, when we were fishing, about three leagues from land, a fearful storm arose. Suddenly, violently, from the north-west it raged.

"By the time we had got in the nets it was hard upon us; fortunately it did not catch us broadside on, but we were driven before it, straight for the shore, at a terrible speed.

"It was the first time I had been out in such a storm. I was mad with terror. Then it was that in the frenzy of my fear I prayed to the Virgin, vowing that if she brought us safe to land I would consecrate myself to her service.

"By this time we could see dimly the angry black mass of cliffs reaching out to devour us. Eagerly we watched for the Tour de Saint Léger and the mouth of our harbour, but we could discern nothing.

"This Tour de Saint Léger, I must tell you, is a landmark well known to all the coast. It is a ruined spire, all that remains of the Church of Saint Léger. It stands at the top of the cliffs, just outside my village, and by it homeward-bound fishermen can steer their course.

"Suddenly, as we gazed into the gloom, there was a fierce flash of lightning that for a second showed up our familiar beacon clear against the wild sky. At once we knew that we were but a few fathoms from the harbour entrance. Somehow we managed to steer a straight course. We were saved.

"I remembered my vow. I began my studies full of faith and fervent gratitude. Without doubt I accepted all the tenets of the Catholic belief, looking forward with eagerness to the day when first I should have the privilege of celebrating mass, as to a great festival.

"On the eve of that day an insidious spirit of doubt assailed me unawares, but it was easily quelled, and I began work in my allotted parish as full of faith as on the night of our deliverance from the storm.

"After some months I again began to be tormented by fits of unbelief. At first I fought against this evil spirit, shocked to think that for a moment I could doubt. I wished to believe. I prayed, and I regained my faith.

"Again I was haunted with an ever-growing doubt. The whole foundation of my faith tottered. I no longer believed in God as Love, yet I feared him as Judge, and so I reasoned myself back to faith.

"Then came the worst phase of all. I no longer feared God, but, regretting my disbelief, I searched vainly for truth in theological writings. Nothing convinced me, nothing helped me. I found no guide in the void wherein I wandered. I envied those steadfast Christians of whom I read, yet was wholly unable to share in their belief.

"One day, utterly wearied with fruitless study, I went out and flung myself amongst the cool grass. The sun shone, and the air was sweet with the fresh fragrance of early summer. Near by a lark was singing, and as it sang its music seemed to enter into my brain, into my soul, filling me with great peace. As I listened, gradually I knew that all was well. I knew that the things for which I had striven were vain. I knew that we were not meant to probe God's secrets. Only I wished that every man might lie amongst the grass, and feel the sun and hear the lark. I knew that it sang, and that the spring was with us.

"Look," he said, and he opened wide the window.

"Look, is it not so?"

A blossom-covered pear-tree stood white and shining in the moonlight. Far away we heard the sighing of the restless sea. I looked—I knew that he was right.

A NOVEL CHURCH CENSUS

By CHARLES W. CRUMP.

I.

ALMOST every paper one picks up contains an article, or at least some reference to the declining membership and influence of the Churches of to-day. Such headlines as "Statistomania," "Churchianity," "Where are we Drifting to?" etc., are now quite common and not a little bit wearisome to our eyes. We are told also that the empty pews are a testimony to the fact that these headlines and articles are not entirely unwarranted.

Truly we are in a transition state in regard to divine worship and the duties of Sunday.

I live in what is called a "railway" town; and, with a view to getting to the bottom of this steady decline in figures and very apparent apathy on the part of the workers, I devised a scheme whereby I should get first-hand information and actually feel the pulse of the populace. I had about 3,000 four-page circulars printed, made of good paper, and issued in an attractive form. These circulars were carefully distributed by a selected body of workers, special care being taken that the non-churchgoers should be reached as far as possible, and that every grade of social life should be appealed to. Of course, 3,000 would not go far in a large town, but the judicious circulation obtained the desired effect.

II.

The front page contained the details of the "scheme," and asked for plain, straightforward speaking in answer to six questions, which here follow:—

1. Why do YOU not attend the services of the Christian Church?

2. Why do you think your FRIENDS or others do not attend?

3. What definite charge can you or they bring against the Church of to-day or its services?

4. Have you anything to say against its ministers? If so, say it plainly.

5. If you think the Church is going backward, what is the best way to win the people and stop the decline?

6. What, do YOU think, will be the position and general character of the Church of, say, 1923?

Space was left on the inside of the circular for the use of answers. The back was adorned with a photograph of the Church where the circular came from, and where addresses were to be given on the answers received.

The idea caught on and proved a real success. The number of answers received totalled 132, and were representative of all the social grades. In addition, I received a number of answers from distant towns. The lines written totalled 4,000, and the words (approximately) 28,000.

The individual questions to receive the least answers were numbers 4 and 6. Indeed, I was much surprised at the very gentle treatment the ministers received.

III.

The work of classifying the answers was no mean task; but, as far as I was able to do this, I arrived at the following conclusion respecting the order in which the various causes of Church decline should be placed:—

The Churches are declining because of:—

1. The inconsistency, imperfections, uncharitableness, and unfaithful witness of church members themselves.

2. The lack of interest on the part of the Church in the social conditions of the people.

3. Because of the cast-iron creeds and harsh doctrines, especially the doctrine of God, taught by the Churches; and the general hesitation to make progress with the times in things theological.

(I confess the reference to the harsh doctrine of God was quite unexpected.)

4. Because of the lack of "grip" in the services, the pulpit being largely responsible for this.

5. Because our age is a pleasure-seeking age, and there is a lack of provision of innocent amusements for the young by the Church.

6. Because of the great need of a free, unfettered, enlightened ministry in the pulpits.

IV.

Masters and men, ladies and servants, rich and poor, joined in giving me the above as the causes why we have so many empty pews. I could not help feeling—and I said so—that, speaking generally, the answers betrayed a lack of knowledge of the present attitude of the Churches. It seems to me that all the above would have applied, say, twenty years ago, or even less; but I must say the Churches of to-day are waking up to the situation, and some are very keenly alive to these facts.

The Churches are rousing up and cleansing themselves, and they are thinking of the social conditions of the people, and are endeavouring to provide a free and enlightened ministry.

But though the excuses do not appear modern to me, yet they are provocative of much thought. I understand that dozens of people intended to send in answers, but they, after careful consideration, found it difficult to formulate real, substantial reasons for the position. In that the circulars did good, for they brought the realisation of the difference between flippant conversation about the Churches and real facts worthy of being penned on paper. Respecting the cause which got the most attention, the writers failed to remember that the Church does not profess to be the home of perfect saints; she is a hospital rather than a hot-house. Yet how much Church members have to learn! Who should set the better example? To whom do men look for a likeness of the Man of Nazareth? And what a world of force there is in a good life!

V.

The following answers, culled from the many received, are worthy of particular notice:—

"It is a paradox to pretend that the thing called Christianity, in England or Tripoli, was what the Preacher of Galilee lived and died to establish."

"I am of the opinion that far too much time is devoted by ministers to the active affairs of the municipality and State. The connection is adulterous; and it is questionable whether the minister can legitimately spare the time which these duties demand."

"The Church allows a terrible commercial system to continue, and wastes its time trying to save souls. It would be more in accord with reason if the Church was to realise this and endeavour to bring about the kingdom of God on earth."

"What good can it do to go to church one day in seven, and be told that God is good and great, when one has to contend with strife caused by bad social conditions the remaining six?"

"Churches are helping employers to rob their workmen by administering soothing syrup to these workmen on Sundays."

"Because of the awful doctrines preached. We must first have a rational doctrine or comprehension of God. This doctrine is made the greatest muddle of, of all."

"Because of what the Church has not done for the working classes. Ministers to-day will frequent cafés and tea-rooms in London where the waitresses exist by sweated

A DEBT YOU OWE YOURSELF.

AN INVESTMENT THAT PAYS.

A HOLIDAY ON THE CONTINENT

"EVERYMAN, I WILL GO WITH THEE
AND BE THY GUIDE, IN THY MOST
NEED TO GO BY THY SIDE."

HAVE you ever looked upon a holiday as an investment? Have you ever thought of the interest it yields in the form of increased mental and physical vigour and energy?

A fortnight's change amid new scenes in a new country, an entire detachment from the ordinary duties of life, means the conserving of energy and renewed strength, which will certainly lead to increased efficiency when you return.

EVERYMAN Continental Tours have been planned to give that change in health-giving countries, and to combine with it all the enjoyment of a real holiday.

TO HOLLAND AND SWITZERLAND.

Parties of EVERYMAN Tourists left London last week for holidays in Holland and Switzerland. On Friday a happy little party departed from Victoria Station for Folkestone, from whence they crossed the Channel by the short sea route, via Flushing, and are now enjoying a holiday in the queer little country of Windmills and Dykes. On Saturday another party left for Lucerne and Grindelwald, to spend a happy fortnight in Europe's Paradise—glorious Switzerland.

FLANDERS AND THE ARDENNES.

EVERYMAN Parties leave London on July 12th and 26th, August 9th and 23rd, and September 6th for personally conducted tours in Historic Flanders and the Valleys of the Belgian Ardennes.

Every inch of Flanders is history. It has played an important part in the development of Western Europe. To the tourist, Flanders is full of interest. Ghent, the sister city of Bruges, is mentioned in history as early as the seventh century; in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries the city passed through an almost continuous series of revolutions. John of Gaunt was born here in the fourteenth century.

A FASCINATING CITY.

The stately capital of Belgium—"Little Paris," as it is often called—Brussels, is reminiscent of the French capital in its spacious tree-lined boulevards and magnificent streets. The great picture gallery, which is a wonderful and comprehensive series of the whole range of Flemish art, the beautiful Church of St. Gudule, the nucleus of the city in the beautiful Grande Place, and the thronged, lighted streets, are all part of the memories which are enshrined in this fascinating city.

WATERLOO.

Modern and mediæval history meet here, and a visit should be made to the famous Battlefield of Waterloo. From a commanding position, an English Military Guide lectures on the disposition of the forces on the fateful day, and all the main features of interest are pointed out; and, last of all, as the journey is made to the Chateau of Hougomont, the key of the whole position, the story of the battle is understood as it would be by no other means.

Antwerp, with its fine quays on the river Scheldt, offers many attractions to the visitors; the great Cathedral and the Musée Plantin bring back scenes from the past. The Picture Gallery contains some huge canvasses by Rubens.

THE ARDENNES.

The flower-decked Valleys of the Ardennes offer a delightful contrast to the Flemish cities. Chief among them is the Valley of the Meuse, and as the traveller starts by boat from Namur—the "gateway of the Ardennes"—the town at the meeting-place of the Meuse and Sambre, his mind is carried to the beauties of the Rhine, to which the Meuse is often compared. For nearly four hours passing one picturesque corner after another, great limestone crags looming sheer down to the water's edge, the steamer arrives at Dinant—the most beautiful of all the lovely places in the Valley. On a narrow strip of shore, the town is built against the great cliffs which rise high above it.

EXCURSIONS.

During the fortnight some charming excursions, drives, steamer trips, picnics, etc., have been arranged to all places of interest; in fact, each and every day offers some new delight.

COST OF THE TOUR.

The Cost of the Tour, including all Travelling Expenses, Second-Class Rail throughout, all Hotel Accommodation (three meals a day), Admission Fees to Cathedrals, Churches, Picture Galleries, and all Places of Interest visited, Services of Conductor, Steamer Trip on the Canal to Stuis, Drive in Brussels, Excursion to Waterloo, Drive over the Battlefield and Services of Guide, Excursion to Tervuren, Steamer Trip from Namur to Dinant, All-day Drive through the Valleys of the Meuse and Lesse to Château of Celles and the Château Walzin, Excursion to Rochefort, Mountain Railway, and admission to Grotto of Han (this alone costs the individual tourist 8s.), Steamer Trip to Hastiere, Excursion to Montaigle, is only £8 18s. 6d., and 7s. 6d. covers all gratuities, conveyance of luggage between hotels, etc.

STILL TIME!

Provided a telegram is sent to reach us Friday afternoon, there is still time to book for the July 12th party. Other parties are being very quickly filled, and you can only secure a place by immediate application for bookings.

SWITZERLAND.

EVERYMAN Swiss Holidays are proving exceedingly attractive, and many parties are already complete.

We have still a few vacant places in the following Tours:—

Lucerne and Grindelwald, leaving London July 18th and August 1st and 18th.

THE CULT OF THE BOOKPLATE

BOOKPLATES, more or less on the lines of those of the present day, have been used by book-lovers almost since the art of printing was invented, and it would seem that the introduction of printing was almost or quite contemporaneous with the origin of the use of bookplates. Certainly in the very early days of book production bookplates were introduced, and have been used ever since by owners who take personal interest in their literary possessions.

One of the earliest specimens of English bookplates dates back to 1516, nearly four centuries ago; but it is a well-attested fact that they were in use on the Continent—notably in Germany—still earlier than this.

A remarkably fine example of ancient bookplates is that presented by Sir Nicholas Bacon to the University of Cambridge in 1574, and it is interesting to note that the ever-punctilious Pepys records, under date July 21st, 1668, how he "went to my plate-makers and there spent an hour about contriving my bookplates for the King's four yards." As, under the watchful care of enthusiastic collectors, other specimens are brought to light, it becomes abundantly evident that from these very early times the custom has been almost universal among the learned classes. The mission of the bookplate has always been, and must always be, primarily to indicate ownership of the books in which they are placed. They may be ornate or simple, as the taste or means of the owner may dictate; they may incorporate crest, arms, motto, or other family attribute; or, again, they may reflect the personal interests or occupations of the owner; but the real aim of the bookplate remains ever the same—a reminder to those who borrow. And in thus ensuring the return of books to their home quarters, they are a most effective means of preventing loss. But bookplates have a value and interest quite apart from this consideration. As one writer says, "Nestling in a book, unknown and unseen until the book is opened, whether quaint or commonplace, artistic or otherwise, it speaks with a mute eloquence to all those not absolutely dead to its many lurking charms."

I specialise in the designing and engraving of bookplates, and have a capable staff of artists and engravers to assist me, each design being original work, and incorporating crest, arms, or some other desired feature. On request, I will at once send specimens.

I have executed bookplates for clients in all parts of the world, and have many testimonials from delighted clients in all positions, for I try to take as keen a pleasure in producing a simple, inexpensive plate as in one that involves almost infinite care as to detail and fine copperplate engraving.

There is practically no limit to the variations of style and taste in bookplates. I am frequently sent photographs of houses or gardens or districts, as well as other special features which it is desired to perpetuate in a plate; anything that is of personal interest to the owner may be said to be suitable.

The cost varies, of course, according to the work involved, and the method of reproduction; a very simple design, with zinc block and one hundred plates, can be had for 17s. 6d. inclusive, while copperplate engraving ranges from two and a half guineas upward. But in all cases the value is good—and I have hundreds of testimonials. Book-lovers who have not yet a bookplate of their own, or who are wishing for one as a gift to a friend, are invited to send me a few particulars on which to base a design, and I will then furnish a pencil suggestive treatment for approval. For a tasteful birthday or wedding gift a bookplate is particularly suitable, when the recipients are those who find pleasure in books. It generally takes about three weeks to complete the work.—HENRY D. WARD, 49, Great Portland Street, London, W. industry, receiving only 8s. per week for many hours of labour."

And so I might go on. There is one other, quite alone, which I would like you to notice:—

"Because the Church represents something unattainable. I desire the ideal it holds out, but I know I cannot reach it. Therefore it jars rather than soothes. The Church is thus not in harmony with my spiritual condition."

Large crowds have gathered to listen to each address based upon these answers, and opportunity has been found for discussion when desired.

It is obvious that "There remaineth yet much land to be possessed."

PERSONALITY IN LITERATURE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Mr. Corkery, in his article, "Personality in Literature," seems to me to be utterly wrong in identifying personality and style. He says, "Personality is a far land, won to only by hardy pilgrims. It is style."

There is undoubtedly a connection between personality and style, but it is the personality which makes the style and not, as Mr. Corkery assumes, the style which makes the personality. If ever there was a poet with a personality, it is Masfield; and yet I agree with Mr. Corkery that his style is far from perfect.

Mr. Birrell once said of Browning, "He describes love, not only broken, but breaking; hate in the germ; doubt at its birth. These are difficult things to do, either in poetry or prose, and people with easy, flowing Addisonian or Tennysonian styles cannot do them." This might, with equal justice, be said of Masfield.

Mr. Corkery wishes Masfield "to give us a small book of lyrics as finished as those of Mr. Yeats." May I commend to him the former author's "Ballads and Poems"?—I am, sir, etc.,

MR. COBBITT AND THE INSTITUTE OF CHARTERED ACCOUNTANTS.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—As Mr. Lewis, in his letter in your issue of the 4th inst., apparently doubts my veracity in describing myself as a chartered accountant, I would refer him to the published results of the final examination of the Institute of Chartered Accountants held in December last, duly followed by notice of admission to the Institute in February of this year.—I am, sir, etc.,

G. K. CHESTERTON.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—It is a pity for Mr. Chesterton that he did not write two books instead of twenty-three, and die incontinently. He would then have escaped the ire of Mr. R. Curle (who seems more annoyed by the quantity than by the quality of his output), and might have merited an essay on "Brilliance Nipped in the Bud" by the same gentleman. Mr. Chesterton's constant use of paradox, tiring as it may be to some readers, always seems to me not the brilliant fallacy of certain modern writers so much as a sustained attempt at condensation. His paradoxes are generally capable of being reasoned out between their two terms, and one can hardly fail to admit the quite remarkable saneness which may be seen through the electric effects caused by his frequent short circuits. "Orthodoxy" may be annoying to many, but at least it has more readers than would have a work in fifteen volumes entitled "Philosophia Generalis, auctore Gilbertus Chesterton"!

The source of the irritation seems to be that he is able to be dogmatic without begging the question. "He loathes oppression, but he believes in dogmatic religion; he abhors cruelty, but he loves the Middle Ages; he is a passionate advocate of freedom, but he thinks such a thing as facilities for divorce an obnoxious form of slavery," says Mr. Curle; but neither G. K. C. nor Hilaire Belloc, nor for that matter any "fanatical Catholic," would be guilty of so open and unashamed a petitio principii as the above quotation involves.—I am, sir, etc.,

THE CURSE OF USURY.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—If I may be allowed to comment on your special commissioner's second article, I would say that it is based on the mistaken notion that a pawnbroker's business is a very profitable one.

I will not repeat what I said in my last letter, but I would draw his attention to the following figures.

In 1871 the population of this country was thirty-one millions, in 1911 it was forty-five millions—an increase of nearly 50 per cent. In 1870 there were 4,010 pawnbrokers' licences in Great Britain and Ireland, and in 1912 the number was 5,356—an increase of not quite 30 per cent. (each shop has a licence).

People are only too ready to rush in to share the plunder of any business or profession in which big profits are possible; but these figures do not suggest that during the past forty-one years there has ever been a rush into the pawnbroking trade, although by law no man or woman who is able to produce evidence of good character can be refused a licence.

With regard to the scheme laid before your readers, I think your commissioner will find that in America, where it has been successful, a very different state of things prevails to that found in this country, and his scheme would not touch the real evil which does exist here at the present time.

It is not the pawnbroker, but the small moneylender who robs the poor, and the numbers of the latter are increasing in every industrial centre. Ten years ago there were only 200 registered moneylenders in Liverpool, to-day there are 942, and the increase suggests that the business is a profitable one for anybody of ruthless disposition.

The question involved is a difficult one, for if a working man prefers to borrow 12s. of a moneylender at the rate of 2s. a week, rather than take his watch to the pawnbroker and borrow the 12s. on it at the rate of 3d. a month, who is to stop him?

The moneylender's attraction is doubtless the fact that the property remains in the borrower's possession, and I am afraid on this account your commissioner's scheme would be powerless to compete with this growing evil.—I am, sir, etc., murder so long as men are unable to keep their passions under perfect control; and the same human feebleness will always lead to a certain amount of prostitution.

Mr. Whiting says, "You cannot make people moral by Act of Parliament." Why, then, have laws against murder? Because, in the first place, you can, by Act of Parliament, make people fear to be immoral. If murder were not punished, there would be more murder, and if the White Slave trader were punished more severely, there would be less White Slave traffic.

If there were no punishment for murder, most murders would be committed because the murderer would see in it a means of making his existence more comfortable. The cause of most prostitution is the low standard of wages paid to women at present. No one will deny that the extension of the franchise to the working man, and that only—for politicians are not philanthropists, and listen only to those of their constituents who have votes—has resulted in his getting higher wages; and women's wages will be increased only when they have the power of making the politician listen to their voice.

I have enough faith in the human race in general to believe that, if it is as easy to live a moral life as to live an immoral one, a moral life will always be chosen.

It is in order to give women the opportunity of living a moral life that we are anxious to see the franchise extended to women.—I am, sir, etc.,

APPRENTICESHIP AND ITS EFFECT ON UNEMPLOYMENT AND THE BIRTH-RATE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—The writer (aged seventy-four), when he was young, remembers that all boys were apprenticed to whatever trade or profession they had chosen, and received an increased wage each year, until they had completed their apprenticeship; and then they, being fully skilled workmen, received a man's full wages. The first use made of this was to have what was called "a shop warming," i.e., a treat to their fellow-workmen, and, as a rule, it was not long after when they married, they receiving full wages, and being enabled to do so. Unfortunately, during at least the past fifty years, the practice of apprenticeship has become almost obsolete, and boys have commenced their career, without being apprenticed, at a low wage. After a little while they, in most cases, seeing an opportunity of receiving more wages, mostly as an improver, leave their employment, and go to another firm. Many do this several times during their youth. The employers' competition to obtain youths with some little knowledge of their business is much to blame for this, the consequence being, through insufficient training, these men stock the labour market with unskilled labour, and thus, by the time they should have completed their apprenticeship, and become skilled workmen, they are only receiving a youth's wages, and are unable to afford marriage until much later in life, many not at all.

This has also had much to do with the present unnatural competition of women, which has naturally caused so much unemployment of men, and is also responsible for the reduced birth-rate, which, in its turn, has become such a serious matter for the nation.

Now the question arises: What is the remedy for this state of things? Many have been, and are being, suggested, but to my mind the one true remedy would be a return to the system of apprenticeship; and here is a glorious opportunity for our Labour party, if they would sink all other matters for the time being, and concentrate their minds upon promoting an Act of Parliament to the effect that all boys should in future be apprenticed. Is it not obvious that if such an Act should be passed our future generations would become skilled workmen, enabled to marry earlier, and increase the birth-rate, and consequently also reduce the competition of women? And, above all, it would lead to our dear old England becoming once more the workshop of the world, and our women once again becoming the mothers and helpmeets of future generations, thus occupying the glorious and natural position in the world which God has assigned to them.

Such an Act of Parliament, as I have foreshadowed above, would be one of the most inestimable boons ever conferred upon the country, and would be a lasting honour to whatever party would promote and get it passed into law.—I am, sir, etc., J. JOHNSON.

THE POET-LAUREATE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—You invited suggestions as to the next Poet-Laureate. Assuming that the Laureateship is a mark of homage to be offered to the greatest living poet of the British Empire, I beg your readers seriously to consider whether it ought not to be offered to Rabindranath Tagore. He is only beginning to come to his kingdom in Europe, but he is sufficiently known to many through his own translations of his poems, "Gitanjali," with an introduction by Mr. W. B. Yeats (Macmillan and Co., 4s. 6d.). To read these poems, even in the English version, is to be aware of the existence of a poet of such surpassing genius that, if our fellow-subjects in India are to be considered eligible, there can hardly be a doubt that Tagore is the one poet of our day whose claim to the distinction cannot be disputed.

As to his place in India, Mr. Yeats quotes the words of a Bengali doctor of medicine as follows:—

"We have other poets, but none that are his equal; we call this the epoch of Rabindranath Tagore. No poet seems to me as famous in Europe as he is among us. He is as great in music as in poetry, and his songs are sung from the west of India into Burmah wherever Bengali is spoken."

There are arts in which we of the West claim to lead the way; if we find that the East is surpassing us in poetry, should we not be ready to give honour where honour is due, and to acknowledge our spiritual kinship with our Indian brethren by placing Tagore in the same line of succession with our most honoured British poets?—I am, sir, etc., MARION I. GRAY.

FROM LONDON TO PARIS.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Apropos of Mr. Alexander's article in your number of June 27th, the following figures give an idea of how the S.E. and C. Railway exploit the pockets of Continental travellers. A second-class return ticket London-Bâle, via Folkestone, Boulogne, and Laon, costs £5 15s. 7d., and is available sixty days. A ticket of same class and duration Boulogne-Bâle costs F. 95.20 = £3 16s. 2d., leaving the enormous charge of £1 19s. 5d. for return journey London-Boulogne. True, one can have a 17-day ticket for this stage for £1, but for a journey of two hours by rail (second class) and one and a half hours (third class) by water, the charge is absurd.

THE SUFFRAGE QUESTION.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I am delighted with Mr. Packer's letter. Its tone conveys the impression that I have touched a sore point.

In these regions we are "young" in politics. That is why, perhaps, we have less faith in newspapers than would please your correspondent.

But we are not "young" in the sense of inexperience. The hottest fights ever known in the history of British politics were fought in these regions. Perhaps Mr. Packer has heard of the Rebecca Riots, and the wholesale evictions on this countryside before the passing of the Ballot Act—in the days of few newspapers.

Besides, even in these districts, which know something of the economics of the sailor and of the farmer, there is not wanting the necessity of women being allowed to vote. In this little town seventy-five per cent. of the male population are sailors. On a given day the number of these that would be home to vote in a Parliamentary or in a District Council election would be negligible. Even here the justice of being allowed to vote, as representing their husbands, is obvious; yet, even in the face of this, the interest taken by the womenfolk in the movement, which is led by the University woman, by the militant, and the high society woman, and which is often created by them in some ways, will add nothing to the cause.

May I still establish Mr. Packer's charge of ignorance by suggesting and maintaining that

(1) The women's movement is largely a creation of the Press, and of these three "types" which compose the most noticeable, but the most insincere, part of it.

(2) The movement, in becoming officially endorsed by a political party (as Mr. Wilkinson kindly pointed out), will have to sacrifice somewhat in principle for reasons of expediency.

(3) The suggested sex-war (which was the main point of attack in my letter, and which Mr. Packer has ingeniously passed by) is, from the point of view of common sense, nothing but "an Ariel-like fancy."

I am perhaps as broad-minded and as sympathetic a reader of women's doings in this matter as Mr. Packer, but, though "suffering from extreme youth," I do not suffer to the extent of being blind to facts, if they are rather unfortunate ones.—Wishing your splendid paper every success, I am, sir, etc.,

IRISH PROTESTANTS AND HOME RULE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—If you care to give me space, I would like to answer "Galwegian" and "A Mere Catholic Nationalist." They both chide me, curiously enough, for not giving my name. Well, I have had a friend fired at ten minutes after getting up from my table, and within half a mile of my gate; I have been summoned to appear before a League Tribunal to answer for lending a ladder to an unpopular neighbour, and I have had two labourers' cottages built against my demesne wall, in most unsuitable sites, simply to annoy me because I am a Protestant and a Unionist. There are three reasons why I will not "come into the open" to be a target for your correspondents' friends. "Galwegian" says that Home Rule is supported by the leading professional and commercial men both in Dublin and the country. I am an old man, and know both Dublin and Ireland better than most men. In Dublin, especially, I have considerable interests and more friends than I could count, and I affirm from personal knowledge that the great majority of the manufacturers, merchants, shippers, and large traders of all sorts are Unionists, that the bankers, stockbrokers, doctors, solicitors, and other professional men are also chiefly Unionists. Almost every clergyman in Ireland, except Roman Catholic ones, is a Unionist. Nine out of ten of the leisured and cultured classes (such as Mr. Hone belongs to) are Unionists.

"Galwegian" does not appear to understand what I said about "uneducated voters." I did not say that the Irish party was composed of uneducated men. I said the voters who elected them were, and so they are. As to the cost of Ireland's government, I am too old to trust statistics, and some of "Galwegian's" figures are doubtful. Is he aware that a great number of Scotch officials are assessed for income tax in London?

Whatever the cost, Home Rule will not make for economy, as even Mr. Redmond has admitted. We are now taxed by two authorities, local and imperial. All their taxes are to stand, and a third authority is to have power to impose national taxes as well. We borrow money at low interest on imperial security now, but in future we will have to borrow at high interest on our own. Pat is bleeding from two veins, but has plenty of food to keep up his strength. Dr. Home Rule proposes to open a third vein and cut off his food. Poor Pat! There is no such thing as Protestant ascendancy in Ireland, and there are certainly no government offices in which nobody but a Protestant need apply.—I am, sir, etc.,

THE CONTINENTAL SUNDAY.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Reading the discussion raised by Rev. J. Adderley's article on "The Continental Sunday," some words of George Gissing's on the subject came into my mind. They are to be found in "The Private Papers of Henry Ryecroft," and seem to me well worth pondering:—

"There was a time when it delighted me to flash my satire on the English Sunday; I could see nothing but antiquated foolishness and modern hypocrisy in this weekly pause from labour and from bustle. Now I prize it as an inestimable boon, and dread every encroachment on its restful stillness. Scoff as I might at Sabbatarianism, was I not always glad when Sunday came! The bells of London churches and chapels are not soothing to the ear; but when I remember their sound—even that of the most aggressively pharisaic conventicle, with its one dire clapper—I find it associated with a sense of repose and liberty. This day of the seven I granted to my better genius; work was put aside, and, when heaven permitted, trouble forgotten.

"When out of England I have always missed this Sunday quietude, this difference from ordinary days, which seem to affect the very atmosphere. It is not enough that people should go to church, that shops should be closed, and workyards silent; these holiday notes do not make a Sunday. Think as one may of its significance, our Day of Rest has a peculiar sanctity, felt, I imagine, in a more or less vague way even by those who wish to see the village lads at cricket, and theatres open in the town. The idea is surely as good a one as ever came to heavy-laden mortals; let one whole day in every week be removed from the common life of the world, lifted above common pleasure as above common cares. With all the abuses of fanaticism, this thought remained rich in blessings; Sunday has always brought large good to the generality, and to a chosen number has been the very life of the soul, however heretically some of them understood the words. If its ancient use perish from among us, so much the worse for our country."—

I am, sir, etc., JOHN MITCHELL.

Blackhill, June 27th, 1913.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—“Broad-mindedness,” as extolled by Mr. A. Leo. Peacock, is by no means an unmixed blessing. It is surprising that Father Adderley should take such a superficial view of the Sabbatarian question, entirely ignoring the deep, hidden forces which, if he did but perceive it, eclipse the mere question of one day's rest in seven, important though that is. Mr. Maurice L. Johnson shows much more discernment when he commiserates those who do not know what Sunday is. It is an astonishing fact that the majority of modern men and women are in that unenviable position.

Quite apart from spiritual or religious considerations, it must be obvious to everyone that there is much more benefit to be derived from the calm of a general cessation of work than from the rush and turmoil which surrounds one who takes his holiday, say, on a Tuesday. Can anything be more obviously fallacious than the remark of Mr. Peacock's friend that “if every person is guaranteed one day's rest in seven, it does not make any difference whether it be Sunday or any other day, so long as he gets it”?

The holiday-maker does not spend his vacation in the immediate neighbourhood of his place of business, unless circumstances compel him to do so. Recognising this, why not create an atmosphere of rest on one day in each week, instead of forcing our fellow-citizens to spend their one day surrounded by the clamour of the working world?

Mr. Peacock is rightly disgusted by present-day hypocrisy and self-righteousness; but I would beg him to remember that not all religion is cant, nor all “rationalism” wisdom.—I am, sir, etc.,

GEORGE D. JAMES.

Paddington, July 1st, 1913.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I am glad to see the letter of an “Ex-Tram Conductor”—in reply to the article by the Rev. James Adderley on “The Continental Sunday”—in which he says, “No day of the week can make up to a man of religious inclinations the loss of Sunday.” That statement is self-evident; but I go much further, and affirm that no day of the week can make up to the average working man the loss of Sunday. Is the man single, he wishes on his off day the company of his chums or his sweetheart; but, unfortunately, his holiday may not be theirs, and he must do without. Is the man married, and the father of children, his holiday is again not theirs. The children are at day-school, while his wife has her work to do, and thus the man must employ or amuse himself alone. Another day in exchange for Sunday is not a fair exchange to a working man, whether he is religiously inclined or not.

I have no right to force a man to lose his Sunday for my pleasure or amusement, nor has any man the right to rob me of mine.

The Rev. James Adderley says: “Would it not be much better for all parties if we agreed to drop the religious argument, and adopt the purely philanthropic one, that the ‘Sabbath was made for man’?” Is the reverend gentleman correct in taking this quotation as purely philanthropic, and not religious?

To me, a plain man, the words are religious, and altogether religious. The Sabbath was made for man because of the needs and weaknesses of man. When mankind is perfect the Sabbath will be obsolete, but not till then. Most of us require all the safeguards to spiritual culture possible, and the common Sabbath is our greatest safeguard. One has said, “The Church is a Divine institution because it is so very human.” I say the Sabbath is a Divine institution for the same good reason, and thus “the Sabbath was made for man.”

The Rev. James Adderley says he is a Protestant. I once heard a roadmender say, “I can understand a Tory, an' I can understand a Radical, but hang thae Liberal Unionists.” I cannot understand the Rev. James Adderley—does he understand himself as revealed in his article, “The Continental Sunday”?—
I am, sir, etc., ALEX. HENDERSON.

THE POSITION OF THE ENGLISH AUTHOR.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Your Cardiff correspondent, “S. H. E. L.,” seems to me to write only of questionable possibilities when he forecasts all-round benefits to literature if embryonic authors without private means will employ business as a provider of necessities and comforts, and authorship as a mere outlet for exuberance. This hybrid alternative to an artistic life of “struggle and starvation,” far from solving the author's problem, merely furnishes a choice of two evils; and whilst, materially, it is admittedly the lesser, it would not, except in the most favourable circumstances, be conducive to the advancement of Art.

I know something of business, and a little of authorship, and I cannot believe that writing which represents the remains of an energy which has been mostly dissipated in turning the treadmill of toil can be expected to add to the literature of any but a decadent day.

Writing, as I once heard Mr. Galsworthy say, is real hard work, a statement quite contrary to popular belief, and one which upholds the contention that it is not feasible as a pastime for filling the little leisure which the average business career allows of. It is not that there is no time for writing, but that there is no time for writing and thought; in which latter category I include the necessary study of technique and the classics, and the cultivation of an acquaintance with the best contemporary literature.

It is true that some businesses provide ample opportunities for observation, but there is more in literature than the jotting down of what we see.

Then, again—and this is, perhaps, the most important point of all—a business training and career, providing they be thorough enough to enable one to compete efficiently with one's contemporaries, tend to have a corrosive action upon the creative faculties, and a decomposing effect upon the artistic or poetic temperament. Business is the Land of Materialism peopled mostly by citizens of the Republic of the Illiterate. It is rare, indeed, that a traveller therefrom can hope to rent a dwelling on Parnassus!

As the number of copies of these two magazines is limited, you are strongly advised to write for them to-day to avoid being "too late."

The Gift of the Golden Touch.

Throughout the whole of the world's history there have been men and women who seem "born to succeed"—who turn everything they touch into gold.

The fact was observed by the Greeks of old, who enshrined it in the legend of Midas "of the Golden Touch." It is known to us to-day. We all know of such men. They are successful in everything they undertake. They rise, seemingly without difficulty, and even from the most subordinate positions, right to the top, where the finest opportunities are to be had, and the biggest money is to be made.

There is a scientific and practical reason for the success of these men and women. The secret of their achievements is simply that they possess to an extraordinarily developed degree certain mental qualities that "get them on."

Develops your Mental Powers.

These qualities can be developed by every reader by mental training. They exist in a more or less developed form in every brain. They are there in the brain as the seed is in the earth. In some cases they develop spontaneously, and flower and come to fruition without consciously directed effort. But in most cases these qualities have to be developed by scientific training, and in all cases they can be developed by such training, as the wonderful results reported by those who have taken the Course of the Pelman School of the Mind prove.

Here are a few of the "get-you-on" qualities developed by the Pelman System. Run your eye down this list and mark with a pencil which of them you feel require developing in your own case.

Pleasant and Simple to Follow.

The Pelman System (as the two free magazines will show you) embodies in a practical, pleasurable, and easy-to-follow form just that scientific training of the mind and memory which strengthens and develops the "Success-Winning" qualities of your mind just as Scientific Physical Training strengthens and develops your muscles.

Business men write to say how their profits have increased and their expenses diminished since practising the Pelman System.

Tradesmen, shop assistants, commercial travellers, canvassers find they are getting more orders and doing more business through their increased powers of Salesmanship since taking the Course.

Barristers, politicians, preachers, and lecturers have become better, more convincing, and more eloquent speakers through the valuable help given by these wonder-working aids to mental mastery.

Students studying for examinations find that the Pelman Course lightens their labours by endowing them with splendid powers of memory, enabling them to learn foreign languages, names, dates, figures, formulae, statistics, etc., in from one-third to one-quarter the usual time.

And from members of every calling come letters showing how this wonderful system has enabled these writers to earn larger incomes and to rise above colleagues and competitors who have never trained their minds by this wonderful Scientific Aid to Success.

This wonderful Course has now been secured for you at a reduction of almost half the usual fees.

"The opportunity," says Mr. O'Connor, "is special, not merely in its terms, but in other ways as well. . . . May the result be that we shall have contributed towards making many thousands of men and women better equipped, more efficient and more qualified for success."

To the first 1,000 readers who apply for this twelve-fold Pelman Course of Mind and Memory Training nearly one-half of the ordinary fees will be specially remitted.

Letters from ladies and gentlemen who have taken this Course are printed in the two magazines that will be sent you gratis and post free to-day. They are most remarkable. The writers show just how the Pelman Course has helped them to make more rapid progress in their respective professions, businesses, and occupations. It will help you in just the same way.

Ideal Summer Mental Hobby.

T.P.'s great offer has come at an opportune time.

Now, with the long summer evenings ahead, is just the time to practise the Pelman method, and thus qualify for a higher position and a rise of income by the autumn.

You can use these twelve aids to mental mastery and power in your spare time. The Pelman books are printed in handy pocket size. You can carry one of them about with you and study it in spare moments during the day—when riding in the tram or bus, or train—when sitting in the garden in the cool of the evening. A couple of hours a week, or a few minutes a day, spent Pelmanising your brain will bring about a marvellous increase in mental power and sheer business capacity. The improvement will gain for you a certain increase in income, and a rapid, progressive advance towards Fortune and Success.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

WE are given a realistic description of prison life in America by Mr. Frank L. Packard, in his new book, GREATER LOVE HATH NO MAN (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.). The plot is somewhat far-fetched, and this is to be regretted, as with a little pains the author could have made the sacrifice of Varge appear more feasible. The situation of the opening chapter is a striking one. Varge, the hero of the story, was adopted when a small child by Dr. Merton and his wife. The boy gave to them a wealth of devotion and affection, and in their turn they grew to lean intimately upon him, to depend on him, to need him; for Harold Merton, their son, was an unsatisfactory and somewhat dissipated person. In the middle of the night Harold comes to Varge, and tells him he has murdered his father. Thereon, on the wave of fierce emotion, Varge undertakes to accept the guilt of the crime. He will pose as the murderer of his benefactor, to save the widow from the horror of the knowledge that her husband has been killed by her son. Varge is tried, convicted, but in view of his previous record and frank confession is sentenced not to death, but to penal servitude. His life in prison is varied by feats of heroism. He is persecuted by the gaolers, adored by the convicts, and, incidentally, captures the affections of the Governor's daughter. He is a man of immense physical strength, and subject to fierce gusts of emotional stress, has difficulty to control himself when brought face to face with the brutality of the warders. In the true spirit of a hero, however, when Wenger, the chief tormentor, is set upon by a gang of prisoners, Varge comes to his rescue, and lays about him in real Viking style. The fight in the gaol is well told in vivid and picturesque language, and the initial weakness of the plot once swallowed, the story is arresting and dramatic. At the end everything comes right in the best of all possible ways. Mrs. Merton dies, and Harold, in a most helpful and considerate fashion, confesses his crime, and shoots himself. And Varge marries the Governor's daughter.

Mrs. Baillie Reynolds' latest book is a volume of short stories. The author shows evidences of haste and carelessness in construction, and THE SWASHBUCKLER (Mills and Boon, 6s.), the initial story which gives its name to the volume, is slight in plot and unredeemed by literary distinction. It is the old tale of the small State ruled over by a Princess involved in a tangle between a love match and a diplomatic marriage. We all of us know the State, and the Princess is familiar as an old friend. The tale is written in the first person, and the hero, the Swashbuckler in question, performs the whole duty of an adventurer, and marries the Princess. The best story of the series is a slight sketch called "Living Her Own Life," a clever study of a woman artist, who finds that painting pictures is not the only thing that matters.

The novel of finance grows more and more popular. Mr. Max Rittenberg knows his subject, and in SWIRL-

ING WATERS (Methuen and Co., 6s.) we are given a vivid and forceful picture of the workings of a successful company promoter, and shown the fashion in which the market is rigged in favour of the mammoth enterprises that hypnotise the imagination of the public. Clifford Matheson has been at the game for some years, and, on the whole, finds it unsatisfactory. He is a man of imagination, and is driven back on the knowledge that his financial operations do not stand for anything definite; he therefore decides to abandon finance for science, and the more successfully to cut himself adrift from Throgmorton Street, he assumes the identity of his half-brother, John Rivière, who has found complete content in his experiments conducted in a bleak hut in the wilds of Canada. Matheson's wife is an automatic person, inconceivably repellent, and we suspect that it was his desire to escape from her society quite as much as enthusiasm for research that induced Matheson to hide himself in the backwoods. He allows it to be believed that a party of 'Apaches in the slums of Paris have killed him, and quietly fades into obscurity, where he meets with a charming woman of the name of Elaine. He is sucked back into the whirlpool of finance by the machinations of Lars Larssen, a financier of a very different type. This man has conceived the idea of floating a company to open up the vast reserves of the south-west corner of Hudson Bay. This gigantic scheme requires the name of Matheson to lend it prestige, but at the last Clifford shrinks from the responsibility of inducing thousands of people to invest their savings. He will have nothing to do with it unless a prominent Government official is allowed to hold half the shares as trustee. Lars Larssen will not agree; he is determined to carry the scheme through, and finally issues the prospectus bearing Matheson's name without his consent. There follows a series of most exciting plots and counterplots leading up to a dramatic scene between Matheson's wife and Elaine. The former is anxious to get rid of her husband and marry Larssen, but her jealousy is awakened by Elaine's affection for her husband, and she decides to win him back for her own, and allies herself with Larssen for her own purposes. It would not be fair to touch upon the final chapter of this dramatic contest. We leave it to the reader to discover in what fashion Matheson finally beats down his foe. The interest does not flag, and the excitement is sustained throughout a clever and arresting book.

'A GODDESS OF STONE (Methuen and Co., 6s.) is a story of the days of smuggling, when war and rumours of war between England and France were in the air, and the French emigrés, thrust out of their native land by the tumult of the Revolution, sought in Britain a haven and a home. The novel is written in the first person, and Mr. Wright Henderson shows considerable skill in his characterisation of the small hero. For the narrator is a little boy of some seven to eight years, and the impressions made on his young mind by men and things are recorded with fidelity and wonderful understanding as to the angle at which children look at events. Tom is the son of an old English soldier, who married the daughter of a French gentleman. The boy loses his parents when he is only eight, and emerges from a quiet home in Chelsea, where his playmates "were fine ladies and grand gentlemen who had mocked at life in the Court of Versailles," to find a refuge in the house of Paul Bygrave, his father's half-brother and a person of huge physical stature and repellent disposition. The lonely little boy finds his only consolation in stolen visits to a statue of Aphrodite hidden among the trees

Knowledge is increasing so rapidly and in so many different directions that the busy man is coming to depend more and more upon a good Encyclopædia in which he can turn up all that is known upon any subject he is interested in. But it is essential, that the information given should be absolutely reliable, and that the "Illustrated Chambers's Encyclopædia" is the only work at a moderate price that really serves this purpose is obvious from the following few names, taken from a list of over 1,000 famous contributors:—

1,000 Expert Contributors.

Prince Kropotkin, Viscount Haldane, S. Baring-Gould, Sir W. M. Conway, Sidney Lee, Andrew Lang, Lord Avebury, Professor Vamberg, Sir Charles Warren, Professor A. B. W. Kennedy, Professor Saintsbury, Duke of Argyll, Watts Dunton, Goldwin Smith, Mrs. Fawcett, LL.D., Austin Dobson, Edmund Gosse, F. A. Gasquet, O.S.B., Bramwell Booth, Justin McCarthy, Sir W. F. Butler, Professor Caird, Dr. Andrew Wilson, Sir J. A. H. Murray, G. J. Holyoake, Herbert Spencer, Sir John Murray, Sir Edward Grey, K.G., Mrs. Annie Besant, Sir Clements Markham, Andrew Carnegie, Professor Cheyne.

Every subject is fully dealt with. In the case of the political and sociological matter the information here embodied is not otherwise obtainable save by consultation of hundreds of Blue Books and expensive Government publications. The articles on the Sciences—mental, moral, physical, natural, and of their various branches—are written by professors of those sciences in our great Universities.

The "Illustrated Chambers's" (Latest Edition) is a treasury of compact information and a reliable guide on subjects Literary, Political, Historical, Theological, Scientific, Musical, Artistic, Philosophical, and General. It is international in character. It consists of Ten Handsome Half-Leather Volumes, 200,000 subjects, with cross references, 8,000 pages of new, clear type, written by 1,000 contributors of world-wide distinction. There are 4,000 engravings, superbly reproduced, and 50 magnificent maps. There are also over 50 coloured plates, the finest ever produced in connection with any work of reference. Five thousand biographies of famous men and women are also included, with the histories of all the great movements with which many of them were associated.

Let the Children use It.

The boy or girl who has access to a reliable Encyclopædia and who is encouraged to use it on every possible occasion has a tremendous advantage over one not so situated. It is proverbial that the knowledge thus deliberately acquired is the knowledge that stays; and the youth who supplements the home lessons with additional readings on every subject is the well-informed man or woman who achieves distinction in later life.

Two Opinions.

LORD CURZON OF KEDLESTON writes—

"I have always regarded 'Chambers's Encyclopædia' as the most concise, scholarly and useful compendium of universal knowledge anywhere to be found within a similar compass."

HILAIRE BELLOC, Esq., writes—

"'Chambers's Encyclopædia' has been my principal book of reference for the last fifteen years. I have found it much the most accurate of such works, more trustworthy than others, and more comprehensive. . . . I have never found it to fail."

of the garden. He accepts her in the matter-of-fact fashion of a child, and to his perception she is imbued with an understanding and a sympathy for all his sufferings, and the terrible loneliness that at times engulfs him. Tom makes the discovery that his uncle is connected with the smuggling industry, and is most cruelly beaten for his curiosity. A succession of wild and terrifying events follow, and the interest is sustained as much by the fashion in which the incidents are told as by the events themselves. A fugitive Marquis in league with the smugglers kills Uncle Paul in a ghastly fashion, and the small boy has to give evidence at the trial. The literary quality of the style, the leisured fashion of the descriptive lend themselves admirably to the telling of episodes that, recounted in a more violent strain, would appear sensational and melodramatic. The book is ably constructed and well written.

THE MYSTERY OF DR. FU-MANCHU (Methuen and Co., 6s.) recalls the sensations and hair-breadth escapes recounted in "Dr. Nikola." Mr. Sax Romer, however, has a somewhat quieter style than Guy Boothby, though he has the same appreciation of the value of weird animals in creating an atmosphere of horror. To Dr. Petrie, a meek practitioner from the suburbs, there appears one Smith, a mysterious person connected with the East, and attached intimately, though secretly, to the Diplomatic service. He shows his friend a small red mark upon his arm, which he announces has been caused by the wound of a barb soaked in the venom distilled from a hymadryad, the most deadly reptile of the East. Only the most drastic methods avail to save his life; he assures his friend he is the victim of an inscrutable Oriental, one Fu-Manchu, "A yellow octopus who has fastened his tentacles upon the British race, and has vowed to exterminate them and their influence from the East." One by one Anglo-Indians are marked down, one by one all those members of the English-speaking race who have attained prominent positions in the East are to be visited with deadly and horrible vengeance. Smith is especially fearful that an official of the India Office is at that moment in imminent danger of his life, and persuades Petrie to accompany him. They are too late. The official is already dead. This time, however, the agency of the hymadryad has not been called into requisition. The instrument of vengeance is a red ant, "some six inches long, of a vivid scarlet colour, and of a truly terrifying description." Smith fights Fu-Manchu with unceasing vigilance, and the designs of the yellow octopus are finally defeated. He disappears in a cloud of smoke, leaving behind him not so much as a red ant to tell the tale. There is plenty of sensation in the book, and it provides a number of shocks and thrills.

Messrs. Burns and Oates have issued their 5s. edition of Mrs. Meynell's poetry at an apposite moment. At the time when her claims as a possible candidate for the Laureate'ship are being hotly canvassed, it is well one should realise the qualities that make her work exceptional. Her output has been exceedingly small. Her poems are comprised in one volume, which consists only of 117 pages. Perhaps no poet, with the possible exception of Gray, has established so high a repute on so slender a foundation, so far as mere quantity is concerned, and assuredly no one has lavished a greater wealth of artistry upon his work. It is nearly fifty years ago since Mrs. Meynell gave a hint of her incomparable gifts. Her technique is almost flawless; to alter a word would be, one feels, to impair the whole. Each phrase fills its appointed niche, and the whole forms a mosaic of dazzling brilliancy. Mrs. Meynell is not likely to achieve the popularity of Tennyson, or even Browning. She is in part a mystic, and mysticism appeals only to the few; but the pure delight of perfect phrasing will be found in all her poems, and the magic of words is nowhere more potent than in her verse.

Rosa Mayreder has published a survey of the woman problem (William Heinemann, 5s.). Her conclusions are somewhat muddle-headed, but her criticisms of her own sex are piquant, and at times eloquent. The author has the quality of frankness, and does not attempt to hide her opinion that women are neither so interesting nor so honest as men. "The majority of women are neither in qualities of character nor of intellect the equals of man." She states that this inequality is due largely to inferior discipline and training and the low ideal of life set before the girl. One feels that the author is really quarrelling not only with the institution of marriage but with the physical fact that marks woman as the bearer of children. But the full measure of her scorn is reserved for the woman as the gentlewoman. "In the very concept of the lady there is something that is incompatible with the concept of a free personality. Woman, considered as a gentlewoman, though apparently elevated to the supreme peak of a beautiful caste, nevertheless, considered as an individual, leads a life within very narrowly constricted limits." This sweeping generalisation is not convincing, for the author neglects to define her terms. She is amusing, if slightly vituperative, in her attacks on what she terms "the masterful man." "Their relations with women are always coloured by an element of vulgar boastfulness. However tame and feeble they may in reality be, these men love to swagger before women's eyes like stage heroes toying absurdly with the hilts of the swords which their arms would be now too weak to wield." To all those who are concerned with the present turmoil about the position of woman in the home and in the State we recommend this book. Dull in parts and confused in argument, it is valuable as showing what a woman's real opinions are on certain definite points.

BOOKS FOR THE HOLIDAYS

ROSALIND IN ARDEN

In literature, nothing has been more evident in the 20th Century than the decline of the English novel. Misguided novelists, actuated chiefly by the desire to create "a sensation," have deliberately chosen for their subjects the most nauseous of all things—sexual problems. In the midst of this turbid, demoralising atmosphere it is indeed a pleasure to find a novel which steers clear of unpalatable subjects and endeavours to treat of the pleasant side of life,—of the things which make life enduring and existence anything but a disease.

Of this latter type is

MR. MARRIOTT WATSON'S

New Novel

ROSALIND IN ARDEN.

It exhales the wholesome freshness of youth. It pulsates with the vigour of life, clean and unpolluted. It conjures up scenes of a ripe green country with the blue sky for a ceiling and nature as the unceasing orchestra. Referring to this book The Daily Chronicle says, "The charm of the book is the charm of youth and beauty at play—a charm enhanced by the grace of the author's style"; and The Athenæum, "It has indeed a touch of the sublime. . . Rosalind is a delightful creation."

THE MEDIÆVAL TOWN SERIES

Each town is treated by one who not only is conversant with its historical associations and topographical interests, but whose inner consciousness has conceived the true spirit of the place. Throughout the pages of the book one realises that the author's successful aim has been, not merely to portray a town or city recognisable only by distinguishing landmarks, but to open up to the reader a vista of scenes and incidents which, taken collectively and connectedly, blend themselves into unmistakable and inimitable individuality.

To save uncongenial labour, to make life happier and sweeter for every human being, to increase the leisure time of the overworked—these things are the objects which inventors have striven to attain. Bell, the inventor of the telephone, placed all the world on chatting terms over the wires. He showed us how to laugh at space. Edison applied electricity and enables us to brighten the darkest night. Airmen have mastered the art of flying so what is there left

WHY, OUR GARMENTS STILL WEAR OUT.

But your Hosiery need not if you will keep pace with the times, for there is now Hosiery that is Holeproof.

WHY THIS HOSIERY IS HOLEPROOF.

The explanation of the durability of "V. & H." Holeproof Hosiery is made here, so that every person can see for himself, or herself, the genuineness of it. Your own brain will show you the truth of it. This "V. & H." Holeproof Hosiery is made in a new way from a specially privately manufactured yarn. This yarn is lighter in weight and at the same time tougher and stronger than any other brand. It is so pliable that it gives to continued pressure and wear, just as a sponge may be depressed by gripping in the hand, but still have no damage done to its fabric. There is hardly any spring or elastic stretch in ordinary hose, even of the most expensive kind, and this accounts for the rapid appearance of holes and thin places. Luxuriously comfortable, simply and well-made, "V. & H." Holeproof Hosiery is a revelation to all.

Look at our "GUARANTEE" Ticket which is sent with every pair we sell

Then, if within that time a hole should appear, send them back to us at once with ticket, and we will present you with new hose without extra cost.

No such guarantee could be given with hose made in the ordinary way. But with "V. & H." Holeproof Hose you can be free from the fear of a hole suddenly showing—not only just at that point at the heel where the eyes of everyone can see, but at no part of "V. & H." Holeproof Hose will there be a hole. That we guarantee for two whole months.

The comfort and pleasure of good wearing hose to men conveys a sense of well-being and satisfaction all day long, while to business girls and busy house-wives, to whom the weekly darning is a long and tiresome task, the benefit is incalculable.

Everyone in the country will be wearing "V. & H." Holeproof Hosiery after we can get them just to TRY it once. Orders are now pouring in from the friends of those who already are wearing the new "V. & H." Holeproof Hose. The price is—

HISTORY IN THE MAKING

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

SO profoundly impressed was the King with the enthusiasm excited by his progress through Lancashire, that we learn his Majesty has determined to repeat the experiment of these Royal industrial tours twice next year, when the Black Country and the Clyde shipbuilding district will be visited. It is not unlikely that these tours, which have done so much to bring the Throne into direct relation with the people, will become a regular feature of the reign until every section of industrial England has been explored.

Bulgaria has had to pay a bitter price for her rashness in reopening war. She has been compelled to place herself, alas! unreservedly in the hands of Russia. With her army shattered and helpless, with famine and her ancient enemy the Turk again threatening, this course was inevitable, and Europe may congratulate herself that, even through these dreadful agencies, peace is at last ensured, and this last phase of the Balkan trouble at an end. The pity of it is that the Allies, who fought together so splendidly in war, could not sustain peace, and that this involved the interposition of outside elements.

By far the most important political pronouncement delivered on behalf of the Government for many a long day fell, by a curious irony, from the lips of Lord St. Ledgers, who on Tuesday night last revealed to the House of Lords the intentions of the Government in regard to Ulster and Home Rule. The course decided on is marked by considerable ingenuity. First of all, there will be no General Election till May of next year, when, under the Parliament Act, Home Rule will become law. That Act gives the Government power to postpone the actual establishment of a Parliament on College Green for twelve months, and, during those twelve months, an appeal will be made to the people for their verdict. If the Liberals are returned, then, of course, Unionists will be invited to accept the situation. If the Opposition achieve victory at the polls, they can repeal or amend the Act. The plan now revealed shows that for once, at all events, rumour is justified of her children, and, from the Government point of view, it has the crowning merit of throwing the responsibility for Ireland on the Opposition should they kill the Bill.

A question of far-reaching and profound importance is raised by the announcement that Germany has purchased for her hospitals and medical institutions every available milligram of British radium. At present there are two available sources of supply worth speaking of in the world—our own at Cornwall and the pitchblende mines held by the Austrian Government. So far as Austria goes, she prohibits absolutely the exportation of the precious stuff, which now fetches £480,000 per oz. Should we do likewise? The question arises because the result of the raid upon British radium is that British hospitals will have to wait many months before they can hope to give their patients the wonderful curative treatment now being exploited abroad. This, it will be admitted, is paradoxical to the point of absurdity.

It is not surprising that the news that Mr. William Jennings Bryan has announced his intention of going on a lecturing tour through the States should have roused the very liveliest indignation throughout the whole of America. There is something distinctly incongruous, not to say grossly undignified, in a Cabinet Minister, who is entrusted with the most serious tasks, not giving the whole of his time to his work, and even the announcement that Mr. Bryan drives his own motor-car will not, we fear, reconcile the Americans, in many respects the most punctilious people in the world, to this departure from a wholesome practice—a departure that, we believe, would be ruinous to democracy. If public men are not paid sufficient, and it seems that on both sides of the Atlantic that may be the case, let their remuneration be increased. But the State must have the best of their thought and the whole of their time!

Is it not high time that the Government took steps to place military aviation on a more secure foundation—if we may use that term in connection with a science whose practice is necessarily "in the air." It used to be said of the British army that peace was a necessary condition of its safety, but even peace, it seems, cannot ensure safety for military aeroplanists. According to Captain Faber, two officers recently killed while flying owe their death entirely to the defective make of their machines. If this be true, it is nothing short of monstrous that valuable lives should be sacrificed to inferior workmanship, and the sooner the War Office insist on a higher standard of execution the better. No one has emphasised more strongly than Colonel Cody—their own expert—the need of reform in this direction.

Yet another phase, though, alas! by no means a new one, must be added to the eternal housing question. According to the Daily Mail, the engaged couples of Halstead, a pretty little town in Essex, are faced with the quandary that, if they marry, they will be unable to get a house in the neighbourhood. Houses, it seems, are bespoke for years in advance, and men leave the district, or live single, because they cannot obtain them. 'Tis sixty years since Charles Dickens denounced this very evil, one which the nation dare not ignore. When will our statesmen deal with it?

THE MAN AND HIS WORK

I.—THE MAN WITH THE PEN * * * BY C. SHERIDAN JONES

IT is nearly twenty years since the writer of these lines was warned, very solemnly and emphatically warned, as to the sort of life he would be compelled to adopt provided he followed journalism as a profession. Hard and exacting work, unconscionable hours, inadequate rewards, succeeded only slowly by long-delayed recognition—these were the main heads of the indictment. It has proved a true bill. Of course, journalism has prizes that are unsuspected of the man in the street, and that come swiftly, and almost silently, within the grasp of some of its votaries. The late William Clarke, for instance, found his income increased by exactly £1,500 a year during the course of one week; and frequently a single article has brought the writer fame and fortune. But, on the whole, the warning of my early monitor stands good, and, after many years of endeavour in Fleet Street, I often catch myself wondering what it is that impels young men, fresh from the Varsity or the public school, to stake their all on a literary career.

I suppose that the great compelling charm which journalism still exerts over the brightest spirits, the most alert intelligences of the rising generation, is that strange sense of power which it bestows even on the very humblest of its practitioners. The consciousness of his ability to shape events, "to get things done," to make history—that is the thrill to which every journalist worth his salt responds, from the editor of a great daily down to the youngest reporter on his staff. I could give a thousand instances of how the magic of cold type has operated to alter the whole current of events. I remember—to take a very diminutive example—how, in the early days of my apprenticeship, I was asked to attend a meeting for the reclamation of some waste land in an unlovely suburb, which it was proposed should constitute a new lung for London. The "meeting" was very sparsely attended. A few women and some half-score of children formed, with policemen, the major portion of the audience. But, marvellous to relate, the report of the proceedings which followed aroused extraordinary enthusiasm in the district, and a little later the purchase of the land was effected and a new park laid out. Again, I remember a well-known M.P. telling me that the whole success of an agitation which swept England from end to end was due to a certain report of a demonstration that appeared in the Times. I could give other instances. To-day the Housing question is always with us. Its evils, its magnitude, its national importance are fully realised and widely discussed. But I question very much whether, if a certain Alfred Milner had not years ago been on the staff of the Pall Mall Gazette, its importance would be so generally admitted. It was while that nobleman was assistant editor of the Pall Mall Gazette, under the late Mr. W. T. Stead, that he inspired the celebrated series of articles, "The Bitter Cry of Outcast London," which led to the Royal Commission on the Housing of the Working Classes, and won for the subject the recognition which it now enjoys. The Pall Mall Gazette had other victories. Mr. Stead it was who, at the cost of imprisonment, scored the first enactment against the White Slave traffic; and his friend, whom he described years later as "one of the greatest preachers that London enjoys," Mr. G. R. Sims, was the man, whose unselfish and unremitting efforts for Adolph Beck, resulted in the establishment of a Court of Criminal Appeal—one of the greatest triumphs, surely, that journalism has ever achieved.

Sometimes the journalist will condescend to "make" the news that he subsequently records. There is a capital story extant in Fleet Street of a successful free lance, who, finding that things were slack, and that there was a good deal of discontent in the police force, set himself to organise a strike of the Metropolitan constables, with such success that half the Bow Street Division came out, to his great profit and delight. Another good story is told of Mr. Bart Kennedy, who, sent down as special commissioner to record the happenings in connection with the memorable strike of Grimsby fishermen, sought to interest the Mayor with his proposals for a settlement, and so successfully that the matters in dispute were adjusted. The journal he represented, however, missed some excellent copy, and the proprietors were not easily placated.

Triumphs like these belong rather to the irregulars of the profession than to the steady, tried, and disciplined officers who, day by day and week by week, arrange the form which the news of the world shall assume. Their work is by far the most exacting. They have not the stimulus, save in a secondary degree, of outside events. They miss the inspiration of direct contact with the happenings of the outside world, whose history they record through the alembic of the tape machine or the descriptive of the junior reporter. On the whole, theirs is the hardest lot which the profession affords. The work of a sub-editor on a great London morning or evening paper is so arduous and so nerve-destroying that he cannot discharge his duties satisfactorily for more than a limited number of years, when he must accept an inferior position on a paper of different status. Often he has paid a premium of several hundred pounds to learn his business, and has not infrequently served a lengthy apprenticeship to it also. But his utmost earning capacity rarely exceeds £600 per year, and even that well-rewarded period is a brief one. His case appears all the harder when we recollect that the sub-editor's range of information must be very wide. I can call to mind the dismissal of a certain "sub" on a well-known London daily for recording, on the strength of a cablegram, that a certain treaty between the U.S.A. Government and this country had been ratified. The cable showed a majority for the treaty in the U.S. Senate, but, according to the Constitution of the United States, anything short of a two-thirds majority was insufficient, and his failure to recollect this fact cost my friend his position.

Not infrequently, alas, it happens even to some of the most competent of these inside journalists that they develop into one of the tragedies which haunt Fleet Street. Walk from Temple Bar to Ludgate Circus, and you will be struck by the number of careworn faces and threadbare men whom you meet. They are men of culture and education, who have failed to sustain the severe pace which modern journalism requires. Often they have held important positions, which they have lost through no fault of their own. Perhaps it is that they have become, in course of time, pumped out, used up, "extinct volcanoes." A man may occupy a position of responsibility on a paper for many years. Then his engagement is terminated, and he finds it difficult, almost impossible, to secure other employment. His mind has been focussed along the lines of one paper, whose needs and requirements he understands perfectly. But he has become, as it were, stereotyped and he is unable to hitch on to new and different methods. He drifts and drifts, and frequently becomes one of the failures of a great profession.

It is from this class also that there are largely recruited those privateers of the Press, the penny-a-liners, men who live by duplicating many times the unconsidered trifles of the world—by reporting inquests, fires, murders, and the like. More than once has their doom been predicted. They were to have been rendered supererogatory by the better organisation of the news agencies, to have disappeared æons ago before superior talent and initiative. But, like the brook, they go on for ever. Their flimsy is still received, and some of the greatest scoops of modern journalism have been achieved by them. It was a "liner" who discovered the great Grosvenor Hotel imbroglio, which resulted in the famous cause célèbre, and another who gave the world its first intimation that the late King Edward was too ill to attend the Coronation of 1902 on the date first arranged for the ceremony.

Physique is one of the determining factors of the journalist's success. If one considers the successful war correspondents, the men who have won through and achieved distinction in the most arduous branch of a journalist's career, you will realise that muscle and soundness in wind and limb tell almost as much as brains. Archibald Forbes, Bennett Burleigh, Beatty Kingston—all these were big men, who could stand any amount of "punishment" and nervous strain, and yet come up smiling with their copy. The war correspondent is, perhaps, for this reason, the best-paid of all journalists. Mr. Bennett Burleigh has a retainer of many hundreds a year from the Daily Telegraph, and the sums earned by his predecessors in many famous campaigns were, as things go, really considerable. But, for the most part, the rewards of journalists are by no means imposing. The editor of a daily paper will receive a large salary—anything from £1,000 to £3,500 a year. These may seem big figures, but we must recollect that an editor on a great paper must maintain a certain position, and must be seen in society. So far as his subordinates are concerned, the obligation becomes less pressing. In any case, their emoluments are considerably less, although their work is often as onerous. Under the régime of modern newspaper production they get used up far quicker. Indeed, it may be said of the editor of a newspaper that the less work he does, the greater is his fitness for the position he occupies. It is his work to direct others, and to inspire them—to give the journal just that touch of individuality and distinction without which a paper, no more than a man, can succeed. He has to arrange the leaders, to define the general line of policy, to select the main features of his organ day by day. That done, he should leave the details to others whom he can trust. Of these perhaps the most important is the news editor, who, as I have said, has to give his work an amount of strained and anxious attention, and to grapple with its details, under conditions that frequently make the lengthy tenure of his office impossible.

In fact, outside the editorial staff proper, journalism is tending more and more to become a dry-as-dust profession, depending more and more upon a clerk-like exactness and precision, rather than on a vivid imagination and quick grasp of opportunities.

The war correspondent is, of course, an exception. His work remains splendidly exciting, full of brilliant opportunities and of feverish escapes. There are dozens of legends extant concerning the feats of these news-getters at the front, who still contrive to outwit the censor when the curtain is rung up on the drama of war. The best of these, I always thought, was concerning the great FitzGerald, who, during one of the bygone revolts on the part of the Balkan States against Turkey, contrived with masterly ingenuity to outwit the Sultan's orders, and to transmit to England even the secret instructions that Abdul issued to his generals. FitzGerald achieved this feat with beautiful simplicity. Sleeping at night in an Armenian convent, he would ride out at dawn to the mountains, and, placing the necessary apparatus against the telegraph poles, he would perform the feat of tapping the wires, decoding for transmission by another route the telegrams he was sending to the London Liberal Press. The most delightful feature of the "scoop" was that the Government at Constantinople never found how the Press and the enemy got the news, though the palace was searched and re-searched to find the traitor in the camp.

In strange contrast to this brilliant feat was the unfortunate failure of one of FitzGerald's confrères, who was commissioned to report the descent of an aeronaut at Hendon. The descent did not take place; but the reporter saved himself the trouble of attending the ceremony by drawing on his imagination, and, alas! the paper was very badly let down.

It is sometimes said that a journalist is a man without conscience or convictions, who is prepared to write as he is paid. No doubt it is true that, as Zangwill said, "Every question is like a sheet of paper. There are two sides, but a journalist may write only on one of them." But I venture to think that in no profession in the world do men make greater sacrifices for the sake of their convictions. Mr. E. T. Cook threw up the editorship of the Daily News owing to political differences with the proprietors. Mr. Massingham retired just about the same time from the Daily Chronicle on grounds equally honourable. Mr. Lathbury left the Guardian on what seems to many a minor point of conscience; and there are innumerable other instances as striking on record. In point of fact, it is only the hack journalist who surrenders his convictions. The supreme craftsman brings the public round to his.

Carlyle has said of the latter-day journalist that he is the equivalent of the old-time priest. Surely he is more than that! His real function is that of the people's advocate. He must exercise perpetually that eternal vigilance which is the price of liberty. Over and over again his acumen has dragged to light some crying scandal that has remained unsuspected of the people. His soul must be ever in action. While other men enjoy regular hours and settled repose, he must be prepared to work day and night to secure for others conditions he cannot win for himself. He must be prepared to listen to the grievances of all men and to be oblivious of his own; to deny himself sleep so that the engineers may win their eight hours a day; to give up his own half-holiday in order that the shop assistants may get an extra half-hour off. He must insist on the paramount importance of Trade Unionism and suffer himself to be blacklegged by every stray celebrity—music-hall artist, murderer, jockey, or what not. He must voice everybody's grievances except his own. If, as the old Romans used to say, "work is worship," then indeed the life of the journalist is suffused with religion, for, in very truth, it is consecrated to mankind.

MASTERPIECE FOR THE WEEK

THE MEDITATIONS OF MARCUS AURELIUS ANTONINUS ❦❦ By J. S. PHILLIMORE

AFTER 500 years of total oblivion, the book which has played so great a part in modern times was rediscovered and published in 1558. And as one might take the varying esteem of these "Meditations" for a clue to the religious history of the last three centuries, so one may see an initial appropriateness in their publication just before the new religion formally began in England. For the book is one of the great touchstones; tell me your opinion of Marcus Aurelius, and I can infer your opinion on a thousand other matters. Will you answer, with Renan, that it is "the most human of books"? Thanks; then I know all about you. . . . Or, with Brunetière, will you say, "It is the tone of the Superior Person in M. Aurelius which makes him unreadable"? Thanks; and let us shake hands upon it! Pax tecum, frater.

I.

If you are of those who talk about "the Individual Soul alone with God," when you mean the Individual Soul alone with a looking-glass, then you are with the Emperor Julian, and Gibbon, and Renan, and Matthew Arnold (to say nothing of the lesser rhetoricians of confusion, such as Farrar), in panegyrising Marcus Aurelius. But if your vocabulary includes the little word Prig, then these four letters will nearly express for you the essence of all that your wholesome instinct resents in M. Aurelius. And yet the case is not so simple as all that. The great repute of the book forbids us merely to say "Prig," and there's an end of it. Let us inspect this famous piece of egotism. "Egotism is not tiresome," said Froude, somewhere in that most self-revealing quasi-novel of his, "The Nemesis of Faith," or it ought not to be, if one is sincere about oneself; but it is so hard to be sincere." Marcus called his book not by the name of "Meditations," as it is commonly called, but "To Himself." Yet never was there a book which had less of the says-I-to-myself frankness about it, and so much of that quite opposite temper which says, "This is strictly private, but it would be a great pity if no one ever saw it." It is so hard to be sincere. Yes, there's the rub, as Froude said. And if sincerity fail for an instant, such a book becomes poisoned: because what is the purpose of writing it? Not historical record: Marcus is none of those who feel that every fact, even of autobiography, has a sacred beauty; nor does he write for the instruction of his successors. "It is not a treatise, but rather the diary of a soul; the daily thoughts of a religious man, jotted down just as they occurred. We may call it a spiritual commonplace book; there are quotations from his day's reading, from Plato, Antisthenes, the poets; the rest consists of reflections upon the doctrines of his school, not reasoned out, but illustrated with an infinity of epigrams and images. It is like the 'De Imitatione,' but less orderly. It is not an autobiography, such as 'The Confessions' of Augustine, or the Journals of Wesley or Fox, though it begins with a slight retrospective sketch; nor is it apologetic or controversial, like the 'Pensées' of Pascal."

II.

I quote these words from the late Dr. Bigg's admirable introduction to Mr. John Jackson's translation (Oxford, 1906), in which the reader will find the Emperor's biography neatly sketched by one who knew the history and literature of the Decline exceptionally well. It is a good method to take a list of other famous books with which the "To Himself" has been hastily and superficially or stupidly compared, and by noting some differences, to define eventually what it is, why it is famous, and why it offends. It is not like Wesley's or Fox's Journal, because each of these had the mind of a historian, with something of the genius of a picaresque novelist, and no morbid self-inversion. It is not altogether unlike the "Pensées"; but though there is an ugly side to Pascal's intense seriousness, which looks towards egoistic mania, à la Nietzsche; Pascal's scientific curiosity, as well as his profound "conviction of sin," divides him widely from Marcus. How does he differ from St. Thomas à Kempis? In this: that St. Thomas speaks with authority and conviction and responsibility, a Novice-master, as well as a mediator, chronicling his soul in retreat; and that the Catholic Church will not allow in him (or in any other contemplative, for matter of that) to forget that she is a social institution. But, above all, Marcus never writes in shame or self-reproach. It is his individualism, his conscious aloofness from the vulgar, which has made Marcus Aurelius the text-book of so many religious agnostics, a class which probably includes the large majority of educated people in this country at the present time, and which bids fair to be the eventual heir of the Protestant experiment in Northern Europe. For such minds as Renan and Matthew Arnold catch the early intimations, and herald an influence which will not take its full general effect until a generation or two later. The dignity, the gentlemanliness, the self-complacent sense of duty performed and temptation resisted were so many qualities that appealed to the Arnold mentality.

III.

When we open the book at random and light upon such things as this: "Constantly bear in mind the principles of Physics, Ethics and Dialectics, applying them, if possible, to every impression"; or this: "When sleep is hard to leave, remember that it is a law of thy being and of man's nature to act as befits a member of the community of living creatures, sleep being merely a faculty we share with the beasts of the field; and, furthermore, that whatever is in harmony with the nature of any individual is, to that individual, nearer and dearer than aught else, more suitable to him, and withal more pleasant in every way," one thinks of "Sandford and Merton," and one thanks God for having provided non-Stoical mankind with a remedy for solemn folly, in the blessed panacea of laughter. Here, as in other mystifications and self-solemnisations (such as a Maeterlinck drama), once let the sound of human laughter be heard, and the spell is broken. One of Mr. Maurice Baring's "Pages from Lost Diaries" is the best and most searching criticism of priggyishness. The very function of comedy is to save us from being hypnotised into the long-faced or the sour-faced rigidity of countenance. And yet Lucian, Marcus' contemporary, never saw this aspect of the matter. He tells a capital story, how the most notorious and impudent impostor of the age, Alexander of Abônuteichos, led the Emperor into a comical display of superstition, which ended in a disastrous defeat; but Lucian's satiric humour is never allowed to play on "divine" persons, only on old gods and suchlike; and he tells his story with regret and without a smile.

IV.

Marcus' sect accounts for much. After a struggle between Literature (represented by Fronto) and Philosophy (Epictetus, Apollonius Stoicus, Maximus Tyrius) in youth, he definitely shrank into Stoicism. Stoicism tended to kill humour; for humour, once given free play, will kill Stoicism. When Rome, with a wonderfully sudden revulsion or conversion after the civil wars, clutched desperate hold of a creed which commended itself to statesmen by its evidently preservative and antiseptic qualities, humour was dead. All the allegro disappears from Virgil's later fancy: Horace left no successors. There is something nervous, meagre, and febrile in the representative Roman Stoic men of letters—Seneca, Lucan and Persius. Not a laugh among them. Add this mood to the mind of a delicate child, nursed in the purple, flattered by a kindly but rather empty-headed tutor like Fronto, and it is little wonder if Marcus grew up to take himself, his soul, the daily and hourly temperature and symptoms of his moral health, more seriously than anything in the world. If we were to forget this, it would become impossible to read with any patience those first pages of the "To Himself": "I must be like grandpapa in this, and learn that from mamma, and remember what dear old Dr. So-and-so used to say. And what a good example, each in his own way, did all the lecturers set me, whose courses I was privileged to attend!" etc., etc.

V.

But it would be a pity to read no further, for the book has many noble and beautiful things in it. And the pathos of Marcus' personality and situation give piquancy to much that might be dismissed as the commonplaces of a professional moralist: a profession which perhaps more than any other jeopardises the soul. Remember that these are the diary-jottings of a man of peace, a man of words, a sophist, who, painfully conscious of performing a laborious duty, does in fact rule the half of the world which matters; and written in a tent, from the seat of war, at various dates in that interminable struggle with the barbarians on the Danube frontier. Remember that he was a man who, had he wished, yet could hardly close his eyes to the general ebb of Roman vitality and civilisation: when all around was going soft in decay, the Stoic could at least harden his heart. Also he was humane and enlightened, and "would not hurt a fly, unless it were a Christian fly" (as Bigg well said). You will read on for pages and pages without offence, until you meet with some phrase that flashes a light right down into the silly abysmal paradoxes of Stoicism and smells foully of the complacent self-delusion which such make-believes breed. Again I open at random: "This thing is no misfortune; but the ability to bear it with fortitude is a blessing indeed." The imperial prig might have left that for Mr. Joseph Finsbury to say. And somehow these are the notes which remain in the memory, so that the book is more irritating to recollect than to read. "A good and great man," we say as we read it; and as we think it over after reading, we add, "And he knew it."

To suffer change can be no hurt; as no benefit it is, by change to attain to being. The age and time of the world is as it were a flood and swift current, consisting of the things that are brought to pass in the world. For as soon as anything hath appeared, and is passed away, another succeeds, and that also will presently out of sight.—From "The Meditations of Marcus Aurelius."

IN DEFENCE OF THE BABU

By AN INDIAN STUDENT.

SIR,—I have read with great interest the discussion about India and the Indians, carried on by Messrs. Hyndman and Lilly, in the last three issues of your esteemed weekly. I do not presume to pass any opinion on the merits of the controversy, but please allow me, as an Indian, to say a few words in defence of the educated classes of India, and of the unspeakable Babu in particular.

Mr. Lilly does not explain what he exactly means by the "Babu class" or "Babudom," but I presume these choice expressions are meant for those Hindus of Bengal who have received an English education. If so, I am afraid Mr. Lilly attaches quite a disproportionate importance to the part played by educated Bengalees in the agitation for representative government in India. No doubt the agitation first made its appearance in Bengal, as it was bound to do; for the greater wealth and education of this province, and its long apprenticeship under British rule, gave it a start upon the other provinces of India. But the agitation is now by no means confined to Bengal alone, and if the signs of the times can be read aright, it seems probable that some other provinces will ere long leave Bengal far behind.

Coming now to the specific charges, Mr. Lilly says that educated Indians care only for their own sectional interests, and are quite blind to the interests of the toiling and voiceless millions of India, and "they have really no more right to speak for the people of India than the three tailors of Tooley Street had to speak for the people of England." No charge could be farther from the truth, and no remark wider of the mark. In the preamble to his first article—mentioning his qualifications to speak authoritatively about India—Mr. Lilly says that since leaving India he has always kept himself in touch with the current legislative, political and administrative problems of that country. Let him, then, only look through the list of the hundred odd Bills introduced by the representatives of the educated classes during the last three years in the various Legislative Councils of India, and I challenge him to point out a single one amongst them in which the interests of the educated classes have been alone considered. Does he ever read the resolutions passed by the Indian National Congress—the official organ of educated Indian opinion—in its annual gatherings? Has he heard of the Swadeshi movement, among many others of the same nature, started by the "Babu class" of Bengal at considerable sacrifice to themselves, for the express purpose of reviving home industries, and the indigenous arts and trades of India—all but killed by free foreign competition? Does he know that the two great reforms, for which the educated classes are now pressing the Indian Government, are free elementary education for the masses, and the adoption of measures for ensuring better treatment for Indian labourers in the British Colonies? It is needless to multiply these instances, their number is legion. If some of them (which is quite true) have "violently opposed" all measures introduced by the Government for the amelioration of the condition of poor agriculturists, the explanation of that is to be found in the fact that even now, after the liberal reforms of Lord Morley, Indian Legislatures are, in the words of a member of Parliament just returned from a visit to India, "miniature Houses of Lords." And if Mr. Lilly will examine the annals of the House of Lords, or of the British Conservative party, he will find that the repugnance to allow any "outside" authority to come between themselves and their tenants is not peculiar to the landlords of India. The remedy for this lies in the extension of the franchise, not in closing the doors on representative government.

Mr. Lilly's next big charge against educated Indians is that they are denationalised, have lost all faith in their old civilisation and religion; they are despised by the common people, and "viewed with the greatest disfavour" by the native Princes. The first part of this charge might have had some foundation in truth if uttered two generations ago, when the Indian character was really temporarily unsettled by its sudden contact with the science and literature of Europe. But since then a reaction has set in, and the danger now is rather of going to the other extreme. The external manifestations of this reaction against Western culture and Western civilisation are to be found in the rise of the Nationalist and Swadeshi movements, the renaissance of indigenous arts and literatures, and the attempts at founding national schools and universities where the ancient learning of India should predominate. Thus the coolness which had for a time existed between the classes who had received an English education, and the more orthodox classes of the community has already nearly passed away. But in no case would it be true to say that the educated classes ever were, or now are, despised by the ordinary people, for in no other country have the common folk a deeper respect for learning for its own sake (cf. the age-long veneration in which the Brahmins, only a small minority of whom used to be priests, have been held for their learning in India). The remark that the educated classes in India have lost all faith in their ancient religion is sufficiently disproved by the fact that not all the attempts of the Christian missionaries for one century have resulted in one convert in a thousand among educated Indians. These educated classes have also given some of their ablest administrators to the native States, and "the greatest disfavour" of the native Princes does not prevent them from employing educated Indians in ever-increasing numbers for the administration of their territories.

Mr. Lilly's next condemnation of the educated Indian is that he is unmanly. He quotes with approval the following sentences (among others) from M. Maindron: "The Babus. . . They become writers, journalists, and clerks (ronds-de-cuir), for nothing manly in the Englishman attracts them. They dread English sports, from which their effeminacy and cowardice keep them aloof, . . . etc., etc." To give only one instance, does Mr. Lilly know that only the other day a football team of this effeminate "Babu class" won the Indian Association Football Shield Competition—the highest laurels that India can bestow in the game—after defeating some half a dozen of the best European teams, civil and military, in India?

Allow me, sir, now to make a few brief remarks on the general part of Mr. Lilly's criticism of Indian conditions. His great objection to the granting of any system of representative government to India appears to be that Indians have never been used to this form of government. But have not the Indian village communities managed their own affairs from time immemorial through their own freely elected representatives—the village panchayat? Were not these communities governed according to the most up-to-date democratic conditions when the majority of the inhabitants of English manors were still serfs?

In another place Mr. Lilly says that the various classes and sections of the Indian people have absolutely nothing in common. This comes strange from a man who has known India as intimately as Mr. Lilly claims to have done. India has inherited a very old civilisation, which is the same in every part of the country, and (like its people) quite distinct from any other civilisation in the world. And in spite of great local variations of manners and customs, which in such a big country are bound to arise, anyone but a biased and superficial observer would find a deep underlying uniformity in the nature of the people throughout the length and breadth of the country.

As regards only one other of his assertions, which I have space here to discuss, viz., that Hindus and Mahommedans would fight and annihilate one another if left to themselves, unless one of these communities succeeded in mastering the other, all I can say is that it is a statement which hardly deserves rational consideration. I do not deny that some religious prejudice exists in India, as perhaps elsewhere, but we must not forget that Hindus and Mahommedans had for centuries lived peaceably together (and not always in a state of anarchy, as commonly supposed) before the advent of British rule; that the twentieth century is not the same as the seventeenth or the eighteenth, and no single community would now be strong enough to impose its will on the others. And if only the supreme Government would give up for a time its time-hallowed policy of divide et impera, the various provinces of India (gradually coming to realise their common interests) would soon be able to evolve some system of federal government under British hegemony.

Before bringing my letter to a close, I should like to point out the misleading nature of Mr. Lilly's statistics. To take two or three examples:

(1) He says, "In the whole of India there are 625,000 literates in English." As a matter of fact, their number is now over a million and a half.

(2) He says, "Only a twentieth part of the people live in towns, most of which are overgrown villages." The census of 1901 gives the urban population as one-tenth of the rural in India (all places with 10,000 or more inhabitants being classed as urban).

(3) He says "that there are 539 different languages and dialects spoken in India." The grand total given in the Census Report of 1901 is 185. But these figures give a wrong impression of the actual state of affairs. Only half a dozen languages are spoken by over 200 millions out of the total population of 294 millions (1901) in India; while a dozen account for more than 270 millions.

Similarly, there are no doubt a very large number of religions in India, but Hinduism and Mahomedanism together count 270 million followers. Of the remaining twenty-four millions, more than one-third are animists, i.e., have no religion at all. [My figures are all taken from the statistical abstract of British India, cd. 6,637.]

With many apologies for trespassing at such length on your valuable space.—I am, sir, etc.,

"CANADA TO-DAY, 1913"

THE rush to Canada still continues; but the majority of emigrants, anxious only to reach the promised land, are not able to learn the truth as to the conditions existing in the Dominion without difficulty. Their perplexities have been met by the publication of the new "Canada Annual," which has appeared each year since 1911 with increasing success. The sections covered by the volume include articles on finance, sport, farming, and conditions of labour generally. Brightly written, full of valuable hints, the volume should be read by all those interested in the colony. On application to Kingsway House, Kingsway, W.C., for 2s.; postage, 6d. extra.

BALZAC * * * BY CHARLES SAROLEA

I.

WHEN a writer dies at fifty-one, when into this brief span of life he has crowded one hundred and fifty volumes, of which at least thirty are masterpieces, when from early youth he has been spending fourteen hours a day bent over his copy and taking stimulants in order to be able to produce more copy, there cannot have been much time left for exciting external adventure. And, as a matter of fact, although there is plenty of adventure in Balzac's novels, there is little enough in the life of the novelist. It is true, on the other hand, that, whatever incident there is, is of supreme importance for the interest of his work. For there never was a great artist, unless it be Tolstoy, whose work was so entirely autobiographical. There never was a writer whose writings bore so unmistakably the imprint of his Titanic personality.

II.

Balzac entered Paris like a conqueror, as a young provincial from Touraine, the garden of France, the country of Rabelais. Similarly, most of Balzac's favourite heroes, like Rastignac and Rubempré, came from the province to seek fame and fortune in modern Babylon.

Balzac was a middle-class parvenu, a typical "bourgeois gentilhomme," who wanted to make his way into the nobility, who altered the physiognomy of his baptismal name, and, instead of plain Monsieur Balzac, called himself Monsieur Honoré de Balzac. Similarly, many of his heroes are endowed with the same high social ambitions and aspirations.

Balzac, like another famous parvenu and novelist, d'Israeli, had many affectations and mannerisms, and those mannerisms are undoubtedly reflected in his laborious style and in the often forced quality of his wit, and one involuntarily thinks of the author penning his love intrigues and his unedifying droll stories clad in the Dominican's robes.

Balzac had very difficult beginnings, and he had countless novels killed under him. He became a great novelist not by the grace divine of his native genius, but by virtue of his tremendous will power. He was like a great orator born with an impediment in his speech, or like a great composer stricken with deafness. And although those difficulties were heroically encountered, and although his overcoming them must be an inspiration to beginners for all times to come, the initial impediment in his speech remains only too apparent, and even his best work contains many parts unworthy of his genius.

Balzac was constantly involved in money difficulties and legal entanglements. All through life he dreamt of making millions, of exploiting imaginary gold mines, and almost until the end he was harassed by creditors. And the money difficulties and legal entanglements creep up in every novel. High and low finance provide the atmosphere of many a story. Half his characters are either indebted or in the clutches of usurers, or obsessed by their expectations.

Balzac was ever dreaming of marrying an heiress from the nobility, and he eventually realised his dreams. After waiting for twenty years, he secured his prize, and after a few months he died. Even so, Balzac's heroes, Rastignac, and Rubempré, and young Grandet, are pursuing the same quest, and "un beau mariage"—a fine marriage—is one of the mainsprings of the Balzacian novel.

III.

English writers, even the greatest, live in constant terror of their special public; they are in awe of the circulating library. And, like their public, they are afraid of the truth; they are afraid that it may be found too depressing; they are afraid that it may be found sordid; most of all, they are afraid that it may be found immoral. Balzac has no such ignoble terror, for he does not write for the circulating library. Indeed, although weighed down by a crushing burden of debt, he never thinks of his reader. He has a Frenchman's instinct for sincerity and intellectual integrity. His vision of truth may not be suitable for a school-girl, but he does not write for the schoolgirl. His stories may not be palatable to the weakly sentimentalist, but he does not write for the sentimentalist. He only writes for those who have an insatiable curiosity for and sympathy with suffering and struggling humanity. He only writes for those who want to be spectators and partakers of the whole "human comedy," who want to be lifted above their narrow little world, to be plunged into the whirlpool and "maelstrom" of human endeavour and human passion.

IV.

For Balzac is pre-eminently, like Shakespeare, the poet of passion, of elemental and primordial passion. And, like Shakespeare, he is the anatomist of the soul. And, like every drama of the English poet, so every novel of the Frenchman is the story of one absorbing desire, overmastering, uncontrolled, and spreading havoc and devastation because it is uncontrolled. "Cousin Pons" is the tragedy of the artist and idealist in conflict with the realities of a sordid world. "Cousine Bette" is the tragedy of lust. The "Quest of the Absolute" is the tragedy of scientific curiosity. "Eugénie Grandet" is the tragedy of avarice. "The Greatness and Decline of Cesar Birotteau" is the tragedy of bourgeois vanity. "A Bachelor's Establishment" is the tragedy of the soldier who is unfitted by his military career for the duties of civic life. "Old Goriot" is the tragedy of paternal love, and last, not least, the "Wild Ass's Skin" sums up in one striking philosophical symbol the whole tragedy of human destiny.

V.

Most great novelists have their limitations, and only give us some aspects of the moral and social world. They are London cockneys like Dickens, or Belgravians and Mayfairers like Thackeray. Or they only give us the Cathedral town like Trollope, or the Five Towns like Arnold Bennett, or the annals of the country house like Jane Austen, or the Annals of the Parish. Balzac has no such limitations. He is neither metropolitan, nor urban, nor suburban, nor rural. He is never parochial. He is ever universal. He may have his predilections; he may love to describe Napoleonic veterans ("Colonel Chabert," "Medecin de Campagne") because he is a worshipper of Napoleon, and because he himself claims to be the Napoleon of literature. He may love to describe priests because, if not in the practice of his life, at least in theory, he is a good Catholic, and because, like every good Frenchman, he has a horror of sect and schism. But he is restricted to no class. If his types of the soldier and priest are admirable, his peasants and bourgeois are equally strong, or his artists and politicians, or his costermongers or prostitutes, or his lawyers and money-lenders. Myriads of characters move in the vast world of the "Human Comedy," whether the part they play be insignificant or important; whether they belong to high life or low life, they are described with the same zest, with the same loving minuteness of the craftsman.

VI.

There is one striking peculiarity and contradiction in Balzac's art: whilst his horizon is infinite, his canvas is generally small. He almost invariably prefers the Dutch manner to the largeness and amplitude of the Italian masters. Condensation of matter is one of his most constant characteristics. Few of his novels have more than 400 pages, and again and again the tragedy is condensed into thirty or forty pages. And the quantity is often in inverse ratio to the quality. Even Balzac has done nothing greater than the "Maranas" or "Colonel Chabert," or the "Commission in Lunacy"—unless it be the "Curé de Tours." I remember Maeterlinck telling me one day that he considers that little masterpiece the supreme achievement of the novelist, and I feel very much disposed to agree with him. In the good old days of the 31s. 6d. novel, English writers, for commercial reasons, were compelled to thin out and to spin out their story, and to solve the difficult problem of expanding one volume into three. Balzac, on the contrary, is generally more inclined to crowd three novels into one. "Old Goriot" is an excellent illustration of the tendency. In this one masterpiece there is material for four novels. First there is a detective story in the adventures of Vautrin—the original of "Jean Valjean." Secondly, there is a romantic autobiography in the rise of M. de Rastignac. Thirdly, there is a society novel and a "Vanity Fair" in the intrigues of Madame de Beauseant and the Baronne de Nucongen, and, finally, there is the King Lear tragedy of the old Goriot deserted by the daughter to whom he has sacrificed everything.

VII.

I admit that this instinct for condensation often leads to overcrowding, makes what Henry James has called Balzac's novels, "very difficult reading." A study of the French master requires strenuous discipline, and is in itself an education. Even as the reader of the silly and flimsy circulating library novel has his taste spoiled for the great Frenchman, so conversely the habitual reading of Balzac spoils one for the circulating library.

But in many of his novels Balzac has avoided the danger of overcrowding the canvas, and, instead of following the diverse fortunes of several characters, concentrates on one single subject. This applies, of course, to all his short stories, but even some of his greater novels are nothing but the isolated study of a single French family represented by three or four characters. In this connection no critic seems to have noticed that "Eugénie Grandet," the "Quest of the Absolute," the "Greatness and Decline of Cesar Birotteau," are all cast in the same mould, and that they are all equally classical in their strict observance of the unities, in their severe restraint. Those three domestic dramas in their structure and composition present striking analogies with the domestic comedies of Molière. Even as in "L'Avare," in "Les Femmes Savants," in "Le Malade Imaginaire," we are presented with the comic picture of the typical French home, so we are given here a tragic picture. And in each comedy and in each novel the analogy extends even to the presence of the inevitable and irrepressible domestic servant.

VIII.

It is interesting to note that in the case of the three masterpieces just mentioned, it is the woman who is the nobler character. Ruskin tells us in his "Sesame and Lilies" that in Shakespeare's tragedies it is almost invariably the woman who has to suffer for or to atone for the guilt or the selfishness or the stupidity of the man. What Ruskin says of Shakespeare may be as fitly applied to Balzac. And this is one further point of resemblance between the two great poets. An implacable realist, Balzac is ever prone to idealise womanhood.

And this brings us to one of the most disputed controversies in connection with the "Human Comedy." Balzac has again and again been accused of pandering to the lower instincts, and of taking a debased view of human nature. It is the exact reverse which is the truth. The ruffians and scoundrels no doubt abound. But no other poet has created more admirable and more diverse types of human virtue and human heroism. No other writer has higher ideals, although he seldom obtrudes those ideals, although he seldom becomes didactic, except in the "Country Doctor" or the "Village Priest." Those who accuse Balzac of immorality or of pessimism or of cynicism have read him to very little purpose. He is too magnanimous not to believe in human nature. He is too full of exuberant vitality to be a pessimist, and not to believe in life and in the joy of life. And he is too much of the poet and of the artist not to believe in beauty, not to feel the artist's instinct of transfiguring and idealising reality. It is for that very reason that Balzac will always appeal to those readers who, in a literary masterpiece, above all, seek a vision of beauty and a source of energy and an inspiration for a fuller and nobler life.

TO THE NOT INCONSTANT MOON

"O swear not by the moon, the inconstant moon."—Shakespeare.

QUEEN of the silver diadem impearled

Before whose throne within the sapphire hall

Grim spectres of the night are held in thrall,

That else would haunt the vigils of the world,

'Alway thou viewest in the darkness whirled

Round Heaven's axle stars and planets all,

And yet thy peace, inviolate, mystical,

Is as a banner o'er the void unfurled.

Disconsolate we wend our timorous way

Here in the gloom, seeing no certain light;

For us is neither peace nor dower of might.

O moon, whence is thy confidence, O say,

Canst thou beyond the utmost bound of night

Descry the dawning of diviner day?

THE WORKS OF FRANCIS THOMPSON*

By E. HERMANN

I.

"HE never bowed his noble head but in adoration." At first sight this seems grotesquely untrue of the battered singer who sat long years with want and remorse. On a deeper view it becomes the very epitome of Francis Thompson's soul. Inured to destitution and despair, he remained free alike from bitterness and from ignoble surrender, and emerged out of hell unestranged from his fellows, and in humble intimacy with his God. One who had seen him, wild-eyed, pallid, bedraggled, racked with the fierce reaction of laudanum, and all but lost, and who had rashly classed him with haggard eroticists like Ernest Dowson, said afterwards, on reading the poems, "But Francis Thompson never wrote these, . . . these songs were written by a priest, and by what a priest!" He had hit the nail on the head. Francis Thompson wrote in a priestly fashion, not only in virtue of his rare liturgical sense—a quality which is never more apparent than when he is contrasted with Crashaw, the poet he is considered most closely to resemble—but far more in virtue of a spiritual grace. True, he is clothed with pomp and steeped in liturgical splendour. His verse moves in solemn procession, with waving banners and multi-coloured vestments. It is heavy with incense, and studded with lights, oppressively hieratic at times, as with the stiffness of opulent embroidery on cloth of gold. But it is not in these that his priestly quality resides. It is rather in a soul that in the deepest humility of its bitter penitence knew itself a custodian and interpreter of eternal mysteries, and saw with sacramental eyes, regarding not the embroidery of the veil, but the glory of the veiled One.

II.

With the Definitive Edition of his works before us, we can trace this priestly quality on an ample scale. Three fine volumes, two giving the best of his poetry, and one containing his fragmentary prose, beginning with his famous essay on Shelley, place the naked soul of the singer in our hands. A hundred observations and suggestions come to the mind as one reads. Here is the influence of Milton—never since Milton, surely, has verse worn so regal a vesture. Here Shakespeare has left his mark; there the delicate latinity suggests Lord de Tabley; yonder, the smallness and sweetness of spiritual suggestion recalls Henry Vaughan, and here is the unmistakable influence of Donne. Again one is captured by his wonderful poems on children, so poignant in their humility and wistfulness, so radiantly beautiful in their perfect artistry. "The Hound of Heaven" once more grips the imagination. There are finer things than it in his lesser-known work, yet where else can we find so thrilling and contagious an atmosphere of sheer relentless speed? And the opening lines are certainly among the rarest and strongest that even Thompson ever penned. Then, turning the pages to find old favourites, we steep ourselves in the matchless delicacy of his Sister Songs—no other poet surely has written with such stainless grace of women, of young girls. In spite of our knowledge of the dark strands that crossed his web of life, we find ourselves asserting that such mingled majesty and loveliness could only come of quiet, dignified days, beautifully lived under wide skies and amid noble horizons. Then some such autobiographical fragment as this recalls us to the hard facts:—

"Forlorn and faint and stark,
I had endured through watches of the dark
The abashless inquisition of each star;
Yea, was the outcast mark
Of all those heavenly passers' scrutiny;
Stood bound and helplessly
For Time to shoot his barbèd minutes at me;
Suffered the trampling hoof of every hour
In night's slow-wheeled car;
Until the tardy dawn dragged me at length
From under those dread wheels; and, bled of strength,
I waited the inevitable last.
Then there came past
A child; like thee, a spring-flower; but a flower
Fallen from the budded coronal of Spring,
And through the city-streets blown withering.
She passed—O brave, sad, loveliest, tender thing!—
And of her own scant pittance did she give,
That I might eat and live:
Then fled, a swift and trackless fugitive."

III.

There is enough in Francis Thompson's work to mar the perfection of his art, and the force of his spiritual suggestion. Often his latinity degenerates into mannerism; more often it becomes stiff and hard. Now and again self-consciousness lays its deadly hand upon inspiration. At times a churning sea of metaphor obscures the picture, and of much that he wrote it must be said that it lacks the charm and cadence of song, lacks even that rough and highly-syncopated charm of rhythm which makes some of Browning's least melodious verse interesting, and even delightful in its own tart way. But looking over it all, one is tempted to wonder what his generation was about to miss the glory of so authentic a genius, and that at a time when the poet's voice was silent in the land. "Blessed is the people that knows its prophets before they die." Yet Thompson was not left without the praise of those whose praise was worth the having. On his coffin lay roses from Meredith's garden, with the testimony of the aged Titan, "A true poet, one of the small band." And during his life-time he had the joy of being hailed by such sure judges as the Meynells as a singer of rare and haunting power. Coventry Patmore heaped praise upon his work in the Fortnightly, H. D. Traill in the Nineteenth Century, and Mr. J. L. Garvin in the Newcastle Daily Chronicle, while Arthur Symonds followed suit in the Saturday Review with a much-quoted critique. "Other poets," he said, "have had deeper things to say, and a more flawless beauty; others have put more heart into their song; but no one has been a torch waved with so fitful a splendour over the gulfs of our darkness." A torch!—the figure clings. Not even Blake could cast so revealing a light upon the things of earth. To see a solid garden pumpkin transformed by one magic flash of fairy light into a coach of gold and glass is a delectation which awaits the reader of Francis Thompson's verse. Here he can hold infinity in the palm of his hand, and swing the earth a trinket at his wrist. Sometimes he will be beaten with a flaming scourge that drives the imagination along till it all but fails, at others he will be held in a breathless stillness, in which he will see the eternal reflected in the pools of time. Some critics would have us believe that Thompson, like so many second-rate mystics, was vague and blank rather than deep, and that he cast his curiously wrought imagery before the feet of a thoughtless clique, as a child casts flower-petals. Nothing could be farther from the mark. He is often laboured, hyper-subtle, and, it must be admitted, tedious. Vague and irresponsible he is never. On the contrary, his very faults spring from an over-scrupulous precision. Forging ahead with all the driving force of a fiery spiritual energy, he is restrained by the very same energy which will not brook anything purposeless or impertinent in its shining way.

IV.

But it is to the priestly character of Thompson's poetry that one is ever tempted to revert. To not a few minds the word suggests arrogance, self-consciousness, and a mind caught in the gin of mechanical routine, and dwarfed by ignoble limitations. But Francis Thompson's priestliness was of the original and authentic type—the priestliness of a dedicated soul bowed in glad and humble awe before eternal mysteries, and utterly absorbed in adoration and vision. Without some hint of such priestliness there can be no true poetry, but Thompson had it in that high and explicit sense which gives him a unique place among priestly singers. It is the soul and charm of his song. It saved him alike from hardness and from sentimentalism. It kept his ornate ecclesiasticism from degenerating into pious millinery, and made it a fit garment for the King's Daughter who is all fair within. One cannot leave this central aspect of Thompson's work without illustrating it from two examples, which unite an unchallengeable beauty of form with an interior radiancy of spiritual grace. The first is taken from his panoplied ode to the Setting Sun:—

"No rift disturbs the heavy shade and chill, Save one, where the charred firmament lets through
The scorching dazzle of Heaven; 'gainst which the hill,
Out-flattened sombrelly,
Stands black as life against eternity.
Against eternity?
A rifting light in me
Burns through the leaden broodings of the mind:
O blessed Sun, thy state
Uprisen or derogate,
Dafts me with no more doubt; I seek and find.
If with exultant tread
Thou foot the Eastern sea,
Or like a golden bee
Sting the West to angry red,
Thou dost image, thou dost follow
That King-Maker of Creation
Who, ere Hellas hailed Apollo,
Gave thee, angel-god, thy station;
Thou art of Him a type memorial.
Like Him thou hang'st in dreadful pomp of blood
Upon the Western rood;
And His stained brow did veil like thine to night,
Yet lift once more Its light,
And, risen, again departed from our ball,
But when It set on earth arose in Heaven.
Thus hath He unto death His beauty given:

And so of all which form inheriteth
The fall doth pass the rise in worth;
For birth hath in itself the germ of death,
But death hath in itself the germ of birth."

V.

The second is taken from the "Assumpta Maria," a poem which stands by itself: there is nothing quite like it in all our literature:—

"I am Daniel's mystic Mountain,
Whence the mighty stone was rolled;
I am the four Rivers' fountain,
Watering Paradise of old;
Cloud down-raining the Just One am,
Danae of the Shower of Gold;
I the Hostel of the Sun am;
He the Lamb, and I the Fold.
He the Anteros and Eros,
I the body, He the Cross;
He is fast to me, Ischyros
Agios Athanatos.

* * * *

Who is She, in candid vesture,
Rushing up from out the brine?
Treading with resilient gesture
Air, and with that Cup divine?
She in us and we in her are,
Beating Godward: all that pine,
Lo, a wonder and a terror!
The Sun hath blushed the Sea to Wine.
He the Anteros and Eros,
She the Bride and Spirit; for Now the days of promise near us,
And the Sea shall be no more.

Open wide thy gates, O Virgin,
That the King may enter thee!
At all gates the clangours gurge in,
God's paludament lightens, see!
Camp of Angels! Well we even
Of this thing may doubtful be,—
If thou art assumed to Heaven,
Or is Heaven assumed to thee!
Consummatum. Christ the promised,
Thy maiden realm is won, O Strong!
Since to such sweet kingdom comest,
Remember me, poor Thief of Song!

Caudent fails the stars along:—
Mortals that behold a woman
Rising 'twixt the Moon and Sun:
Who am I the heavens assume? an
All am I, and I am one."

VI.

In his little essay on Richard Crashaw, Francis Thompson has all unconsciously written a sober and not any too generous estimate of his own Muse.

"He is fraught with suggestion—infinite suggestion. More than one poet has drawn much from him, yet much remains to be drawn. But it is not only for poets he exists. Those who read for enjoyment can find in him abundant delight, if they will be content (as they are content with Wordsworth) to grope through his plenteous infelicity. He is no poet of the human and household emotions; he has not pathos, or warm love, or any of the qualities which come home to the natural kindly race of men. But how fecund is his brilliant imagery, rapturous ethereality! He has at his best an extraordinary cunning of diction, cleaving like gold-leaf to its object. In some of his poems it is the feat of an amazing gymnast in words rather than of an unpremeditating angel. Yet . . . there are numerous other examples in which the miracle seems as unconscious as admirable."

August, lucent inviolate, born of a soul that had the stars for its food, wrought in a mind as stainless as it was sincere, Francis Thompson's work speaks to men of the things that belong to their peace in a voice that strikes a new chord in English literature.

GOLDEN SYRUP

As a small child I sat on the nursemaid's knee at bedtime and contemplated my supper of arrowroot. I had had my bath; I was warm and comfortable; I liked the feeling of my nightgown and the smell of damp towels drying on the guard.

The nursemaid tied on my feeder over my flannel nightgown. "Be a good child," it said in red cross-stitch. With assumed interest I drew the nursemaid's attention to some of the more familiar letters. She put me through my alphabetical paces, and interpreted the motto for me. The diversion was short. She became aware of the cooling arrowroot, and dipped her spoon. The spoon broke through the surface skin, and showed the liquid stuff beneath, steaming hot. Then it was at my lips.

"Sup them up," said the nursemaid, who was Scotch. I swallowed obediently. The thing had to be gone through with.

But soon I saw the hopelessness of the undertaking. It was not like eating cornflour or even porridge. In these firmer foods you could measure your progress; you made a clearly defined bay, which grew with each successive spoonful until you came triumphant, if replete, to the other side—exactly like the children of Israel crossing the Red Sea in my Bible-book. It was impossible to make any such impression on arrowroot. For every spoonful swallowed there flowed in a fresh rush of thick white stuff from every side. A constant level was maintained. It became very disheartening.

"Be a good child," she said.

She had recently told me what would be my fate if I were a bad child. I sat up.

"If I don't, shall I go to hell?" I asked. She said she expected so.

Unutterable boredom and nausea had seized me. Soon the fires of hell seemed preferable to another spoonful of that pale glue. Tears rolled down my cheeks, and in a desperate moment I spat out what I could. The devil did not instantly appear, so it is to the nursemaid's undying credit that she did not appeal to Nana. Instead, she fetched from the cupboard a clear glass jar of golden syrup, and, when she had dipped a spoonful, she traced upon the surface of that loathsome arrowroot a glittering golden pattern. Soon I saw, even through the distortion of my tears, that here was no common, unmeaning wriggle, but the outline of some great four-legged thing.

"That's a dromedary," said the nursemaid. And so it was. He had a long, long neck, and a hump upon his back, and a little tail, and long, thin legs, and he was racing over the white desert of my arrowroot—a wondrous, golden beast.

"Now," said the nursemaid, "we will eat this dromedary." I had never eaten a common camel before, still less a dromedary, and the idea filled me with excitement. First I ate his long, thin legs, and then his thread-like tail, and then his golden body with its hump, and last of all I ate his long, long neck, and then his proud head with its great golden eye. Spoonful by spoonful. He tasted very good. And then I saw, to my amazement, that all the arrowroot was finished as well, and I needn't go to hell to-night.

The nursemaid wiped my mouth with the feeder, and kissed me. "To-morrow night," she said, "you shall eat an elephant. Now say grace."

I folded my hands; they stuck together by reason of the syrup on them. "Thank God for my good dromedary. Amen."

IN BOHEMIA

MR. EDWIN PUGH, the chronicler of "Harry the Cockney," takes us to Bohemia in London in his latest novel "Punch and Judy" (Chapman and Hall, 6s.). The scene of the story is laid in Soho, and those delightful little restaurants instinct with camaraderie are vividly brought before the reader. The action takes place in a wonderful lodging house attached to a French café near Old Compton Street. Monsieur and Madame Poussier are the proprietors, and their lodgers and their clients are amazing and delightful people. Gourowski, the Anarchist with the leonine head, stalks in and out the drama with the unexpectedness and dramatic effect of the ghost in "Hamlet." There one meets the broken-down actor, Holy Jo, who interlards his conversation with inapposite quotations from the Scriptures. There, also, in the garrets, we meet the overworked seamstress, the mother of a family that ebbs and flows in a tragic rhythm—the birth of one child being balanced with the funeral of another. Moll, the Roman, of resurgent femininity, flames out in the bizarre colours of the oldest and most terrible profession of the world. Against this background of motley hues move the twins that give the title to the story. Punch, a small, elf-like character, with a passionate capacity for tragic emotions, and his deep-laid plot for the removal of the latest edition to the family of the seamstress is the deus ex machina of the piece. He it is who brings Una, the artist's model, to the notice of the hero, Crispin Pix. The latter is a young composer in search of the masterpiece that shall make him immortal. He leaves his comfortable and conventional home with his sister, and sets out on the sea of adventure that brings him to port with Madame Poussier.

Una is a delightful creation. With all the witchery of young April she flits in on the habitués of the café, who, without question, admit her supremacy and wonder at her freshness. Crispin goes down before her charms, intensified by the drab surroundings of Soho. "He was thoroughly aware of bright mocking eyes and slightly crooked brows shaded by the broad brim of a sort of silver helmet, trimmed with white feathers that she wore poised jauntily on her head; of a wilful mouth revealing strong white teeth between full ripe lips like snow in the heart of a scarlet flower . . . she wore clothes of the colour of very young foliage; Crispin was reminded of cool green rushes sheathing a pale pink flower, her face. Her whole person seemed to him veiled in a soft, warm, glamorous aura of mystery." Crispin surrenders to the witchery of the girl like snow before the morning sun. But, and herein comes the art of the author, the girl's freshness, the very genuineness of her beauty, seems to wither when tried by the fatal standard of conventionalised conduct. Crispin's married sister comes to Soho, and at the chill of her personality, instinct with the rigour of a small country parsonage, the artist's model feels her heart grow faint. From the moment of the advent of Mrs. Phlox one hears the knell of romance. Una feels she cannot survive the Phlox influence, and finally severs her relationship with Crispin to marry Olly Ullys, a clever young artist who has worshipped her for years. Mr. Pugh shows genius in naming his characters. One visualises Crispin's sister at the name of Phlox as the exact type of woman to regard life from the feather-bed point of view. And, at the end, Una is the character that remains indelibly imprinted on the mind. She is a vivid and a virile creation, and Mr. Pugh's many admirers will not fail to surrender to her charms. Full of swift humour and dramatic power, it is a book forceful and pathetic.

LITERARY NOTES

It is a long time since we saw so altogether delightful a booklet as the souvenir of the recent George Borrow celebration at Norwich. From the cover, with A. J. Munning's virile design of George Borrow and Petuengro overlooking the city of Norwich—a happy conception in the true Borrowian spirit—to the concluding "Lines on a Flower from Borrow's Grave," it is an excellent example of what such things should be. The illustrations—several of them reproductions of etchings mounted on grey paper—are admirably done, and full of charm and interest. The cancelled corners of Borrow's house specially take one's fancy—by some strange freak of suggestions these cramped interiors are redolent of the man of wide open spaces and wind-rocked nights. The letterpress is worthy of the illustrations, and the print and general get up beyond reproach. Both the Celebration Committee and the publishers, Messrs. Jarrold and Sons, are to be congratulated on this attractive little achievement.

One of the few events of the slack season is the publication of Mr. W. S. Lilly's book, "The New France," a study in religious and social history from the Roman Catholic point of view. Mr. Lilly contends that the French Revolution struck at the very basis of civil society in its daring attempt to recreate a nation and so produced a new France. One of the most immediate results of this transformation was an entire divorce between the spiritual ideal or ideals of the Roman Church and the political ideals of the Revolution. By studying the changes of sentiment thus evoked we are able, Mr. Lilly believes, to seize the only true significance of some of the most representative figures in the history of modern France, and to appreciate the moral and intellectual values of the Third Republic. In this book he makes an exhaustive analysis of the Revolution in its relation to the Faith, and his personal studies of men like Fouché, Talleyrand, Chateaubriand, and M. Paul Bourget form not the least attractive part of the volume.

Mr. A. G. Gardiner, the versatile editor of the Daily News, has attained a well-deserved reputation as a writer of character sketches. He may, indeed, be called a master of that popular but difficult genre, and his "Man of the Week" has made the Saturday issue of the Daily News a thing to be looked forward to. Some years ago his volume of sketches, "Prophets, Priests, and Kings," had a most favourable reception, and ran out of print very quickly. Mr. Gardiner has now prepared a second volume of selected sketches, to be published in October by Messrs. Nisbet, under the title of "Pillars of Society." The book will be profusely illustrated.

Most "revivals" are no more than mechanical re-ristinations. Among the few vital movements of this class is the revival of the old-time broadside, as inaugurated by Mr. Jack B. Yeats. These broadsides, which are now entering upon the sixth year of their life, are printed and coloured by hand in a little four-roomed cottage near Dundrum, co. Dublin, where many beautiful little books are also printed, Mr. Yeats' sister, Elizabeth C. Yeats, being in charge of the hand press. The broadsides, with their delightful suggestion of "a penny plain and twopence coloured" (only their price is 1s. each, and they are fully worth it), have the genuine, racy, rollicking flavour of the old-time article with the added grace of delicate printing and characteristic draughtsmanship.

THE REAL CANADA

By G. C. THOMSON

(Concluded.)

I.

NEWSPAPERS and tramcars are items in which our new world cannot stand comparison against the old. The tramcars are, indeed, well designed and well appointed, but their stopping-places (I speak of Winnipeg especially) are provokingly numerous. The conductor has an absurd and out-of-date box for fares, and there is no limit to the passengers allowed on the cars. It is no uncommon thing to find your evening car packed with every being for whom there is an inch of standing room, and other passengers elinging like flies to perilous footholds outside. As to newspapers, one cannot grumble at the price. You pay 2½d. for a single paper in the morning, but you can contract for it for a shilling a month. At night you get three papers for your 2½d., and on Saturday night your bundle of three is large enough to fill a golf bag. It is not in quantity that the lack is. It is certainly not in ability. But the Yankee journalism has gripped Canadian papers. With a few creditable exceptions they are sensational, inaccurate, and violently partisan. They certainly encourage the belief that no Canadian credits the cleanness of his political opponent—a belief which one fears to be widespread. Certainly there are too many examples of politicians entering public life poor and emerging rich; and the system of "to the victims the spoils" is still carried on, to the detriment of the Civil Service. Postmaster-ships, for instance, are political rewards, and the party uppermost sees that room is made for its own supporters on every stateable excuse. The present Prime Minister seems to be trying to improve matters, but that he is not wholly successful may be seen in the recent case, in which an ominous notice from Ottawa was served on a certain Nova Scotia postmaster whose job was desired by some Government nominee. Active interference in the late General Election was the assigned cause of the official displeasure. The only difficulty in making this good was the discovery of the unfortunate fact that the suspected postmaster had died four years before the election occurred! In the Civil Service there are many men highly competent and highly scrupulous, but in general an applicant does not need to prove his competency if he can prove his party services; and he does not need to show his scrupulousness if he can influence votes.

II.

It is not good to be unwell in Canada. Hospitals exist in all important towns, but the sick man is not the free guest that he is in Britain. He must pay sweetly for his accommodation (two guineas a week is almost a minimum), and operations are far too dear for the poor man. Yet these payments do not cover expenses, and the liberality with which Canadians, however humble, contribute on "Tag Days" to their hospitals is a revelation to the Englishman. It is a matter for reflection that the hospitals might well be smaller did the Canadian take more trouble about expectoration, public sanitation, and infectious diseases. The freedom with which infected patients gad about in public turns many a doctor's hair grey.

From hospitals to hospitality is not a long step. And here one must praise Canadians with caution. I suppose it is due in large measure to the marvellously mobile nature of the incoming population, and in some measure to the Canadian's shyness and unwillingness to be the subject of "foreign" comment, but he does not, in the Western cities at least, readily make the stranger welcome to his home. Britons coming out will quickly make congenial friends with Britons; but in the towns they will take long to gather a circle of Canadian friends. I know a gifted Scots solicitor who was a graduate of two home universities, a witty man and a companionable. He was a valued assistant in a great Winnipeg law office, where there were nine partners. In five years' time this educated gentleman had never once been invited to the home of any one of these partners. A dozen law men can be produced to swear that this case is not exceptional.

Perhaps our Scots friend deterred Canadian hospitality by his national humour. Humour is a faculty in which the Western Dominion is as destitute as it is of art. And along with this lack goes the corresponding lack of any sense of proportion. The Yankee spirit of "blow" has got its hold, and the true Canadian sees his own institutions through rose-coloured magnifying glasses. Winnipeg I regard as a really great city, a cause for the most legitimate pride among Winnipeggers. But the Winnipegger is not satisfied with this. He regards his city as larger than London, more beautiful than Paris, and more enterprising than New York.

III.

The child problem is acute in Canada. Not that the child is mischievous; he can teach many a lesson in that to his islander cousin. But he is spoilt from A to Z. He is often the most engaging of little fellows, affectionate, polite, and thoughtful—in his own way. Besides, he is not petty; he is not quarrelsome; and he is uncommonly kind to animals. There is, however, no real sense of discipline. The child grows old far too soon. To see children standing in tramcars is not common: they generally find a space for themselves. To see adults standing and children sitting is quite common. What the Canadian calls "cuteness" the English mother would call "impertinence." "Stop that, you beast," said a middle-class infant to his grandmamma, who was fondling him; and the mother, turning proudly to her guests, exclaimed, "Ain't he cute?" A friend of mine, walking with a Canadian, was run into by the sleigh of a careless little girl. The child, when she recovered from her surprise, trotted back and stammered, "I'm sorry." Whereupon the Canadian contemptuously remarked, "Bet that's an English kid. A Canadian would have been too cute to come back and apologise." I don't know whether it was a Yankee or a Canadian boy who, when reproved for some fault, remonstrated, "D—n it, mother, I'm only four"; but it would quite well suit the Canadian hopeful.

IV.

One would like to add a paragraph or two on Canadian grammar and slang; the exploitations of the public menace whom we call the "real estate artist," "society" receptions, and the fashions in dress. But each could modestly claim a page. Extravagance is one of the keynotes of Western life, except in contributions to churches, where the economy is irreproachable. But if the Church doesn't get the money, the jeweller does. It goes in gaudy tie-pins for men, and expensive "sunbursts" (i.e., diamond brooches) for women. Gold is easily made, and so high is the standard of comfort that it melts easily away. It is only in the East that one pays 2½d. for a shoe-shine. In Winnipeg the price is always 5d., and in my Western city it is 7½d. a time! Yet the blacks are kept busy. Cigars costing 5d. each are smoked regularly by porters and draymen, bank clerks and shop assistants. Motors are run by the most ordinary of people. The theatres, however hopeless the play, are always crowded; admission into a mere picture house is often difficult to get; and the man who treats a girl to a "show" (every entertainment is a "show") must spend his money freely on "candies," ices, and perhaps a supper afterwards. The woman is usually culpable. In Western Canada she avoids Coventry Patmore's rebuke. She does not cheapen Paradise. A young Englishman, whose income squares badly with his social training, told me of a dance to which he had taken a Winnipeg girl. Between tickets, supper, taxi-cabs, flowers, and candies, his expenses were eighteen dollars (£3 13s. 8d.)—his whole income for three weeks, and he considered it was all necessary. He is, in general, a strictly economical man. Here he became an example of the adaptable Englishman.

V.

On this adaptability question I often admire the Englishman and wax indignant with my fellow-Scot. The Colonial Scot so quickly forgets his national habits, and so gaily adopts those of his new atmosphere. He doesn't select; that is my grievance against him; he takes the whole concern, bad and good—sometimes even the accent. So, before he has been a month in Canada he starts chewing; he shaves his neck; he sports baggy "pants" and boots with ugly, bulging toes. A little later he gets his mouth ornamented with a gold tooth or two, and drops his cap for an eternal bowler hat—even when wearing white trousers. My honoured countryman is always ready with his cowardly excuse, "When in Rome do as they do in Rome." "When in Rome," says an Irish lady I know, "do as you do at home." One need not look twice before deciding which motto is the worthier. It is one of the excellences of the English coloniser that he comes resolved not to set aside his old customs until he has something better to fill their place. He thinks long before he exchanges his high code for any less high; and even when he drives that theory to rank stupidity, it seems to me an example of the backbone that has made the Englishman a conqueror. To illustrate: the Scot abroad will often from a false considerateness allow Colonials to refer to him as "English" and his country as "England" (meaning "British" and "Britain"), a point at which his Northern "soopleness" comes in to sacrifice both honesty and patriotism.

My final word is, by all means come to Canada. The climate is, at the least, healthy. A certain boy, who was asked by his old-country relatives how he liked the Canadian summer, replied, "I've never seen one. I've only been nine months in Winnipeg." But this is overdrawn. The home Briton will not find any tremendous difference. And against mosquitoes and thunderstorms we have always coolness in our summer nights, when sleep comes sweetly. The truth is, the climate has not many hardships. In the winter we forget the awful heat and flies of summer; and when summer comes the memory of winter's icicles is grateful. And the seasons in between are superb.

THERE is never any good to be expected of young men who confess their sins and repent and straightway fall into them again. A man of strong character only confesses his faults to himself, and punishes himself for them; as for the weak, they drop back into the old ruts when they find that the bank is too steep to climb.—From Balzac.

"To See the Sea before I Die!"

Dear Friend,

Whilst holiday appeals for children and tired toilers are being made in many places, there is a class of the community that seems to be entirely overlooked—I refer to widows, elderly spinsters, and old married couples who, once well off, have now fallen upon evil days.

There is no poverty so acute as that which has seen better days. One born and bred in poverty does not feel the pinch like those who have "come down" in the world. A fortnight by the sea would be keenly appreciated by such. An old lady said most pathetically to me the other day, "I would so much like to see the sea before I die." She had not seen it for over thirty years. She is now poor, although once better off. In addition, I have a number of adults who I desire greatly to send away for a fortnight. What "better class poor" who are compelled to exist in one or two small, stuffy rooms in a thickly populated district endure, only those who have experienced it can tell. I earnestly plead for gifts. £5 will send five adults away for a fortnight (a slight reduction being made for a party), £1 5s. will give a couple of weeks, and 12s. 6d. send a needy one away for a week.

Many readers of this appeal are looking forward to their own holiday with keen enjoyment, others are already revelling in the fresh air of the country and seaside. Think of those unable to go, and add to the pleasure of your own holiday by sending others to enjoy one also.

HOW MARRIAGES ARE MADE IN FRANCE

I.—THE ROMANTIC MARRIAGE * * BY CHARLES FOLEY

IT was the annual Fair Day at the little country town of Servant. I had been over, and was on my way back to Menat, where I was spending my holiday, when I met an acquaintance, and we entered a café together. The room was crowded, but my attention was immediately arrested by a young Lieutenant of the Gendarmerie seated between two Town Councillors. He was extremely handsome, with a slightly aquiline nose, fair moustache, and blue eyes lit up by a frank, pleasant expression that told he was at peace with himself and all the world. He laughed like a boy, disclosing a set of sound white teeth. His hands were big and broad, but well kept. His whole appearance, his measured way of speaking, his easy attitude, all bespoke a simple soul in a sound, healthy body.

"That's Monsieur Maudu, the Lieutenant in command of the Menat Gendarmerie," whispered my friend. "A splendid specimen of humanity, isn't he? Well, I assure you his wife is just as handsome as he is, perhaps even handsomer, and the way their marriage came about is most romantic. But I see he is getting up to go. He is returning to Menat. I will introduce you, and you can walk back together."

A few minutes later the Lieutenant and I were descending the winding road that leads down to the valley, in the midst of which nestles the little village of Menat, with its red roofs overshadowed by the ever-moving poplar trees. Maudu spoke but little except in answer to my remarks. My friend's observation about his marriage had aroused my curiosity, and I forthwith began to question him about himself. "Was he at all ambitious, did he not wish to rise in the service, and be stationed in a less out-of-the-way place?"

"We are quite happy as we are," he said, and he smiled contentedly.

After that I could not get him to talk about himself any more, not, I am sure, because he distrusted me, but simply that he thought his life could be of no interest to a stranger. At a corner of the road, sheltered by trees, we passed an old stone mansion behind great rusty gates. It was all shut up and desolate looking, but yet the deep mullioned windows and turrets gave it a certain look of grandeur. As I stopped in front of this gloomy, stately old building, my companion remarked quietly, "That is my wife's old home."

With difficulty I repressed an exclamation of surprise. We walked on, and soon reached the little village street, with its straggling houses. In a few minutes more we should have to part, and my curiosity remain unsatisfied. I grew desperate, and, at the risk of appearing importunate, I ventured to say, "Your marriage was very romantic, wasn't it?"

"I suppose it was," he replied carelessly. "I always thought it quite natural, but, of course, others must think it strange. This is where I live," he added, stopping before a modest little white house. "Do come in and rest, and if it interests you, my wife will tell you the story of our marriage. There is no mystery connected with it."

We found Madame Maudu in the little dining-room. She was a tall, fair woman, extremely good-looking, very simple and unaffected, like her husband. She gave me the same frank, happy smile as she filled our two glasses. The Lieutenant emptied his, and then rose, saying, "My dear, I have to go and report myself at headquarters; tell Monsieur the story of our marriage. You do it so much better than I can, and it may interest him." He closed the door behind him, and she seated herself and began, without any preamble.

"You saw the old manor house on your way here. I was born and brought up there; Mademoiselle de la Traille de Pontaubier de Mersy I was in those days. My father, the Marquis, became a widower soon after my birth, and died penniless when I was just twenty-one. The old house, the only property I inherited, was mortgaged to the very last stone. The sale of it could just pay off the debts; nothing more. I stood absolutely alone in the world; I knew no one of noble enough blood or rich enough to mate with a dowerless daughter of my house. The thought of a convent or a single life filled me with horror. I wished to marry, to love, and be loved again. A penniless condition does not kill romance and fancy in a heart of twenty-one. When, therefore, the fixed period of mourning was over, my plan of action was resolved upon. I called on the notary, and fixed the sale by auction of the old manor house for that day fortnight. At the same time I let all my acquaintances and everybody in the place know of my wish to marry. I announced that if any honest young fellow, touched by my story and the frank avowal of my dowerlessness, thought to find in me a staunch, loyal wife, he had but to ring at my gate. I would open to him, receive him, and listen to what he had to say. And if he persuaded me of his sincere affection, whatever or whoever he might be, I would, with no false pride, accept him as my husband.

"It was, of course, most quixotic, mad, nay, arrant presumption on my part," said Madame Maudu, blushing slightly, "and you have a right to laugh. But, I assure you, I, who knew nothing of real life, looked upon my device as something romantic, enterprising, dashing. My course of action determined upon, I went back to my house, very pleased with myself.

"Those days of complete solitude at the old manor house were the darkest and most melancholy of my life. I wandered aimlessly about the park and gardens, but never went far from the gate, for I had a childish fancy that I must be there if a ring came. No one rang; I heard passing footsteps, but not one stopped at the gate. The days slipped slowly by, and my rosy hopes grew dim, and gave place to cruel pangs of deception and despair, as I began to realise that, in spite of the bright world around me, with its beauties of spring, the gallant young lover who was to bear away the good, beautiful maiden as a bride was but a creation of my imagination.

"The last day came, and the evening found me seated on the moss-covered stone steps leading up to the house. When night fell I at last went indoors. The huge, bare hall struck an icy chill into me, and the whole house was silent as death in its damp dreariness. Slowly I drew the big bolts across the door, when suddenly the bell at the gate rang. I started and hesitated. I had waited so long that my hopes were vanishing. But the bell sounded again louder than before. I crossed the lawn in a kind of dream, not daring to believe it could be anyone for me.

"But somebody was there.

"Then I was seized with fright, and thought the ring heralded some pitfall or snare for an unwary maiden. Nevertheless, I walked on, determined to show a bold front. I could distinguish a man in uniform when I got nearer. 'Some official letter from the Mayor or the Notary,' I said to myself, and opened the gate to let the stranger in, and preceded him to the house. In the hall, now completely dark, I turned without daring to look at him, and said shortly, 'You wish for an answer to the letter?' 'I have no letter. I met the Notary, and he told me what you had said, so I have come.'

"His voice had a determined ring in it, but he spoke in jerks, and his breath came quick and short.

"I was dazed for a moment, and lost all sense of where I was or what I was saying. I attempted to strike a light, but my trembling fingers fumbled helplessly at the match-box, whilst he went on quickly, breathlessly:

"'You don't know me, but how often have I watched you pass, and you were so beautiful that it made me all the sadder. After hearing of your decision from the Notary, I thought of nobody but you all day—all night—always. Every evening I have sat at the bend of the road to watch. A cold sweat came over me when a passer-by approached your gates. And now I have run at the gate myself, Mademoiselle, the very last day at the very last moment, not because I was doubtful of myself, but because I wanted you to have a chance of finding somebody better than a poor devil like me. But I don't want to force myself upon you. I can offer you deep affection and devotion. I have moderate means, but if you think I am too presuming, say so, and I will go instantly, and nobody shall ever know that you opened the gate to me.'

"I at last succeeded in lighting the lamp, and could now see him clearly. In spite of his pallor, he was extremely handsome. He stood there very dignified and calm, but with such a look of anguish in his eyes that I felt irresistibly compelled to hold out my hand to him. Then, realising the folly and imprudence of my conduct, a hot blush overspread my face, and I said in a low voice, 'What must you think of me?' 'I think you are a good, noble woman, Mademoiselle,' he replied, 'that is why I love you, and why I am here.'

"That, Monsieur, was how I met my husband."—

TO HIS LADY'S BRIDESMAIDS

WHEN Love first rose from out the virgin sea,
The waves, in wondering tenderness upcurled,
Gave their white foam to clothe her purity;
And when she fared across the flowering world
To bind the hearts of men to her desire,
Not without state she came; the rose-winged loves
Around her flew, and with her maiden choir
She sang of beauty 'midst her train of doves.

And since, fair ladies, with your sweet array
You do this gentle service to my love,
For you some gifts that fail not would I pray:
Youth garlanded with flowers and years that move
Soft as the cadence of a summer's day—
And shall not Love sometime call you away?

THE RELIGIOUS DRAMA *

I.

THE announcement that Sir Herbert Tree is about to produce a religious play at His Majesty's Theatre, the successful work of the Morality Play Society during the last two years, and the recent publication of Mr. Gordon Crosse's small but most important volume, in the "Arts of the Church" Series, under the editorship of Dr. Dearmer, all serve to call the attention of Christian people to the possibilities and responsibilities connected with the drama. A recent symposium in the Christian Commonwealth has shown that the old prejudices against any alliance between the Stage and the Church have almost died out, and all parties are now willing to give one another a fair hearing. I call Mr. Gordon Crosse's book on the Religious Drama important, because it marks a new stage in the discussion. Hitherto most of us have been concerning ourselves with such questions as whether or not Christians should go to the theatre; the tone of the secular drama and its influence on the development of the spiritual life; the general problem of the entertainment of the people; the reproduction of old morality plays by professionals, or the production of modern ones. Now we are asked to look upon the drama as one of the arts of the Church, and to discuss the desirability of its revival. Is the Church well advised to train her children to act in the same way as she organises her choirs to sing? Is she to contemplate once more a stage as well as a pulpit in her apparatus of religion? These are the ultimate questions raised by the book.

II.

Now, there can be no doubt that it was the ritual of the Church which at first revived the drama that had fallen on evil days when Christianity supplanted heathenism. Nor can there be any doubt that the drama was not something outside the Church, as it is now—something to be used or shunned, something to be carried on by a distinct set of persons, who might or might not be professing Christians. It was part and parcel of the social life of the Church. It is at Oberammergau, almost alone in these days, that we can understand what a large part the drama may play in the common mind of Christian people. These Bavarian peasants live from decade to decade with the Passion Play looming large in their consciousness. In the middle ages in this country it must have been something of the same sort in every town where the great cycles took place, planned and performed by the trades guilds. We shall probably never get back to that in this country. The divided state of Christendom alone would prevent it. But there seems no reason why the dramatic instinct should not have very much freer play among religious people as such. When large masses of people work together for a common object, they usually do much of it in dramatic form. What could have been more dramatic than the signing of the Ulster Covenant? So with the processions during a strike, or the torchlight parades at political gatherings, and at elections. The women suffragists, too, have shown the power of dramatic expression in the way they have organised their demonstrations in Hyde Park and elsewhere. Why should not Christian people do the same to further their own peculiar agitation for the spread of the Kingdom of God? I see no reason against it, though I see difficulties in the way. One difficulty arises from the fact that "ritual," which both historically and essentially is a kind of religious drama, has got a bad name with many Christian people. They have got into their heads that ritual implies a substitution of outward form for inward reality. If these people see the drama becoming a part of Church life they will look upon it as merely a further externalising of religion to the detriment of its spirit. And yet, if we take a dispassionate view of ritualism, we shall see that its modern development, in the Church of England, at least, has not really been due to any carelessness about reality in religion, but rather the reverse. Without pronouncing in any way on the rightness or wrongness of the Tractarian movement, we cannot deny that the "ritualism" which followed it was due to an intense desire to express the realities which the leaders of that movement had been teaching. Lowder and Mackonochie were not ceremonialists wanting to substitute an easy and attractive form of religious practice in poor parts of London for the stern teaching of truths which Newman and Pusey were writing about in the Tracts. On the contrary, they were simply embodying in outward symbol what they themselves had learnt from their masters at Oxford. While Pusey was preaching Eucharistic doctrine at Christ Church, they were acting it in Holborn and Ratcliff Highway. But the acting was no mere theatricality. It was the genuine expression of something vital. In proportion as we can get people to recognise the legitimacy of ritual in religion, and its reality, we shall get them to allow the religious drama. The prejudice against religious drama is closely connected with the prejudice against ritual. Both are diminishing, as men come to see that outward expression and externalism are not the same thing. In fact, it is often the case that just because a man is not an externalist he must express himself by outward action. He may feel constrained to show by action that what he has said in a creed again and again he really believes inwardly. The "secular" drama (so called) has been through much the same criticism and misunderstanding as the ritualistic movement in religion. It deserved it more. The drama was very artificial in Victorian times, and did not really express or interpret life. Now it does, or is doing so more every day. This is giving drama a good name, and will eventually give the same to ritual and religious drama.

III.

Now let us see what has actually been done in the making of a religious drama in modern times. As we should expect, the revival, so far as it has at present taken shape, has been chiefly among those who are called ritualists. The most that evangelicals have allowed in this direction has been in the way of tableaux illustrating foreign mission work. The revival first began with Lowder's "Bethlehem pictures." At St. Peter's, London Docks, many years ago, there was acted every Christmas the simple story of the Childhood of Christ. Again, on Good Friday, the "Stations of the Cross" were preached in the streets. Lady Wimborne's famous "Donkey" story was no doubt well founded on the reports of absentees from the annual Palm Sunday processions, when palms were carried round the churches. I remember being told this ancient anecdote to warn me against ritualism nearly forty years ago. Since those days the Christmas play has become very common. It is essentially "religious drama," in the sense of Mr. Crosse's book, because it is performed by communicants only, and done as a spiritual exercise, and for spiritual edification. In some parishes a great advance has been made upon this, and the old Nativity plays have been revived, or new ones composed. So also there have been Pageants performed for the most part by religious people, and of late street Processions on festivals have assumed a more dramatic character. In some ways the most remarkable of all is the annual play performed by the villagers at Hambridge, in Somerset, under the management of the Rev. C. L. Marson. This clergyman, whose writings in the old Church Reformer used to call forth the admiration of Lord Morley, is exactly the kind of man from whom we should expect practical help in restoring the dramatic sense of our country folk. He knows how to "educate" people in the best meaning of that word. He does not plant a ready-made play on his child-actors, and force them to learn it; he tells them the story, and leaves it to them to play it in their own words. Hambridge is not only the home of a new dramatic revival of religion; it is a school, we should think, for actors of all kinds. Could there be a better way of evoking the true spirit of drama?

IV.

These Somerset children must love Christmas in a new way, or rather in the old way. Instead of looking forward only to Santa Claus and his stocking, they associate the festival with the re-enactment of the old, old story of the shepherds and the Babe of Bethlehem. It is performed on Holy Innocents' Day, the "Childermass" of the middle ages, when the children had a "high old time" in church—a much more interesting time than they have now in that very melancholy relic of Childermass Day, the service in Westminster Abbey, when they are addressed by the Dean. To sum up. Provided that the revivalists of a religious drama are careful to keep free from the undoubted abuses which have sometimes accompanied it, provided that the movement is gradual, not hurried on by those who, in order to get professional proficiency, ignore the spirit of devotion, and admit actors and actresses, and even playwrights, who care little for the august subjects which it is proposed to dramatise; provided, in fact, that it is all done to the glory of God, there is no reason why this almost lost art should not once more find its home in our Church circles, and express thoughts and aspirations which at present are too often either quenched altogether or turned into a wrong direction through want of this opportunity which our forefathers knew better how to guide.

JAMES ADDERLEY.

A PLEA FOR THE VERY OLD

THE pathos of the very old who, after a life of hard work and unceasing effort, find themselves derelict and forlorn is one of the most tragic things of modern life. The appeal for the young is one that finds a ready response. The spectacle of the hungry child, the little baby pinched with starvation, dying for want of purer air and better conditions, touches with swift pity the hardest heart. But the aged make no such direct appeal. They hide their sufferings, veil their troubles, assuming a dignity at once pathetic and forlorn. To one who pleads for the very old there are fifty who urge the sorrows of the child. And when there is launched a direct appeal on behalf of the men and women who have taken their share of the burden and heat of the day, and look on a little comfort and touch of gladness in the evening of their days, the response should be swift and ungrudging. The Rev. Frank Swainson pleads for funds to send old people to the sea. For five pounds as many people can be sent from the stuffy town for a fortnight; £1 5s. will ensure a couple of weeks' rest; and 12s. 6d. will buy seven days at the sea, that one old lady pleaded to visit once again before she died. Life is very hard on the aged poor; it rests with those more happily circumstanced to make the closing hours of their long journey a little brighter. Subscriptions should be sent to St. Barnabas Vicarage, 558, Caledonian Road, N.

DANIEL DE FOE

DE FOE dissident, pamphlétaire, journaliste, romancier, tour à tour marchand de bas, fabricant de tuiles, comptable dans les douanes, fut un de ces infatigables travailleurs et de ces obstinés combattants, qui, maltraités, calomniés, emprisonnés, à force de probité, de bon sens et d'énergie, parvinrent à ranger l'Angleterre de leur parti. A vingt-trois ans, ayant pris les armes pour Monmouth, c'est grand hasard s'il n'est point pendu ou déporté. Sept ans plus tard, il est ruiné et obligé de se cacher. En 1702, pour un pamphlet entendu à contre-pied, on le condamne à l'amende, on le met au pilori, on lui coupe les oreilles, on l'emprisonne pendant deux ans à Newgate, et c'est la charité du trésorier Godolphin qui empêche sa femme et ses six enfants de mourir de faim. Relâché et employé en Ecosse pour l'union des deux royaumes, il manque d'être lapidé. Un autre pamphlet, mal compris encore, le mène en prison, le force à payer une caution de huit cents livres, et c'est juste à temps qu'il reçoit le pardon de la reine. On le contrefait, on le vole et on le diffame. Il est obligé de réclamer contre les pillards faussaires qui impriment et altèrent ses œuvres à leur profit; contre l'abandon des whigs, qui ne le trouvent pas assez docile; contre l'animosité des Tories, qui voient en lui le premier champion des whigs. Au milieu de son apologie, il est frappé d'apoplexie, et de son lit continue à se défendre. Il vit pourtant, et il en coûte de vivre; pauvre et chargé de famille, à cinquante-cinq ans, il se retourne vers la fiction et compose "Robinson Crusoe," puis tour à tour "Moll Flanders," "Captain Singleton," "Duncan Campbell," "Colonel Jack," "The History of the Great Plague in London," et d'autres encore. Cette veine épuisée, il pioche à côté et en exploite une autre, "Le Parfait Négociant Anglais," "Un Voyage à Travers la Grande-Bretagne." La mort approche, et la pauvreté reste. En vain il a écrit en prose, en vers, sur tous les sujets, politiques et religieux, d'occasion et de principes, satires et romans, histoires et poèmes, voyages et pamphlets, traités de négoce et renseignements de statistique, en tout deux cent dix ouvrages, non d'amplification, mais de raisonnements, de documents et de faits, serrés et entassés les uns par-dessus les autres avec une telle prodigalité que la mémoire, la méditation et l'application d'un homme semblent trop petites pour un tel labeur; il meurt sans un sou, laissant des dettes. De quelque côté qu'on regarde sa vie, on n'y voit qu'efforts prolongés et persécutions subies. La jouissance en semble absente; l'idée du beau n'y a point d'accès. Quand il arrive à la fiction, c'est en presbytérien et en plébéien, avec des sujets bas et des intentions morales, pour étaler les aventures et réformer la conduite des voleurs et des filles, des ouvriers et des matelots. Tout son plaisir fut de penser qu'il y avait un service à rendre, et qu'il le rendait. "Celui qui a la vérité de son côté, dit-il, est un sot aussi bien qu'un lâche, quand il a peur de la confesser à cause du grand nombre des opinions des autres hommes. Certainement il est dur à un homme de dire: Tout le monde se trompe, excepté moi; mais si en effet tout le monde se trompe, qu'y peut-il faire?" De Foe ressemble à l'un de ces braves soldats obscurs et utiles qui, l'estomac vide, le dos chargé, les pieds dans la boue, font les corvées, emboursent les coups, reçoivent tout le jour le feu de l'ennemi et quelquefois par surcroît celui de leurs camarades, et meurent sergents, heureux quand de rencontre ils ont accroché la croix d'honneur.

DANIEL DE FOE

DE FOE, a dissenter, a pamphleteer, a journalist, a novel-writer, successively a hosier, a tile-maker, an accountant, was one of those indefatigable labourers and obstinate combatants who, ill-treated, calumniated, imprisoned, succeeded by their uprightness, common-sense, and energy, in gaining England over to their side. At twenty-three, having taken arms for Monmouth, he was fortunate in not being hung or transported. Seven years later he was ruined, and obliged to hide. In 1702, for a pamphlet misunderstood, he was condemned to pay a fine, was set in the pillory, had his ears cut off, was imprisoned two years in Newgate, and only the charity of Godolphin prevented his wife and six children from dying of hunger. Being released, and sent as a commissioner to Scotland, to treat about the union of the two countries, he had a narrow escape of being stoned. Another pamphlet, again misconceived, sent him to prison, compelled him to pay a fine of eight hundred pounds, and only just in time he received the Queen's pardon. He was caricatured, robbed, and slandered. He was obliged to protest against the plagiarists, who borrowed and altered his works for their benefit; against the neglect of the Whigs, who did not find him tractable enough; against the animosity of the Tories, who saw in him the chief champion of the Whigs. In the midst of his self-defence he was struck with apoplexy, and continued to defend himself from his bed. Yet he lived, but with great difficulty; poor and burdened with a family, he turned, at fifty-five, to fiction, and composed "Robinson Crusoe," and wrote successively "Moll Flanders," "Captain Singleton," "Duncan Campbell," "Colonel Jack," the "History of the Great Plague in London," etc. This vein exhausted, he diverged and tried another—the "Complete English Tradesman," a "Tour through Great Britain." Death comes on; poverty remains. In vain had he written in prose, in verse, on all subjects, political and religious, accidental and moral, satires and novels, histories and poems, travels and pamphlets, commercial essays and statistical information, in all, two hundred and ten works, not of verbiage, but of arguments, documents, and facts, crowded and piled one upon another with such prodigality, that the memory, thought, and application of one man seem too small for such a labour; he died penniless, in debt. However we regard his life, we see only prolonged efforts and persecutions. Joy seems to be wanting; the idea of the beautiful never enters. When he comes to fiction, it is like a Presbyterian and plebeian, with low subjects and moral aims, to treat of the adventures and reform the conduct of thieves and prostitutes, workmen and soldiers. His whole delight was to think that he had a service to perform, and that he was performing it: "He that has truth on his side is a fool as well as a coward, if he is afraid to own it, because of the multitude of other men's opinions. 'Tis hard for a man to say, all the world is mistaken but himself. But if, indeed, all the world is mistaken, who can help it?" De Foe is like one of those brave, obscure, and useful soldiers, who, with empty belly and burdened shoulders, go through their duties with their feet in the mud, pocket blows, receive day by day the fire of the enemy, and sometimes that of their friends into the bargain, and die sergeants, happy if it has been their lot to get hold of the cross of the legion of honour.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—The letter by Mr. Johnson on this subject is an interesting one, and if conditions of life had not changed so greatly, doubtless the old way of an apprenticeship would be a decided advantage.

But to-day employers of labour are not caring a straw about men; in fact, if men could be displaced entirely, and the work now done by human beings were performed by machines, they would not want men. I am not half Mr. Johnson's age, but I am forced, as a person who has served an apprenticeship to a skilled trade, to recognise the fact that I am only a cog in a wheel, and the wheel is so large that if the machine slows down my presence is not wanted, and when this occurs I become unemployed; but, being a human being, my stomach craves food, the law compels me to cover my nakedness, and if I sleep outside, the law again steps in, and may put me in prison as a "sturdy beggar" having no visible means of support. And this is perfectly true. Does anybody fancy I am giving two straws for the welfare of the State when the State treats me in this manner?

We maintain an army of men to fight, and they are fed and paid all the time; we maintain police to strike us down, judges to sentence us, warders to watch us, officials to watch the warders, and so on ad infinitum, when we go to ask a farthing more an hour on our pay. All these parasites are maintained in health and illness, but we who perform the essential work of society—keeping drains clean, laying streets, sweeping them, spinning and weaving cloth, and all the useful forms of labour, are permitted by the State to starve, and become mentally distressed for lack of something to do. Thinking people are determined that, so far as in them lies, another generation shall not suffer hardship and distress, hence the reduction in the birth-rate, and the postponement of marriage to a much later age than formerly. I should like if some others of your readers would give their views on this subject.—I am, sir, etc.,

Paisley, July 13th, 1913.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I am surprised that anyone who understands the difference between ancient and modern industry should talk of reviving apprenticeship. Every worker to-day, with very few exceptions, executes some small operation that can in many instances be learned in a few weeks. In the old times it was necessary to learn to make the completed article. Apprenticeship was always, in my opinion, a bit of a swindle, in which the master class got a good deal the best of the bargain. To-day apprenticeship would, in most instances, be an absurd anachronism. As to the birth-rate, we are, in my opinion, breeding more people than can be provided for. I read lately that, in spite of its diminution, the excess of births over deaths was well maintained, owing to the diminution in the death-rate. If England is to be the workshop of the world (in my opinion one of the meanest and most contemptible ambitions), female labour, the present excess of which is greatly to be deprecated, is a necessity.—I am, sir, etc.,

ARE THE FRENCH A RELIGIOUS PEOPLE?

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—The fact that EVERYMAN is so eminently a "live" paper, causes it occasionally to challenge criticism. Your current issue, for example, contains this remarkable statement:

"No one will understand French history who does not realise that the French people are by far the most religious people of modern Europe."

I suppose it all turns upon what exactly is meant by a "religious people." I have met many Frenchmen who have admitted themselves "Catholique—par principe," the italicised words being accompanied by a shrug of the shoulders, which spoke volumes.

May I transcribe what a writer of the standing of Taine has said on the subject?

"Foncièrement la race n'est point religieuse, c'est-à-dire sérieuse et sujette aux alarmes de conscience, mais sceptique, railleuse, prompte à ramener les privilégiés à son niveau, à chercher l'homme sous le dignitaire, à croire que pour tous, comme pour elle, le grand objet de la vie est l'amusement ou le plaisir. La France a toujours été 'de la religion de Voltaire.'" (La Fontaine et ses Fables, p. 117. Ed. Hachette.)

Thanking you for many happy and profitable hours spent with your excellent paper.—I am, sir, etc.,

CLIFFORD H. ABBOTT.

Keighley, July 12th, 1913.

[Taine is no authority on the philosophy of religion, and his "La Fontaine" is a juvenile production. If the French people are not a deeply religious people, then I confess that their whole history becomes an insoluble mystery. The French Middle Age, the University of Paris, and the rise of scholasticism, the Gothic Cathedrals and the Crusades, the ever-recurring wars of religion, from the Albigenses down to the Dreyfus affair, the representative statesmen and artists and thinkers, Joan of Arc, Calvin, Richelieu, Pascal, Bossuet, Voltaire, Mirabeau, Robespierre, Balzac, Lamartine, Victor Hugo, Michelet, are all phenomena without an explanation.—ED.]

SHALL WE ABOLISH THE PAWNBROKER?

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—As a reader of your excellent journal from the start, I shall be pleased if you will publish the following.

I am grateful to your Special Commissioner for writing upon this subject. He has opened my eyes to the effect that a little knowledge upon this subject is, to him, and those who take a superficial light on it, a dangerous thing. I have been in the pawnbroking trade for over twenty years. The words "harsh and unconscionable" and "unearned increment" are words that have a sting attached to them. They are very hard words to apply to the pawnbroker. I trust that when your contributor reads this letter he will withdraw same. The best method to test this is the comparative one. You refer to any other calling of shopkeeper, and see what his profits are. We are bound in by Acts of Parliament with respect to our charges. Other tradesmen have a free hand. You take a grocer, for instance. A friend of mine is a grocer. We have both read your article, and come to the conclusion that the grocer gets more out of his clients than does the pawnbroker.

Let us go into this a little, and compare notes.

We are charged with getting 400 per cent. per annum for lending 1s. every week. The grocer gets

HOLIDAYS

FULL OF HEALTH AND HAPPINESS.

What are you doing this year? Are you going on the same old beaten track—the kind of holiday which you have spent year after year without variation—it may be the seaside or it may be the country?

Why not make a change this year? The one essential of a beneficial holiday is CHANGE—change of scene, change of environment, change of company, change of people, places and customs.

Get out of the groove this year. Widen your outlook, broaden your views, go out and see the customs of other countries. Enjoy the delights of travelling over new ground in the company of congenial companions, and come back full of happy memories of the most enjoyable and profitable holiday you have ever spent.

That should be your programme for this year!

EVERYMAN CONTINENTAL TOURS

will give you that entire change—that absolute detachment from the ordinary routine of life which is so necessary to a perfect holiday; old things are forgotten amid the delights of new scenes and new peoples and languages. “The travelled mind is the Catholic mind educated from exclusiveness and egotism.” The culture and breadth of outlook that travel gives is so marked that it is esteemed as the greatest of all educators as well as the purest of all joys.

EVERYMAN Tours are proving a splendid success. The arrangements are so complete that they remove all trouble and anxiety from those who are travelling, and they are so planned as to produce the maximum of enjoyment and comfort. Each week sees EVERYMAN parties departing for FRANCE, BELGIUM, HOLLAND and SWITZERLAND THE LAND OF SNOW-CAPPED PEAKS.

No country is more favoured by nature, no climate is more healthy, and no scenery more impressive and awe-inspiring. A visit to Switzerland to, say Chamonix, in summer from the month of May, when the excessive heat renders life in the towns and lowlands almost unbearable, then the agreeable freshness of the mornings and evenings here will compensate you for the heat of the day. The nights are cool, and you enjoy a peaceful and profound sleep. At a time when the sun sends its rays almost perpendicularly to the earth, you will always find at Chamonix a shady nook among the pines and a comfortable summer-house, romantically hidden in the dark verdure of the pine-woods, whilst a refreshing breeze from the glaciers will deliciously fan your face. And when you climb one of the heights in order to contemplate a sunrise, the delighted eye will rest upon the eternal ice and snow, to which the rising sun imparts incomparable purple hue; a sight which, once seen, will scarcely ever be forgotten.

A Fortnight's Personally Conducted Tour in Montreux, Territet and Chamonix, starting July 26th, August 9th and 23rd.

This little gem clustering around the Lake of Geneva is justly the pride of the Swiss Riviera. Nothing can surpass it in beauty, with the blue waters of the lake in front and the towering Rochers-de-Naye at the back. Byron, it will be remembered, lived for some time near Montreux, and he ever extolled its beauties; of Territet he said that it was “more beautiful than a dream.” An entire fortnight can be spent here, taking the most delightful excursions arranged, or a week can be spent in and around Territet, and a week in the neighbourhood of Mont Blanc, making Chamonix the centre.

Nearest to Mont Blanc, the monarch of the Alps, Chamonix has a charm and fascination above any other of the Alpine villages in the higher altitudes.

From early morning, when the great granite mountain is lighted up by the brilliant rays of the rising sun, in the full blaze of the summer noon, when the eternal snows on the summit of the mountain remain placid and undisturbed, in the evening when the glow of the twilight suffuses the mountain peaks a crimson hue, and at night when the two streets of the village stretch like a cross of light in the darkness of the valley, Chamonix is a place apart with a fascination peculiarly its own.

This is only one of the many delightful Tours arranged.

"I CANNOT SLEEP!"

The man or woman from whom is wrung this bitter cry is in grave danger. If the sleeplessness be only partial it may, and if neglected will, develop into acute insomnia. It is during sleep that Nature replenishes and rejuvenates the nerve forces. If Nature is denied that restful condition, the whole system is laid open to serious troubles.

SHATTERED NERVES

are an early symptom—a solemn warning that something must be done. Neglect that warning and illness—perhaps mental AFFECTION—is not far off. Drugs won't cure; they may relieve, but not permanently. Medicine is useless. Nature wants sleep, and wants it produced naturally. Now—is the title of a little book dealing exhaustively with a sane and proved treatment—without drugs or medicine—which, in a natural, simply-explained manner, brings blessed sleep. This little book is an offer of Sleep to the Sleepless, a promise of Healthy Repose. It is FREE—quite free, and a postcard will bring it to-day. MR. CORSAN THWAITES' FORMER REPORT:

THE GIFT OF SLEEP

"September 29th, 1893.

"It gives me great pleasure to testify to my continued belief in the efficacy and curative power of your Magnetic Appliances. To all sufferers from similar complaints to mine, viz., Dyspepsia, Nervous Exhaustion, and Sleeplessness, they are invaluable. In my own case, before using them I was unable to sleep at all, but since, the loss of sleep has only averaged a couple of nights per annum for many years. The persistent efforts on the part of some so-called scientific authorities to disparage Magnetism are very pitiable, and I should recommend to all sufferers to try this remedy for themselves. The proof that Magnetic Appliances are genuine curative agents is clearly seen in the case of young children who have been relieved by them, and who were too young to have been cured by mere faith alone."

600 per cent. per annum for the same amount. As tradesmen we do not differ in one iota. What we both do is to invest our money and exchange it at the above profits. Again, the 1s. pledge can be left for one month, and the charge is the same as for one day.

I have a pledge for 20s. This is for one week, and every week for 1 year. For this pledge I charge 6d. per week. Being in and out I get a profit of 24s. The same amount is spent at the grocer's. What does he get? His profit per annum is £6 10s. If the above expletives can be thrown at the pawnbroker, the compound of these words take the grocer and hang him as a villain.

Let me here give you a little light upon the subject, in comparing the pawnbroker and the grocer.

I know a man who has been in the trade for thirty or forty years. He lends every week £150. His gross profits are £8 10s., but of this he has to pay three wages, with an additional 35 per cent. loss for out of times and other trade expenses. I leave your readers and Special Commissioner to gather the rest, which is anything but fabulous wealth. My friend the grocer has the same turnover, £150 per week. There are five people in the shop, two men, two boys, one girl. Their gross profit per week is £13 15s. Why the curse of usury applied to the pawnbroker? This little, but just, comparison will help your Special Commissioner the next time he writes on the pawnbroking trade. The pawnbroking trade is not, then, what your contributor holds it to be. The pawnbroker is not a rogue, thief, or robber, but an honoured citizen, taking his place in the world of tradesmen. There is scarcely another tradesman that has to stand the test of character as the pawnbroker. Anyone can be a grocer, but not a pawnbroker.

Your contributor's reform scheme may or may not suit England. The New York Loan Company was a business concern from its inception, they had the almighty dollar in view. They have created a very large reserve fund, and pay 6 per cent. This is, on the face of it, no philanthropic institution. Your commissioner will open his eyes and mind when I tell him and your readers that on a bill of sale or bonds the English pawnbroker can and does advance money at 3½ per cent., not 5 per cent. I myself have taken bonds into pledge at a lower rate of interest than this much-lauded loan company. The very same bonds have been pledged with a solicitor in this town, who charged 1s. 6d. for the making out of a certain document, while I myself charged 6d. The English system is, then, much better for the pawnner than the New York Loan Company. If this company charges 5 per cent. per month, and this is allowed to run the same course as the English system, then the client pays 60 per cent. per annum. Well may they make and pay a handsome dividend.

The English system is best for the pawnners. They have freedom from excess.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I have been particularly interested in the articles under the heading of "The Curse of Usury," by your Special Commissioner, and the subsequent letters in relation thereto from your enlightened correspondents. I am, however, particularly pleased to observe from your paragraph in "Notes of the Week," July 4th, 1913, that the articles of your Special Commissioner are to have some practical utility in the fighting of the evils he so ably brings before us. I sincerely hope that the official inquiry will take place, and that your optimistic anticipations, "that it may have memorable results," will be realised. Whether or not the matter is allowed to drop, I feel sure your readers are obliged to you for bringing the whole matter into the arena of "public opinion" in such a thorough and illuminating manner, and so opening our eyes to a great and growing national evil.

I must not close without congratulating you upon the high quality and high standard you maintain in EVERYMAN, and wishing you the success your paper deserves.—I am, sir, etc.,

WHY NOT FIFTY-TWO BANK HOLIDAYS?

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I was very much interested by the article of Henry Wright in EVERYMAN, July 4th, re fifty-two Bank Holidays, and, as a unit in the class which he evidently desires to benefit, perhaps a comment or two might not be out of place, especially as I can claim forty years' more or less active connection with trade union effort.

On first perusal of the article, one might be captivated with the apparent simplicity of the idea, but a little thought will convince that the project is not so simple as it looks.

There is an error into which we often fall—that of considering the working class as if they consisted only of factory "hands," without any consideration of the case of those who administer to the needs, the desires, and the pleasures of the "hands" during their periods of relaxation.

This came out very prominently in the case of the miners' eight hours day, which was persistently opposed by the men of Northumberland and Durham.

It will be remembered that a settlement could only be arrived at by the miners accepting a "three-shift system."

Now look for a moment into the miner's household. There is, say, the head of the family, two grown-up sons, and a boy; one of these may be on each shift; each one expects the comforts of a home for two-thirds of the twenty-four hours; how are they to be catered for in respect to meals, washing, etc.?

For answer, ask the miner's wife.

Again, suppose you let loose all the occupants of factories, mines, offices, etc., from Friday night till Monday morning, and at the same time close all the shops, i.e., butchers, bakers, grocers, refreshment rooms, entertainments, etc., etc.

What sort of a holiday would it be?

The fact is that when you "close down" the factories, etc., you automatically set in motion another army of workers, who are generally left out of the reckoning, and who—by reason of their comparative want of organisation—are veritable slaves, and, in spite of all the legislation, are in many instances unable to command even the Sabbath rest.

What is wanted is some arrangement whereby the "hands" and the "caterers" have their holidays in turn.

Is this impossible? Can or will "Combines of Brain" do anything to bring this about?

I am afraid not, so long as the "Devil take the hindmost" methods of society prevail.

But suppose we could realise that the best interests of society are interwoven with the welfare of each member. If each individual was recognised as an asset of the State, it would be to the interest of the State

Is it really necessary that one section of the community shall work abnormal hours in order that another section shall enjoy abnormal liberty?

Through invention and organisation our wealth-producing capacity has enormously increased, but our methods for distribution (i.e., sharing out) of the wealth produced are as antiquated as the hills.

Perhaps some day a practical solution will "arrive." In the meantime, I heartily agree with the last paragraph of the article, especially "We live by the social lump, and we are beginning to find out that by the social lump we must be cured of social evil."—I am, sir, etc.,

J. O.

Newcastle-on-Tyne, July 6th, 1913.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—A very plausible case is made out for a five days' working week in an article headed as above, which appears in your issue of the 4th inst., and it is a consummation devoutly to be wished; but it appears to me that at the present stage of our industrial development it is quite impossible for the great majority of the workers of this country, whatever the future may bring. It would be no difficult matter, perhaps, in the case of many productive workers—artisans, mechanics, miners, mill-hands—but they constitute only a minority of the great mass of the working classes; and they have it very much in their power to make their own conditions within the limits of essential industrial requirements.

It is admitted by your contributor that the milkman, the cabby, and the shopkeeper would have to be accepted; but what about the many distributive employments, great and small, and the great public services—the railways, the post office, the docks, the shipping, the carters, etc.? And are not the agriculturists to count? To say nothing of the great substratum of casual workers, who, unfortunately, are so essential an element of our present social and industrial system. "A paltry extra hour's work on our five working days" would be no equivalent of a complete stoppage of all these activities from Friday evening till Monday morning.

The aspiration of your contributor is a most laudable one, and I am sure every one of your readers would be among the first to welcome its advent. But—we must wait.—I am, sir, etc.,

BOY LABOUR.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—As a member of the artisan class, and at the present time an engineer's foreman, it often grieves me when looking round my shop, as I wonder what will become of the boys—boys who are sent out of the Council schools, able and fit, full of go and enthusiasm, in each boy a desire to imitate the great men, whose lives he has read of, and whose inventions have brought them fame and fortune. But, alas! poor boy, when he enters the "works," he finds an iron discipline, and his master a machine which seems capable of everything but speech. In the particular trade in which I am employed—the motor-car trade—there is an immense quantity of automatic and semi-automatic and other machinery employed, which requires little or no skilled attention. Therefore boy and youth labour is largely employed. As these boys grow up, and reach a certain standard of wages, the majority have to leave, and that at an age when it is practically impossible to learn any trade, even if the means existed. These once bright boys, who were such a costly asset of the community, whose minds and bodies were looked after by the State and powers that be, are now, as so much scrap, fit only for casual workers, labourers, or food for the army or navy. Maybe he flees from his homeland and birthright to some more congenial land under the flag. Machinery under modern conditions is a veritable juggernaut for the young labour employed therein, and could just as well be looked after by the old and partially disabled members of the community who have "had their day," instead of deadening the minds and ambitions of the young.

The only solution I can suggest is for the State to watch over the boy's future until he reaches the age of twenty-one.—I am, sir, etc.,

THE SUFFRAGE QUESTION.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—Mr. J. A. Frome Wilkinson's letter on this subject contains, I think, one glaring fallacy, which is sufficient to destroy his whole argument.

He says Mr. Thomas "will have to go far before he will find another cause whose advocates are prepared to undergo the tortures that the militants have undergone." But it is precisely these tortures which are objected to by the Suffragettes and their supporters. They not only expect to escape all punishment, but also that public opinion will praise their destructive efforts. Yet it is obvious that if they win their case by violence without punishment and without incurring the proper hatred of ordinary men and women, the fact would incite other organisations to adopt the same easy but not very logical way of convincing their opponents. This would lead to anarchy—which is not in the interests of men, and still less of women.—I am, sir, etc.,

PERSONALITY IN LITERATURE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I appreciate Mr. Corkery's clever article in the current issue of your excellent paper. I do not, however, see that it gets to the root of the matter, on this ever-recurring problem of "style."

Mr. Corkery very ingeniously describes "style" as "travelling in a circle," but he does not seem to see that just because of this, "style" is something quite different to "personality." There is nothing so "impersonal" as a circle. Personality, so far as its meaning can be expressed in words, is a flow of vital and original feeling, which at heart knows and cares nothing about circles, routines, or any kind of mathematic symbolism. In a strict sense, Art and Style are synonymous terms, but when the spirit of Style abandons itself to the mere seeking of its own fixation and elaboration, instead of fulfilling its true function, as an appropriate and yielding expression of feeling and vital movement, then Style is the drier-up of personality, and the Artist becomes an obstacle to the Man. Such a Stylist would not really be possessing the Form, but becoming obsessed by it. It is really true that in Art the "style" may be exquisite, yet no more connected with the real beauty and strength of the world than a beautiful garment covering a tailor's dummy. A good deal of the poetry which is labelled as of "Miltonic" quality is of this kind.—I am, sir, etc.,

THE MAN WHO IS CURING THE NATION'S EYESIGHT.

WELL-KNOWN LONDON SPECIALIST'S WONDERFUL DISCOVERY.

Particulars Now Available to the Public.

A well-known London specialist has made a remarkable discovery which already is making a sensation wherever the result of its use is known.

It is nothing less than the discovery of a wonderfully simple yet scientific method

Mr. Levison particularly invites those who wear glasses to write to or call upon him for his advice as to whether his treatment will speedily restore them to perfect sight. He makes no charge for this advice, whether to callers or to postal inquirers.

Most successful has the new discovery proved in the cure of

1. Falling or weakening eyesight.
2. Short-sightedness.
3. Old Slight and Blurring.
4. Twitching Eyes.
5. Hot Eyes.
6. Watery Eyes.
7. Discharging Eyes.
8. Unequal Power of Eyes.
9. Aching Eyes.
10. Red and Inflamed Eyes.
11. Eyesight Headaches.

St. Paul's as seen by the short-sighted. St. Paul's as it should be seen.

If you lack the full benefit of the sense of sight, you should not fail to secure John Levison's remarkably successful advice free to all who send the convenient Form below.

for restoring perfect eyesight to the weak-sighted and bringing back to tired, old eyes their once youthful, clear-seeing power.

Everybody who for the first time is told about the new discovery is eagerly asking, "Will it do my sight good?"

The answer in practically every case is, "Yes."

What the great German oculists have so long held as the principal theory in connection with the cure of eyesight troubles, Mr. John Levison has at last made practicable, and the system of scientific massage applied to the weakened muscular system of the eye, adopted in practice by leading authorities, is now perfected in such a simple form that the sufferer himself may adopt this method of treatment with perfect confidence, and without any supervision, in his own home.

As Mr. John Levison, the discoverer of this wonderful method of eyesight restoration, says, "Every sufferer may cure his or her own trouble at home, inexpensively and speedily, by following out the simple instructions I give—which are, indeed, so simple that a child could understand, yet so effective as to be of benefit, no matter how bad the sight may be."

The weak-sighted are enabled to check the insidious nature and ever-growing worse condition of their trouble, and build up the eyesight in perfect strength to see clearly at any age. Mr. Levison does not claim his discovery as a "cure all," but whenever a cure is possible, his method of Treatment will accomplish it.

only a disfigurement, but a constant source of expense, and, of course, cannot cure any eyesight trouble, but simply act as "sight-crutches."

For your convenience the Conpon below may be filled in and posted for the particulars of the new discovery which restores weak or failing sight.

"Letters we have read, records of cases investigated, and the knowledge of the possibilities of such a treatment as that Mr. Levison controls, not only permit us to emphasize its perfect safety and its great success, but to add that this treatment must be included amongst the greatest benefits that have accrued from scientific endeavour for a long time past."

Readers of EVERYMAN are invited to fill in and forward this Form to Mr. LEVISON for full particulars of his Method of Eyesight Treatment,

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

THE LITTLE WICKET GATE, by Algernon Petworth (Fifield, 6s.), is reminiscent of a number of volumes dealing with those dreams of Utopia that have afflicted man at all times. Lord Algernon Petworth, for some reason not stated, is troubled with baffling seizures of unconsciousness. Whenever he finds himself in a situation difficult, dangerous, and clearly beyond the art of the author to handle, coma swoops down upon him like a pall, and he knows not what he does. This being so, we are not surprised to find him transported to an earthly paradise, instinct with all the charms of the tropics, but inhabited by the most priggish and boresome people in the world. They all dress exquisitely, and their raiment and their clothes appear to be showered upon them by an unseen but all-sufficient benefactor. Free from many of the complexities of modern society, they have not yet discovered how to dispense with love; and love complicates the situation for Lord Algernon to an extent from which even his periodic fits of coma do not rescue him. He finds an easy way at last, however. He kisses the beautiful girl of Tiflihin—the euphonious name of the earthly paradise—and at the touch of his lips the girl expires—either of surprise or joy.

A book on the national sport of Spain has been published by Messrs. Simpkin, Marshall and Co., BLOOD AND SAND (6s.), by Vincent Blasco Ibanez. It is powerfully and vividly written—almost too vividly for the fastidious reader who prefers to know only the romantic side of the sport. The pictures which the author conjures up are full of pathos, and indeed there are some passages which it is impossible to read unmoved. We see the wife of the matador waiting in anguish and apprehension outside the arena where her husband is fighting for his life; the cries of the torn and bleeding horses are ever in our ears, with the shouts of the multitude at each fresh onslaught of the bull, shouts which rise into a roar, the roaring of the wild beast, the true and only one—the one which is absolutely without mercy for man or beast so that only it may feed its passion for blood. Mr. Ibanez spares his readers nothing, and tells us that the disembowelled horses are not allowed to die in peace, but must be dragged out of the arena, and somehow patched and sewn up, and forced once more on to staggering legs, if only for a few minutes longer, in order that they may be the sport of the terrified and infuriated bull and the frenzied mob. It is difficult to say who is the most injured of all the actors in that ghastly drama—the bull, noble and brave animal, cruelly betrayed by his masters; the poor, worn-out horses, who are forced to a most dreadful and agonising death; or the men whose trade it is to daily place their life in the hands of the multitude who elect that it shall be at the mercy of a wild beast.

Messrs. Eveleigh Nash have just published a volume that sheds a vivid side-light on the modes and manners of the time of Henry VIII. The eternal feminine in relation to that much-married monarch is entertainingly expressed in ELIZABETH BLOUNT AND HENRY THE EIGHTH, by William Childe-Pemberton (6s.). The lady in question was one of Henry's early loves, Elizabeth Blount, a member of one of the oldest of English families. Of a slender and appealing type of beauty, her immature attractions appealed most intimately to the monarch, and she embarked on the first of the liaisons that continued throughout his reign. The result of the relationship was a son, christened Henry Fitzroy, on whom was bestowed the Earldom of Nottingham, together with the Dukedom of Richmond and Somerset, and the Order of the Garter. At one time his father seemed to have contemplated the possibility of naming him as his successor, for in the days of the Tudors, legitimacy went down before the will of the Sovereign. The boy, however, died at seventeen; and Elizabeth lived to marry two husbands. One of the most delightful passages in the book is the glimpse of English life as seen by Desiderio Erasmus. He starts with an eulogy of Britain, and mentions that the women are of dazzling beauty, and that their kindness, if possible, exceeds their charm. "Moreover, there is a fashion never sufficiently commended. Wherever you go you are received by everyone with kisses; when you take your leave you are dismissed with kisses; you return, kisses are again renewed. . . . Wherever you meet there are kisses in abundance. In short, wherever you move, all things are charged with kisses. And, Faustus, if you once tasted how sweet and fragrant they are, you would be glad to sojourn in England, not for ten years, like Solan, but to your dying day."

After reading this, one realises that there were perhaps more excuses for Henry the Philanderer than are at first perceived. * * *

The latest disciple in fiction of the immortal Sherlock Holmes is a tiresome person of the name of DR. CUNLIFFE, INVESTIGATOR (Heath, Cranton and Ouseley, 6s.). What this Admirable Crichton does not know of criminal methods is not worth troubling over. He is intensely interested in his personal idiosyncrasies, and tells us on the first page of the book that when he was only "a year and a half old, and barely able to totter along on his own legs," he was discovered in a cupboard munching away at a Christmas cake. Mr. H. Frankish appears to think this suggests qualities of a highly individualised character. Strange to say, the records of human babies generally, tell of their healthy appetite for cake, and there is no reason to suppose that a capacity for hiding in a cupboard shows technical qualifications for the tracing of criminals, and the elucidation of mystery. There is very little Dr. Cunliffe cannot do; he is a dead shot, a past master of Ju-Jitsu, has a complete knowledge of innumerable languages, is an expert engineer, a skilled mechanic, and, as was said of Lord John Manners, could, at a push, navigate a balloon or command the Channel Fleet. As studies of crime the volume is not successful. The descriptions are long-winded, the action delayed, the types sketched are neither new nor original. The author misses his mark when he attempts to touch the nerve of horror. "The Mystery of the Norfolk Mere," being the account of a monstrous creature between a bird-man and an octopus, is unintentionally humorous, and, far from arousing fright, induces laughter. The author has aimed high above his capacity, and in attempting a new departure in detective stories has landed himself in unqualified failure. * * *

There is nothing either new or arresting in THE LOVE STONE (T. Fisher Unwin, 3s. 6d.). Claude and Alice Askew are well known as writers of a stereotyped story. Love, mystery, occasional murders, varied by romantic adventures in foreign parts, form the constituent parts of their recipe. The volume in question is served up in the old style, and we are treated once again to the usual complications. Salome is an irresponsible woman, who is finally mastered by a violent type of man, and practically bullied into submission. Her character is a vivid contrast to Sheilah, married to a blind husband, who finally recovers his sight, and to her joy finds a beauty in her no one else perceives, having painted her features with the beauty of the idealist. "He who had been disappointed in the ways of the grass, the hills, and the flowers would not be disappointed here. Sheilah would always be veiled in flame and fire; she would be one of the shining ones, she would be his queen and his beloved." The love stone of the story is a rock on which the lovers of the neighbourhood swear their fidelity.

Jack London's latest novel, SMOKE BELLEW, is well up to the level of his previous novels. We are taken once more into the wilds, and the conflict of man against the elemental forces is graphically depicted. Bellew goes on a long trail, and meets with many adventures. One feels the bite of the frost, the tang of the stinging winds, clean and cruel, from the North as they blow over the white plains. One hears the long-drawn howl of the wolf, and shivers in sympathy with the thrill that runs through the lonely trapper, who has come to his last cartridge, and feels that he will shortly come to grips with death in its most ghastly form. Smoke is captured in mistake for the murderer of Joe Kinade, and is faced with the pleasing prospect of lynch law. The account of the trial is forceful and convincing. One can visualise the scene, and sense the grim determination of the men to have blood for blood. But the author slackens the tension at the right moment and in an unexpected fashion. Judge, jury, and witnesses leave the prisoner in possession of the Court through the cunning of a woman, who engineers a stampede. She produces a nugget of gold, and induces those assembled to conclude that it has been mined in the neighbourhood; the rush for the precious metal carries everything before it, and Smoke Bellew goes free. Full of suggestion, and written in a fine, nervous style, the book is one that should arrest the reader, and easily attain the same wide circulation that attended that marvellous chronicle of dog life, "White Fang."

THE GIRL OF THE GOLDEN GATE (Grant Richards, 6s.) is a strong story, graphically written. The plot is not a new one, and is marred by the unnecessary inclusion of an old-time device of machine-made romance. Lavelle, the hero, and the conventional man of iron will and indomitable resolution, is, we regret to say, a person of noble birth, who has severed his connection with Society, and gone out to seek adventure. We say "regret" because the book is strong enough to dispense with any such device. The perils of the shipwrecked castaways adrift on a Southern sea are neither cut and dried nor conventional. There is a reality about their sufferings, and the alternation of hope with fear as the chances of rescue rise and fall, that is refreshing in the midst of many romances in which the human element serves simply as foreground for the sea and land. We recognise the genuine thrill when, after hours of combat with the winds and waves, Lavelle and his crew sight land, and, having reached the shore, discover that the promised haven is but a mirage; they have struck a floating island, "a bit of waste land—the bait of a cruel trap which the sea had set." Emily, the golden girl of the story, is a conventional woman, who, under the stress of elemental emotions and a hand-to-hand fight for life, develops strong and human qualities. The book is written with a force and emotion that makes one overlook faults of construction and of plot. Mr. William Meloney has the all-saving gift of sincerity; real emotions underlie his words, and in these days of considerable poor writing this counts for much.

ROBINSON'S

as follows :

Recipe by Mr. H. HAMMOND, M.C.A. (formerly Chef de Cuisine, Bachelors' Club):—Put the outside peel of two lemons into two quarts of water, add eight lumps of sugar and boil for ten minutes. To this add two dessertspoonfuls of Robinson's "Patent" Barley, previously mixed to a smooth paste with a little cold water. Continue to boil for five minutes and allow to cool. When cold, strain off through fine muslin and add ice and lemon-juice to taste.

Pearl Barley should on no account be used as a substitute, as, to give it a better appearance, it is frequently adulterated with French Chalk, which is most injurious to the system.

HISTORY IN THE MAKING

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Government's much-discussed Education Bill has at long last been introduced into the House of Commons, and beyond doubt it fully justifies Lord Haldane's anticipatory description of "colossal." It is, in fact, the most far-reaching legislative effort that we have seen for a generation or more. The provision of baths, playing fields, and school nurseries, with meals for the children on Sundays and holidays, coupled with a "complete and progressive system of education, with instruction of an advanced character, from nursery to University." This is a programme almost beyond the dreams of the most optimistic educationists. The pity of it is that, so far as the House goes, the Bill is "dead" for this Session; but in the country its clauses will be earnestly examined and eagerly discussed.

It is with something like amazement, tempered by despair, that one reads the headline, "Turks Back in Adrianople." It seems only yesterday that we were all rejoicing that the tyranny of the "unspeakable Turk" had been broken for ever, and that the young nations of the Balkans were free at last to work out their destinies unhampered by his impossible rule. And now, alas, we find the Allies at each other's throats, and the Turk back in the saddle, determined to make a fight for it. Never, surely, did history provide a crueller disappointment, a more ironical disillusionment. By the way, it is noteworthy that our contemporary, the Outlook, almost alone in the Press, foreshadowed the course of events, and prophesied that before long the Turk would once again be a factor in the situation. "'Tis true, 'tis pity, but pity 'tis, 'tis true."

The most significant development of the struggle in China, a struggle that everyone familiar with events in the "Flowery Land" has long expected, is that Sun Yat Sen has definitely thrown the weight of his personality into the side of the Southern provinces, who are in revolt against Yuan-Shi-Kai. No one who has watched the career of Yuan expected that his rule as President would be popular, or that he was anything more than an efficient stop-gap. His whole sympathies and trend of mind are anti-republican, and the only practical alternative to that Republic, it should be borne in mind, is a restoration of the Manchus. Whatever else may transpire as the immediate result of the present complication, that, at all events, is unlikely, and the only logical alternative is the establishment of the Republic on a secure basis. The project of restoring the Mings to the throne they vacated three centuries ago is too hopeless to require comment.

The harvest must necessarily be a time of anxiety for the farmer. The uncertainty of the weather, the unevenness of the crops—even within the same field—these are factors that it is beyond the skill of man to adjust. But to them there has been added for the English farmer an additional burden, which has never before been more apparent in the United Kingdom—the difficulty of getting sufficient hands! From every quarter of the countryside bitter complaints are being received on this head. When we remember that last month British emigrants, chiefly agriculturists, numbered 40,770—an increase of 5,768 over June, 1912—we may surely be pardoned for asking if it is beyond the wit of British statesmanship to keep labour on the land.

Earl Grey's proposal to establish an "Empire Shop" on the island site off the Strand has excited keen enthusiasm, and no wonder. At present the agencies of our various Colonies and Dominions are dotted all over the City and West End. Their establishment under one roof and in a central spot should do much to bring home to Londoners the vast resources of the Empire, of which their City is the pivot, and the permanent exhibition of Empire products should prove a powerful stimulant for that increase of trade within the Empire which we all desire. "What do they know of England, who only England know."

In its way the non-militant suffrage march is one of the most remarkable events that has occurred in modern England. Time was, and not so many years ago, when political organisers declared that you could not get women to take part in processions or demonstrations. Now we find these women, strongly opposed to the tactics of the militants, but anxious to show that they also are anxious to do and to suffer for the cause, marching from Land's End to London, trudging hundreds of miles, patiently bearing insult and contumely on the way. The immediate effect of the pilgrimage may be nil. But it is an impressive demonstration that is bound to be productive of results.

It is refreshing to note—as also it is a remarkable sign of the times—that the so-called Wesleyan "heresy hunt" has failed. The Rev. George Jackson has been appointed to the Chair of Pastoral Theology at the Didsbury Training College, Manchester, and his views, orthodox or not, are not to stand in the way. The decision is distinctly interesting, not to say historical. Whoever bans a man on account of his opinions, the Free Churches are not of the company.

HOW THE LABOURER LIVES * * * BY F. E. GREEN

A STORY is told in Glasgow how a very wealthy lady, attired in silken dress and jewellery, addressed a large meeting of working women on the subject of thrift. She rebuked the wives of workmen for their thriftlessness, and informed them what excellent soup could be made out of mutton bones. Thereupon a voice was heard coming from the back of the hall, saying: "What we wants to know, mum, is who's had the meat off the bone."

I was constantly reminded of this story when, after the publication of "The Tyranny of the Countryside" (in which I printed one or two real budgets of labourers' wives), I received several angry letters, which, judging by the addresses, were written by ladies and gentlemen who were living in luxury upon the labour of other people. One of these, a lady, who stated she kept ten outdoor servants, wanted to know why English labourers in the southern counties, who "spent their time in smoking and loafing for their 15s. a week, could not live like the thrifty Scotch by making two-thirds of their meals of porridge and milk, say, 3d. a day." Another, a gentleman, writing from a large country house, wrote with righteous asseveration that "15s. a week was quite sufficient to maintain our race in a state of physical efficiency. If there is anything," he went on to say, "that is undermining the thrifty habits of the countryside people, it is the luxurious style of living pervading the whole community. I give you one instance: the substitution of packets of Quaker Oats, costing 7d., against good oatmeal, costing 2d. Why is this? Because they have lost the patience to prepare and boil the oatmeal, whereas the Quaker Oats are ready at once!"

This quaint insistence by the rich that those who do the hardest physical labour should live upon a monotonous diet of oatmeal three times a day, recalls the discussion that took place in the House of Commons towards the end of the eighteenth century on the deplorably low standard of vitality of the rural poor, resulting from the enclosures of commons, thus depriving cottage children of milk. When members were making ponderous speeches over the ignorance of the labourer who preferred white to brown bread, Fox projected a gleam of humour into the discussion by asking if any member of that House could speak with any authority on the subject of bread, as it appeared to form so small a proportion of their daily diet!

To all the good people who wrote to me with such righteous indignation, I would recommend a reading of "How the Labourer Lives," by Seebohm Rowntree and May Kendall (Nelsons, 2s.). They will learn that, out of the forty-two budgets taken from the lips of the wives of labourers earning from 12s. to 22s. a week, in one household no milk was consumed at all, in fifteen households only condensed or separated milk, and in the twenty-six households where fresh milk was part of the dietary it amounted to less than a pint a day for each family. After this, I think gentlefolk will not be so eager to recommend porridge three times a day as the sole diet.

It is really extraordinary how educated people can regard it as a kind of Divine dispensation that those who do the hardest work of the community should live upon the coarsest and poorest food. Perhaps these people feel that they have done their duty when they live as Dives did in Ernest Bilton's poem.

"Now Dives daily feasted and was gorgeously arrayed,
Not at all because he liked it, but because 'twas good for trade.
That the people might have calico he clothed himself in silk,
And surfeited himself on cream that they might get the milk;
He fed five hundred servants that the poor might not lack bread,
And had his vessels made of gold that they might get more lead;
And e'en to show his sympathy with the deserving poor,
He did no useful work himself that they might do the more.
You'll think this very, very strange, but then of course you know,
'Twas in a far-off country, and a long while ago."

It is significant that, in spite of the fact that these labourers live in a country overflowing with milk and honey, butter does not figure at all in twenty of the forty-two budgets, in which dripping or margarine takes its place, and towards the end of the week one notices that the bread has often to be eaten without even a scrape of margarine.

The authors arrive at the painful conclusion that: "It may be taken as an established fact that a family of five persons, whose total income does not exceed 20s. 6d., and whose rent is 2s., is living below the poverty line," which means that the majority of farm labourers living south of the Trent receive wages insufficient to maintain their families in physical efficiency!

Nothing surely shatters more completely the townsman's delusion that life is made easier in the country because you can produce for yourself so many of the necessaries of life, than these little household tragedies written in tiny columns of pence. Many of these labourers have allotments or cottage gardens, but, beyond vegetables, few of them produce anything of any dietary value. Most of the men who have to feed their master's horses and cattle are forbidden to keep either poultry or pigs. In the case of one woman who was allowed to keep a pig, when asked why she did not do so, answered:

"What's the use of hungering ourselves to feed a pig?"

She could not afford to purchase the necessary weekly bag of meal, even though it might become a profitable investment.

These budgets, showing the meagreness of the home produce of cottagers, are a striking illustration of the divorce of our English agricultural labourer from the land. He is now the most dependent of all European peasants, for our peasant civilisation was destroyed at the passing of the last of the enclosure acts.

It is borne in upon us with tragic insistence that it is the woman who has to bear the brunt of this unending battle of trying to make both ends meet. With daily self-sacrifice she sees that her man and her children are fed before herself, and if there is any meat on the table it goes to the breadwinner to store up physical energy to meet the demands of his master. When questioned as to how they managed on wages of 13s. a week, a woman answered:

"I sleep all right till about twelve, and then I wake and begin worrying about what I owe, and how to get things. Last night I lay and cried for about a couple of hours."

Another woman, who had to cke out 14s. a week, observed:

"We've got hell here, we have. We shall get something good, but I believe hell's their place what don't look after the poor." A Yorkshire woman, whose husband earns 18s. a week, said: "When I have seen other children in warm clothing, and mine jealous, then I haven't known what to say. I know our Master wasn't rich. We've got a roof to cover us, and He hadn't where to lay His head, so I daresay it's all for the best. But they say English people ought to be strong and brave, and I don't know how they expect them—living as they do—to be strong, and brave, and cheerful."

"I couldn't tell you how we live," said a woman whose husband earned 12s. a week in Oxfordshire, "it's a mystery" (with the puzzled look of the poor at the perpetual miracle of continued existence). "I don't know how we manage; the thing is to get it passed."

It is the woman who invariably raises the note of revolt. Possibly, if the husband were denied his weekly soporific of tobacco and beer, small though that item appears in these budgets, he might be roused to action. It is certain that it is the women who are bearing to breaking point the strain of it all. One of the most awful reflections, surely, upon our modern civilisation was that uttered by Mr. George Edwards, the Secretary of the Agricultural Labourers' Union:

"In nine cases out of ten the women starve; the first thing she thinks about is her children and husband. As a result of this chronic underfeeding, we have a very large percentage of insanity amongst the women. I am on the Asylums Committee of the Norfolk County Council, and we have over 300 wives of the labouring classes under our care. I attribute this large number to the anxiety necessitated in making ends meet and to the poor food."

The labourers' wives have broken out in revolt before in England, and they may revolt again. My own experience has been that cottage women are more willing to expose their poverty in angry words than the men.

I distinctly remember one woman living on the verge of Thursley Common, pointing across that beautiful heath overrun with rabbits, shouting out with vehemence:

"Is it right that one man should claim all the wild game which runs or flies over this yer heth, which I hear tell belonged once to all of us, and my husband dar'n't so much as look at a rabbit? They do say that the day will come when it will be altered, and things be made more equal." She looked as if she could storm a citadel.

Mr. Rowntree and Miss May Kendall have evidently experienced the same feeling, for the volume ends with these words:

"And yet, especially among the women, there is a slow disturbance—something that is not yet rebellion, and not yet hope, that seems to hold the dim promise of both. The waters are troubled, though one hears some very contradictory accounts of the appearance of the angel."

Amongst the men even there are signs that the flag of revolt has already been raised in Lancashire and Somersetshire. No one should be surprised if what is still our largest class of workers refuse to wait until a dilatory Government brings them redress from an age-long suffering. The advance guard of this army we see already on the march.

SERB, GREEK, AND BULGAR

By DAVID H. LOWE.

[As the result of a campaign to promote the study of English in the Balkans, and as the result of an audience which was granted me in 1906 by His Majesty King Peter of Serbia, the systematic teaching of the English language and literature was introduced into the National University of Belgrade, and the author of the present article, Mr. David H. Lowe, was appointed the first English lecturer. Both in his capacity as University teacher and as tutor of the Servian Crown Prince, Mr. Lowe had ample opportunities of studying Balkan life and Balkan politics from the inside. The following paper will, therefore, be specially acceptable to our readers. It is a lucid and impartial statement and analysis of a hopelessly involved situation.—EDITOR.]

THE latest war in the Balkans has been the shortest as it has been the most ferocious of modern times, and the public will stand aghast if anything like the full story ever becomes known. Why such bitter hostility should exist between the races is a question more often asked than answered, and a recapitulation of the facts may be welcome to readers at the present time.

I.

During the seventh century the Slav dwellers between the Danube and the Balkan mountains were attacked and overpowered by savage Tartar hordes from Kazan on the River Volga. These invaders, who were known as Bulgars or "Volga-men" (from Bolga=Volga, and ar=a man), were completely absorbed by the conquered Slavs and vanished. As memorials they left behind them their name and nature. Thus it comes about that Serb and Bulgar differ so strangely in national character, for, whilst the Bulgar is surly and taciturn and purposeful, the Serb is gay and volatile and happy-go-lucky.

In the centuries that followed their conversion to Christianity, a rivalry grew up between the two kindred peoples, and to a great Bulgarian there succeeded a great Servian Empire stretching from the Danube to the Adriatic. But these so-called empires were mere confederations of a loose and unstable kind, and after the crushing victory of the Turks at Kossovo in 1389, the dream of a powerful consolidated Servian State seemed to be shattered for ever.

II.

At the beginning of the nineteenth century the feeling of national consciousness awoke to robust life in the races of the Near East, and both Serbia and Greece succeeded in throwing off the Turkish yoke; but it was not until Russia had marched her victorious armies to the gates of Stamboul that Turkey ceased to rank as a Great Power in Europe.

The treaty of San Stefano, as revised by the Congress of Berlin in June, 1878, recognised the complete independence of Serbia, Montenegro, and Roumania. Moreover, the State of Bulgaria was created north of the Balkans, whilst the autonomous Turkish province of Eastern Roumelia was created south of the same range of mountains. As Bulgaria and "Eastern Roumelia" were inhabited by the same race of people, it was unlikely that this arbitrary division of them would endure, and in the summer of 1885 came the revolution of Philippopoli, when Bulgaria and Roumelia proclaimed themselves one and indivisible. While European diplomatists argued and discussed the new situation, King Milan of Serbia, encouraged thereto by Austria, took it upon him to pose as the champion of the Berlin Treaty and to forbid the union. Declaring war on Bulgaria, he laid siege to Widdin, and, marching through the Dragoman Pass, took up a position at Slivnitsa, within sight of Sofia.

The remarks of the Swiss mercenary in Bernard Shaw's "Arms and the Man," give a true hint of what followed. Owing to incompetent generalship and to an almost inconceivable lack of supplies and munitions of war, the Servians were unable to hold their ground, and, driven out of Slivnitsa, were pursued across their own frontier by the triumphant Bulgarians. At this point Austria intervened, and, as it is known that Russia would have supported Bulgaria had the Servians been victorious, the whole affair is seen to have been a war of puppets. None the less, it left behind it a legacy of hate and rancour.

III.

We come now to the famous Macedonian problem, the solution of which has plunged the quondam allies into war.

For long years Servia, Greece, and Bulgaria watched Macedonia with anxious eyes, and calculated the share of territory that would fall to each when the inevitable day of reckoning came. About one-half of the entire population of two and a half millions is composed of Christian Slavs. It was when the analysis was pushed further and an attempt made to distinguish Serb from Bulgar that violent feeling was aroused in Sofia and Belgrade. Now, although it is possible in certain parts of the country to make the distinction, it cannot be too strongly insisted upon that the Slav inhabitants of a great part of Macedonia have no spontaneous national consciousness or impulse, and it was this amorphous mass that claimed the special attention of rival propagandists.

The Turkish imperial authority did not interfere with the religious life of the subject races. This toleration, extended to no other institution, made it possible for a Church, and for a Church only, to become a basis of corporate life. It was a rallying ground for its adherents, and preserved their language and their traditions. The Christian Slavs belonged to the Greek Orthodox Church, but had enjoyed from time immemorial the privilege of a native clergy, who conducted the services in the old Slavonic tongue. This arrangement worked well, but a time came when the Patriarch sought to hellenise the Slavs of Macedonia. Greek priests were installed in the villages, church services were conducted in Greek, and the Greek language was made compulsory in the schools. All this aroused great opposition, and an agitation against the policy of the Patriarch began.

IV.

The resistance to the ecclesiastical tyranny of the Patriarch was in its origin racial, but not national. The distinction is important. As time went on, however, the character of the agitation changed, and it became purely Bulgarian, a transformation due partly to the activity of propagandists, and partly to the action of Russia, which at the moment was strongly Bulgarophil. From this politico-religious strife there emerged not a reformed Macedonian branch of the Greek Orthodox Church, but the schismatic body known as the Bulgarian Exarchate. As the Turks had expressly granted the privilege of a native clergy to the new Church, many Macedonians hastened to join it, and those who did so were claimed in Sofia as patriotic Bulgars. On the other hand, there were large numbers who hated the schism, and remained faithful to the Patriarch whilst continuing to agitate for more favourable treatment.

V.

In the Exarchate the Bulgarians possessed a powerful instrument for the consolidation of their national interests and for the promotion of their ambitious designs. The idea of a great Slav State had taken deep root in Bulgaria, an idea sedulously fostered by priest and schoolmaster in the neighbouring provinces. Bulgarian ambitions were partly realised in 1885, when the union with Roumelia was publicly proclaimed and accepted by Europe as a fait accompli. Having thus broadened the basis of their power as a State, the Bulgarians addressed themselves with renewed energy to the furtherance of their aims in Turkish Macedonia. A fresh army of priests and schoolmasters was pushed forward in the interest of the Bulgarian Church, but it soon became clear that the struggle, ostensibly between the adherents of the Bulgarian Exarch and those of the Greek Patriarch, was in reality an international contest between Bulgarians on the one hand and Greeks and Servians on the other. So far the rivalry had stopped short of bloodshed.

VI.

In 1894 the notorious Bulgarian Committee of Interior Organisation was formed. At first it concerned itself with the development of peaceful propagandist measures, but four years later it declared that the time had come "for more energetic action." Accordingly, armed forces were organised, and the duties of Comitadjis—the Turkish name for members of the Committee's bands—were laid down. The Comitadjis very quickly made it plain that by the enemy they understood the Christian Patriarchist as well as the Turkish tyrant, and that under the terms of spy and traitor they included those who declined to enrol themselves as members of the Exarchate. A complete network of communications was established throughout Turkish Macedonia, and the leaders of the bands had an underground authority greater than that of the Sultan himself. The armed force movement, conceived possibly with the honest purpose of freeing Macedonia from the Turk, degenerated into a horrible nightmare of massacre and oppression of the Christian peoples, and made possible the unspeakable deeds of such inhuman monsters as Karassouli, Sandanski, and Apostol.

VII.

The Turkish troops proved themselves quite unequal to the task of coping with the brigands, and in 1903 a crowded meeting of Greco-Macedonians was held at Athens to consider the position of their fellow-countrymen, and it was decided to take up arms in defence of Patriarchists if the existing state of affairs continued. Before taking this step, they once more appealed to Europe to protect their co-religionists against the Bulgarian bands that were bringing dishonour upon the name of Christian. Servia associated herself with Greece, but the appeal to the Powers brought no relief. The Comitadjis continued to pillage and murder, and Athens and Belgrade saw nothing for it but to translate words into deeds. In 1904 armed bands of Greeks and Servians crossed their respective frontiers into Macedonia, and confusion became worse confounded.

Such was the situation as it existed before the Turkish war. The Orthodox Slavs, supported unofficially by Greece and Servia, were engaged in a desperate attempt to stay the advance of Bulgaria behind the stalking-horse of the Exarchate. The ferocious animosity engendered in the struggle makes it surprising that an alliance against the Turk should ever have been possible at all, and once the common enemy removed, there was grave danger that the rapacity of Bulgaria would set the allies by the ears. When Austria deprived Servia, Greece, and Montenegro of the fruits of victory in Albania, a second war became a moral certainty.

THE MAN AND HIS WORK

II.—THE MAN ON THE IRON LINES * * BY C. SHERIDAN JONES

It is, to paraphrase Waverley, some fifty years since Charles Dickens, no dull observer of social portents surely, expressed mild surprise that there should be anything like chronic discontent along the iron lines of our railways, coupled with absolute horror at the whispered possibility of a national railway strike. So slowly do things move that it is only quite recently that the national strike occurred, while, alas! discontent is still with us, and there is scarcely a month, and never a year, that passes without the public being called on to take sides in a bitter dispute between one or other of the companies and their employees. Ever since there have been railways, in fact, the men who work them have been in conflict, masked or open, with the management, and, marvellously as our railway system has developed, and admirably perfected as its details have been, for some strange reason or another peace on the lines always hangs by a thread, and the men are almost invariably in a state of incipient revolt.

What is the reason for this disquieting anomaly? Why should railway servants be more prone to strike than other bodies of workmen? In part, I think the reasons are permanent, and cannot be remedied. The ordinary workman, the engineer, builder, or mechanic who does not get on with his foreman, or doesn't like his "job," very soon takes the remedy in his own hands. He asks to be paid off, packs his bag, and, if trade is brisk, gets work in the next town, or in the next street. Not so the railway servant. If he gives notice to one company, it is pretty certain that no other will engage him. If he does not like one station master, he cannot ask to work under another. And if he goes out into the great world beyond railways, all the technical knowledge that he has acquired during with the result that he stays on and chafes under grievances, real or imaginary, that the carpenter or bricklayer would end by the simple device of giving notice.

That is one of the almost inevitable reasons for railway discontent. Take another. Railway directors are responsible, not only for the carriage of goods, but of lives, and, necessarily, they are compelled to insist upon a discipline that must often seem harsh, rigid, and reasonless.

Every man on the iron lines has supplied to him quite early in his novitiate a bulky book of rules that require a trained intelligence and some considerable application to understand correctly, and these are desiderata beyond the possibilities of the ordinary porter. More, occasions may arise when—as is always the case with rules—it is sound sense to disregard them, and then, as happened to Guard Richardson, the railway servant is actually punished for obeying the printed commands of the company rather than the peremptory order of his superior, who may call the signalman from the box that the rules say he ought not to leave, or instruct the porter to do work that the rules say he must leave untouched. Small wonder, when the porter or signalman is thus punished, that he becomes embittered against what must seem to him treatment as capricious as it is stern.

These, of course, are not the only reasons for railway discontent. I have taken them first merely because I wanted to show some of the difficulties of the situation. Before we go on to consider some of the others, let us look for a moment at the vast army of men who are concerned. The growth of railways during the last forty years has been astounding. Their capital has increased from £552,660,000 in 1871 to £1,318,515,000 in 1910. The mileage has grown from 15,376 to 23,387 in the same period, and their staff now numbers nearly 600,000, of which about 320,000 are actually engaged in maintaining the traffic. Alas, as we shall presently see, the increase in the profits earned has not been maintained. For the moment, it is enough to notice who are directly affected by the facts and figures which are set forth in this article. If we consider the wages of these men, we shall find that, like the profits, they have by no means increased with the companies' business. Take, for instance, the platform porters. Before the railwaymen made their great effort two years ago, an effort that almost paralysed the trade of the country, platform porters were getting 18s. per week. To-day their wages have risen by only another shilling. Other grades, it is true, have fared a little better. The Midland firemen, I am told, won increases of 10s., and the inspectors of 2s. 6d. a week. Sunday labour is now recognised and paid for as extra, and hours have been materially reduced in all grades. Thus, the platform porter, who years ago worked the clock round, without any guaranteed meal-time, now has an eleven-hour day, with an hour for meals; while the signalman's hours have been reduced from twelve hours to eleven and ten. But, for the most part, the wages remain scandalously low, and are entirely inadequate for the support of a wife and family. Indeed, the only railway servant that one is inclined to envy is the country station master, who, although he has to be always "on the spot," gets a house rent and rate free,

With a nice little Garden Attached and some £90 to £100 in addition. He can cultivate some of the graces and comforts of life. But even he, be it noted, is expected to be always on deck, and the Great Northern Railway even go so far as to prevent a station master being absent for more than two hours without leave!

It is this strain of being so long on duty, and engaged in work that must be discharged with the utmost exactitude, that adds so much to the discontent of these poorly paid and absolutely indispensable servants of the public. For them, very often, no leave of absence is possible, no relaxation of their burden, however brief, is to be thought of. There is a dreadfully pathetic story, as I always thought, of a Welsh signalman, whose child was taken ill one night. He was a widower, and his cottage stood alone, and there was no one to help him nurse the poor child, who was as the light of his eyes. When the morning came he was able to get help, but he went to the signal box half-dazed for lack of sleep, and tormented by anxiety. What was the result? The inevitable happened. He pulled the wrong lever: a train was wrecked, lives lost—and the signalman, the martyr of a system, had

To Face a Charge of Manslaughter, only Narrowly Escaping Conviction.

That escape is only typical of thousands of others. The railway servant must know something of the stoicism of the Roman sentries at Pompeii, who stuck to their posts when covered by the lava of the volcano. Come frost, come heat, come death, come sorrow—the railwayman must be at his post at the appointed hour. "Romance," wrote Kipling, "brought in the nine fifteen." Aye, truly, but it was the romance of grim, human fortitude, of poignant suffering, of duty done while all that the doer cares for lies—he knows not—whether dead or alive.

For the quite exceptional strain which this sort of heroism imposes on him the railway servant of whatever grade gets no adequate compensation. Why is this?

It would be unfair to blame the companies altogether. As I have said, by a curious paradox, while the capital and the mileage of the companies have expanded, the profits earned have shrunk. From 1871-1910 the prosperity of the companies waned perceptibly; a fact that is apparent from the following table, showing the average proportion of nett receipts to paid-up capital:

|--------------------------|--------------------------|
| 1871-1875=4.56 per cent. | 1891-1895=3.80 per cent. |
| 1876-1880=4.29 " | 1896-1900=3.64 " |
| 1881-1885=4.22 " | 1901-1905=3.38 " |

while on the ordinary capital, which is not quite the same thing, dividends decreased from 4.7 per cent. during the period 1873-5 to 3.8 per cent. in 1910; although during practically the same period the number of passengers increased from 375,218,000 to 1,306,729,000.

What is the reason for this strange discrepancy? In large part it is to be accounted for by increase in prices of materials. Then, again, while the fact that ours was the earliest the pioneer railway system gave us many advantages, it had its serious drawbacks. The rolling stock was soon rendered obsolete. The old 5-8-ton wagons became hopelessly out of date. Immense expenditure had to be undertaken to bring our companies into line with the railways of the Colonies, the States, and Russia, while, it must never be forgotten (especially in view of the demand for nationalisation) that hanging round the necks of the railway companies is which years ago they had to pay in law costs, Parliamentary expenses, and as "compensation" to landowners. The millions for which they were then bled are still being paid for by the sweated porters of Euston and the over-worked engine-drivers of Crewe. It cost the U.S.A. £11,500 per mile to build her railways. Belgium paid £13,280. Germany £18,235. England paid £49,000, of which £7,000 went to the landowners, and £2,000 to the lawyers! It is not only in matters of private conduct that the sins of the fathers are visited upon the children unto the third and fourth generation. To-day we are being mulcted, railway servant and consumer alike, for the insensate terms which our grandfathers exacted at the height of the railway mania.

So far as the man on the iron lines is concerned, he has to pay for that mad hour of national delirium twice over. First, as we have seen, his wages are grossly inadequate. Secondly, he is the victim of fatal and dreadful accidents to an extent that would not be tolerated in any other walk of life. Take, for instance, the case of the platelayer. The records are strewn with reports of accidents to men on the permanent way.

"We Look Out for Ourselves"

is a much-quoted sentence at inquests on platelayers killed at work—meaning that the "watcher," which the Act of Parliament says ought to be provided, has been conspicuous by his absence, with the result that an express train has descended upon a poor platelayer and cut him to pieces. In 1906 there were no less than 101 of these platelayers killed and 126 injured, and, despite the strictures of Government inspectors, the figures remain fearfully high.

It is only fair to the companies to say that they insist that many of these accidents are the direct result of the men's own carelessness, and before me as I write is an elaborate series of instructions, telling the men how these untoward happenings may be avoided. But it cannot be said that the record of the companies in the matter is a good one. They have fought automatic couplings, for instance, tooth and nail long after their practicability and efficiency were demonstrated beyond all reasonable doubt. Even as I write, those very couplings, which the companies insist are useless, are being made by the thousand in England for the State railways of Egypt and India, but 336 British shunters and forty-eight couplers were injured on our iron lines last year, while the total number of casualties reached the appalling figure of 22,498! There are grounds only too strong for the belief that, just as the mortality among railway passengers was reduced by additional and, of course, expensive precautions, so could these thousands be spared also. But that means, of course, a reduction in the profits of the companies, and a loss to the millions of shareholders (the L. and N.-W. have upwards of 100,000 on their register alone), who are representative of every class of society; while any further increase in railway rates or goods charges to recoup them is just now unthinkable.

It would, of course, be a mistake to think of the railway servant's life as one long, unrelieved round of toil and hardship. He has many advantages. His employment is constant and assured, and, if he keeps his place, his home need never be haunted by that dreadful spectre of unemployment, which darkens the lives of many better paid workers. In the country he often has his little garden or allotment against the line, where he can grow vegetables. Generally, which is so essential to good housewifery. Nearly always is it neat and attractive, and the fact that nearly all the companies help to provide for their men by a superannuation scheme, to which they contribute, is another factor that makes for security in the railway men's employment.

None the less, it is difficult, as one looks along the iron lines, and waits to hear the express come thundering past the empty countryside and through the quiet country station, to see peace ahead. The men are perfecting a mighty organisation, and are feeling every day the pinch of higher prices. The shareholders are pressing for more dividends. The directors need even more capital. And all the time the friction engendered of innumerable controversies, of bitter complaints of unredressed grievances, grows tenser and more acute. One calls to mind that wonderful chapter of Zola that ends with the lost train and its dead driver dashing on and on along the line at a breakneck speed—to reach safety or catastrophe, who can tell? And that, one feels, typifies the British railway system itself.

THE NEW POET LAUREATE * * * BY ERNEST RHYS

THE first thing one thought of on hearing that Robert Bridges had been made Poet-Laureate was that the office had fallen to a true lyric poet. Most clearly and most unaffectedly among the versemen of our time he has lived by the old genuine lyric tradition in his writing. The sung word, the open phrase, the musical idea, and the responsive rise and fall, crescend and cadence have always been a part of his equipment. He has never mistaken verse for prose, or prose for verse, and his art has been a labour and a joy, and has, we may say, come naturally to him.

The best way to give his voice effect in the printed page is to let its accents be heard, and, if possible, after a fashion to show how they accord with, and where they differ from, the notes of other men and women. There is no need to enter on comparisons with his actual forerunners in the office, or speak of the poet Pye, or the victims of Dryden and Pope, or attempt to find his altitude in a constellation that included an Alfred major and an Alfred minor. But it belongs to the verse of the real melodist to set the chorus of the whole woodside going; and so it is with the freshness of the song of Dr. Bridges:

"Who will be clerk?
I, said the Lark."

He leads the antiphony, because the delight of the morning and the sense of night past and day new-begun are in him, as they were in the earlier men and the poets of the youth of the world. Listening to him, we are reminded now of Hobbinol, now of the Elizabethans, now again of the Lutanists, or Herrick and Campion: not because he has imitated them, but because he has touched the springs of melody which set old rhythms vibrating.

It is a test of the lyric writer that he is able to take up the theme of the reverdie, the spring's return, and use the old notes, yet make them seem new as the first daylight over the hilltop. The thrush uses the motive and the rhythm of a thousand summers; but his April invocation is never a whit diminished in the apparent reckless, delicious exuberance and wild novelty of tune and theme. Hear this lyric ode in octaves—a spring invitation to the country. Direct as Campion's at his frankest, it has the touch, hard to explain, that tells of emotion genuinely and individually felt:

"The freshets are unbound,
And, leaping from the hill,
Their mossy banks refill
With strains of light and sound;
And, scattered down the meads,
From hour to hour unfold
A thousand buds and beads
In stars and cups of gold.

"Now hear, and see, and note,
The farms are all astir,
And every labourer
Has doffed his winter coat;
And now with specks of white
They dot the brown hillside,
Or jaunt and sing outright
As by their teams they ride."

In such verse the writer preserves the unconscious air that one asks of the born song-maker; and it is a good and healthy sign in him that he is not afraid of repeating things, or taking a word, a line, an allusion, an idiom out of the greater currency of the lyric tongue. Where he has taken pleasure in other rhymers' verses, he will make much of it, and play upon their phrase and weave rhyme around their given word. In the reply-song to that just quoted, e.g., he opens one octave with an echo:

"One long in city pent Forgets, or must complain . . ."

He abounds in choice appropriations and adaptations of the irresistible words from the Bible, or from the old master-singers, which the custom of the craft allows to the real craftsman. He will base a lyric on a phrase like "I will not let thee go."

What are the events in such a poet's life? He walked across a clover field in July; renewed his pulses and his memories in a flowery mead; went, as George Herbert used to go, to hear music in a great or a little church; saw Death pass on the highway, and met his own youth in the shadow of Cypris' shrine, at the elbow of Psyche. These sound like nothing in the newspaper, they count for little in the hurly-burly of men; they built up his arch of days nevertheless, through which he spied the first and last things. If you think this points to a writer of only one mood and one venture of the imagination, you are wrong. Try one of his winter pieces, or a November cartoon, and then turn the page to his ballad of "The Winnowers," which opens—

"Betwixt two billows of the downs
The little hamlet lies,
And nothing sees but the bald crowns
Of the hills, and the blue skies.

"Clustering beneath the long descent
And grey slopes of the wold,
The red roofs nestle, overspent,
With lichen yellow as gold. . ."

A true musician, Dr. Bridges is one of the very few men of our time who have understood the delicate exactions of the art of writing words for music. Occasionally one comes on a song, such as the following, which must have been written to fit a definite melody:

"I praise the gentle maid,
Whose happy voice and smile
To confidence betrayed
My doleful heart awhile:
And gave my spirit deploring
Fresh wings for soaring.

"The maid for very fear
Of love I durst not tell;
The rose could never hear,
Though I bespake her well;
So in my song I bind them,
For all to find them."

We do not usually look for sonnets in a song-writer. A sonnet is a sort of frozen song—a lyric in a mould. But it is in "Sonnet 62" of the Collected Poems that Dr. Bridges has given us the key to his lyric creed—

"I will be what God made me, nor protest Against the bent of genius in my time,
That science of my friends robs all the best,
While I love beauty, and was born to rhyme.

"Be they our mighty men, and let me dwell
In shadow among the mighty shades of old,
With love's forsaken palace for my cell;
Whence I look forth, and all the world behold.

What is consoling about his poetry, too, is for the reader to find that he can carry all the accumulated burden of culture, and use Greek precedent, and work out the hardest puzzles of prosody without destroying for a moment his English naturalness of verse. He is like a man of the early time who wears the robe of the twentieth century, being, in fact, a freeman of that region which is not bound by time. Another day it may be possible to speak of his Masks and Dramas.

MYSTICISM * * * BY DR. PERCY DEARMER

I.

OUR age is an age of some perplexity, but of much hope. It is perplexing, because the world has been moving more rapidly during our lifetime than ever before. There is for most people a great gulf between themselves and their bringing up: our point of view is so different from that of our fathers that we cannot reason as they did; and for most of us it is difficult, if not impossible, to think things out afresh. Some seek out new religions, taking with them a double dose of credulity; some try to re-state the old; some drift into an indifference, which is the worst sort of negation.

Yet it is a hopeful age. Materialism is crumbling away, with its attendant pessimism, and man is recovering, with undeniable rapidity, the spiritual view of life. M. Bergson's recent address to the Society for Psychical Research was a notable instance of the decay of scientific materialism, for he was able to declare that, not only from the psychological, but also from the anatomical side, the brain is now found to be, not the creator of thought, but the means whereby thought establishes relations with material things—the organ of the spirit, in fact.

II.

It is, therefore, no wonder that there should be at this time a great revival of Mysticism, since Mysticism clears away perplexities and brings spiritual light even to those who cannot claim to be athletes in its difficult way. Now what is Mysticism? It has nothing to do with mistiness or mysteriousness. It is simply the way of contemplation, the seeking of union with the Divine, independently of the organs of sense. It is the focussing of the highest part of man—of his fundamental being—upon that ultimate Reality which is the Supreme Being, which, in fact, is God. Cor ad cor loquitur—"Heart speaks to heart"—is the best epigram of Mysticism.

One cannot, then, wonder that Mysticism comes as a breath of fresh air to many who had been disgusted by the formalism of much religious teaching, or who had lost their faith in the dogmatic framework of Christianity. It is always a fault among religious ministers to teach religion as if it were all framework, to forget the wine in their insistence upon the excellence of the bottles. Men hear religion propounded as if it were all a matter of phrases and words by those who sometimes forget the high realities which the words try to express—and must always express more or less inadequately. Therefore some grow impatient, and forget on their side that the mind of man must try to express itself in words, that everyone must have his philosophy, that without bottles the wine will be spilt. We cannot wonder. Many preachers are mortally adept at provoking reaction in their hearers. It is natural that thousands of people should turn to the direct access into the sanctuary which Mysticism offers—frequently without their having any quarrel with orthodoxy. To this the most orthodox cannot object: indeed, the more sure such a one is of the truth of his dogmatic framework, the more confident he ought to be that his orthodoxy will be vindicated by men seeking after God. Prævalebit veritas.

III.

And Mysticism is far from being unorthodox. It is only comprehensive; for, being concerned with the seeking after that ultimate Reality which lies behind appearances (the Mystics call it Union with God), Mysticism is at home in many orthodoxies, and Mystics are found in all religions; that is to say, good men have been able to find God, in whatever religion they followed—not that all religions are equally good, but that all are religions, all embody generations of spiritual experience, and have learnt the methods of saints, and even in their superstitions express the pathetic strivings of the multitudes, the search of common sorrowing humanity after comfort and truth.

So Mysticism meets another need of our times—the desire to find a synthesis for all the religions of the world. Nor is this so difficult as it seems; for modern research has proved to us that even the natives of Central Africa, with all their idols and savage ideas, yet believe in a Supreme God far above their crude pantheons. There is a synthesis, and the Mystic has found it; for in every religion, however debased, there are a few who seek to bring the turbulent soul of man into union with the Supreme Being. And in all religions there are some who have succeeded, and have won an unearthly grandeur which the world has never failed to recognise.

IV.

In the future that lies immediately before us there is likely to be a great increase in the mystical way of taking life. The Mystics themselves will always be a small company; for they are the geniuses of religion—men or women of immense will, of great capacities, of a rare power of endurance, who are like the artist in their intuition and concentration, and are ready to sacrifice everything for their sacred quest. But in the humbler strata of humanity, an increasing number will follow the mystic way, and will gain their souls in quietness and contemplation.

This lower Mysticism will obviously be a great help to those who hang loosely or not at all by Christian orthodoxy. There are many "broad" views, much modernism, a good deal of hesitancy in accepting this or that article of the Creed. This undogmatic frame of mind is likely to increase; for we are by no means through our long age of transition, and people can hardly settle their philosophy while science is changing so rapidly. There are many also who, without denying traditional beliefs, will seek out a way for themselves in which traditional beliefs form a small part. There will be some loss in all this—some disastrous destruction of bottles; but, after all, the important thing is that men should become more spiritual, and—the truth will prevail.

V.

Meanwhile it is significant that the great Mystics of history have been singularly untroubled by theological difficulties, and have generally been perfectly content with the religion in which they were born. There is much wisdom in this. People often run off with some particular "difficulty" when, if they would be content to wait a few years, concentrating themselves upon what is still true to them, they would find that their stumbling-block was no difficulty at all, or it may be that it was an unimportant accretion which they are better without. Anyhow, it is characteristic of those great religious geniuses whom we call Mystics that they seldom wanted to change their religion. They were content to improve it. They were too intensely interested in the Creator to trouble themselves about the theological disputations of their time. Sometimes when, like Saint Paul, they were being held back and depraved by the religion of their birth, they embraced a higher faith; but, as a rule, Catholics and Protestants, Buddhists and Mohammedans, have been content to worship God in their old way, only losing in the process some of the exclusiveness and negations of their own Church. The Mystics found the wine in their bottles, and were content. They did not, like bad workmen, complain of their tools; though they improved them, and often added new tools to those they already possessed.

LITERARY NOTES

MR. ROBERT HICHENS is one of the few novelists who keeps up the "level" of his reputation. The issue of a new novel by this author is somewhat of an event in literary circles, and the present season, with the exception of the publication of "Sons and Lovers," has been so bare of successful romances that the reading public will look forward to the appearance of "The Way of Ambition," the title Mr. Hichens has selected, by Messrs. Methuen next month. This versatile novelist has scored a success in a variety of styles. He has written a fine series of studies in the supernatural, has touched on the sex problem in that inimitable book, "The Woman of the Fan," and has given us plenty of adventure. But while we realise his dramatic force and clever characterisation, and admire to the full the emotional surge in the greatest of his novels, "The Garden of Allah," we go back with longing and regret to one of his earliest, but perhaps the most delightful of his books. The "Prophet of Berkeley Square" is written with that spirit of adventure and sense of humour that are the rarest things in the novel of to-day. The exquisite series of telegrams sent by the Prophet to his faithful disciple is unmatched in modern times, and we still nourish the hope that Mr. Hichens may some day be prevailed upon to return to the country of rollicking fun and hair-breadth adventures.

There is no end to the boom in "Mark Rutherford." Mr. Milford is shortly publishing a volume of "Autobiographical Notes." Originally planned for the use only of his family and friends, the author subsequently realised that they might possibly be utilised for a wider public, and prepared them for that purpose. The volume will be edited by Miss White, Mark Rutherford's daughter, and will include certain portraits of interest to his admirers. It is interesting to note that this author, who occupies an almost unique niche in contemporary literature, and who combines an extreme reticence with an almost meticulous care in the revision of his MSS., should have left the British Museum an interesting collection of books and documents.

It is difficult to imagine that Thomas Hardy could be improved by illustration. It is rare, indeed, that the temperament of the artist coincides so closely with the author's that the union of pen and pencil is a happy one. It is with some amount of apprehension, therefore, that we learn that "Under the Greenwood Tree" is to be published by Messrs. Chatto and Windus with coloured pictures. The artist selected is Mr. Keith Henderson, and we learn that he has attempted to reproduce the spirit of Hardy by adopting the methods of the Dutch School as applied to rural painting. We have, perhaps, much to be thankful for in that this innovation does not apply to "Tess." Much harm cannot be done to the countryside as Hardy shows it us, but to attempt the reproduction of a woman so complex as Tess, at once tragic and passionate, would be, we feel, a task beyond the capacity of modern art.

The recreations of popular novelists would furnish material for an amusing volume. Mr. H. G. Wells has invented an ingenious and delightful war game, played with tin soldiers and mimic cannon, but involving a knowledge of strategy and of the art of manoeuvring that renders it most exciting. So absorbing does he find it that he is always ready to devote an afternoon to a sham fight, and literary men of divers temperaments find it as fascinating as does the author of "The War of the Worlds." A young literary critic who has already made his mark finds intense satisfaction in the culture of white mice. He carries a specimen with him in the pocket of his coat, and regards it as a mascot. Its presence, he says, has never failed to clinch his point with a recalcitrant publisher on the question of royalties.

The cult of the cinema has come to stay. Nowadays enterprising firms negotiate for the right to reproduce the most striking scenes from a successful play, and the vogue for telling the tale of a popular novel on the film has proved very popular, though the attempt to depict the masterpieces of English fiction on the sheet has not altogether caught on. The art of the novel is too distinct from the play to render such an attempt easy. One received something of a shock at witnessing Becky Sharp on the stage. The acting version of that inimitable adventuress suggested a different personality to Thackeray's creation; and if the dramatisation of "Vanity Fair" failed to bring home the genius of the novel, a pictorial representation of that comedy of English manners would be even less successful. The serial story is perhaps the best fitted for the film. Hairbreadth escapes and romantic adventures follow one upon the other in the popular newspaper feuilleton, and lend themselves admirably for reproduction on the sheet.

The magazines of to-day, though superior in number to those of fifty years ago, compare unfavourably as to quality. It may be said of the mass of periodicals that there are but six short stories, and that they are regularly retold month after month, garnished with different trappings. The tales are, for the most part, concerned with people of large incomes or with none, the two extremes of the social scale, with occasional stories about flappers. The middle-class is rarely touched on. The clever, thoughtful, and at the same time witty stories of Mrs. Riddell that appeared half a century ago in the Cornhill have no prototype to-day. The clerk is without a chronicler once he has passed the starvation limit. The hard-working doctor of the parish is unnoticed. The novel of psychology has taken the place of the narrative of everyday things, everyday but yet eternal. "One cannot write convincingly about love unless the heroine has a good income and plenty of leisure," said a popular author to the writer. "And you don't find either, except among wealthy, cultured people." The middle-class is for the moment crowded out; there is plenty of room for a novelist who deals with this not inconsiderable section of the community.

MASTERPIECE FOR THE WEEK

DOSTOEVSKY'S "THE IDIOT" * * * BY RICHARD CURLE

MRS. GARNETT has chosen as the second volume of her translation of Dostoevsky the novel which he himself preferred to all his other books. As Mr. Baring says so well in his "Landmarks of Russian Literature," "Into the character of the hero of this book Dostoevsky has put all the sweetness of his nature, all his sympathy with the unfortunate, all his pity for the sick, all his understanding and love of children. The character of Prince Myshkin reflects all that is best in Dostoevsky." This prince is, himself, "The Idiot"—a young man in whom the disease of epilepsy has affected the brain in a curious way. He is extraordinarily simple and extraordinarily profound. This character of his, at once so child-like, so understanding, and so compassionate, draws to him irresistibly the regard and love of all whom he meets. From his very first day in Petersburg (whither he has travelled from a "home" in Switzerland), he becomes the centre of an amazing and highly complicated drama. But amongst all these wild, inflamed, fantastic happenings, he retains a simple-minded sincerity that little by little disarms all suspicion and ridicule. In the end he is desperately loved by two women—Nastasya Filippovna and Aglaia Ivanovna Epanchin. And it is round this strange affair that the book is imagined. Nastasya is a figure of tragic intensity, a "lost woman" who cannot drown her despair in dissipation or excuses, whereas Aglaia is a young girl of a pure, feverish, and self-willed nature that will brook no restraint. The prince is in love with Aglaia, but his pity for Nastasya is an almost deeper emotion. Nastasya, too, has a lover—Rogozhin, a man of boundless will and determination, a terrible man. Nastasya fears him, but he attracts her as a basilisk might. As for Rogozhin, he is devoured by passion and jealousy. . . .

The chief events take place near Petersburg, and, though the story is enormously long, involved, and even incoherent, the time it covers is but short. All sorts of things happen—the most unexpected and maddest things—but through them the main current shines sufficiently clear. At the very moment when all is settled in Aglaia's mind that she will marry Myshkin, when all her doubts have vanished once and for ever, at that very moment he leaves her to protect the suffering and wronged Nastasya. This frightful crisis of affairs begins to undermine his recovered sanity. From now onwards his simplicity, his quietness, and his gentleness, are more marked. The date of his marriage to Nastasya is hurried on, but, on the very day of the wedding, Rogozhin appears and carries her off to Petersburg with him. He murders her there the next morning so that now all chance of losing her love shall be gone for ever. Myshkin follows, instinctively knowing all, and together he and Rogozhin spend the night by the bedside of the dead Nastasya.

" . . . When, after many hours, the doors were opened and people came in, they found the murderer completely unconscious and raving. Myshkin was sitting beside him motionless on the floor, and every time the delirious man broke into screaming or babble he hastened to pass his trembling hand softly over his hair and cheeks, as though caressing and soothing him. But by now he could understand no questions he was asked, and did not recognise the people surrounding him; and if Schneider himself had come from Switzerland to look at his former pupil and patient, remembering the condition in which Myshkin had sometimes been during the first year of his stay in Switzerland, he would have flung up his hands in despair and would have said, as he said then, 'An idiot!'

This is certainly one of the most thrilling and moving of all Dostoevsky's novels—in its own way, indeed, the most moving of all. It abounds in scenes and incidents that no other man could have come near to writing. And its creative power is most astonishing. The beautiful and pathetic figure of Myshkin is surrounded by a host of living and memorable people. Aglaia and her mother, Madame Epanchin, are amongst the finest figures of Dostoevsky; so, also, are Nastasya (a type almost outside anyone else's comprehension) and Rogozhin himself. And very typical of Dostoevsky's genius are men like Lebedyev, the cunning, foolish, and self-abasing busybody; old Ivogin, the thief and liar; and his so different sons Ganya and Kolya; and, in fact, a score of other characters. In the confused and disordered nightmare of events these people stand out with marvellous reality. Dostoevsky is the supreme psychologist. He floods the dark places of the soul as no other writer has ever done. And always he speaks of suffering and vice with the absolute conviction of a fellow-sinner, rather than with the cold wisdom of a teacher. That is why he is so beloved and respected in Russia, and that is why to everyone, all over the world, he is becoming recognised as one of the greatest writers that has ever lived.

Warm thanks must be given to Mrs. Garnett for her able, arduous, and most necessary labour.

RESULT OF "EVERYMAN" REFERENDUM

A VERY large number of entries have been received for the Referendum, "The Ten Most Popular Articles in the First Twenty-six Numbers of EVERYMAN." Unfortunately, few competitors have strictly complied with the conditions of the competition, the vast majority having voted for a series instead of voting for individual articles. It has, therefore, been very difficult to adjudicate on the results, and the prizes have been equally divided between the following three competitors:—

MICHEL-ANGE

IL y a quatre hommes qui, dans les arts et dans les lettres, se sont élevés au-dessus de tous les autres, tellement au-dessus qu'ils semblent d'une race à part: Dante, Shakespeare, Beethoven et Michel-Ange. Ni la science profonde, ni la possession complète de toutes les ressources de l'art, ni la fécondité de l'imagination, ni l'originalité de l'esprit, n'ont suffi à leur donner cette place: ils ont eu tout cela; mais tout cela est secondaire. Ce qui les a portés à ce rang, c'est leur âme, une âme de dieu tombé, tout entière soulevée par un effort irrésistible vers un monde disproportionné au nôtre, toujours combattante et souffrante, toujours en travail et en tempête, et qui, incapable de s'assouvir comme de s'abattre, s'emploie solitairement à dresser devant les hommes des colosses aussi effrénés, aussi forts, aussi dououreusement sublimes que son impuissant et insatiable désir.

Par ce trait, Michel-Ange est moderne, et c'est pour cela peut-être qu'aujourd'hui nous le comprenons sans effort. A-t-il été plus infortuné que les autres hommes? Quand on regarde les événements du dehors, il semble que non. Mais la souffrance se mesure à l'ébranlement de l'être intérieur, non au choc des choses extérieures, et s'il y a ou jamais une âme capable de transports, de frémissements et d'indignation, c'est celle-là. Dès sa jeunesse il s'était déplié dans les compagnies, et s'était renfermé dans l'étude et le silence au point de paraître orgueilleux ou fou. Plus tard, au faite de la gloire, il s'y plongea plus avant encore, se promenant seul, servi par un seul domestique, passant seul des semaines entières sur ses échafauds, tout entier à la conversation qu'il avait incessamment avec lui-même. C'est qu'il ne trouvait personne autre qui lui répondit. Non-seulement ses sentiments étaient trop forts, mais encore ils étaient trop hauts. Dès sa première adolescence, il avait aimé sans mesure toutes les choses nobles: son art d'abord, auquel il s'était livré malgré les brutalités de son père, et qu'il avait approfondi dans tous ses accessoires, le compas et scalpel à la main, avec une ténacité extraordinaire, jusqu'à devenir malade; ensuite sa dignité, qu'il avait maintenue, au péril de sa tête, en face des papes les plus impérieux, jusqu'à se faire respecter comme un égal et les braver "plus que n'aurait fait un roi de France." Il avait méprisé les plaisirs ordinaires: "quoique riche, il avait vécu comme un homme pauvre," frugal, dînant souvent d'un morceau de pain, laborieux, dur à son corps, dormant peu et quelquefois tout habillé, sans luxe, sans train de maison, sans souci de l'argent, donnant ses statues et ses tableaux à ses amis, 20,000 francs à son domestique, 30,000 ou 40,000 francs en une fois à son neveu, quantité de sommes à sa famille.

Un jour, vieux et décrépît, quelqu'un le rencontra près du Colisée, à pied et dans la neige, et lui demanda, "Où allez-vous?"—"A l'école, pour tâcher d'apprendre quelque chose." A la fin il va jusqu'à se déprendre de lui-même, "de cet art qui fut son monarque et son idole; peinture ou statuaire, que rien maintenant ne vienne distraire mon âme tournée vers le divin amour qui sur la croix ouvrit les bras pour nous recevoir." Dernier soupir d'une grande âme dans un siècle gâté, chez un peuple asservi; pour elle, le renoncement est le seul refuge. Soixante années durant, ses œuvres n'ont fait que rendre visible le combat héroïque qui jusqu'au bout s'est livré dans son cœur.

MICHAEL ANGELO

THERE are four men in the world of art and of literature above all others, and to such a degree as to seem to belong to another race, namely, Dante, Shakespeare, Beethoven, and Michael Angelo. No profound knowledge, no full possession of all the resources of art, no fertility of imagination, no originality of intellect, sufficed to secure them this position, for these they all had; these, moreover, are of secondary importance; that which elevated them to this rank is their soul, the soul of a fallen deity, struggling irresistibly after a world disproportionate to our own, always suffering and combating, always toiling and tempestuous, and, as incapable of being sated as of sinking, devoting itself in solitude to erecting before men colossi as ungovernable, as vigorous, and as sadly sublime as its own insatiable and impotent desire.

Michael Angelo is thus a modern spirit, and it is for this reason, perhaps, that we are able to comprehend him without effort. Was he more unfortunate than other men? Regarding things externally, it seems that he was not. Suffering, however, must be measured by inward emotion, and not by outward circumstance, and if ever a spirit existed capable of transports of enthusiasm and tremors of indignation, it was his. From his youth up, society was distasteful to him; he had so applied himself to study in solitude as to be considered proud or insane. Later, at the acme of his fame, he plunged still deeper into it; he took solitary walks, was served by one domestic, and passed entire weeks on scaffoldings wholly absorbed in self-communion. And this because he could hold converse with no other mind. Not only were his sentiments too powerful, but again they were too exalted. From his earliest years he cherished a passionate love for all noble things, and first for his art, to which he gave himself up entirely, notwithstanding his father's brutality, investigating all its accessories with compass and scalpel in hand, and with such extraordinary persistence that he became ill; and next, his self-respect, which he maintained at the risk of his life, facing imperious popes even to forcing them to regard him as an equal, braving them "more than a king of France would have done." He held ordinary pleasures in contempt; although rich, he lived like a poor man, often dining on a crust of bread; and laboriously, treating himself severely, sleeping but little, and often in his clothes, without luxury of any kind, without household display, without care for money, giving away statues and pictures to his friends, 20,000 francs to his servant, 30,000 or 40,000 francs at once to his nephew, besides countless other sums to the rest of his family.

One day, aged and decrepit, some one encountered him near the Colosseum on foot and in the snow; on being asked, "Where are you going?" "To school," he replied, "to try and learn something." Finally he goes so far as to separate himself from himself, from that art which was his monarch and his idol; "picture or statue, let nothing now divert my soul from that divine love on the cross, whose arms are always open to receive us!" The last sigh of a great soul in a degenerate age, and among an enslaved people! Self-renunciation is his last refuge. For sixty years his works do no more than make visible the heroic combat which maintained itself in his breast to the end.

JOSEPH CONRAD: AN ATTEMPT AT APPRECIATION

By ARTHUR L. SALMON

I.

JOSEPH CONRAD has accomplished two things, one of which might have been considered wildly improbable, the other of which we should deem impossible if it had not been done. Born a Russian Pole, by sheer choice and determination he made himself a seaman of the British merchant service, gaining his master's certificate; and by the same choice and determination he who up to the age of fifteen or sixteen knew no English has made himself an English writer, in which vocation also he has won his certificate as master. He tells us that he was in a Marseilles pilot-boat, sailing in it for pleasure and not on service, when he first "heard himself addressed in English—the speech of my secret choice, of my future, of long friendships, of the deepest affections, of hours of toil and hours of ease, and of solitary hours, too; of books read, of thoughts pursued, of remembered emotions—of my very dreams!" And he adds that if still, "after being fashioned by it in that part of me which cannot die, I dare not claim it aloud as my own, then, at any rate, it is the speech of my children." Clearly, the speech of Shakespeare and Milton is an integral and most vital thing with Mr. Conrad, as his mastery of it is profound and wonderful. It was in the Paris Revue of 1903 that M. Waliszewski drew the attention of Europe to this extraordinary case of "literary naturalisation." Mr. Conrad has done much since that date, but perhaps he has produced nothing more striking than some of the tales that M. Waliszewski then analysed. He had already given the world his volumes entitled "Youth," "Typhoon," and "Lord Jim." He had already achieved not only some great literature; but surely we may assert that one of his tales, "Heart of Darkness," did much to arouse the sympathies of English-speaking peoples in regard to the horrors of the Congo. The writer does not pose as reformer, as philanthropist, as an author of definite moral purpose; but he did this thing by the grim force of his art, and perhaps more successfully because, in a sense, it was a side-issue.

II.

Mr. Conrad's true surname is Korzeniowski. Taking his place of choice in English literature, he wisely abandoned it; yet it is a name of repute, of literary importance in the history of Poland. It remains his, with all the significance of its antecedents, although he put it on one side as incongruous with his present position. He was born in the heart of the Ukraine, in 1857. A grand-uncle of his, who must have been a man of striking personality, had served in the army of Napoleon during the Russian invasion, and had once been reduced to eating dog. Ever since hearing this, his distinguished descendant has had a prejudice against the Little Corporal, as though Napoleon had been directly responsible for the brave man's being driven to such fare. Does not a trace of the impression made by this memory come out in the tale of "Falk," but intensified and deepened—for Falk had eaten human flesh, not dog? But although Mr. Conrad has given the world a volume of reminiscences, the glimpses of autobiography that he affords us are elusive and shadowy. If he has some of the necessary egotism of the artist, it is not an egotism of forwardness, of self-conceit; it is the essence of humility, of reserve, of dignified restraint. For his true autobiography we must go to his fiction, or to such a book as "The Mirror of the Sea"; and here, by an instinct of sympathy, we can separate the actual from the fictitious—though in spirit the fictitious and the actual are often equally real. That in his early childhood, owing to the Polish rising of 1863, his family had to leave Russia; that he was educated at Cracow; that in young boyhood he decided to become a sailor, and "an English sailor"—all this we know; and we should like to know more. We also know that his first story, "Almayer's Folly," was carried about with him in an unfinished state during many years, on shipboard and elsewhere, till its publication in 1895 acquainted the discerning critics with the advent of a new psychologist. It was a sombre book—most of Mr. Conrad's books are sombre—but it clearly foreshadowed the author's coming triumphs, both in description and in the analysis of mental conditions. The English was admirable, with scarcely a trace of what we may call foreign accent. There were a few such traces, as there are still on rare occasions—a faint, subtle tone of the language acquired, not native. If we did not know that the writer had been born to a different speech, and were not therefore on the watch, not one of a thousand of us would detect anything—perhaps not one in a hundred thousand.

III.

But that which is scarcely present at all in the language is present in the mental workings, the psychology; though here again we have the advantage of knowing Mr. Conrad's antecedents, and therefore being prepared to notice. Neither as a point of appreciation or depreciation, but simply as a racial fact, we are compelled to assert that the psychology of Joseph Conrad is not that of a Briton nor of an American; it is Slavic, more akin to the psychology of Dostoevsky. We get at the naked soul with this writer in a manner almost new to English literature; we get also what appears to be an utter absence of moral motive. Everywhere we have the attitude of the onlooker, but it is the onlooker who sees deep below the surface, whose sympathy is intense without being exactly emotional; sometimes there is almost what seems to be a cold curiosity, a remoteness. In such a tale as "The End of his Tether" no word of pity is spared for Captain Whalley; yet we know that his creator pities him to the depth of his heart's core. The story of his heroic struggle is told ruthlessly, critically—a careless reader might almost say heartlessly. This is really the triumph of Mr. Conrad's art; he appears to be standing aloof, when no doubt his sympathies are quivering with their tense earnestness. Sometimes it may be he approaches the grotesque, the bizarre, the unreal. For instance, "The Nigger of the Narcissus" may be a fine psychologic study—undoubtedly it is so; but it lacks appeal to our deeper natures; it fails somewhat in sustained interest. What M. Waliszewski calls its "acute and penetrating analysis of details" has more to do with psychology than with art. Again, in the tremendous tempest that is the subject matter of "Typhoon," there is too great a piling of the agony; it is like a condensed description of a hundred tempests rather than the picture of one. Its vivid power cannot be disputed; but if it be possible to exaggerate such a thing as a storm at sea it seems to be done here, so that the amassing of details remains slightly unconvincing. It was in these earlier books, and in his fine volume, "The Mirror of the Sea," that Mr. Conrad paid tribute to his old vocation; but it may not be unkind to suggest that he is never quite so happy when he is far from the coast; that his true sphere is aboard, or at least in port. The sea has entered into his soul; he remains a seaman to the end. The literature of the English language has had some famous names in the department of sea romance, from Smollett and Marryat to Fenimore Cooper and Melville. There is also Mr. Clark Russell, who is at least inventive and exciting. But it was left to a foreigner to bring a still finer art into his relation with sea subjects. The only one of the above-mentioned names that might perhaps be brought into comparison with Mr. Conrad is that of Herman Melville, whose "Moby Dick" is certainly a masterpiece of what may be called sea-psychology. Yet any such joining of names must be entirely futile. In a literary sense Conrad had no predecessors, though he is certainly winning imitators. We can hardly imagine that Stacpoole's "Pools of Silence," a powerful and most useful book, would have been written had it not been for Conrad's "Heart of Darkness."

IV.

It is impossible here to deal separately with all the author's works. One in which the sea is quite deserted, "The Secret Agent," is a grim study of anarchy and human character. There is indeed no need to under-value anything that has been written by this earnest and zealous pen; it is even possible that some may find the greatest proofs of Mr. Conrad's genius in books like his "Nostromo," his "Set of Six," his recent "Twixt Land and Sea." But there will be not a few who will detect the finest flower of his work in some of the earlier books, especially perhaps in "Youth"; and in parts of the book that he wrote from the intensity of his feeling as a sailor. His "Mirror of the Sea" is a work of subtle atmospheric effect; it deals with land-falls and departures, the overdue and the missing, the grip of the earth and the mystery of the ocean. And here the writer is thoroughly at home; here he becomes sometimes rhapsodical, often poetic. As he has taken the acuteness of his psychology into the depths of African forests, up the tangle of tropic rivers, so he has brought it here, to his consideration not only of those who "do business on great waters," but also of the vessels in which they embark, the wharves and quays at which they find harbourage.

THE tow-rope had been let go at the blast of the whistle. Before he had time to cry out or to move a limb, he saw her cast adrift and shooting across the gunboat's stern with the impetus of her speed. . . . The cries on board of her came to him only as a dreadful and confused murmur through the loud thumping of blood in his ears, while she held on. She ran upright in a terrible display of her gift of speed, with an incomparable air of life and grace. She ran on till the smooth level of water in front of her bows seemed to sink down suddenly as if sucked away; and, with a strange, violent tremor of her mastsheads she stopped, inclined her lofty spars a little, and lay still. She lay still on the reef, while the Neptun, fetching a wide circle, continued at full speed up Spermonde Passage, heading for the town. She lay, still, perfectly still, with something ill-omened and unnatural in her attitude.—From "Twixt Land and Sea," by Joseph Conrad.

SILHOUETTE

From the gallery of memory, mutascopic and fragmentary, there flashes at times a picture, many-coloured and complete; more often the screen gives back an outline, blurred in parts, yet conveying an impression so vivid and compelling that the mind holds only the salient points, and there emerges of scenes and emotions—a silhouette!

THE roar of the city beat against the church walls with an insistent demand. The girl clenched her hands instinctively. It was the voice of the city she feared and hated, the city that had called her lover from the countryside, charmed him from the green meadows starred with field flowers to a world of grey streets, sullen and hot—aye, hot with the anguish of the long, cruel day. The old peasant woman at her side sat with closed eyes, patient with that terrible patience of the poor that suffers uncomplainingly. Within a stone's throw, full in the blaze of the sun, stood the high building where they had taken her boy—and even now were trying him for murder. She had sat in the court while the men in wigs and gowns had spoken of him. She had heard him held up to scorn, listened while one told how he had crept in the silence of the night and killed an old man for his money; and all the while she watched her son, waiting for him to meet her eyes and read the message in her own, infinitely loving, full of so divine a compassion, that the poor old face, transfigured, grew very beautiful. All that the people said had sounded far away. She was holding her firstborn in her arms in the cottage garden; the air was sweet with the scent of summer, and his baby hand, outstretched, had stroked her cheek.

It was not possible that any man could think her boy was guilty, and yet the clutch of fear tugged at her heart. Dear God, how dark it grew! Somewhere a child was crying. Her child? She tottered to her feet. . . . It crashed home to her that he was in the dock. Her hands shook as the day wore on, and the beating of her heart grew faint. The court was cleared for lunch. How could they eat, she thought, and turned about a bit of bread between her lips. How could they eat! The cry welled up, and found expression when on the door there sounded the dread knocking that announced the judge had come again into the court. They had taken her out into the sunshine, and together with Rachael she had sought the shadow of the church.

"They'll never hang him, mother!" The girl's hand tightened on the frail thin arm. But the old woman made no answer. Her eyes were closed—maybe she slept. In the court the judge was speaking. It seemed to Rachael she could hear his voice. A hard man, a cruel man, they had told her, cruel as the city where he sat in state in robes of red—red as the blood they said the man she loved had taken. And then there seemed to fall a space of silence. The jury were considering whether a fellow-man should live or die. The sunshine flickered through the church windows, touched the grey streets with gold; the roar of the city sounded nearer. . . .

It was not to his sweetheart that he turned when they told him he was free. He stumbled blindly forward to where the frail old woman stood, and hid his face upon her breast. And all that she had suffered in that moment was forgotten. The city had taken him from her; the city had given him back. She was holding him in her arms once more—her firstborn, her darling. . . . And his hand stretched out and touched her withered cheek.

HOW MARRIAGES ARE MADE IN FRANCE

II.—THE SUMMARY MARRIAGE * * BY CHARLES FOLEY

I.

It was Madame Verdeuil's "At Home" day—Madame Verdeuil, wife of the great Professor Verdeuil. For the last hour the conversation had turned on matrimony, and many a mamma with budding daughters declaimed on the great circumspection and caution she would exercise before accepting a son-in-law.

Madame Verdeuil generally listened to her friends' remarks with the good-humoured indulgence of one whose life has held nothing but untroubled, peaceful happiness. That day, however, when the tenth mamma had contributed the same well-worn sentiment to the matrimonial buzz, she suddenly observed somewhat sharply: "Caution is necessary, certainly, but not too much. Marriage, like so many another thing, is a venture: it may or it may not turn out happily." On this point Madame Verdeuil spoke with all the authority of a woman who, since her wedding-day—and she was now well over fifty—had had the most loving and faithful of husbands. "I know of no happier married couple than we are, and yet," she continued, "my marriage was brought about in the simplest and most summary fashion—no planning, no calculating."

II.

"Tell us about it, dear Madame Verdeuil," cried everyone; and their hostess, always affable and smiling, began. "My father was a professor at a public day-school at Portvieux, a widower with three children—girls: Ernestine, Gabrielle, and myself, Charlotte, the youngest. He had no private means, so we had to live economically on his modest salary, which we just managed to do without getting into debt. Ernestine looked after the house and Gabrielle did the cooking. I helped the other two. I was nearly eight years old when a new burden was laid on the slender household purse.

"For some time my father had been interested in a pupil in his class, and been struck by his intelligence and steady application to work—a tall, thin lad of eighteen, in shabby clothes that he had long outgrown. One Sunday morning this boy, Monsieur Gustave, sat down to lunch with us, and, much to our consternation, ate nearly half our small leg of mutton. Hardly a look did he vouchsafe us girls, but never ceased discussing his work with my father. Dumb with astonishment, we were told, before the meal ended, that M. Gustave was to board with us. My father called it 'boarding' in order not to hurt the boy's pride. He certainly would not have been able to contribute to his keep, for he was a penniless orphan, and was educating himself by means of a scholarship he had gained. With another mouth to feed, and a mouth with no small appetite, Ernestine had to use all her wits to make both ends meet. We girls had to eat a little less and grow a little thinner, and thus M. Gustave was enabled to wear clothes that fitted him, to buy the needful books, to put on flesh, and be set up in health again, as my father expressed it. From that Sunday morning my father was a different man—he had always longed for a son, and this lad seemed to make him young again, buoyant, light hearted. Gustave's work was the one topic of interest, even at meals. My father never tired of explaining, tutoring, coaching him, till he was soon head of his class. I cannot say that our life was made happier through this new inmate. He ignored us three girls entirely, perhaps from a feeling of boyish contempt or shyness, or maybe from an instinct of respect for the family of his benefactor.

"We were invariably on our best behaviour when he was present, and never spoke to him, but we kept our eyes and ears open, and we knew that he had but one thought—to get through his examinations and score a success. And although for two whole years he sat at meals with us three times every day, we knew him so slightly that we experienced not the least regret when, having passed his examinations brilliantly, which delighted my father, he left us to continue his studies in Paris. My father was to accompany him to the station, and we said 'good-bye' one evening in the little hall. It was too dark to see the expression on Monsieur Gustave's face, but in his most natural voice he said, 'Good-bye, Ernestine; good-bye, Gabrielle; good-bye, little Charlotte!' And he had remained such a stranger to us that we found ourselves wondering afterwards how he even knew our names.

"We did not see him again for ten years. My father's interest in him was maintained, for he often heard from his protégé. Sometimes he would read out his letters to us. They were all about examinations, degree taking, professorships, and seemed but very dull to us. My father always wrote back: 'Don't waste your time writing such long letters; you have far more important things to do;' and Monsieur Gustave obeyed this injunction, for his letters grew meagre, then came but rarely, and after five or six years we knew nothing more of him, not even his address.

III.

"One evening, not long after Ernestine's marriage with Alfred Baulain, the Art Professor at Portvieux, we were all sitting together in the drawing-room when my father was handed a letter. 'From Gustave!' he exclaimed, opening it with delight. 'He says he has taken his degree and got a good appointment at a big hospital. That is the first step towards wealth and fame.'

"Suddenly, as he read on, his expression changed, and he exclaimed: 'Who would have dreamt of such a thing? Listen, my dears; what do you think of this?' And here my dear father read out the following in Gustave's short, concise manner of a man with little leisure, and who goes straight to the point without beating about the bush. 'I am now in a position to marry. If I remember right, Ernestine, your eldest daughter, must be twenty-five. I am thirty. That would be very suitable. I have to go to Nantes on the 20th for the day, for a Medical Congress. Nantes is not far from Portvieux. Could you bring Ernestine? We could arrange everything then.'

"Ernestine, who was very much in love with her husband, burst out laughing.

"'Well, that's one way of proposing! Fortunately I'm married already; but what a narrow escape!'

"Papa was not laughing at all. He seemed very much concerned. Maybe he saw some cherished dream shattered. He replied to the letter in the same laconic manner. 'I regret extremely, but Ernestine was married a week ago.' Two days after we were sitting at dinner, when a second letter, shorter still, arrived. 'I shall go to the Congress at Nantes all the same, and am just as anxious to get married. As Ernestine is unavailable, please bring Gabrielle. She must be twenty-one by now. 'A little young, but she will do.'

"Papa smiled, but Gabrielle had grown very white, and suddenly broke out into sobs. She confessed that she and Monsieur Lumcau, the History Professor, had loved one another for a long time, that that very day he was coming to make a formal demand for her hand, and that she could never sacrifice her betrothed to this Monsieur Gustave, who was now nothing but a stranger to them, and who only wanted her because her sister was no longer to be had.

"Again my father was very put out, but was too just to bring any force to bear on Gabrielle. The History Professor came that same day, and immediately after my father sent the following reply to his old pupil: 'You are unfortunate; Gabrielle is engaged.'

"The next day a telegram containing the following words arrived:

"Bring youngest, if disengaged. Nineteen much too young, but wish one of your daughters; must take what can.'

My father, radiant, turned to me.

"Thank goodness,' he said, 'you are not married, nor even engaged!'

"No, papa, but—'

"But my father in his delight cut me short.

"You shall marry him! He insists on becoming my son-in-law, the dear boy. Most flattering, most flattering!'

"Very flattering for my father, no doubt; certainly not for me. However, he wired an answer immediately, and seemed so very delighted, poor dear man, that I hadn't the heart to remonstrate.

IV.

I was quite indifferent about the marriage. I had no remembrance at all of Monsieur Gustave; consequently he recalled at least nothing unpleasant. I had never had time to dream about lovers, so I resigned myself philosophically. 'Why not marry him as well as any other?' I said to myself. 'I don't love him, but papa likes him so much that, anyhow, one person will be made happy.'

"A few days later my father and I arrived at Nantes. I certainly did not recognise our late boarder in the man I was presented to. I did not dare look at him more than furtively. We lunched together in a private room of the hotel, and, as in the old days, he talked to papa the whole time, and I listened, quiet and demure, as I used to when a little girl. By the time the sweets came on the table the whole business was concluded. Monsieur Gustave had brought a ring from Paris, and now, just before starting for the Congress, he placed this ring on my finger, a little awkwardly and timidly, I thought. The ring happened to fit me.

"There, Ernestine,' he said—'no, I mean Gabrielle,' I must do him the justice to say that his mistake arose more from bashfulness than absent-mindedness.

"I laughed outright.

"No, no, Charlotte, my boy, Charlotte. Come, kiss her, Gustave.'

"He embraced me, and from that moment till he left us he called me by my name without once hesitating.

"I didn't see him again till the morning of our wedding-day. That same evening we travelled by the express to Paris, and really I could not have said the next morning if he liked me or I liked him. A month later we loved each other with a strong and lasting affection."

Madame stopped, and the memory of those days shone in her glistening eyes. Then she added, with the contented smile of a happy woman:

"That is how I got married. A very simple, summary fashion, you may say, but you see it has been crowned with success. And if any of you would suggest that such a marriage has no romance or poetry about it, I would ask you this: 'What is there more poetical and romantic than happiness?'"—Translated by Margaret Hogg.

HOW THE CARNEGIE MILLIONS ARE MISMANAGED IN SCOTLAND

I.

TEN years ago Mr. Andrew Carnegie presented two millions sterling to the Scottish Universities: the most munificent gift ever made in Great Britain to an Educational Institution, with the single exception perhaps of the Cecil Rhodes Bequest to the University of Oxford. The administration of the Carnegie millions was vested in a Trust. The intentions and ideals of the donor were clearly expressed in the letter of donation, but the Trustees were allowed full liberty to allocate the annual income of £100,000 in the interest of higher Scottish education.

II.

Under any other circumstances such latitude given to the Trustees would have been the wisest, because the most liberal policy. But under the special circumstances of Scottish education, such discretion left to the Trustees proved fatal, and in the light of recent events it is infinitely to be regretted that Mr. Andrew Carnegie did not play the part of the enlightened despot. I am sure that if he had, the results of his benefaction would have been very different. As it happened, the Carnegie Trustees allowed themselves to be overruled and dictated to by the Scottish Universities, which are the most conservative, and, in the opinion of many, the most reactionary bodies in the United Kingdom. Mr. Carnegie had explicitly stated that he wished to further the interests of modern education. So little have the Trustees respected that wish, so little have they done for modern education, that the Scottish Universities find themselves to-day in the position of not possessing a single Chair of Modern Languages or Literature. It is a scandalous position, and it is as unique in the United Kingdom as it is in Europe.

III.

In the face of such a policy, shall we wonder that in the University of Edinburgh there are three to four male students attending the German classes as against a hundred attending the Latin classes? Or shall we be astonished at the general neglect of German all over the country? We have been repeatedly asked by some of our readers to have a weekly German page in EVERYMAN, as we have a weekly French page. Much as we would like, we dare not undertake such an experiment. So universal is the ignorance of the German language that probably not fifty readers in a thousand would be able to understand our German page.

IV.

Twenty years ago the Scottish University reactionaries declared that if no Chairs of French and German were established, it was merely because the teaching of French and German did not possess the educational value, or did not provide the educational discipline which would entitle the teachers of those subjects to the academic status of professors. To-day even University reactionaries have ceased to urge such an imbecile contention, and even those who entertain the prejudice dare not urge it, because they are afraid of public ridicule. Instead, they urge the

(Second Article.)

To speak of a revival of interest in connexion with Bookplates cannot be strictly correct, for the simple reason that for more than four centuries they have been known and appreciated and used by book-lovers who have had the means of obtaining them. But it is certainly correct to say that to-day the field of their usefulness and interest is far wider. To-day owners of a library, however small, generally wish to have a bookplate; the difficulty has been rather in getting one designed and engraved to meet their wishes, either as to treatment or cost. It has been generally thought to be of necessity a costly matter to have one's own bookplate, and it can easily be expensive. But modern facilities in engraving have brought really artistic work within easy reach of modest purses. An original bookplate, incorporating almost any special features that may be desired, can now be had for less than two guineas, inclusive of the design, engraved plate, and a hundred prints, while extra hundreds printed off from time to time as required cost but a few shillings. Copperplate engraving costs more, of course, according to the work involved, and many a book-lover, realising Keats's line, "A thing of beauty is a joy for ever," will still prefer to have and enjoy the art that had remained without a rival for so many centuries.

As I have already pointed out, the primary use of a bookplate is to mark the ownership of books—a reminder to those who borrow, a safeguard to those who lend, but there are other considerations that give an added value to bookplates. They should, and generally do, indicate the personal tastes of their owners, and, being permanent, are of distinct interest to posterity. I have had many quite interesting experiences illustrating this. An elderly lady wrote me recently from a small town in Australia requiring a design for herself, and, by way of guide, sent the only print she had of her grandfather's bookplate, showing the family's arms and crest—a connecting link that joined the England of nearly a century ago with the Australia of to-day. Another instance was that of a lady who wished to have a bookplate containing the family's arms to send out to a grandson in South Africa—obviously as a permanent reminder of the name he bore and the duties demanded by it. Another case that occurs to me was that of a gentleman who called on me to inquire what it would cost to alter a plate to bring it more up to date. I fear I looked somewhat aghast at the bare idea. The plate was sixty years old and of somewhat questionable artistic merit, but it represented early Victorian work, and its very age commanded respect. I explained that, although if it were really desired I would alter it, the work would be positively distasteful; and I then learned that there were several others in the family, and that they went back to quite early in the eighteenth century, forming an almost complete family record for nearly two centuries. This client was kind enough to send me prints from each of them, and they are among my treasured possessions.

As to subjects for design in bookplates, the range is practically without limit. Where the owner is entitled to arms or crest these are generally introduced, but with or without arms or crest a bookplate design can artistically embody other features of peculiar interest. All the professions lend themselves to treatment that will indicate the owner's special interest, while for others a corner of the study or garden, a view of country or sea having special personal interest, are often included. There is really no limit, provided the subject can be dealt with artistically.

On request I will submit specimens of bookplates I have designed, together with a rough pencil sketch showing suggestive treatment, and state what the cost will be.—HENRY D. WARD, 49, Great Portland Street, London, W. hypocritical plea that the Scottish Universities have not the financial means to establish Modern Language Professorships, that they are so poor that they cannot endow one single Chair. One does not know whether to be more indignant at the mendacity or hypocrisy of such a plea, when it is remembered that the two millions presented by Mr. Carnegie to the Scottish Universities were partly given for the express purpose of furthering the Modern Humanities.

V.

Is it then not about time that Mr. Carnegie should politely remind his Trustees that they are not carrying out the ideals which inspired him to make his donation? Is it not about time that he should bring some moral pressure to bear upon them, that he should liberate them from the tyranny of academic pedants, and that he should call on them to meet the urgent needs of the times?

A few weeks ago a representative of EVERYMAN had the privilege of a prolonged interview with Mr. Carnegie, which will shortly be published in this paper. In the course of that interview our representative was much impressed with the fact that two interests and ideals were uppermost in the mind of Mr. Carnegie: the interests of Modern Culture, and the interests of International Peace and International Understanding. Both interests are suffering equally at the hands of the Carnegie Trust, for both are so closely identified that they are one and the same. Peace is impossible without political understanding, and political understanding is impossible without moral and intellectual understanding, and moral and intellectual understanding between two nations is impossible without the mutual exchange of thought, and without the mutual knowledge of their language and literature. The day of one-world language as a medium of international exchange may not be far distant, but until that day has come there is only one efficient means to bring about an International Entente, namely, that from the Elementary School upwards the younger generations in each country shall be educated to understand each other, and to appreciate each other's efforts in the cause of civilisation. The one efficient means is a familiar and sympathetic acquaintance on the part of every educated citizen with the public opinion, with the ideals and aspirations of the leading nations of Central Europe.

CORRESPONDENCE

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Owing to the large number of letters received it is necessary for correspondents to write briefly if their letters are to appear.

THE WHITE SLAVE TRAFFIC.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—May I beg that you will allow me to answer two points in Mr. Claude Tessier's letter on "The Truth about White Slavery," as his information on the subject appears to be somewhat incomplete.

The Criminal Law Amendment Bill of 1912 was drafted after long and careful consideration by a committee composed of representatives of the Jewish Gentlemen's Committee for the Protection of Jewish Girls, the Jewish Board of Deputies, the London Council for the Promotion of Public Morality, and the National Vigilance Association. This conjoint committee was formed exclusively of men, and the Bill of 1912 was drafted from their experience of what was necessary for legally protecting women from being commercially exploited for immoral purposes. The form and scope of the Bill was determined by consultation with the Home Office.

The Pass-the-Bill Committee worked for the passage of the Bill because it dealt with the commercial exploitation of vice. It was not influenced by unverified stories of the forcible abduction of young girls, nor did it spread or countenance them in any way. Moreover, may I add that the committee did not, as a committee, support the clauses in the Bill relating to flogging? Many members felt that the objects of the Act might be thereby nullified and obscured. The legislation for which the Pass-the-Bill Committee worked was for the prevention of procuring and the better protection of girlhood.—I am, sir, etc.,

EDITH M. H. A. BIGLAND,

Hon. Sec., late Pass-the-Bill Committee.

19, Tothill Street, S.W., July 12th, 1913.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—The letter in your current issue signed "S. F. Campbell" shows the usual extraordinary muddled arguments and ignorant fallacies displayed by Suffragists as soon as they attempt to tackle any of the real issues of life, instead of vaguely crying for the vote.

To begin with, S. F. C. (there is nothing in the signature to indicate sex, but from internal evidence I deduce a feminine writer) apparently claims for the Suffragists the credit for the White Slave Traffic Bill. It is news to me that, as a corporate body, they have ever agitated for any reform beyond the extension of the franchise.

In the same first paragraph she (or he) says that the "same human feebleness"—i.e., men being unable to keep their passions under control—will always lead to a certain amount of prostitution. Could any statement be feebler or less like the truth? But any argument which attempts to expose the "feebleness" or the wickedness of "men" is good enough for the Suffragist. There will always be prostitution of one kind or another as long as men are men and women are women, and as long as the present false conception of "morality" is preached and held by people like S. F. Campbell.

If you can make people "moral" by Act of Parliament, why not introduce a Bill for the suppression of "immorality"?

If there were no punishment for murder, there would be more murders, says S. F. C. What grounds has he (or she) for this statement? The reason given—something about the murderer making his (why not her?) existence more comfortable—seems to me simply nonsense. What does it mean?

The cause of most prostitution is not the low standard of wages paid to women at present; S. F. C. has simply not studied the question at all. If all women's wages were to-morrow raised automatically there would be still more prostitution, for there would be more women unemployed. Fifty per cent. of women employed to-day are employed because they are cheaper than men. They are cheaper than men because there are more of them; because, for physical reasons, they cannot be relied upon to the same extent as men; because they, in most cases, are not in the same need of money for the support of others; and because there is always the one "profession" open to them at which they can earn more, viz., this same prostitution.

Even if I admitted for a moment the contention concerning the lowness of women's wages, and its effect on prostitution, I should, of course, have to point

"THIRTY-THREE YEARS SINCE I SAW THE SEA."

Dear Friend,

"Thirty-three years since I saw the sea." This was told me by an old lady for whom I had just arranged a holiday. She had come to thank me, and in doing so mentioned that she had not been away for all these long years. From my knowledge of the woman I can vouch for the truth of this statement. Think what this means! Week after week, month after month, year after year, toiling and slaving, with no break at all in the monotonous grind, struggling to keep home together, and help keep a number of grandchildren, the idea of a real holiday at the seaside never seemed practicable. Many people would think themselves hardly used if they could only manage to go away every three years. Think then of no holiday for three and thirty years.

The above case is not an exceptional one. There are many others in similar circumstances—fathers and mothers without the slightest prospects of the much needed rest and change unless some kind person makes it possible by sending the means.—WILL YOU?

I hope soon to enjoy a holiday at the sea, and this makes me feel deeply for the less fortunate ones unable to leave London.

WILL YOU HELP ME TO GET THEM AWAY?

"He that hath pity upon the poor lendeth unto the Lord: and look what he layeth out, it shall be paid him again." A £5 note will send five adults to the sea for a fortnight; £1 5s. will give one a couple of weeks; 12s. 6d. send a needy one away for a week.

Gifts may be sent direct to me at the above address.

Yours in His Happy Service,

out that no man's vote has ever had the effect of raising wages. Did the old shoemaker interviewed by Mr. Holmes in the same issue of your paper have a vote? If so, what good did it do him? Can S. F. C. point to one specific case of men's wages being raised in proportion to their voting powers? Not even in the Bill which ended the coal strike, which Bill was the result not of men's votes, but of their combination and the need the country had of their labour. Those are the only factors that will ever raise wages. It is surely time this dishonest fallacy, which has gained the Suffragist cause innumerable unthinking adherents, were once and for all laid to rest.

I should like S. F. C. to read an article entitled "Women and Morality," in this month's English Review, written by "A-Mother." For once, a woman has dealt with this subject sensibly and with open eyes. If there were more women with the views of the writer of that article, there would be less so-called immorality, and more would be done for the causes people like S. F. C. profess to have at heart than by all the sterile agitation for "votes," meaning nothing and leading nowhere save to the loss of all the privileges which women have always enjoyed, and which the real majority of them even now wish to retain. It is to protect such women that I am an Anti-Suffragist.—I am, sir, etc.,

PERCY E. REINGANUM.

Cheapside, E.C., July 11th, 1913.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—“A. B. C.,” in your issue of the 27th ult., gives, I believe, the only remedy for raising the moral standard of civilisation, which he states as follows:—“The only way that will be successful is the religious method. Educate the people to high ideals. Give the young men and maidens a noble conception of life, especially of the ideal principles of marriage, and they will be safe.”

It is the most distressing thought imaginable that our present marriage service is the last place to which our young men and maidens should turn to derive never-failing inspiration for high ideals in love and life. I merely quote the words of a prominent ecclesiastical divine connected with one of our important cathedrals, in order to confirm my statement. He said, “When I perform the Marriage Service, I do not read the ‘Secondly,’ for I think it absolutely beastly.”

This service is our “First Social Law.” The Church itself admits it errs in its teaching. Is it therefore to be wondered that after centuries of its administration we are plunged now into a sexual war? The Church, with its out-of-date teaching and dogmas, is chiefly responsible for the degradation and corruption of the greatest and most beautiful instinct by which man is meant to live, which has resulted in sensuality, sin, disease, and fearful death, the natural accompaniments to all Satanic influences.

The sooner our women in sane moments refuse to accept their most beautiful office in life in the terms as set forth in our present Marriage Law, and sanely ask to be man's “help-meet” rather than his serf, the sooner shall we men rise to the ideals demanded by “true womanhood.”—I am, sir, etc.,

WILLIAM M. BROWN.

Liverpool, July 7th, 1913.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Like many of your correspondents, I am mystified as to how the extension of the franchise to women can in any way assuage the social evil. Being connected with a newspaper, I observed how, during the White Slave Act campaign, stories crept in of instances of procuring which bore the seal of romance on them, and although I have a fairly intimate knowledge of police work in three of our largest cities I never yet encountered a single member of the force who had ever found one of these romantic stories to be correct.

Have any of your readers ever come across an authenticated story of a girl lured away, drugged with sweets or wine, and sold into a house of ill-fame? I am firmly of opinion that the only two factors at work in recruiting what is erroneously termed “white slavery” are poverty and voluntary submission. In your issue of June 27th a correspondent spoke of the small percentage of rescues by the Salvation Army. It would be interesting to know the percentage of girls who do not want to be rescued.

I have heard street girls openly boast of the money they can make—£15 and £20 per week. Why is it that some portion of their savings is not devoted to freeing themselves from their bondage? I should hazard that half the girls on the streets of our big cities could release themselves permanently with a year's earnings. At any rate, I knew one of the frail sisterhood who had managed to purchase two houses with her earnings. Can we not have the truth about white slavery?—I am, sir, etc.,

APPRENTICESHIP.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—May I suggest to your correspondent “J. Johnson” the following considerations which render (the suggested) compulsory apprenticeship impossible, futile, and anachronistic?

(1) Apprenticeship as a system is obsolete. It survives in the tailoring and dressmaking trades almost exclusively.

(2) “Specialisation” in modern industry has ousted the skilled worker with a complete knowledge of his trade.

(3) The introduction of machinery has led to a large demand for unskilled workers.

(4) Unskilled work is, generally speaking, in receipt of higher remuneration than is skilled work.

(5) Unskilled work obtains immediate return, while apprenticeship usually requires an unremunerative waiting period, which is exactly what the boy whom this Act would touch is unable to afford.

With all good wishes to your excellent paper.—I am, sir, etc.,

THE CURSE OF USURY.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I have perused with interest your special commissioner's articles under this heading.

Does not the whole trouble at present lie in the “sale” of the unredeemed pledges? These so-called sales are attended by the few “in the know,” and it is by the devious ways following on this that “Uncle” amasses his huge profits.

The common occurrence is something as follows: The when and wherefore of the public auction is hushed, and known alone to those in the trade. Hence it will be generally found that it is the trade relatives of “Uncle” who attend and bid for the unredeemed pledges at his wish. Thus, an article which is pledged for, say, 5s., is never allowed to realise more than this amount, although invariably it is worth more! So when the pledgee (as he may and can) requires to

AUGUST

THE HOLIDAY MONTH.

ENJOY IT TO THE FULL.

We are on the verge of the great holiday month. Hundreds of thousands of holiday-makers will flock to the English resorts. Hotels and boarding houses will be uncomfortably crowded, and in many cases the ends of the holiday will be defeated, for the crowds and the bustle, the hurry and worry, make the essential peace impossible.

But away on the Continent, among the snow-capped mountains of Switzerland, in the vernal valleys of the Ardennes, or in sequestered Holland, the real joy and magic of a holiday may be realised.

Why should not you spend your holiday on the Continent this year? It will mean much to you, much more than you imagine; the new scenes, the customs of new peoples, the entire and absolute change, will provide not enjoyment alone, but will regulate your imagination, widen your mental horizon, and add immeasurably to your store of knowledge.

see the broker's books, he finds that his pledge has only been sold for 5s. If that amount had been exceeded, he could, of course, claim the balance, less interest. The article is then resold by "Uncle" for a much higher amount, and here, undoubtedly, lies the prime cause of the high profits in this trade.

Another source of profit is the charge for wrappers in the case of goods liable to deterioration.

It is a known fact that some of our poor women-folk depend entirely for their rent week by week on the proceeds of "popping the old man's Sunday best" from Monday till Saturday! It is not from sources such as this that the trouble in question emanates, but let these public sales be watched!—I am, sir, etc.,

ARE THE FRENCH A RELIGIOUS PEOPLE?

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Correspondence with regard to France as a religious nation and articles on Robespierre which have recently appeared in your paper suggest the enclosed lines from Mrs. Barrett Browning's "Aurora Leigh" as a clue to the interpretation of what to the Englishman is still an enigma. The raising of questions of this description is invaluable to thoughtful minds.—I am, sir, etc.,

M. S. CHUGNELL.

Herts.

"The English have a scornful, insular way
Of calling the French light. The levity
Is in the judgment only, which yet stands;
For say a foolish thing but oft enough
(And here's the secret of a hundred creeds—
Men get opinions as boys learn to spell,
By reiteration chiefly), the same thing
Shall pass at last for absolutely wise,
And not with fools exclusively. And so
We say the French are light, as if we said
The cat mews or the milch-cow gives us milk.
. . . . Is a bullet light
That dashes from the gun-mouth, while the eye
Winks and the heart beats one, to flatten itself
To a wafer on the white speck on a wall
A hundred paces off? Even so direct,
So sternly undivertible of aim,
Is this French people.

All idealists.

Too absolute and earnest, with them all
The idea of a knife cuts real flesh;
And still, devouring the safe interval
Which Nature placed between the thought and act
With those too fiery and impatient souls,
They threaten conflagration to the world,
And rush with most unscrupulous logic on Impossible practice.

And so I am strong to love this noble France,
This poet of the nations, who dreams on
And wails on (while the household goes to wreck)
For ever after some ideal good—
Some equal poise of sex, some unavowed love
Inviolable, some spontaneous brotherhood,
Some wealth that leaves none poor and finds none tired,
Some freedom of the many that respects
The wisdom of the few. Heroic dreams!
Sublime to dream so: natural to wake:
And sad, to use such lofty scaffoldings,
Erected for the building of a church,
To build instead a brothel or a prison—
May God save France!"

—"Aurora Leigh," Book VI.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—To dig up quotations from Taine in support of crude and ill-digested ideas of the French mind, at this hour, is like hunting up a train for to-morrow in a last year's time-table. Permit me to recommend something more up to date—for instance, "L'Orientation Religieuse de la France Actuelle," by Paul Sabatier; and the writings, say, of such recent and modern giants of thought as Ferdinand Boisson, Leon Châine, Boutroux, Guyau.—I am, sir, etc.,

MA FOI!

"EVERYMAN" AND G. K. CHESTERTON.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I have been a subscriber from the commencement of your paper, which I consider the best literary pennyworth of the day, and I heartily wish it success. My son also takes it in. But we are both sick of articles either by Mr. Chesterton or about Mr. Chesterton, and are going to give it up if any more appear. This is, of course, a matter of no consequence to you, and I should not take the trouble to write you but for the fact that there may be thousands who think in the same way, and I honestly wish your splendid undertaking to be in every way a success.—I am, sir, etc.,

E. H.

Reform Club, London, July 15th, 1913.

[MUCH as I value the kind support of Mr. "E. H." and his son, and of the thousands of imaginary readers whom he supposes to hold the same opinions, I shall continue gratefully to accept and to print in EVERYMAN any article which Mr. G. K. Chesterton will do us the honour to contribute. I may as well confess quite privately, not as Editor, but as an ordinary reader, that I am one of the many thousands who are of the opposite opinion with regard to Mr. Chesterton. I believe that Mr. Chesterton is one of the moral assets of the British people. I believe him to be one of the greatest English writers living, an inspiring poet, a superb humorist, a profound thinker, and, above all, a stout and generous heart.

But neither "E. H.'s" nor my own private opinion concerning Mr. Chesterton need be of any particular interest to the readers of EVERYMAN. What ought to be of interest to every reader is the moral principle involved by "E. H.'s" letter, and the extraordinary attitude of mind which it implies. Does he really think it an unpardonable crime to have printed in EVERYMAN two articles by Mr. G. K. Chesterton and three appreciations (and depreciations) of his writings? And does he really think us capable of such meanness as to be bribed and terrorised into tabooing an eminent contributor simply because he happens not to be acceptable to a group of intolerant readers? From the note-paper of his letter, Mr. "E. H." is presumably a member of the Reform Club, and no doubt he prides himself on being a Liberal, "good and true." Let me tell him that although he may be a staunch and strenuous supporter of his party, even Torquemada or the Grand Inquisitor of the Spanish Inquisition, nay, even the Duke of Alva, have a better claim to calling themselves Liberals than has Mr. "E. H." When the Grand Inquisitor or the Duke of Alva burned a heretic, they did so on the assumption that the heretic was a bad man or taught a perverse doctrine. Mr. "E. H." on the contrary, is prepared to condemn EVERYMAN, whilst saying at the same time that EVERYMAN is a paragon of all the virtues.

Therefore, in conclusion, I must ask Mr. "E. H." and his son, and his thousands of imaginary supporters, to reconsider their opinion and their adverse decision. If Mr. "E. H." persists in calling EVERYMAN "the best literary pennyworth of the day," and if he persists in calling himself a Liberal, I must ask him in all consistency and in all honesty to do his utmost to recommend this "admirable pennyworth" to his friends, even though I myself, as Editor, must absolutely refuse to pronounce a sentence of excommunication against Mr. Gilbert Keith Chesterton.—EDITOR.]

THE VILLAIN IN LITERATURE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—It appears to me that Mr. Sheridan Jones, in his interesting study of "The Villain in Literature," has overlooked a somewhat important point, viz., that the worst characters, as well as the best, are a combination of good and evil qualities. In the good man the good predominates; in the bad man, the bad. That is the only difference.

In the average mid-Victorian novel the hero is a cross between Sir Galahad and Bayard, a veritable incarnation of virtue and courage; for him life is one

KENSINGTON COLLEGE.

DIRECTOR'S TWENTY-SIXTH SUMMER REPORT.

One hundred applications for every twenty-nine Students.

Unique Certificate from Chartered Accountant.

We have been favoured with a copy of the above interesting document, and learn that the College has again surpassed all previous records. The unique distinctions of the GOLD MEDAL and the DIPLOMA OF HONOUR FOR SECRETARIAL AND COMMERCIAL TRAINING awarded to Kensington College by the Festival of Empire, 1911, were duplicated at the Manchester Winter Exhibition, 1913.

During Term the disparity between the number of applications from employers for the services of the College-trained Students, and the number of Candidates available for appointments, had been even greater than in the past. To illustrate what this disparity actually is, the unique idea of submitting all vouchers and papers concerning the matter to the scathing criticism of a Chartered Accountant was adopted, and the following Certificate (a copy of which has been sent to us) was obtained:—

CHARTERED ACCOUNTANT'S CERTIFICATE.

TELEPHONES:

LONDON, E.C.
24th July, 1913.

FROM J. H. L. LANCASTER,
Chartered Accountant.

TO JAMES MUNFORD ESQ., F.R.C.I.,
M.R.S.A.,
Director, Kensington College, Bayswater.

DEAR SIR,

I hereby certify that I have examined the Kensington College Register of Vacant Appointments and the Correspondence and Vouchers connected therewith for the six months ended 30th June, 1913.

During this period the demand for the services of Graduates from the College was in excess of the supply, and for this reason the College was only in a position to introduce Candidates for 29.16 per cent. of the Appointments placed at its disposal.

It also appears that additional vacancies were offered to the College again and again by the same employers.

Yours faithfully;

(Sd.) J. H. L. LANCASTER, A.C.A.

Three weeks before the end of Term the position was that a satisfactory Appointment had been provided for every Qualified Candidate. There were many Positions to be filled, but no Candidates to be nominated for some highly attractive vacant Appointments. One daughter of an eminent Peer signifies her intention of waiting till the autumn in the hope of finding a Kensington College Candidate available by that time. It will thus be seen that the task of coping with the demand for Kensington College students has long been quite an impossible one.

Among the various Appointments offered during Term to the qualified students of Kensington College have been some as Secretaries to Peers, eminent Army and Professional men, and several important Public Institutions as well as to many City Companies.

We see that the College students have had remarkable success in the public examinations held by the Royal Society of Arts. A perusal of the following particulars should be of interest to all those who follow the great advance in the standard of work required in modern Commerce:—

The Official Report of the Royal Society of Arts Advanced Examinations advises that Kensington College has secured:—

The Society's SILVER MEDAL AND FIRST PRIZE for FRENCH.

The Society's SILVER MEDAL AND FIRST PRIZE for GERMAN.

In ORAL SPANISH the candidates passed with Distinction. No failures.

In ORAL GERMAN 83 per cent. passed, 45 per cent. passed with Distinction.

In ORAL FRENCH 100 per cent. passed, 70 per cent. passed with Distinction. No failures.

The Kensington College percentage of Medals and Prizes is 10.3, eight times higher than the percentage for the whole Kingdom (1.3).

A College with such records must enforce the attention of every thoughtful man or woman who has the welfare of the rising generation and our future commercial prosperity at heart.

Founded 26 years ago the College a short time since located itself in the present commodious premises, at the corner of Gloucester Terrace and Bishop's Road, which were opened by Her Grace Katherine Duchess of Westminster. Situated in its own grounds and surrounded by trees and gardens, the College affords an ideal spot in this fashionable and healthy part of London for the study of the various subjects necessary for a Secretarial or Commercial career. In addition to such matters as Book-keeping, Accountancy, Shorthand, Correspondence, Typewriting, etc., Modern Languages take a prominent place in the curriculum of the College, as the result of the Examinations quoted above denote.

After the purely academical work is finished, the Students are admitted into the College Offices and appointed to responsible positions on the Secretarial Staff. One term at least is recommended in these Offices in order to acquire that practical experience so necessary to a candidate who wishes to carry out conscientiously the onerous duties of a paid appointment.

The Director advises us that he is always ready to give advice on the subject of a suitable career for boy or girl to any of our readers, personally or by post.

Students are now being enrolled for next Term in order of receipt of their applications.

Candidates desiring full particulars of the Training under the only Gold Medal system extant, for a variety of appointments from which to select a congenial career, should fill in and post the appended coupon (½d. stamp on envelope).

long tilting-match, in which he successfully holds the lists against all comers. The typical villain, on the contrary, is more often than not an incarnation of low cunning obsessed by some ruling passion, such as cruelty, avarice, ambition, or lust. All honour to "George Eliot," who led the van in a revolt against this wholly unnatural school of fiction. Unlike the vast majority of the novelists of her time, "George Eliot" never allowed herself to idealise her characters. Maggie Tulliver, Savonarola, Romola, and Dinah Morris (to take a few of her designedly attractive characters), all have their weaknesses. The writer who, in order to render sin the more odious, makes his "villains" worse than are their prototypes in real life is unconsciously acting a lie. Personally, I consider "George Eliot" one of the greatest moral teachers of the last century. She showed that sin, like virtue, is its own reward, but that the consequences of sin frequently recoil not only upon the sinner, but also upon his innocent associates.

The character of Arthur Donnithorne (in "Adam Bede") illustrates the danger of letting things go, of drifting through life without moral ballast. "Evil is wrought by want of thought as well as by want of heart."

In Tito (in "Romola") we see one whose only care in life is his personal comfort—a cool, selfish, unscrupulous individual, unsparing of caresses when they cost him nothing, who faces the world with a smiling face, and, under cover of a spotless reputation, lives a life of consummate meanness. Unlike "Holy Willie" or Tartuffe, Tito makes no profession of piety; yet his hypocrisy is no less despicable than that of the Scotch mendicant or the French faux dévot. But a tragic end awaits him. He perishes at the hand of the man whom he has most deeply injured.

I cannot agree with Mr. Jones's assertion that "thousands of people have closed 'Romola' convinced that Tito was really a nice young man, who would have turned out quite well if he had only been tactfully handled." The class of people who would form such a judgment would scarcely have the patience to read through a work of such a highly reflective character as "Romola."—I am, sir, etc.,

HERBERT HOUGHTON.

Hampstead, N.W., July 15th, 1913.

THE CONTINENTAL SUNDAY.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I cannot help feeling that the main point of the Rev. James Adderley's article upon "The Continental Sunday" is entirely overlooked (perhaps forgotten) by those who write critically, and who by their letters seem for the most part to unduly emphasise the fact that Sunday is a day of rest.

Unless I misunderstand the Rev. James Adderley, the idea that appealed to me strongly was this—that Sunday for the masses is not, or should not be, only a day of rest. That neither should it be merely the recognised day of days for openly avowing Christianity and making good one's obligations to the God of his love and traditions; but a holy day which is also a holiday.

The Rev. James Adderley does not ask merely that people shall have additional pleasure on Sunday, but that they shall have legitimate pleasure.

To secure this, first he suggests there is your obligation to God, which includes attendance at church, Catholic England as "The Mass," but now more commonly called "Holy Communion." And afterwards—wholesome pleasures, the recreation of rest or joy-making. Feast or fair, what does it matter so that the day proves attractive for all, and is well spent by all?

For most surely "rest" and "peace" are not the only elements which should go to the making of a normal day—more especially a workman's Sunday—but also worship, and joy in recreation.

Possibly one might get the two first elements apart from the life of the Church (this is the idea, and presumably the ideal, of many so-called Christians of to-day, and so they preserve a tradition of the Sunday which is both impotent and harmful). But contained in the latter is the truest ideal of Sunday, namely, full churches first and full lives afterwards.

The Rev. James Adderley desires the fullness of life for all.

The atmosphere and charm of the peaceful English Sunday, of which George Gissing writes, is precious to all healthy, normal Christians; but we have not only the countryside and old-fashioned or cultured town-folk to consider, but also the crowded city, the thoughtless young, and those who throng the streets on a Sunday, and who stay outside our churches—the laughter-loving masses, the children in things of the Spirit.

The lesson of the English Sunday is too long for such. Shorten it then. Teach them the Rev. James Adderley's healthy ideas, contained in the motto concealed beneath his words, "Duty first, and pleasure afterwards."

There is matter for many a sermon hidden beneath the wise sayings of our forefathers. "All work and no play makes Jack a dull boy." Dullness for the masses should be avoided at all costs, for "Satan finds some mischief still for idle hands to do."—I am, sir, etc.,

FIFTY-TWO BANK HOLIDAYS.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Your correspondent's suggestion for shifting Saturday's work on to the other five working days must, I fear, emanate from one who is not himself compelled to labour from early morn to night in a big city. The suggestion to compress the week's labour into five days is very good and feasible. There are, however, considerations affecting a lengthening of the working days for most of London workers at least. Many are compelled to wait for a solid meal until they arrive home at 8 p.m. to 8.30 p.m., and later. To these the difference of one hour would be suicidal. Those unable to go without food for another hour would have to purchase food away from home. Limited funds would find this a heavy burden. Owing to the faulty system of education under which many of us were brought up, the only opportunity for self-improvement and advancement (attained by such a struggle as no one who has not experienced it can imagine) is during the evening hour (seldom hours). Alas! few employers are generous enough to grant (even unwillingly) facilities for the employees to attend classes, which are often held at ridiculously early hours, at which it is impossible to attend. The addition of one hour would close the road for ever to many of these. There are also many who are now completely exhausted by close confinement for too long hours. Two hours less labour per diem would mean better work, but one hour more would mean a shorter life. A few hours extra would not compensate in one morning for the loss sustained in the other five days. Would your correspondent suggest workmen should be paid Thursday evening? How would the necessary Saturday purchases be made with shops

EXTRACTS FROM THE PRESS.

"A practical guide for travellers, without any ridiculous sentences."—New York Herald, Paris.

"A little book calculated to prove very useful to the English traveller in France and Italy."—Daily Mail, Paris.

"'Time is Money' is exceptionally well adapted for the traveller. A most useful kind is the pages devoted to the translation of the menu of one of the popular Restaurants Duval in Paris. The conversation is practical, and the author wisely makes no attempt to give the pronunciation."—T.P.'s Weekly.

"'Time is Money' will be found specially useful, because it has been written bit by bit during years of life on the Continent. Travellers will find in it things they wish to say, and not the amusing but irrelevant remarks of the ordinary conversation book."—The Associates' Journal, G.F.S.

"Miss Augusta Ayliffe has published a very useful and clever work, entitled 'Time is Money.' The book aims at teaching languages to busy people, and 'is intended for those persons who jump into the train and go half-way round the world, while the sleepy ones are thinking the matter over, and studying a bit of French or Italian grammar before entertaining a thought of going on the Continent.' . . . The book should prove invaluable to all those who want to achieve a workable knowledge of French or Italian in the shortest possible time."—Everyman.

"Miss Ayliffe's 'Time is Money' is a publication of a very interesting and practical kind, superior to many of its class. With it in his hand the traveller might often save himself from embarrassment, and at least he can walk into a restaurant and order his meals. It is the experience of many travellers that in PRACTICE an aid to PRONUNCIATION is a failure. A pure accent cannot be obtained by self-tuition. The author of 'Time is Money' defies the best linguist of the day to give a written pronunciation of 'on' in 'bon,' etc.; 'en' and 'u' in 'rue,' etc. . . ."—The Florence Herald, June, 1913.

FRANCIS THOMPSON.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—In Mr. Hermann's excellent account of Francis Thompson, which appeared in this week's number of EVERYMAN, I notice a reference to "haggard eroticists like Ernest Dowson." I find it very hard to recognise under this title the poet to whom love was not passion, but only renunciation and melancholy reminiscence. Dowson's short life may have been chequered with light and darkness, but his poems reflect only the light. To the poet love was so delicate a thing that death or even separation were better than the inevitable disenchantment of passion.

Only my anxiety that there should be room in the necessarily limited space given to correspondence in this paper for some protest against Mr. Hermann's expression prevents me from allowing Dowson to defend himself by quotation. His poems are contained in one volume—easily obtainable and short to read; yet to those who have read them the book becomes a breviary of the twilight hours of the soul.—I am, sir, etc.,

THE BUSINESS MAN AND LITERATURE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—“There is no time” in a business man's career “for writing and thought.” So says your correspondent “Kashual Kritic,” and in most cases he is doubtless right. But not strictly so; for it is obvious to anyone acquainted with business that it is not time which prevents the best business man from doing other things than those he ordinarily has to deal with, but lack of opportune ability.

It is often correctly said that, if you want anything done, go to the busy man, who apparently hasn't time, and you will be more likely to get it done than if you go to the man who has apparently plenty of leisure. The good business man makes time; but only in the very rarest of cases does he, or perhaps can he without great difficulty, under present traditional custom, make time to become anything else than a business man. The reason possibly is that a good business man has the details of business on his mind all the hours of business, while in his off time he feels he has necessarily to keep himself free from any distraction, or to apply his mind only to the very lightest of recreation.

But there probably are just a few good business men who do not let things be on their minds except just for the comparatively few minutes in which they are actually dealing with them, and that, for the rest, they depend upon indexes and diaries and reminders, or perhaps upon the care-freeing system of sectionalising their business, or upon any other of the modern contrivances, by means of which they can refresh their memories only at the exact minute when it is necessary. In other words, they keep things only in their minds to be called up directly they are wanted.

This is surely as it should be in the case of everyone in business, for then there would be time and energy left to appreciate life, and all the delights and even ecstasies of life, which require energy in their practice as well as time, and which we know in our hearts we have left behind us in following the march of civilisation. The difference between having things on the mind and in the mind may be the sole difference between materialism on the one hand, of which the business man never really approves, and romance on the other, which he now usually despises, but all the time knows in his heart is of as great importance to life as the more directly useful accomplishment of “getting a living.” To put it in another way, the difference between having things on the mind and in the mind may perhaps be the difference between putting all one's efforts on getting money which will only supply one-half the necessities of life, and which can never, by any possible chance, supply the other equally necessary want, and that of apportioning one's efforts in such a way as to provide for the supply of both.

I have been getting away from the question of being an author; but being an author is only one of the various ways of expressing life, and it is much more important for a man to live the fullest possible life than it is for him to express it.—I am, sir, etc.,

London, E.C.

ERNEST LONLEY.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

MR. DE LA VILLENEUVE is one of the authors who has gone to the East on the crest of the Balkan boom for his latest novel. SOLD TO THE SULTAN (Eveleigh Nash, 6s.) is not a very convincing romance. The atmosphere of Bluebeard and his many wives, their intrigues and their sufferings, strikes one as being out of date. The heroine of the story, Fatima by name, is a familiar figure in novels of this type. She is sold into captivity as a member of the Sultan's harem, and accepts her fate with Oriental philosophy. It is decided, however, that her lord and master will dispense with her services as a wife, and she is transferred to a captain in the Ottoman Army, Ali Bey, one of the leaders of the Young Turks. It is arranged that she shall spy out his secrets and supply the Palace with the latest information as to the doings of the rebels. Here, however, we meet with the counterplot beloved of novelists. Ali realises the motive for presenting him with the beautiful Fatima, and arranges that he will defeat the Sultan and test her devotion at one and the same time. He gives her false information, so that if she betray him no harm will be done, and he will know she is a traitor. He then departs and leaves her to her fate, which is an extremely unpleasant one. The amiable Sultan turns her over to the chief torturer, who burns bits out of her feet and legs, with other characteristic and Oriental torments. She withstands the ordeal, however, and eventually rejoins her husband with impaired health, but a resolute fidelity.

Superintendent Froest, late of Scotland Yard, has written a detective story called THE GRELL MYSTERY (Nash, 6s.). It is an old proverb that a shoemaker is always badly shod, and it is certain that whatever Superintendent Froest's capacity may have been in the art of discovering mysterious crimes and tracking down bloodthirsty murderers, he does not possess the ability to frame his adventures for the purposes of publication. The book is neither convincing nor arresting; it is machine-made, and curiously void of those details of description, those little touches of personal observation that one would have supposed the author to have had at his fingers' ends. Perhaps Mr. Froest still feels the obligation of professional reticence, for

2 Money-making Professions

by which Readers of EVERYMAN can
. . . turn their spare hours into Guineas . . .

Can you Write?

Doubtless there are thousands of thinking men and women—readers of EVERYMAN—who have something to say which would be of real interest to the world, but they have not developed the power of expressing themselves interestingly and forcibly. To such readers, the journalistic profession offers unlimited scope, and, with training, should be the means of affording a very lucrative and fascinating spare-time hobby. To be successful in literary work necessitates a course of specialised training conducted by a successful journalist who is willing to impart the benefit of his own experience.

All readers of EVERYMAN who possess some literary ability are advised to send a specimen MS. to the Secretary of the Practical Correspondence College, 77, Thanet House, Strand. This MS. will be carefully read through by the Instructor of the Journalism Course, and a candid criticism will be returned to the sender within a few days, together with full particulars of the P.C.C. Course in Free Lance Journalism and Short Story Writing.

The openings in Journalism are more numerous, more interesting, and, above all, more lucrative than most people realise. As a spare-time hobby or a regular occupation, you can earn from 7s. 6d. to £2 2s. per hour if you know what to write and where to sell articles, short stories, and the interesting little paragraphs which constitute one-quarter of the contents of dailies and weeklies.

A young friend of the present writer, of twenty-two years of age, who began work for the Press three years ago, now earns the comfortable income of £2,000 a year. She had no introductions or influence; her success is solely the result of her knowing how to do just the work that's wanted. She works no harder than the average woman teacher, but she makes every stroke of her pen tell, and every Editor she works for knows exactly what to expect from her; he knows she is dependable.

Do not Delay.

Send at once. This is a golden opportunity which may make all the difference to your future success. You may have missed chances before; don't miss this one. Send now, before you forget it.

No matter how little you may know now, Correspondence Teaching will begin just where you need it to begin, and take you as far as you need to go. The work of the College is to train, encourage, and help students to succeed.

No other Institution has by correspondence helped so many men and women, in all parts of the world, to train their talents to earn money. No other Institution enjoys such wide and intimate acquaintance with publishers, editors, printers, and advertisers. This opens the door of employment to the students.

Can you Draw?

Other readers of EVERYMAN who may not possess literary talent are probably able to draw more or less successfully. Why not turn this talent to profitable account? Drawing for one's friends is interesting, but not profitable. Why not consider the possibilities of Commercial Art?

Send a Small Sketch,

in any media—pen, pencil, or colour—and we will return it to you with a personal letter from the Art Director (one of London's leading Designers) upon your chances of success in Commercially Applied Art.

We will send also a finely illustrated Prospectus of our unique Course of Home Study, which teaches all you need to know to make money by Drawing for Reproduction, Designing Posters, Book and Magazine Covers, Ex Libris, Advertisements, etc.

With our progressive, superbly illustrated lessons in the practical, professional side of designing, and the unlimited individual criticism, help, and advice of our Art Director, you may learn in your spare time what usually takes years to find out—just the essential facts that no Art School or hand codes ever tell you.

You can learn, too, how to turn a taste for drawing into guineas in the shortest possible time, how to make the designs that are wanted; how, when, and where to dispose of them to the utmost advantage.

The lessons are clear and easy to follow, and drudgery of study is eliminated. Gaining a practical knowledge of the profitable branches of Applied Art by our system of Postal tuition is, in fact, a pleasant pastime. The student's difficulties and doubts give place to confidence and courage, and he or she is helped to earn while learning.

Among the objects taught in the Twelve Months' Course are: Lettering, Black-and-White, Line, Wash and Body Colour, Drawing effectively Figures, Pretty Faces, Drapery, Flowers; Landscapes and Portraits in Colours; Studio Economics; Time and Labour-saving Devices, Practical Hints, etc.

It costs nothing and you risk nothing in sending a sketch and receiving particulars of the only System that trains you until proficient, and that has helped so many men and women in all parts of the world to earn money by Art.

he discloses none of the secrets of the prison-house. This mystery which is not a mystery might have been written by a man who had never come within a hundred miles of the Old Bailey, never experienced the curious thrill of dread and apprehension which one feels when watching the face of the prisoner in the dock. The note of real emotion is lacking, as is a logical sequence of events. The author might, we think, be more successful if he were to turn his attention to writing about prisons and prisoners as they really are.

Mrs. Frances Hodgson Burnett has a rare gift for allegory. THE LAND OF THE BLUE FLOWER (reprinted by Messrs. Putnam, 2s. net) is a charming fable. One associated the author of "That Lass o' Lowrie's" with a power of the dramatic, but in this dainty trifle she shows she can paint in softer, more delicate colours, and can create an atmosphere with the turn of a phrase. The story is very slight, and tells how King Amor changed the name of his country to "The Land of the Blue Flower." "In my pleasance on the mountain top there grows a Blue Flower. One of my brothers, the birds, brought me its seed from an Emperor's hidden garden. It is as beautiful as the sky at dawn. It has a strange power. It dispels evil fortune and the dark thoughts which bring it. There is no time for dark thoughts—there is no time for evil." The king commands that all his subjects shall plant the seed of the Blue Flower, which he will distribute to everyone. "Gradually all sorts of curious things happened. People who were growing Blue Flowers began to keep the ground round them in order." It was found, also, that people did not seem to have so many things to quarrel about. They were too occupied with tending the Blue Flower to watch their neighbours' incomings or outcomings, and gradually peace and content spread over the country, and the gloom that had ruled over the land before was forgotten.

It sometimes happens that the facts about a people, the truth concerning a revolution, or the history of a war is brought home more convincingly by the aid of a great novel or a remarkable play than through the agency of innumerable treatises or essays. THE DAUGHTER OF HEAVEN (Constable, 5s. net), by Pierre Loti and Judith Gautier, presents convincingly the underlying enmity between the Tartar race and their Chinese subjects. "The Daughter of Heaven" is the Empress, mother of the heir to the Ming Dynasty. This small hope of the line of China's ancient rulers has been carefully hidden away, in the hope that by the time he reaches man's estate his friends and followers will be in a position to aim a blow for the re-establishment of the Mings upon the throne. The play opens in the garden of the Palace at Nan-King, where is the Empress and her boy. To them comes the Emperor of Peking, the head of the reigning house of Manchu, and sworn foe of the Mings. He assumes a disguise, and falls in love with the Empress, who in her heart succumbs to his influence. The Tartar departs determined to do all that is possible to heal the breach between the two houses. He designs to marry the Empress, and there is some hope of his ambition being accomplished, when his followers for ever frustrate the desire of his heart. The Tartar army, in his absence, press on the Palace, and the Empress is forced to see her faithful and devoted followers shot. The remnant, rather than fall into the hands of the Tartars, set fire to the Palace and seek death in the heart of the flames. The Empress, yielding to pressure, makes her escape, first vowing that she will follow her soldiers so soon as she has ensured the safety of her son. The son, however, dies, and the Empress, watched over by the Tartar Emperor, is brought to his Palace at Peking. The scene between the Daughter of Heaven and the Tartar usurper is written with dramatic force and passion. She admits her love for him, but declares she will never live to be his wife. Her dead soldiers must for ever come between them. She pleads with him for poison, and he yields to her request. She swallows the fatal drug, and in the few minutes that remain to her throws herself into his arms.

"But now the abyss is crossed, and my mortal enemy is weeping tears for love in my embrace. Let me rest against your breast, come closer, with all your being, that I may pass away as though in you."

THE FOLLIOS OF REDMARLEY (Messrs. Murray, 6s.) is a refreshing novel which it is a genuine pleasure to read. It is concerned with the doings of a county family, the squire and his wife, and six delightful children, ranging from Kitten, aged four, to Mary and Grantley, the elder sister and brother, whose tendencies to grow up are a constant source of surprise and irritated wonder to the squire, his one idea being that children should neither be seen nor heard. To this end he placards the house with notices as to the banging of doors and the desirability of never conversing unless absolutely necessary, and then only in hushed whispers. Needless to say, the poor man is in a constant state of perturbation, mostly occasioned by the escapades of Uz and Buz, the twins, perfect geniuses in the art of discovering new and invariably annoying methods of amusing themselves. Mrs. Allen Harker does not, however, devote all her energies to the portrayal of this family alone, and has introduced her readers to a new and very welcome character, one Eloquent Gallup. Eloquent is the son of a local tradesman, whose one ambition is that his son should go into "Parlyment," and to this end he leaves him a large fortune on the condition that he takes up politics. Eloquent obeys the stipulation, and is the successful Liberal candidate for Redmarley. He is sympathetically drawn, and one follows his career with interest from the moment when he is discovered by Mary sitting in a puddle in the wood, to his final interview with her when he lays his heart at her feet.

Novels centring round a woman whose sole complaint is that she has too much to enjoy and too little to do are not as a rule convincing or attractive. With romance ready and waiting for the artist in the lives of men and women who have to work, it seems a waste of effort to clothe moral inertia with the veil of fantasy, and to suggest that the woman of leisure with an easy-going husband, as much money as she wants, and more than enough pleasure is likely to prove more interesting to the student of psychology than the ordinary type of hard-working everyday life. THE JUMPING OFF PLACE (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.) has the merit of being written brightly; there is no attempt to take the heroine, Eleanor, seriously. "Hers was a case of nerves, resulting from the fact that life had put too much stress on a frail constitution." The doctor she consults tells her frankly she must get out of herself before she is cured, and recommends the stock treatment for such cases as practised in America. She is sent out West to a mining camp, where, presumably brought face to face with the facts of existence, she will have little leisure and less energy to

MARVELS OF THE MIND.

Initiation FREE to Our Readers.

There are hundreds, nay, thousands, of capable men and women to-day needlessly living a life of mediocrity, obscurity, and failure, whose very existence constitute an "apparently intended" succession of endless toil, trouble, and misery. Fatalists, no doubt, exclaim that all such things must be, but just ask yourself this question: Is there one single sound reason why every being should not attain success and happiness? No—most emphatically there is not.

Every human soul is heir to a rich and glorious possession—the sacred cherished gifts of inborn capacities and talents. Everyone is born suitably equipped to play his or her rôle in the game of life, and given opportunities which, when grasped, lead to unbounded success and perfect happiness.

Mr. Frank Hartley, the greatest psychometriculturist, positively denies that failure in any sense of the term necessarily exists. He maintains that the power to succeed lies within the reach of all; it is, in fact, inherent, a potent dormant force, requiring but a certain amount of scientific development to manifest itself in every individual. Hundreds upon hundreds of people in every walk of life who have followed his method testify to the wonderful results which this truly remarkable man has enabled them to accomplish.

£1,000 GUARANTEE.

Just read the following remarkable letter. Mr. Frank Hartley possesses thousands of similar ones, and he will hand a cheque for £1,000 to any London Hospital, fund, or charity, if anyone can prove that these are not absolutely genuine.

Professor Le D—, Fellow of the British Institute of Mental Science and Graduate of the American College of Sciences (Diploma and Honours), writes, March 3rd, 1913:—

"I have carefully examined your system on Personal Magnetism, etc., and find it far superior to any I have ever read. As a Psychologist I may say you have given the very secrets away to the world.—Yours very faithfully,
"LE D—."

No matter your age or position in life, whether you are engaged in artistic pursuits, in commerce, in finance, you may be either employer, employee, or independent, Mr. Frank Hartley will help you attain your most cherished secret ambitions. Every word you speak, every emanating thought, every moment you live is either right or wrong, and the secret of success in every phase of life lies in bringing your every wish, thought, and action into perfect harmony with your immediate surroundings and the hidden forces of nature.

A GENEROUS OFFER.

So absolutely convinced is Mr. Hartley of the infallibility of his system that he offers to send a free copy of his wonderful book, entitled "The Temple of the Mind," to any of our readers interested, and, further, to initiate them free of charge into his wonderful secret success method.

There is no age limit, no question of position, or obstacle of any kind. All you have to do is to write to Mr. Frank Hartley, Room 106a, London Institute of Menti Culture, 9, John Street, Adelphi, London, W.C. (mention you are a reader of EVERYMAN), and he will send you a free copy of his wonderful book, full particulars of his method, and show you what you must do in order to attain Success, Power, Personal Influence, and Perfect Happiness.

Those who wish to may enclose two penny stamps for postage, etc., but in any case a mere request will bring his book and information.

concern herself with chimeras of an enervated imagination. Eleanor is by way of being a coquette, and her physician feels somewhat guilty that he has turned her loose on a number of inoffensive men, who are likely to go down before her without show of resistance. Ultimately the mining camp works a salient cure. Not only does she forget her "nerves" and fancies, but she falls in love with her own husband, whom the exigencies of American society and the facilities afforded for matrimonial freedom by American divorce has separated from her for some time. She is considering the possibility of finally divorcing him, when she discovers that he is really a person of some importance in her life. Miss Ethel Shackelford has a vivacious pen, and though her book makes no serious attempt at reality, it shows a certain capacity for looking on the light side of things that is commendable when serious novels, written in heavy style, issue in such unending succession from the English and American Press.

THE CONFESSIONS OF A DANCING GIRL (Heath, Cranton and Ouseley, 3s. 6d.) is the story of a heroine who determines to go on the music-hall stage, and her adventures in the pursuit of her ambition. There is an amount of local colour about the book that redeems its faults of style and the melodramatic atmosphere in which it is surrounded. Her account of the sensation of an acrobat on the trapeze is convincing, and the chapter that touches on lion-tamers and their pets makes good reading.

PRESS OPINIONS.

DAILY NEWS.—"No stately folio opens more uncompromisingly flat, the thin page making no unseemly attempt at independence; and although 600 such pages lie within a breadth of a bare three-quarters of an inch, the indispensable opacity is much more perfectly preserved than in some much more grandiose works which have sought to compress the full quart of learning into the pint pot of portability."

DAILY TELEGRAPH.—"It is not easy to know who should be congratulated most—the editor, Mr. Andrew Boyle, on so admirable an achievement, the publishers on so courageous an undertaking, or the public on the prospect of being able to purchase for twelve monthly shillings a complete encyclopædia of knowledge."

WORLD.—"... The result is eminently satisfactory, and great popularity may be anticipated for one of the handiest and most correct little reference books ever published."

MANCHESTER COURIER.—"There can be little doubt that countless readers, hitherto prevented only by considerations of cost from acquiring what has become an indispensable part of every household, will be quick to take advantage of this golden opportunity of possessing an encyclopædia which not only answers all their everyday needs, but also makes a handsome addition to any library."

Holeproof Hose.

To save uncongenial labour, to make life happier and sweeter for every human being, to increase the leisure time of the overworked—these things are the objects which inventors have striven to attain. Bell, the inventor of the telephone, placed all the world on chatting terms over the wires. He showed us how to laugh at space. Edison applied electricity and enables us to brighten the darkest night. Airmen have mastered the art of flying so what is there left

WHY, OUR GARMENTS STILL WEAR OUT.

But your Hosiery need not if you will keep pace with the times, for there is now Hosiery that is Holeproof.

WHY THIS HOSIERY IS HOLEPROOF.

The explanation of the durability of "V. & H." Holeproof Hosiery is made here, so that every person can see for himself, or herself, the genuineness of it. Your own brain will show you the truth of it. This "V. & H." Holeproof Hosiery is made in a new way from a specially privately manufactured yarn. This yarn is lighter in weight and at the same time tougher and stronger than any other brand. It is so pliable that it gives to continued pressure and wear, just as a sponge may be depressed by gripping in the hand, but still have no damage done to its fabric. There is hardly any spring or elastic stretch in ordinary hose, even of the most expensive kind, and this accounts for the rapid appearance of holes and thin places. Luxuriously comfortable, shapely and well-made, "V. & H." Holeproof Hosiery is a revelation to all.

Look at our "GUARANTEE" Ticket which is sent with every pair we sell

TRY THEM FOR TWO MONTHS.

Then, if within that time a hole should appear, send them back to us at once with ticket, and we will present you with new hose without extra cost.

No such guarantee could be given with hose made in the ordinary way. But with "V. & H." Holeproof Hose you can be free from the fear of a hole suddenly showing—not only just at that point at the heel where the eyes of everyone can see, but at no part of "V. & H." Holeproof Hose will there be a hole. That we guarantee for two whole months.

The comfort and pleasure of good wearing hose to men conveys a sense of well-being and satisfaction all day long, while to business girls and busy housewives, to whom the weekly darning is a long and tiresome task, the benefit is incalculable.

Everyone in the country will be wearing "V. & H." Holeproof Hosiery after we can get them just to TRY it once. Orders are now pouring in from the friends of those who already are wearing the new "V. & H." Holeproof Hose. The price is—

HISTORY IN THE MAKING

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

IT is exceedingly difficult to speak with any certitude of the probable course of events on the Rand. As we write it seems probable that the cataclysm of a general strike may be avoided, and that there is at least a possibility of the miners accepting the enquiry into their grievances which was offered by General Botha. It is certain, however, that until that enquiry has taken place, or until some improvement has been effected in the lot of the miner, the spectre of labour unrest will continue to haunt the Rand, with results that must prove deplorable to the future development of South Africa.

Mr. Churchill's plunge into oil, and his dramatic and almost abrupt decision to transform the fuel of the fleet, is not to pass unchallenged by criticism from competent quarters. In the House of Commons itself the masterful personality of the First Lord, together with his powers of repartee, may suffice to silence opposition. But none the less the country shows itself restive under the change. Not only have the miners emphatically asserted their right to a vested interest in their occupation, but the experts have not been slow in pointing out that Mr. Churchill will be dependent for his oil on three sources of supply, whose representatives may at any moment form themselves into a ring, while only one country under the flag—Burmah—is potentially capable of providing the Navy with oil. A monopoly that has its success in foreign supply is a danger that even the British Navy cannot disregard, and it is not at all improbable that a Committee of the House of Commons will at no distant date be appointed to enquire into the whole subject.

Quite exceptional interest attaches to the account appearing in this month's World's Work, concerning the success of a remarkable and hitherto unknown colony of small-holders, which, founded some twenty years ago at Winterslow, near Salisbury, has won through on lines that are at once ancient and original. According to our contemporary, the colony has applied to the solution of the modern land problem the principles of the old Saxon Witenagemot, and the experiment has been crowned with complete success. It seems that, in 1892, Major Poore bought a farm, which he proceeded to let to some forty-five small-holders, who took up the land in lots. These forty-five men were divided into committees, according to their localities, of about ten each, whose chairman, with Major Poore, formed the local land court. This court used its funds emphatically for the common good, and, despite poverty of soil and all sorts of disadvantages, the Winterslow small-holders have thriven exceedingly.

Remarkable as has been the development of the crisis in China, it will come with no surprise to those who have followed the course of events in that mysterious country. The revolt of the South against Yuan-Shi-Kai was bound to come. The South is definitely Republican. Yuan has been described, not inaptly, as "moderate Manchu." He accepted the new regime only under pressure, and the Southern provinces accepted him only under the positive duress of the Powers. The last straw came when he concluded a loan of many millions in the teeth of his own Parliament. While his exchequer was empty his opponents knew he was powerless, but anything was possible when he had money. Hence the revolt.

A virile London evening paper publishes some truly astounding figures in regard to the much-discussed Cat and Mouse Act. Night by night it takes various test cases, which show, clearly and undeniably, that, whatever be the cause, the Act has failed ignominiously to achieve its objects. Let us give a case in point. A Suffragette sentenced on July 8th to two months' imprisonment was released on the 15th; again arrested on the 18th; released a second time on the 23rd inst., and has since then been twice released and arrested. What other inference can be drawn from this record than that the Act has absolutely failed?

No little interest attaches to the announcement, circulated by one of the news agencies, to the effect that the Government propose to appoint a Royal Commission to consider the whole question of labour unrest, especially as regards railways. It is over twenty years since the famous Labour Commission was appointed, with memorable results. Mr. Tom Mann and Mr. James Mawdsley, it may be remembered, were among the members, and one of the sequelæ was Mr. Chamberlain's Workmen's Compensation Act. One can only hope that this enquiry will excite something of the interest and enthusiasm of its predecessor.

Are we in for another agitation for a stronger fleet? It really looks uncommonly like it. Without going into the rights or wrongs of the matter, it is obvious that some of Mr. Churchill's critics are determined to force the hand of the First Lord, and the more vigorous among them are already asserting that we are at least six Dreadnoughts short. These critics claim that the margin of sixty per cent. superiority which Mr. Churchill laid down is insufficient, and already there are signs that an active autumn campaign will be conducted in support of their contentions.

THE MAN AND HIS WORK

III.—THE MAN BEFORE THE MAST ❖ ❖ BY C. SHERIDAN JONES

THERE is a picture—by whom and of what artistic value I do not know—which, none the less, always comes to my mind, when I think or write about the men who go down to the sea in ships. It is called, I believe, "The Hopeless Dawn," and it depicts two figures; one that of a young woman—a wife, and now a widow—crouching in an extremity of wild despair at the feet of the old mother, whose careworn face bears that look of enforced resignation which seems more dreadful than the deepest grief. Behind them both, seen through a window of their little cabin, is the sea, angry and exultant, which has that night sucked down and destroyed the lives that were most precious to them both, and which assuredly will make desolate many another home, break many another heart, before its fury is expended.

It is this element of perpetual danger that makes the sailor such an attractive figure. "We have fed the seas for a thousand years," sings Kipling, "and she calls us, still unfed." Every day she demands her victims. Every month one may read the records of wrecks along the coast, which tell her dreadful toll. It is the recognition of this very fact, the knowledge that poor Jack may at any time be called on to face death on the high seas, the feeling that, behind him and his infectious gaiety and boisterous good spirits, there is always that dreadful background of the angry sea, the sea which may at any moment wreck his vessel and end his life; it is this that gives him so strong a hold upon our sympathies. How has that sympathy reacted on the actual facts of the workaday lot of the average seaman? So far, I fear, but feebly. If we take the official figures affecting British seamen in our Mercantile Marine, with whom the present article is exclusively concerned, we find that the number of seamen enumerated as "British, not otherwise defined, and from the Colonies or British possessions," is 136,580—an increase of 8,000 on the 128,077 "Total British" sailors recorded for 1906. It is very pertinent to enquire how this increase was effected, and not a little disquieting to note 3,459 were Chinamen, who, by giving Hong Kong as their birthplace, Got Registered under the "All-Red" Designation.

And our disquietude is increased when we note that the Registrar-General points out that during the twenty years from 1891 to 1911 the number of Lascars in the British Mercantile Marine has increased by 21,583. In 1891 nearly one-half of the Lascars were employed upon vessels trading entirely abroad. The number thus employed has risen in the successive censuses from 10,535 to 13,100, 14,680, 14,924, and in 1911 to 16,571, while simultaneously there has been a greater increase in the number of Lascars on vessels which trade to this country with men under Asiatic agreements. Their numbers in the five censuses have been: 10,787, 14,811, 18,930, 23,501, and in 1911 26,334. On the 3rd of April, 1911, there were 170,416 seamen (including masters and apprentices) employed on steam vessels in the foreign trade, and of these 42,856, or 25 per cent., were Lascars under Asiatic agreement. These Lascars on steam vessels in the foreign trade were apportioned amongst the different ratings as follows:—

|--|--------|
| Petty Officers in the Sailors' Department | 3,292 |
| Sailors or Deck hands | 11,243 |
| Firemen and Trimmers | 17,510 |
| Petty Officers in the Engineers' Department | 2,306 |
| Stewards, Cooks, etc. | 8,505 |
| Total | 42,856 |

These figures really threaten the permanence of the British Jack Tar, the national hero, whose praises Dibden sang, and whose qualities are so frequently emphasised in fiction and the drama, and at once the question arises,

How is it that Life on the Ocean is proving less and less attractive to the race which has given the world its finest seamen, and whose sons are now being ousted by Lascars and Chinamen, by the sweepings of Asiatic ports and the off-scourings of races who are without a tithe of the stamina or the skill in sea craft that the Briton possesses? According to the officials of the men's Unions, the reason is simple. No Treasury grant for "this most important branch of education," no Government assistance in training boys for sea, will suffice. "I could get fifty boys a month," declared Mr. Cathery, of the Seamen's Union, "in the East End of London to qualify for the seaman's life, but life at sea must be made sweeter, and the conditions changed first, before decent fathers and mothers will send their lads to sea." In a word, the men's grievances must be redressed.

What are these grievances? Admittedly Jack Tar's life afloat has enormously improved, but it still fails to correspond with that general advance in conditions, if not in wages, which marks other industries. Take, for instance, the lot of the fireman in the merchant steamer—liner or tramp—which leaves our shores, often without carrying one stokehole hand above the bare number required to maintain a sufficient head of steam; any derangement of the routine, caused, say, by a man falling sick, throws on the remainder an inhuman task, which no man who has not served his apprenticeship as a trimmer can stand.

He is Soon Driven to his Bunk, and his mates are constantly doing doubles for him, working two extra hours in his place. When these extra duties become common, the work becomes ghastly. Men slave on, distressed like hunted deer, and when the work is finished they reel up the fiddle-ladder with working faces, their self-control gone, and have been known to sob like children. Then on top of this comes a rush—very often—of "Field days," when the vessel is nearing home. Sometimes, it is alleged, men are driven to suicide under the fearful pressure—under the unnatural heat of the stokehole and the inhumanity of the speeding up of modern seamanship. According to Mr. Chidlow, Liverpool District Secretary of the National Sailors' and Firemen's Union, out of every 916 European firemen and trimmers, one ends his days by jumping overboard, while with Asiatics it is worse—one in 447 committing suicide. Even here, of course, the balance is with the more stable Britisher, but one cannot wonder that the Englishman is turning his back on a trade that is only maintained under such fearful conditions.

Of course, it would be misleading to pretend that this condition of affairs is typical of the general conditions of the men before the mast. It is representative only of one of the worst phases of life at sea, and it is fair also to remember that—thanks partly to the Union and its persistent efforts—the lot of the average seaman has greatly improved. But the horrors of the stokehole are deeply impressed on the imagination of the sea-faring centres of Great Britain, and although seamen's wages have risen within the last year or two, admittedly the supply of Britishers for the Mercantile Marine has fallen. According to the shipowners, whose view, of course, demands attention, the increase in wages has been considerable. The men dispute this, however, and they put forward figures which they claim show that while advances have taken place, they average for Able Seamen only about 10s. per month. The rates of pay vary, of course, with different ports. Taking those that prevailed in London early in the year, we get the following:—

| | | | | | | | |
|----------|-----|-----|-----|----|----|---|------------|
| Firemen | ... | ... | ... | £5 | 10 | 0 | per month. |
| Trimmers | ... | ... | ... | 5 | 0 | 0 | „ |
| Greasers | ... | ... | ... | 6 | 0 | 0 | „ |
| A.B.'s | ... | ... | ... | 5 | 0 | 0 | „ |

Western Ocean routes.

| | | | | | | | |
|----------|-----|-----|-----|---|----|---|---|
| Greasers | ... | ... | ... | 6 | 5 | 0 | „ |
| Firemen | ... | ... | ... | 6 | 0 | 0 | „ |
| Trimmers | ... | ... | ... | 5 | 10 | 0 | „ |
| A.B.'s | ... | ... | ... | 5 | 10 | 0 | „ |

While at other ports the pay ranged from 35s. per week on weekly and £5 10s. on monthly boats, as at Leith, to Rotterdam, where the pay was only £5 per month. Of course, to this must be added the cost of the seaman's keep, his partial board and lodging on board ship. It is when we come to consider these that we

of the Men,

grievances that, far more than their pay, account for the fact that John Bull, Junior, is turning his back on the sea. While the comfort and requirements of the passengers have been provided for to an extent that is almost ridiculous, while the first-class passengers of the Titanic, for instance, had squash racquet courts and private swimming baths, the accommodation offered to the men is, to put it very mildly, inadequate. Dr. Williams, Medical Officer of the Port of London, denounces the "conditions of the seamen shut up in quarters below deck which are practically in constant use as a sleeping, living, and dining-room, generally dark, dirty, damp, and encumbered with clothing, and where sometimes have to be kept the food that they provide for themselves." These conditions have made the great white scourge, consumption, felt acutely even at sea, and the men themselves declare that the fo'castle is at times intolerably hot, ill-lit and ill-ventilated, with insufficient seats, and with all the intolerable and disgusting nuisances that accrue from "messing" in the same room. Of course, against this we have the advantage of the eternal sea, with its life-giving breezes and glorious air; but even sailors, it should be noted, get tired of that "eternal blue plate, the ocean," overhung, as one of them put it to me, "by the eternal blue saucer of the sky," so sharp and confined does habit render the boundless ocean. On the other hand, they are free now from most of the disgraceful tyrannies and shameful cruelties that mark the sailor's life. Ashore they are better looked after. Their life, arduous and exacting as it is, is free from the fret and cares, the anxieties and distractions that more and more mark the lot of the town artisan, and it still leaves the British sailor something of the blitheness of spirit which makes his character a national asset well worth preserving. See him ashore nowadays, and Jack is no longer drunken, riotous, irrepressible. Usually he has a neat home and a fond wife awaiting him, and he can forget his hardships and privations and enjoy himself ashore, as the pages of W. W. Jacobs amply attest.

Perhaps the sailorman is happiest when he is employed, not by one of the big lines, but aboard

Those small Tramp Steamers which Ply
Up and Down the Coast;

where the skipper, who is not infrequently the owner also, takes pot luck with the tiny crew, and where all have an interest, more or less direct, in the financial success of the voyage. The seaman aboard the tramp tastes to the full the camaraderie of life afloat and knows more of the joys of the home than his brother of the deep-sea voyage. Above all, he is not remote from those blessings of ownership that are brought home on the great lines only by the prodigious dividends, the enormous fortunes netted out of the sweat of his brow, fortunes and dividends that have increased out of all proportion to the advances in wages which combination has won for the sailor.

In some respects, indeed, the seaman's lot has not advanced at all. The under-manning of merchant ships, tamely acquiesced in by the Board of Trade, has rendered his life far more exacting, has increased enormously the pressure that the captain is obliged to place on the members of the individual crew. There is a wealth of figures to prove this assertion, which space does not permit me to put in evidence. Speeding up on the ocean, as on land, has done much to shorten the worker's life. And even more serious is the fact, recently denounced by Mr. Hyndman in a damning indictment, that the Seamen's Load Line won by the heroic exactions of Samuel Plimsoll has gone! Without adequate discussion, and against competent advice, the Board of Trade have virtually abandoned the safeguards which that brave man won from Parliament. I am aware, of course, that it is claimed that the modern conditions of seamanship have rendered Plimsoll's precaution supererogatory. But against that I would quote the almost innumerable censures quoted in the official returns of the Board of Trade, censures which say that the ship carried too heavy a cargo and that all hands perished.

Is it any wonder that the Englishman, the finest sailor in the world, is giving the ocean the go-by?

WHY IS THE NEWSPAPER MAN POWERLESS IN ENGLAND? * * BY CHARLES SAROLEA

I.

THERE are two institutions which have been losing ground in modern England: the Ecclesiastical Institution, which has been temporarily shaken by criticism and unbelief, and the Parliamentary Institution, which has been undermined by the party system and threatened by the advance of democracy. In the place of these two dwindling forces, the Press has been gradually absorbing the fullness of political and spiritual power. The Press guides the policy, formulates the ideals of the nation, inflames the passions of the people. It makes and unmakes the reputations of statesmen, it provides the driving power of Government. In countries like France and America it even arrogates to itself the judicial function, and when ordinary justice fails to detect crime the Press has its own secret service and private detective agencies. Even in despotic countries like Russia and Prussia, the Press is a wholesome check on the tyranny of the Government, and in critical moments a journalist like Maximilian Harden is able to challenge the majesty of the Crown.

II.

But whilst the power of the journal is increasing in every country, and not least so in England, we have to note this strange paradox: the power of the journalist is decreasing. The British newspaper may command immense prestige, yet the men whose brains create that prestige are insignificant members of the community. The British newspaper may be enormously wealthy, yet the man whose brain creates that wealth may be miserably poor. A recent novel by Mr. Alphonse Courlander, "Mightier than the Sword," described that paradoxical contrast, and gave a striking and melancholy picture of the conditions of life and labour of the British journalist.

His tenure of office is lamentably precarious. He may be dismissed whenever the newspaper changes its proprietor. He may be dismissed whenever a new editor assumes power. He may be dismissed if he disagrees with the policy of the paper. Even when he manages to hold on, the time inevitably comes when he must make room for younger men, when he loses the elasticity and nerve which are indispensable in his strenuous profession. At fifty years of age the journalist finds himself useless, resourceless, the discarded victim of a ruthless machine.

III.

The cause of this impotence of the journalist is not far to seek. It is largely attributable to the abominable British system of anonymity. If the journalist were allowed to sign his articles, if he were allowed to have a personality, he would be appreciated in proportion to his merit. He might be a power in the land, as he is in France, where half the Prime Ministers of the Monarchy, where half the statesmen of the Third Republic served their apprenticeship and won their spurs in the Press. In Great Britain the journalist receives no credit. All the credit goes to the paper; that is to say, to the proprietor. And if the journalist ceases to be acceptable to his employer, and is compelled to transfer his allegiance to another paper, all his years of past service are thrown away, for his name is hardly known outside of Fleet Street. In any other profession or trade—on the turf or on the stage—his name would have a marketable value; but in the very profession where individuality ought to count most his name counts for nothing, for it has been suppressed and exploited solely in the interests of the capitalist. His individuality has been merged in that of the paper. The British journalist is like an officer whose heroic deeds are appropriated by the commanding general, with this difference, that whereas on the battlefield the general often actually does gain the victory, in a newspaper the battles are only fought and won by the anonymous journalist.

IV.

Like every social phenomenon, however anomalous, the anonymity of British journalism admits of an historical explanation, like the law of libel or like the traditional custom of designating a member of Parliament not by his name, but by that of his constituency. Once upon a time anonymity was in the first place a means of protecting the public against the misuse of violent personalities, and in the second place it was a means of protecting the journalist against the abuses of despotism. In an age of violent partisanship, in the days of that heroic publicist Daniel de Foe, when passions were running high, there was an advantage in keeping personality in the background and in subordinating individuals to principles. In an age when Government was tyrannical there was an advantage in securing to the humble journalist the protecting barrier of a powerful paper. As plain Mr. Jones, the journalist might have fallen an easy victim to arbitrary Government; as one of a numerous band in a powerful organ of public opinion he was invulnerable.

V.

But what was once a means of protecting the public has now become a means of deceiving it. What once was a means of protecting the journalist has become a means of suppressing him. To-day it is not the tyranny of Government that the journalist has to dread, but the tyranny of capital; and it is the tyranny of capital that maintains the anonymity of the Press. For it is in the interest of the capitalist that the Press should be anonymous. So long as the man of genius is content to remain an anonymous scribbler, the proprietor gets the sole credit of his labours. Instead of the paper being identified with the journalist, the journalist is identified with the paper. If the journalist made himself independent, the reader would realise that, after all, the paper is a mere commercial venture, that it has no moral personality apart from that of the writer, and that it is to the writer alone that he owes guidance and inspiration.

VI.

Under the system of anonymous journalism, not only is the journalist exploited, but the public are hoodwinked. The unsigned article or review in the Times, or the Spectator, or the Manchester Guardian derives an entirely fictitious importance from the prestige of the paper itself. The system, if it subjects genius to impotence, gives absurd importance to mediocrity. For the unsigned article, although appearing in a famous paper, may be, and in many cases is, shallow and insignificant. The writer may be only a hack and hireling, yet to the outside public his voice is the voice of the Times, or the Spectator, or the Manchester Guardian. The value attached by the public to his utterances is entirely deceptive; but the deception can be continued for a generation. Even as a degenerate descendant of a famous house continues to profit from the achievements of his sires, so a great newspaper may long continue to live and trade on its past reputation.

VII.

Happily, signs are not wanting that the days of anonymous journalism are numbered. The weeklies are nearly all dying a natural death, precisely because they cling to a superannuated system, and because they have failed to realise the value of individuality. The historic dailies, the Times and the Scotsman, are still able to maintain anonymity, because they have a great name and abundance of capital; but the most modern and living papers are rapidly discouraging an effete and immoral practice. British journalists have begun to awaken to a sense of their bondage. They begin to realise that the capitalist not only deprives them of the fruits of their talent, but that he tends to suppress that talent itself. For the secret of all talent is personality; and there is no scope for personality in anonymous journalism. And, what is worse, there is no scope for morality and conviction, for the anonymous journalist loses all sense of responsibility, and becomes an advocate in the pay of his employer, and, like an advocate, he will only defend those causes which he is paid to defend. British journalists are beginning to realise those obvious truths. The best of them refuse to be suppressed and exploited any longer and to sell their souls for a mess of pottage. The day is approaching when the British journalist, like his fellow-worker in France, will cease to be a hireling of newspaper proprietors, even though they may be respectable cocoa merchants and munificent American millionaires.

BY a single flash the palace was illuminated from the bottom to its highest terrace: the centre door at the top opened, and a woman—the daughter of Hamilcar—robed in black, appeared on the threshold. She came down the stairway that traversed obliquely the third storey, then the second and the first; pausing on the lowest terrace at the top of the stairway of the galleys, motionless, head downcast, looking down upon the soldiers. Behind her on both sides were two long processions of pale men, clothed in white robes fringed with red, hanging straight down to their feet; their heads and eyebrows were shaven; their hands, in which they carried enormous lyres, glittered with rings. They all chanted in a shrill voice a hymn to the divinity of Carthage. These were the eunuch priests of the temple of Tanit, often summoned by Salambo to her palace. . . . Her hair was powdered with violet dust, and, according to the fashion of Canaanite maidens, it was gathered up in the form of a tower on the crown of her head, making her appear taller: strands of pearls attached to her temples fell down to the corners of her mouth—as rosy as a half-opened pomegranate; on her neck she wore a collection of luminous gems, which imitated in their medley the scales of a sea-eel; her sleeveless tunic, made of a black tissue, starred with red flowers, exposed her bare arms, bedecked with diamonds. Between her ankles she wore a gold chainlet to regulate the length of her steps; and her voluminous dark purple mantle, of an unknown fabric, trailed, making at each step a wide billow behind her.—From "Salambo," by Gustave Flaubert.

FROM A RUSSIAN PRISON

By HELEN VORONOFF

"She has Forgiven"

IT was not until after a lapse of six years that I was once more able to visit the Wiborg Cellular Prison, in the consumptive ward of which I first began to work for poor prisoners. Then I was in the company of Princess Maria Dondoukoff-Korsakoff. Now, this noble woman has gone to her reward, but everything around seemed to speak to me of her. There was not a bed in that ward upon which she had not sat (she seldom, if ever, used the chairs provided, feeling that in this way she was nearer to the patient). And many a sufferer had she comforted. Laying her hand upon his shoulder or his head, she would speak words which, delivered in her sweet and affable voice, could not fail to reach his heart. Ah! how many a heart was softened, how much physical pain relieved, how many souls gained back to God by her sweet ministrations!

And now, with these dear memories crowding upon me, I visited once again the Wiborg Cellular Prison.

It has been much improved; now there are two wards for consumptive patients, whereas formerly there was but one, which was both overcrowded and airless. In fact, the place, I remember, on one occasion was so close as to overcome the Princess, who was obliged to lie down and recover before continuing her ministrations to the sick.

I.

Upon the occasion of this my first visit to the prison after six years, a touching incident occurred, which I should like to recall.

Upon entering the ward I saw at once that there were three there who would not be long upon this earth, for they remained motionless as I advanced. But the others brightened up at my coming, trying to check their troublesome cough, and even, where strong enough, raising themselves to greet me.

During my conversation with them I asked if those so near their end had received Holy Communion. Upon this point I was reassured, and was much comforted to see how anxious were those not yet about to die that their fellow-sufferers should receive this consolation when the end approached.

I noticed as I passed along the ward a specially young and handsome face, the face of one of the three about to breathe their last. I drew closer, and silently watched him for a few moments, fearing to rouse him, for his eyes were closed, and his breath was short and interrupted. Bright red spots burnt upon his cheeks.

As I stood thus his neighbour called him, and, looking above his bed, I read the name, "Paul Rostchin."

"Why do you disturb him?" I asked. The man explained that Rostchin expected me, and wished to ask me something, and that when he regained consciousness he would be very sad that he had not been roused to speak to me.

After some time, Rostchin opened his eyes. I shall never forget their expression. It was a mingling of pain and hope and entreaty. He tried hard to speak, but, although his lips moved, I could hear no sound.

Gently I tried to soothe him, begging him to be calm, and telling him that I was in no hurry, and would wait until I understood what it was he wished to say to me.

At last I caught one word, "Mother." "Ah!" said I, "you are calling your mother; you want to see her; perhaps I could find her. Where does she live?"

"She is far from here," he whispered, "and cannot come."

My heart ached for him. It was pitiful to hear him in these his last moments calling for his mother. I bent over him and said:

"Your own mother, as you say, is far from here; but God has sent me to comfort you. Can you not count me your spiritual mother, and confide in me, when I come to you and sit with you and listen to all you have to say?"

His face brightened at the thought, and a little strength seemed to return. "I have something," he said, "to tell her before I die."

II.

Then I begged him to say to me what he wished to say to her, promising that I would hear it as though I were his mother. Hardly had I said this than the man on the bed at our right, being able to walk, got up and moved away, and the other, who was not equal to that effort, turned his back to us, that he might not hear. I was touched at the feeling displayed by these apparently rough, though simple Russian men.

And then I made out from his laboured words his sad story. A good, kind, and loving mother abandoned for more than a year and a half, while he suffered in prison. His great wish now was to let her know how much he felt his guilt, and beg for her forgiveness.

I listened, holding my breath that I might catch the halting words, and as he bared his soul, and made clear the confession he wished to make, it seemed as though a great weight fell from him; and when, from sheer exhaustion, he sank back and closed his eyes, I knew that the tears were there, as he said brokenly, "I shall never see her again to tell her this. I have only a few days, perhaps a week, left to live."

I never hold out vain hopes to the poor patients when they are about to die, so, seeing how near he was to his end, I did not undeceive him.

Again I asked him for his mother's address, promising to write and tell her that he was dying, and asked forgiveness, and that I would ask her to reply immediately, so that he might hear the answer before the end. The face of the dying man shone with a great joy; the forgiveness of his mother was all he sought now upon the earth. Then, sinking back upon his bed, he murmured, "If I get the answer, I shall take it with me."

Before leaving the hospital I made the sign of the Cross upon his forehead. His eyes were closed, but he whispered, "Thanks, thanks."

III.

Meeting the doctor on my way out, I inquired whether he thought it was worth while to suggest that the mother should come, or could he last so long. The doctor seemed unable to decide, saying he might live a week or he might die that day.

Hurrying home, I despatched the promised letter, and for days awaited the answer. Each day I telephoned to the prison for news of the dying man, and each time I received the same reply, "He is alive, but very weak." And this for five days.

On the sixth day, when I came home in the afternoon, my servant met me with the information that a very old woman, poorly dressed, in bast shoes and a wallet on her back, had been there asking for her son Paul.

Rostchin's mother, upon the receipt of my letter, had determined to come in person to pardon her son. As the journey cost five roubles twenty copecks, she sold all her possessions, pledging even her felt shoes, thus being forced to travel in bast shoes, in spite of the intense cold. It was her first visit to a large town; she was bewildered by all she saw; but her mother's love helped her to surmount all obstacles.

The next morning, very early, I went to her. In her anxiety to get to her son, she came to the tram with one golosh only over her bast shoe; the other she had forgotten. It was not until we were on the way that I broke the sad tidings to her that the hospital to which we were going was the hospital of a prison. "Oh! Paul, Paul, my beloved son. My darling! How did you get to prison?" she sobbed. "He was a warrant officer, and now he is in prison."

To me it was most touching that she did not once reproach him. She only pitied him without end. She warmly thanked me that I had not mentioned in my letter that he was in prison.

"Oh, God! Oh, Holy Virgin Mary! Let me find him alive; let me but hear one word from him; let him look on me only one moment," prayed the old woman.

We found, on our arrival at the prison, that Rostchin yet lived, but to give an adequate description of the meeting between mother and son I feel is beyond me.

When I led the poor woman into the room where Rostchin lay, and showed her the bed on which he was stretched, she staggered, and would have fallen had I not supported her. But her eyes fell on the picture of a saint, and, making the sign of the Cross, she approached the bedside of her son. He was so weak that he could not even turn his head, but tears rolled down his cheeks, and the poor mother, bending over him, gazed so earnestly into his eyes, that her tears fell and flowed with his.

"Forgive me, forgive me, my own mother. I am very guilty," repeated the dying man.

"My son, my dear son Paul, God will forgive you," wept the sorrowing woman.

IV.

I could stand the scene no longer, and I withdrew. When later I returned, some of the sick prisoners came up and thanked me for the great joy I had given to Rostchin.

Once more was I thrilled to find such feelings in these poor prisoners, themselves suffering and outcast, yet rejoicing with their fellow-sufferer. It is easy to weep with those who weep, but when one's own heart is sad and suffering, is it so easy to rejoice with those that rejoice? Envy so easily creeps in.

Rostchin did not live long after the visit of his mother. Having received her pardon, he became calmer, asked for the clergyman, and once more received the Holy Sacrament. His death was that of a good Christian. His sufferings were great, but he remained still in the same peaceful disposition. Before he breathed his last, he repeated again and again, "Forgive, forgive!"

It is interesting to note that his mother did not remain until the end, but, having pardoned and blessed her son, asked to be sent back to her home.

This is characteristically Russian. Having satisfied herself that his soul was prepared to meet his God, she was less anxious about the dying body, asking only to be informed when God had called him away.

I let her know when all was over, and in reply received a simple and touching letter, in which she begged me to "go to his grave, take from it a handful of earth, and send it to me."

What treasures lie hidden in the faithful soul of the simple Russian!—Translated by Mme. Olga Novikoff.

GUSTAVE FLAUBERT*

I.

THERE are some writers whose work is greater than themselves. There are others whose personality is greater than their work. Flaubert belongs to the latter category. A Norman by birth, and a citizen of Rouen, like Corneille, Flaubert, by his massive frame, by his truculent and aggressive manner, reminds one of his Norseman ancestors. Of middle-class origin, and being left a competence by his father, for thirty-five years he lived in the country, and this reviler of the bourgeoisie was almost a bourgeois in the method and regularity of his daily existence. The even tenor of his life was only varied by periodical visits to Paris, and by occasional journeys to the South and to the East, journeys always undertaken with a view to collecting material for his literary work. Living, like Charles Lamb, under the periodical menace of a terrible nervous disease, he never married, but his kindness, his generosity, his integrity and loyalty attracted to him a wide circle of friends, and he was loved for the qualities of his heart as much as he was admired for the greatness of his genius. The "Journal" of the Goncourts gives us a delightful picture of Flaubert as the centre of the most famous literary coterie in the last days of the Second Empire; and it is significant of the position which Flaubert occupied in the estimation of his contemporaries that all the members of this illustrious and heterogeneous group—Ste. Beuve, Rénan, Maupassant, Daudet, Zola—agreed in hailing Gustave Flaubert as the master and creator of a new form of French art.

II.

Literature has its martyrs, like religion and politics, and Flaubert may be considered pre-eminently as one of the martyrs of the literary craft. A bachelor without a family, an agnostic without a creed, an artist without mundane interests, Flaubert's whole soul was immersed in and sacrificed to his art. Literature was his goddess. For her he lived. No writer ever conceived a higher ideal of his mission. In the service of literature he spent a life of unremitting toil, submitting to what he called the tortures of style—"les affres du style"—polishing every sentence, again and again rewriting every page, spending seven years over "Madame Bovary," thirteen years over "Bouvard et Pécuchet," and spending thirty years between the beginning and the end of the "Temptation of St. Anthony." Under those conditions, it is not to be wondered at that, although Flaubert started writing at seventeen, and although he wrote continually and methodically till the hour of his death, he only managed to publish six volumes in all. But each one of those six volumes is stamped with his genius, and is assured of immortality.

III.

He was a strange combination of the romanticist and of the realist. He was brought up on Chateaubriand and Victor Hugo, and for both he professed boundless admiration. He had the romanticist's love of form and colour; he had his exoticism, his haunting sense of beauty, his worship of Art for Art's sake. On the other hand, he had the realist's rigid loyalty to and reverence for truth; he had the habit of scrupulous and minute observation, the hatred of cant and self-delusion. And this double blend of romanticism and realism is revealed in the dual nature of his work. Nothing could be more unlike "Madame Bovary," which is a commonplace narrative of everyday life, than "Salambo," which is a resplendent resurrection of Carthaginian civilisation. Nothing could be less unlike the "Temptation of St. Anthony" than the "Education Sentimentale" or than the striking, but disappointing "Bouvard et Pécuchet."

IV.

Gustave Flaubert is the spiritual father of the modern French naturalist school. All the novels of Zola and Maupassant, of Daudet and the brothers De Goncourt may be said to proceed from "Madame Bovary" (1857), which has become one of the mile-stones of French fiction. "Madame Bovary" is the most characteristic, as well as the highest, expression of Flaubert's genius, and is probably, with "Anne Karenine," the greatest novel of world literature. It is the simple life-story of a farmer's daughter who has been educated above her station, and has been imbued with romantic notions. Having only received from that education both a distaste for the humdrum duties of country life, and social ambitions and intellectual aspirations doomed to disappointment, she falls an easy prey to an ill-regulated mind and to ill-disciplined emotions. "Madame Bovary" is the eternal bankruptcy of romance and sentiment in conflict with the hard and sordid facts of real life.

On its appearance "Madame Bovary" created universal sensation, and it is one of the ironies of literary history that its author was prosecuted for immorality by the most immoral generation of modern French history, the generation of the Third Napoleon. French public opinion has moved a long way since those imperial days; but British public opinion still continues to taboo one of the most wonderful productions of French literature. The fact is all the more strange when we remember that "Madame Bovary" is supremely moral and essentially puritan, as moral, indeed, and as puritan as "Anne Karenine," of which it constantly reminds us. Unlike "George Sand" and like "Anne Karenine," "Madame Bovary" does not give us the romance of unlawful passion, but only its tragedy. "Madame Bovary" is no "Dame aux Camélias." A relentless Nemesis attends every deed of the bourgeois heroine, and she is foredoomed to disaster and suicide for breaking the laws of society and of traditional morality.

V.

Flaubert owes nothing to adventitious circumstances or to meretricious ornament. We are repelled rather than attracted by the sombre atmosphere of his novels. The author belongs to a generation of shattered ideals, culminating in the disasters of Metz and Sedan. And he is a consistent pessimist. He is far more of a pessimist than the Russian novelists, for in Dostoevsky and Tolstoy through the gloom and the darkness there always pierces the light of love and faith. But in Flaubert no ideal relieves the dreary monotony and mediocrity of existence. No sympathy attaches him to his middle-class heroines. He only sees beauty and grandeur in his art; but the admiration which his art evokes is that evoked by a finished piece of statuary. If it has the beauty of marble, it also has its hardness and frigidity.

It is, therefore, not mainly by virtue of the human truth which they contain, nor by virtue of the human ideals and sympathies which they inspire, that Flaubert's novels will live. Rather will they live by virtue of the supreme excellence of their form. Flaubert's writing is the high-water mark of French style, perfect in rhythm and cadence, perfect in the adaptation of expression to thought. They reveal to the student the possibilities of the French language when handled by a master of the literary craft. Nobody in our generation pays any heed to Flaubert's grandiloquent theories of "Art for Art's sake." Yet Flaubert's reputation has been steadily rising, and will continue to rise, and Flaubert has become to-day, by the consent and admiration of all those who are competent to judge, one of the fixed stars in the empyrean of classic French literature.

LITERARY NOTES

IN the front rank of English letter-writers no one's place is more secure than that of Horace Walpole. Like his great contemporary, Dr. Johnson, Walpole had the gift of making himself the centre of a circle of famous, interesting, and admiring friends. So many of his letters are extant and such was his temperament that he may be said to have acted as his own Boswell. At Walpole's own request his correspondents periodically returned him his letters, and in his "Short Notes of My Life" he provided posterity with a résumé of his own career down to the year 1779.

In the eighteenth century, that age of bath-chairs, couriers, and minuets, people seem to have had more time, taste, and talent for letter-writing than in our days of motor-bicycles, telephones, and tangos; and, in his long life of eighty years, Horace Walpole maintained and accumulated so vast a correspondence that his editor, the late Mrs. Paget Toynbee, filled no fewer than sixteen volumes with such letters of his as she could collect. This edition, which was published by the Clarendon Press in 1903-5, contained 3,061 letters, representing over 150 correspondents. In addition to these, hundreds of Walpole's letters still remain untraced or have been withheld from publication by their owners; and, with a view to publishing a supplementary volume, Mr. Paget Toynbee is now appealing to all who have Walpole letters in their possession to permit him to examine and transcribe them. After his wife's death in 1910 Mr. Paget Toynbee completed and saw through the press (1912) her edition of the Lettres de Madame du Deffand à Horace Walpole, and it is welcome news to learn that he intends to spare sufficient time from his Dante studies to continue the work on Walpole so ably carried out by Mrs. Paget Toynbee.

Copenhagen is happy in the possession of two eminent students of English—Professor Otto Jespersen, the philologist, who has written in scholarly fashion on the growth and structure of the English language, and Dr. George Brandes, whose many works on literature, criticism, and history enjoy a world-wide reputation. Dr. Brandes is to visit this country in November, when he will deliver a series of lectures at various University centres and before certain literary societies. His subjects embrace men of very different character and nationality—Shakespeare, Voltaire, Rousseau, Nietzsche, and his fellow-countryman, Hans Andersen.

Admirers of Mr. Joseph Conrad (of whom an appreciation appeared in last week's issue of EVERYMAN) will be interested to know that that distinguished naturalised English novelist has taken to dramatic work, and that the first play from his pen, entitled "One Day More," appears in the August number of the English Review.

Since Miss Violet Markham's "New Era in South Africa" appeared in 1904, more history has been made South of the Zambesi than during the Boer War itself. Judging from Miss Markham's previous works on the subject, her new book, "The South African Scene," which is announced for the autumn by Messrs. Smith, Elder and Co., ought to make a notable addition to the flood of literature dealing with the Union and Rhodesia which has marked the opening of the twentieth century.

In this column last week we ventured to express misgivings anent the project of illustrating the works of Mr. Thomas Hardy. Our remarks have called forth a commendatory letter from a correspondent, H. T., who declares that the subservience of art to literature has been the fruitful source of much of the woeful ignorance and bad taste in matters of art of otherwise educated people. In support of this contention he quotes George Moore, who, writing in 1893 on the failure of art in the nineteenth century, says: "For more than a hundred years painting has been in service. She has acted as a sort of handmaiden to literature, her mission being to make clear to the casual and the unlettered what the lettered had already understood and enjoyed in a more subtle and more erudite form."

In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, continues H. T., an artist "mars those vague but all sufficient mental images born of the text when he attempts to fix them beyond the possibility of further imagining. I maintain the reader loses by these illustrations; for his own mental impressions are truer than the artist's embodiment of the characters and incidents of the work. Of course, one excludes children's books; there illustrations are essential, though more often than not they are too academic and 'grown up.'

"Confining our attention to the novel, I think attempts to illustrate have, as a rule, failed. In some, drawings have helped to give local colour, and have served as glossaries of costume, domestic detail, and the like, or they have served as plans in which the details of the text may be checked. I am thinking of Dickens' illustrators especially, who have helped him so much in this direction; but then the text is so explicit that the descriptions are little removed from graphic expressions ready to the artist's hand. It must not be overlooked that many illustrated books are cherished by the collector more for the technique and other artistic qualities of the drawings than for the service they render the text."

As our correspondent remarks, the subject of the "get up" of a work, and such questions as "What books should be illustrated?" and "How can the book and its embellishment be made an artistic whole?"—all these are matters which should arouse more general and intelligent interest than they do at present.

MASTERPIECE FOR THE WEEK

NEW GRUB STREET * * * BY GEORGE GISSING

"YOU should only write when you are in a good mood," said an editor to the writer of this article; "it makes such a difference to your style." Like many another person in authority, he took no stock of ways or means. The eternal lack of pence did not trouble him; he was oblivious to the fact that needs must when the landlord drives, and the ordinary journalist, unlike the man of letters who has an assured position, cannot wait for a good mood to descend upon him; so much "copy" is required, and he must turn it out at whatever cost to himself. George Gissing is, perhaps, the only author of eminence who has painted for us in such vivid colours and with startling clearness the struggles of the literary man against circumstance.

Edwin Reardon, possessed of a slight, though very real, talent, makes an unequal marriage. He chooses for his wife a woman unable to understand all that his "work" means to a man endowed with the art of phrasing his conceptions of life, its tragedies and its emotions. Amy is able only to think in terms of pounds, shillings, and pence, and the fact that her husband is unable to bring grist to the mill suggests that she has been mistaken in believing he is a man of genius. The alternative to this is one calculated to paralyse the spirit of a man of sensitive temperament. She decides that he could make a good income if he chose, and that the only reason why she is kept without money is that he prefers to write things that please himself rather than supply the market with the kind of books that find a ready sale. Gissing portrays the anguish of a man conscious to the full of his disabilities, but realising also that, under happier circumstances, the talent he possesses might blossom into things of rare and permanent value. Driven to desperation, Reardon tries to increase his income by embarking on a novel of the popular type. The task, alien to his capacities, is more than he can cope with.

"He seldom slept, in the proper sense of the word. As a rule, he was conscious all through the night of 'a kind of fighting between physical weariness and wakeful toil of the mind.' . . . In his unsoothing slumber he talked aloud, frequently wakening Amy; generally he seemed to be holding a dialogue with someone who had imposed an intolerable task upon him. He protested passionately, appealed, argued in the strangest way about the injustice of what was demanded. Once Amy heard him begging for money, positively begging, like some poor wretch in the street; it was horrible, and made her shed tears. When he asked what he had been saying, she could not bring herself to tell him."

But though she could not bear to listen to his distressful wanderings, the fact remained firmly ingrained in her mind that it was only obstinacy that prevented him from turning out the kind of story that runs into innumerable editions, and leaves the public greedy and asking for more.

"When the striking clocks summoned him remorselessly to rise and work he often reeled with dizziness. It seemed to him that the greatest happiness attainable would be to creep into some dark, warm corner, out of the sight and memory of men, and lie there torpid, with the blessed half-consciousness that death would slowly overcome him." For the time being he had written himself out, and the work that at his best was a joy and an inspiration that filled him with ecstasy of creation had become a labour of blood and tears; the phrase that fell at times from his winged pen potent and inspired was dragged but slowly from his tired brain; the chiming of the hours spoke to him only of a toll of words, and as the clock went round he grew more miserably conscious of the effort.

In the ultimate Amy Reardon decides to leave her husband; she is not a bad woman, nor a callous one, she is merely unable to realise that a certain type of man can only produce work under given circumstances, and that her incessant flogging stultifies her husband's talent, and renders it inoperative. He determines to give up writing, and to return to the army of clerks, where for a given number of hours he will earn a bare subsistence, leaving time to devote himself to literary labours for sheer love of the art. And here Gissing proves himself a master of psychology. Realising to the full what Reardon has suffered, he is yet able to be just to the unutterable woman who is his wife. Rather than accept the position of a clerk's wife, she returns to her mother's house, and though the comments of Mrs. Yule are hard to bear, she finds comfort in the improvement in her material condition. Gissing goes to the root of things, and points out that a woman can bear with short commons in food, inferior housing accommodation, inefficiency in domestic service, but she cannot face the lack of those things that affect her personal daintiness with equanimity.

"When Amy began to cut down her laundress's bill she did it with a sense of degradation. . . . Cleanliness is a costly thing, and a troublesome thing when appliances and means have to be improvised. It was in part the understanding she had gained of this side of the life of poverty that made Amy shrink in dread from the still narrower lodgings to which Reardon invited her."

A striking foil to Edwin Reardon is Jasper Milvain, a type well known in Fleet Street—the kind of man who, without originality of his own, is quick to seize on the ideas of his fellows and utilise them to his own advantage. Jasper is not troubled by literary aspirations. He writes to suit the market, he is untroubled on questions of policy or principle, and is ready to praise or blame, according to the journal that employs him. He is a type of the "kept pressman," whose justification and excuse is that he "rings the bell" and scores a marked success. Jasper rapidly forges to the front, and it is the contrast between her husband and his friend that finally breaks the remaining links of Amy's affection for Edwin.

But Gissing's knowledge is not confined to the seamy side of Grub Street. He sketches for us the immortal Wheipdale, the pioneer of the "Tit-bit" school of journalism, that in the days of the author was as yet but in embryo. Other characters as spontaneous and joyous are to be found in this epic of literary Bohemia, though for the most part tragedies abound. Alfred Yule, the man of thwarted ambitions and dead hopes, stalks like a ghost from the nether world through the story. He has lived to see his articles rejected, his pretensions derided; once he was a power in the land, editors sought for his copy, his name carried weight, but a generation arose that knew not Joseph, and he found himself out-paced and out-competed by a pushful and jostling generation. One of the most powerful chapters in this chronicle of Alsatia is that in which Yule discovers he is going blind. He is out on one of those midnight tramps that the slaves of the pen indulge in, long tramps that soothe the brain and quiet the irritated nerves. Long tramps through the quiet streets and deserted suburbs, when, in the silence of the night there rises once again the old dream of success, the old hope that even yet one's work may be recognised, and that before the end one may achieve "a big thing." He meets a young doctor at a coffee stall, and, after the custom of a journalist, falls into conversation with him. Yule goes with him to his rooms and submits to an examination.

"Do you use your eyes much?" asks the doctor.

"Fourteen hours a day, that's all."

"H'm! You are a literary man, I think?"

"I am. My name is Alfred Yule."

"He had some faint hope that the name might be recognised; that would have gone far, for the moment, to counteract his trouble. But not even this poor satisfaction was to be granted to him. To his hearer the name evidently conveyed nothing." The surgeon tells him that his sight is slowly but surely going, and Yule comes out once more into Camden Road feeling that life is over. His wife gives him all the comfort that a woman can afford at such a crisis, but his suffering is intensified by a problem that has arisen in relation to his daughter. Marian has been left a small legacy by her uncle, and has realised that with this at her back she can marry the man she loves. It is part of the irony of things that she has grown to care for Jasper, who has reduced the art of success to a science. Yule feels himself aggrieved that she will not invest her capital in a newspaper, of which he is to be the editor; but she resists both his reproaches and his appeals, and determines to marry. Her father's blindness, however, comes in the way. She is compelled to provide for her people, and Jasper, applying to love, the rule that he applies to life, decides to break off his engagement; he has no use for failure.

Tragedy is the keynote of this most poignant book. But it is tragedy that, while it wounds, does not sear. One feels that Reardon in his death was greater than Jasper in his triumph. That Amy, the hard woman, who could only apply the monetary test, the crude standard of earning capacity, never caught a glimpse of the delectable mountains that Marian beheld, never found gladness in the vision of the blue valley touched with gold that flamed before the girl's eyes, in that brief spell when Jasper loved her.

Amy attains, with Jasper as her husband, the summit of their mutual ambitions. He is made the editor of an important review, and they revel in money, friends, and a big house.

"Isn't the world a glorious place?" cried Jasper, in an ecstasy of self-admiration.

"For rich people," says his wife.

"Yes, for rich people. How I pity the poor devils! . . . Go to the piano, dear, and play me something. . . . Better still if you will sing, my nightingale!"

"So Amy first played and then sang, and Jasper lay back in dreamy bliss."

And then, across the blaze of light, amid the flourish of the trumpets, flits the frail, slight figure of Reardon the failure, Reardon the dreamer, Reardon with the winged vision and tender heart. And the opulent house, the prosperous man and woman, fade, leaving him in all his shabbiness, the centre of the picture—the eternal tragedy of thwarted effort that haunts New Grub Street.

THE HENCHMEN OF BARRISTERS

By E. O.

BARRISTERS' clerks pull the strings. They are men of initiative. They are amiable autocrats. Acquainted with the name of practically every firm of solicitors in London, they know when it is fitting to intimate that fees must be paid in advance, or to let them come in due course. They accept or return briefs, according to the exigencies of the day, fix counsel's fees, and arrange appointments and consultations. They are counsel's faithful bodyguard. In chambers and in courts they uphold their employers' interests with admirable zeal.

They have always to be on the qui vive in the courts. Actions in front of those in which they are interested may be settled, or may break up unexpectedly, and in either of those events they must promptly advise their chiefs that their presence will soon be required. An advocate may be in the throes of an argument or examining a witness elsewhere; but the moment his clerk tells him that he is wanted to "open" in a special jury action, he curtails his remarks or questions, leaving the field to his junior. Off he hurries while his clerk explains more fully to him as they hasten along the corridors the exact position of affairs in the court for which they are bound.

The calling of a barrister's clerk, like many others, is subject to the will of Dame Fortune. He may be a captain in his class, or he may be an obscure member of the rank and file just managing to exist. Personality and tact have much to do with his advancement. To an alert, intelligent man the opportunities are certainly greater than those of clerks in many business offices. It is an accepted maxim that implicit reliance should be placed in the barrister's clerk, who thoroughly understands his business, and that his advice and guidance should ever be followed. He is not "too old at forty." He is like wine in that the older he gets the sounder he becomes. He serves, in many instances, two or more masters in his chambers, so that should any of them die or retire from practice, he has others to fall back upon. Besides the vacancy in chambers will sooner or later be filled. Some ambitious young counsel comes along to share the clerk's services.

The Common Law counsel's clerk may not be on so high a plane, officially, as a Chancery barrister's henchman, but the former enjoys a more varied existence, because he accompanies counsel to Assizes, Quarter Sessions, and other tribunals; the daily panorama before his eyes is more coloured and interesting. The principal clerks to both equity and common law counsel have their opportunities to go higher up the ladder. Especially fortunate are they as the senior clerks to King's Counsel, destined for judicial honours, because when the latter are elevated to the Bench, their employees reap the rewards of fidelity and industry. As judges' clerks they have a sort of reflected glory.

The occupation of a barrister's clerk cannot be taken up in a haphazard way by anyone who, having passed his thirtieth year and failed in other callings, thinks luck will come to him in Lincoln's Inn or the Temple. The vocation demands years of training. One must begin young and he must wait for and grasp the opportunity knocking at the door at least once in every man's life.

RAPHAEL

RAPHAEL fut très-heureux, noblement heureux, et ce genre de bonheur si rare perce dans toutes ses œuvres. Il n'a point connu les tourments ordinaires des artistes, leurs longues attentes, les souffrances de l'orgueil blessé. Il n'a point subi la pauvreté, ni l'humiliation, ni l'indifférence. A vingt-cinq ans, sans effort, il s'est trouvé le premier parmi les peintres de son temps ; son oncle Bramante lui a épargné les sollicitations et l'intrigue. A la vue de sa première fresque, le pape fit effacer les autres et voulut que toute la décoration des Stanze fut de sa main. On ne lui opposait qu'un rival, Michel-Ange, et bien loin de lui porter envie, Raphaël s'inclinait devant lui avec autant d'admiration que de respect. Ses lettres indiquent la modestie et le calme de l'âme. Il était extrêmement aimable et fut extrêmement aimé ; les plus grands le protégeaient et l'accueillaient : ses élèves lui faisaient un cortège d'admirateurs et de camarades. Il n'a eu à lutter ni contre les hommes, ni contre son propre cœur. Il ne semble pas que l'amour ait troublé sa vie, il s'y est complu sans déchirement et sans angoisses. Il avait passé sa première jeunesse parmi les madones du Pérugin, pieuses et paisibles jeunes filles, d'une quiétude virginale, d'une douceur enfantine, mais saines, et que la fièvre mystique du moyen âge n'avait point touchées. Il avait ensuite contemplé les nobles corps antiques, et compris la fière nudité, le bonheur simple de ce monde détruit dont on venait de déterrer les fragments. Entre les deux modèles il avait trouvé sa forme idéale, et il errait dans un monde tout florissant de force, de joie et de jeunesse comme la cité antique, mais où la pureté, la candeur, la bonté d'une inspiration nouvelle répandaient un charme inconnu, sorte de jardin dont les plantes avaient la vigueur et la sève païenne, mais où les fleurs demi-chrétiennes s'ouvraient avec un sourire plus timide et plus doux.

A présent je puis aller regarder ses œuvres, en premier lieu la Madone de Foligno, au Vatican. Ce qui frappe d'abord, c'est la douceur et la pudeur de la Vierge, c'est le geste timide avec lequel elle touche la ceinture bleue de son enfant, c'est l'effet charmant de la bordure dorée de sa robe rouge. Dans toutes ses premières œuvres et dans presque toutes ses madones, il a gardé le souvenir de ce qu'il a senti à Pérouse, auprès d'Assise, au centre des traditions de la piété heureuse et du pur amour. Les jeunes filles qu'il peint sont des communicantes, leur âme n'est pas épanouie ; la religion, en les couvant, a retardé leur éclosion ; avec un corps de femme, elles ont une pensée d'enfant. Pour trouver aujourd'hui des expressions pareilles, il faut voir le visage immobile, innocent des religieuses qui, élevées dès l'enfance au couvent, n'ont jamais senti le contact du monde. Evidemment il étudie avec amour, avec recherche, avec la délicatesse d'un cœur jeune, la fine courbe du nez, la petitesse de la bouche et de l'oreille, un reflet de lumière sur de doux cheveux blonds. Le peintre est un autre Pétrarque, un contemplatif qui suit son rêve, et ne se lasse pas de l'exprimer. Sonnet sur sonnet, il en fera cinquante à propos du même visage, et passera des semaines à épurer les vers où il dépose son bonheur silencieux. Ce n'est point un combattant comme Michel-Ange, un voluptueux comme ses contemporains ; c'est un rêveur charmant, qui a rencontré le moment où l'on savait faire des corps.

RAPHAEL

RAPHAEL led a singularly noble, happy life, and this rare order of happiness is perceptible in all his works. The ordinary trials of artists, their wasted hopes and the pangs of wounded pride, were unknown to him. He was not a victim to poverty, humiliation or neglect. At the age of twenty-five he found himself, without an effort, first among the artists of his time ; his uncle Bramante spared him all intrigue and all solicitation. On seeing his first fresco the Pope caused others to be effaced, and ordered that the entire decoration of his apartments should be entrusted to his hand. But one rival was opposed to him, Michael Angelo, whom, so far from envying, Raphael honoured with as much of admiration as respect. His letters indicate the modesty and serenity of his nature. He was exceedingly amiable and exceedingly beloved ; the great protected and welcomed him, and his pupils formed around him a concourse of admirers and comrades. He had not to contend with man nor with his own heart. Love does not seem to have ruffled his spirit, this passion in him never being accompanied with either sorrow or torment. He had passed his early youth among the Madonnas of Perugino—pious, gentle maidens of virgin innocence and infantile grace, but healthy and untouched by the mystic fever of the middle ages. He then contemplated the noble forms and free spirit of antiquity, the placid joyousness of that extinct world the fragments of which were but just exhumed. At length, from these two types he obtained an ideal of his own, and his mind wandered through a world animated with vigorous impulses, one that expanded, like the antique city, with joyousness and youthful energy, but over which the purity, candour and beneficence of a new inspiration spread an unknown charm ; it seemed to be a garden, the plants of which, quickened by pagan impulse, produced half-Christian flowers that bloomed with a more diffident and a sweeter smile.

I can now examine his works, and first the "Madonna de Foligno" in the Vatican. One is at once impressed with the meek and modest air of the Virgin, the timidity with which she touches the blue girdle of her infant, and the charming effect of the gilded border of her red robe. In all his early works, and in almost all his Madonnas, he has preserved some souvenir of what he felt at Perugia and at Assisi, where he was surrounded by simple traditions of spiritual love and felicity. The young girls he paints are youthful communicants possessing still undeveloped souls ; religion, in covering them with her wings, has retarded their growth ; they are women in form but children in thought. To find similar expression nowadays one must seek for it in the innocent features of nuns immured in convents from infancy, and never brought in contact with the world. It is evident that he studied lovingly and carefully, with all the delicate sentiment of a fresh young heart, the refined curves of the nose, the fine modelling of small mouths and ears, and the reflections of light on soft auburn tresses. The painter is another Petrarch, musing over his reveries and unweariedly expressing them. Sonnet after sonnet, he makes fifty on the same face, and passes weeks in purifying verses in which he deposits his secret joy. He is not a combatant like Michael Angelo, nor a voluptuary like his contemporaries, but a charming dreamer, appearing just at the time when the world knew how to fashion the human form.

JOHN BURNS: FAILURE AND SUCCESS

By P. W. WILSON

WHEN Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman assumed office, his Cabinet consisted of nineteen Ministers. That was nearly eight years ago, and to-day four of those statesmen are dead, other six have retired, and of the remaining nine, two only, Sir Edward Grey and Mr. Burns, have retained their original departmental portfolios. Sir Edward Grey, decorated with the Garter, has survived a multitude of criticisms, but against Mr. Burns the tide has set in strongly, and on his allotted day in Supply, the complaints come from all quarters of the House. For democracy the wide world over, the fate of Mr. Burns is a problem of supreme importance. It is true that in 1892 Mr. Gladstone selected Mr. Burt, now father of the House, as Parliamentary Secretary to the Board of Trade; but Mr. Burns has been the first British artisan to enter a Cabinet, and his record there creates a precedent. In passing, I may remark that the constitution of the Labour Party, whatever be its advantages in other ways, has the demerit of disabling its members from joining a Government. Mr. Ramsay Macdonald and Mr. David Shackleton are men obviously of Cabinet calibre. The one must be content to serve on a Royal Commission; the other has entered the higher Civil Service. If, then, Mr. Burns is left without a successor, the fault does not lie either with him or with historic Liberalism. Rightly or wrongly, Labour has itself imposed the disqualification.

"Burns," so said Sir Charles Dilke to me, "is an artist," and no one, I think, will deny that he has maintained high office with picturesque dignity. The other day I witnessed the glittering progress of President Poincaré through London, and, on walking back to the House, I ran up against Mr. Burns, in his gold lace and cocked hat, striding along Whitehall; and, frankly, he was himself the biggest pageant of the day. At the Guildhall he always receives a hearty ovation, and he held his own, especially in the days of King Edward, even at Court. His home life has been not only irreproachable, but cultured. He keeps a diary that is already a historic document. He remains a strict teetotaller, a lover of cricket, a man of caution in money matters, and, above all, a personality. No one who weighs up political achievements fairly will deny that, according to all ordinary standards, Mr. Burns has been a success. If there is dissatisfaction, the reasons are, first, great expectations, and, secondly, the greatness of the opportunity, as yet unfulfilled.

One can well understand why Mr. Burns was, in the first instance, offered the Local Government Board. He was a leading light on the London County Council. On trams and tenements, on municipal milk and steamboats on the Thames, he waxed eloquent. It was not, perhaps, realised that he was the orator rather than the administrator of Progressive policy. As his colleagues in Spring Gardens knew, his place was on the platform, not in the Committee room, and he was then what he might be now, a great popular expositor of social causes—one who can hold an audience for hours, undeterred by Suffragettes. Our political system provides for such a man the sinecure known as the Chancellor of the Duchy—a post which puts a person into the Cabinet, but leaves him free from departmental routine. It is the post that John Bright should have had instead of the Board of Trade. On Sir Henry Fowler it was thrown away. All I would here submit is that Mr. Burns is perfectly fitted for the duties of counsel in the Cabinet, and exposition in the country. The whole question to-day concerns his achievements in a very exacting public department.

I would remind Radical critics of Mr. Burns that on more than one occasion he fought for them a big battle behind the scenes. In 1906 and 1907 it was not Mr. Burns, but Mr. Lloyd George who, as many of us thought, cold-shouldered the possibility of unifying electric supply for London under municipal ownership. During that fierce controversy Mr. Burns played the part of a stalwart Londoner, and if his advice had been taken the Progressive cause would to-day have been free of the wilderness. Against a hesitating Cabinet, he stood in with "C.-B." for self-government in South Africa, and fought for the Labour version of the Trades Disputes Act. He resisted the anti-German mania, and—most important service of all—he challenged with uncompromising candour what has always seemed to me to have been the unconstitutional use of the military by Mr. Churchill during the railway strike. It was Mr. Burns who kept the soldiers away from the East End and allowed a righteous wrath to blaze out against what he regarded as a gross insult to the workers. And he won. Mr. Churchill left the Home Office, and was not entrusted with the then threatened coal strike, while Mr. McKenna, who changed places with him, did not call for a single regiment when the whole country was menaced with a famine in fuel. Mr. Burns is thus a powerful, indeed, a heavy-handed critic, who, in the field of negative politics, has often waged war against perilous tendencies.

When he plunged into the Local Government Board, two great tasks lay ahead of him. The first was the reform of poor law; the second was rating. Very soon it became clear that in constructive ability Mr. Burns was hardly a match for problems of such stupendous magnitude. Equalisation of rates for London was included in the King's Speech of 1906, but no more was heard of it, either in that overloaded Session or since. Bills for the separate valuation of land were talked about, but they came to nothing. Despite the misery caused by trade depression, Poor Law Reform was made to dance attendance upon the Poor Law Commission, yet the Reports of the Commission, when issued at last, did not stimulate Mr. Burns to fundamental action. There are doubtless fewer children in the mixed workhouse, but the boards of guardians, though universally condemned, remain in their trenches, and Poor Law officers are subscribing for a portrait of Mr. Burns to be hung in the great buildings at Whitehall, of which he was the first occupant. In fairness it should, I think, be recognised that the reorganisation, whether of poor law or of rating, could only be undertaken by a very big man. Mr. Burns has not the advantage of exact education and long departmental training as an under-secretary. And he was dependent upon officials, steeped in the old traditions, whose one idea is to keep a strict look-out on local authorities, as a pedagogue watches unruly schoolboys. Hence the cryptic drafting of the Housing and Town Planning Bill, which, as introduced, was clearly destined to be a dead letter; hence the tardy working of the Act, even as simplified, during the past three years.

Mr. Burns had one great chance of disentangling himself from the red tape so cunningly woven about his strenuous limbs. No Minister was ever more fortunate in his Parliamentary Secretaries. Mr. Runciman, first, and afterwards Mr. Masterman, were just the men to make good the limitations to which I have referred. The wise course for Mr. Burns would have been to ally himself with his colleague on the front bench against his officials. But what happened was that the colleague became a cipher and the officials omnipotent. Neither Mr. Runciman nor Mr. Masterman was ever allowed the responsibility which Mr. Herbert Samuel was freely accorded at the Home Office by Mr. Herbert Gladstone. Yet both these gentlemen were the equals of Mr. Burns in all the qualities that make for administrative statesmanship. Nor were either of them capable of misusing any trust reposed in them by their chief. Their offence lay in the fact that they were not flatterers, and a certain craving for flattery—an impatience of contradiction, explains much that is otherwise mysterious in the career under consideration. It is, of course, unfortunate that at the very outset of his official term the thorny problem of unemployment should have thrown Mr. Burns into violent collision with his old friends and foes in the Labour party. That was his misfortune and not his fault. The situation was still further exacerbated by interminable controversies over "the pledge," and the position of Messrs. Burt and Fenwick. But the net result has been that Mr. Burns has taken refuge in an attitude of general negation, too conservative apparently for the Conservatives themselves, who have now ceased to praise him.

It is, of course, always possible to make out an excellent case against any remedy that may be proposed for evils in the body politic. Mr. Burns is a great phrasemaker, and no man is better able than he to smash up, first, a Tory Bill and next a Radical Bill, as sloppy sentimentalism, or endowment of landlords, or a premium on low wages. Many of the remedies proposed have undoubtedly deserved a critical scrutiny. But the time has come for asking Mr. Burns to produce his own alternative policy. How does he propose to deal with the shortage in cottage accommodation? Does he think that rating and assessment are perfect? And can he honestly maintain that Poor Law is to be adjusted by executive action only, unassisted by legislation? Hitherto, the position has been saved by the simple process of circumventing the Local Government Board through Bills promoted from other departments. The Budget valued land; National Insurance and pensions split up the Poor Law; and Education, with the Mental Deficiency Bills, may continue this policy. But the keynote of Governmental efficiency is to-day held to be departmental co-operation, and the "L.G.B." cannot be left indefinitely rooted to the position of ten years ago while all else is advancing.

It is a misfortune that Mr. Burns should have been withdrawn so completely from the sphere of political propaganda, of which he was in his day a distinguished ornament. He seldom speaks, even at Battersea, and his is not always a general exposition of Ministerial policy. His intellectual position is not Tory, for Toryism to-day implies large and contentious changes. Mr. Burns is far nearer to Lord Rosebery and Mr. Harold Cox than to Mr. Bonar Law and the Tariff Reformers. But I seem to detect in his latest speech a symptom which may mean a complete revision of the rather depressing estimates of his prospects which are now current. He is quite right in maintaining that no amount of doles and palliatives will compensate for the primary evils of low wages and long hours of labour. If at this moment Mr.

Burns were to come forward as the champion of the minimum wage, and were, on a wider platform and with a larger prestige, to fight once more the fight which in years past he won for the dockers, he would become at a bound a force to be reckoned with, and perhaps a dominating force. What the workers need to-day is a voice, and their essential grievance is a stationary wage on a rising market. Mr. Burns has never ceased to visit the workers and study by personal observation what may be their conditions. His tramps at manoeuvres and pilgrimages in South London may not have assisted his main work at the Local Government Board, but what man is better fitted than he to plead the necessities of the deserving poor and the claim of countless homes to a subsistence wage?

LITTLE GAB'S JOURNEY

By ANDRÉ THEURIET

MY windows looked down across the courtyard into the flat occupied by the family of little Gabriel, commonly known in the building as "little Gab." The father was a cutter in a ready-made clothing factory; the mother, exhausted by the birth of five children one after the other, and white-haired at forty-five, did the housework, and so used up what health she had left. Of the five children, the three eldest had left the nest; there were left at home only, a sister of eighteen, a sempstress, and little Gab, who was a hunchback. The late and sickly offspring of one of those Parisian marriages between two people who have passed half their lives in unhealthy workrooms or dark and ill-ventilated back-shops, little Gab was incurably rickety. His deformed spine pushed his shoulders up to his ears, his thin, flabby legs bent under the weight of his crooked and ill-balanced body, and he could only walk when supported by a surgical jacket. From the distorted body, with its hump back and front, rose a head which was much too big, but the face was of exquisite delicacy and of singularly keen expression. Though in reality he was eight years old, his poor stunted and twisted little body made him look scarcely five; but you would have thought he was twenty when you saw his thoughtful face, his prominent forehead, and his great dark-brown eyes, so sad and so precociously pensive. His father, mother, and big sister adored him for his affectionate ways and his unusually alert intelligence. The doctor had forbidden them to allow him to work, but to amuse him and give him a change he was sent to a school, where he contented himself with listening gravely, and where he remembered everything he heard.

One evening, when school was over, I saw him in the entry of the building, sitting by the porter's lodge. His mother had gone to do some shopping, and his sister had not yet come back from her work, so when he came home he had found the door of the flat locked, and, leaning against the wall, with his eager eyes fixed on the street, he was waiting with a pensive and painfully resigned expression on his face, and while I questioned him his dark eyes shot long, observant, frightened glances at me. Meanwhile his sister arrived breathless: "Poor little Gab," she cried; "I have kept you waiting! Were you getting impatient?" "No," replied Gab calmly, in his clear, silvery voice; "I was only saying to myself that perhaps you didn't want me any more, and that you wouldn't come back. . . . I am so sickly and troublesome!" "Oh, you bad boy," the girl murmured, smothering him with kisses; then, turning to me with her eyes full of tears, she added: "He is such a darling, and so clever; he thinks things out just like a grown-up person. . . . What a pity it is that he is so delicate! . . . The doctor says that if he could go back to Berck this summer the sea air and sand baths would probably cure him. . . . But it is such a long way to Berck, and such a great expense! However, I am going to try to earn enough to take him there." And the plucky girl worked from morn till night to save the necessary sum of money.

She wore herself out at her machine, making frills and gathers; she cut out, put together, and sewed, with scarcely any rest. Far on into the night I used to hear the hard, hurried click of the machine, like the jerky whirr of grasshoppers in the fields; behind the lamp-lit curtains I could make out the busy shadow, and involuntarily used to think of one of the verses of Thomas Hood's terrible song:

"Work—work—work!
Till the eyes are heavy and dim!
Seam and gusset and band,—
Band and gusset and seam,
Till over the buttons I fall asleep
And sew them on in a dream!

Work was plentiful, the money-box in a far corner of the chest of drawers was getting full, July was near, and preparations for going away were already being begun—a grand leather trunk was bought, and a suit made for the little fellow—and little Gab, wonder-struck, could talk to his schoolmates of nothing but his journey to the seaside—when, at the last moment, an unfortunate accident upset everything. The young wife of the clerk on the fifth floor had employed the sempstress to retrim her wedding dress, and alter it to the prevailing fashion; it was a costly dress, which the owner wanted to wear again for next winter's little parties. One evening, when he was playing with the inkpot, Gab let it slip from his thin fingers, and unluckily the ink streamed over the satin skirt. He was not scolded, poor little chap! for his face of consternation was only too sad to see. His big sister stifled a cry of horror; silently and nervously she sponged the material and measured the extent of the disaster. The ink had made appalling stains over eight yards of satin. The idea of telling the fifth-floor customer of the mishap and of rousing her compassion for Gab was impossible; to begin with, the clerk's wife was not rich, and her wedding dress was the only thing she had to fall back on for gala days and state occasions; and then the sempstress was proud, and did not care to acquaint the whole house with her private difficulties. The best and most honourable thing to do was to hurry to the Bon Marché and try to match the material. Eight yards at twelve shillings made four pounds sixteen altogether—a grave hole in the money-box and in the reserve fund for the journey! It was all over. The seaside had to be given up for that year. The sempstress kissed little Gab, and set to her work again.

The following winter was a hard grind in the little flat. The autumn had been rainy, and Gab's health had suffered. His bones ached, he had touches of fever and pains in his head. When the doctor sounded him he had shaken his head, and insisted once more on the child being sent to Berck as soon as the fine season began again. This time it was settled that, cost what it might, they would go off to the seaside at the end of May; so the sewing machine began its grasshopper-whirring more breathlessly than ever, and the work went on later and later into the night.

They had bought little Gab a picture book in which there was nothing but sea-scapes; views of ports, with their forests of masts ranged along the quaysides; steep, rocky cliffs washed by foaming waves; fishing boats scattered over the open sea like a flock of white-winged birds. The child talked of nothing but the sea: he saw it in his dreams; and sometimes even in broad daylight, through the grey mist which filled the inner courtyard, he had feverish delusions of wave-beaten shores and great watery plains crossed by ships with swelling sails.

Sometimes he would take a big shell off the mantelpiece—he would put it to his ear, and with his shoulders drawn up to his ears, and big, thoughtful eyes, he would listen for hours to the sound of the sea, which seemed to come through the shell from far off.

That winter was exceptionally damp and cold, and I no longer met little Gab in the entry. The doctor had expressly forbidden him to be allowed out. From time to time I saw him at the window, with one of its curtains raised. His sad, sunken eyes gazed into space, and on the clear pane his thin fingers drew vague outlines of ships. Then suddenly his glance would fall on the window from which I was observing him, and, feeling himself watched, he would draw the muslin curtain in a fit of shyness. Towards the middle of March I no longer saw him near the window. His bones ached more and more, his legs had become too weak to support him, and the pains in his head increased. He now spent whole days lying on his little bed, turning over for the hundredth time the pages of the picture book with the sea and the great ships with their white sails. He had not given up the idea of his journey: "When shall we start?" he would ask his sister, and when she had explained that they must wait for the fine weather, he would go on in his shrill little voice, "You see, I am in a hurry. I want to get well quickly, very quickly, so as not to make you cry any more."

And he would make her tell him the names of the towns they would pass through. He knew them all by heart already: Chantilly, then Clermont, Amiens, Abbeville, and at last the sea. . . . "Once we are there," he would say, "I am sure my bones will not ache any more."

Meanwhile he liked to have the big pink shell off the mantelpiece always by him, and with his ear pressed against its pearly sides he would listen attentively to the distant sound of the sea, which was to set him free from all his troubles.

Towards Easter I no longer heard the dull whirr of the sewing machine. There was no work being done in the little flat, and yet the glow of a lamp lighting up one of the windows far into the night showed that someone was always watching by the bed of the sick child. "He is terribly ill," the portress would say, instinctively holding her big, chubby lad tight to her side; "he can't last long. . . . Poor little fellow, it will be a release."

One morning I met in the entry a little coffin carried by the undertaker's men, and followed by the family.

It was little Gab, setting out at last on his journey towards the fathomless sea of the Unknown.—

To suffer change can be no hurt; as no benefit it is, by change to attain to being. The age and time of the world is as it were a flood and swift current, consisting of the things that are brought to pass in the world. For as soon as anything hath appeared, and is passed away, another succeeds, and that also will presently out of sight.—From "The Meditations of Marcus Aurelius."

THE PARADOX OF PATHOS BY GILBERT THOMAS

FOR all our professed love of books with happy endings, I am almost certain that the stories which give us the truest happiness—if not, in a sense, the keenest pleasure—are those in which, for instance, the hero, whom the gods love, dies young, or in which the curtain falls upon some scene equally poignant in its pathos. I have just read such a story, and it has set me pondering again upon that mysterious relationship which, as most people probably would be ready to testify from experience, seems to exist between sorrow and happiness.

Why is it that the poems which satisfy us most are often the saddest poems? Why is it that the most haunting and soul-filling music is that written in the minor key? Why is it that through tears, and rarely through laughter, we catch the vision splendid? Our human life is woven into one seamless fabric of paradox; but of all things, that which we call pathos would seem, to a mind unaccustomed to probing beneath the surface, the most perplexing in its incongruity. Ever since emotion first set the heart of man beating to new measures, this riddle of the intricate alliance between joy and pain must have challenged explanation, and it finds its supreme expression, of course, in Shelley's famous lines:—

"Our sincerest laughter
With some pain is fraught;

Our sweetest songs are those which tell of saddest thought."

Not until the full sun of knowledge disperses the last mist of ignorance is this problem likely to be satisfactorily solved. And yet, surely, some sort of explanation is not nearly so difficult as might, upon first sight, be imagined. Let us take a simple illustration.

You awake, let us say, one morning in a little house by the sea, with the sound of the intruding tide in your ears and the early light flooding your room. Very quickly you dress and go out on to the cliffs. Perhaps there is a brisk breeze blowing, which ruffles the peacock-blue water into line upon line of frolicking white foam, playing, as it would seem, with the shadows cast by the small, white clouds driven swiftly across an otherwise clear sky.

Far up above the waving grass a lark sings his morning carol; while, to make the picture complete, there comes along the cliffs, in sweet disorder, a flock of schoolboys, with all the spring in their stride and all the early fires of hope in their eyes. And, as you walk quickly along, the play of wind and sea, of sun and cloud, thrills through your veins. At such a time and in such a place, intoxicated almost by the rapture of life and promise, you feel during the first fierce hour or so of the new day that there is no room left for desire.

Very soon, however, there steals in surreptitiously through the back door of your heart some shy presence of dissatisfaction, which, while it does not destroy your happiness, takes the fine edge off it, making you realise, while you sip the sparkling cup of pleasure, that whosoever drinketh of these waters shall thirst again.

And then, when the day at length wears down to eventide, stand again upon the cliffs and watch the last mellow and quivering tints of sunset fading from the west. Perchance it is low tide now, and the voice of the sea, which this morning was thunderous with delight, now comes to you as a far, vague whisper, fraught with a wistful sadness. From a distant valley steals the sweet, melancholy chime of evening bells; while, away upon the far horizon, you can just discern the sail of an outgoing vessel. The quiet air seems tense with grief, while around you are all the symbols of change and decay. Nevertheless, in spite of the sadness which you cannot help but share with the scene, your spirit is lifted to the rare atmosphere of a mountain height, from which the peak of your morning happiness is lost in the distance below. For just as, perhaps, to mix the metaphor, there is, near the spot where you are sitting, a meeting of the ways, where some bubbling little burn loses itself in the great ocean, so exactly is your heart at the meeting of the ways, where your little stream of human grief merges into an infinite sea of divine joy and peace.

For your joy this morning was almost entirely physical. It depended, almost wholly, upon colour and light and movement. It was essentially the clean, healthy joy of the senses; and very much to be prayed for are those in whom such joy cannot find response. But this morning there was no room in your picture for pain. One touch, one smallest suggestion of it would have spoiled the whole canvas. This evening there is every suggestion of pain in the picture. The low whisper of the tide, the departing ship, the evening bells, all speak in no doubtful voice of the inevitable fading of one's ambitions, the inevitable decay of one's powers.

They tell of the certainty of doom which rests upon all things human; and very natural is the grief of our human hearts. But there is no provision in the scheme of God for a vacuum; and it is just when the heart, having poured out its human tears, is empty, that, all unexpectedly and all unconsciously, the flood of what is divine and immortal in one comes surging in. The twilight bell may toll the passing of human hopes, but it tells also of divine consolation. This, surely, is part of the secret of the close bond between joy and sorrow.

In our moments of intense sadness there is going on within us a conflict between two elements—the human and the divine. It is a fierce struggle, and there are acute pangs while we bury, as the advancing years continually compel us to do, our old human aspirations, our old physical joys. But as the rain of our tears passes over the soil where we have laid them, there springs up the imperishable flower of a joy that is of the spirit, whose divine fragrance is matured by our human sorrow, and whose whispers of immortality are stirred by the winds of our mortal pain. The joy of the morning is a very real joy; but only the joy of the evening, which can look sorrow in the face and can triumph over it, will ever satisfy those immortal cravings which are, after all, the truest part of mortal man.

* * * * *

The shadows lengthen. For a moment the last lingering glow of cardinal trembles in the sky. The bells have ceased. The vessel has almost disappeared. Farewell, little twilight boat! You may carry with you a cargo of dead hopes and withered ambitions; you may leave behind you the pleasant and hospitable shore; but another dawn shall reveal to you all the wonder and glory, and all the divine adventure of the ageless and infinite sea.

EDUCATION, ETHICS, AND RELIGION

BY W. E. ORCHARD

NO one can but be aware that there is a profound and growing discontent with the results of popular education. Some of that discontent is no doubt traceable to that generic dissatisfaction with everything that is at once the disease and the hope of modern progress; something may be due to a cowardly fear of the unsettling effects of education on the lower orders, whose eyes have now been opened to the unquestionable injustice in the distribution of the wealth they help to create; something is perhaps due to our expecting from education what education can never give. But these more or less unworthy elements may be quite absent from the discontent which others feel; for they desire nothing better from education than that it should fit everyone according to their capacity to love and learn the truth; for to that, social conditions, ethical sentiment, and religious feeling must eventually conform. But it is becoming fairly evident that our educational system is not tending towards any such desirable results. It has largely destroyed the natural instincts and acute common sense which guide uneducated persons, without putting anything but a quite superficial and misleading knowledge in their place. It has undermined respect for the authority of the family, society, and the church, without inculcating reverence for superior character in others or in themselves. Despite a pretension to be founded on facts and governed by practical realities, modern education does not appear to be awakening in our young people any very conspicuous desire for further knowledge, nor does it seem to be training their minds as organs of attention to life. A religious enthusiast might have reproached the system a generation ago because it was tending to produce a race of rationalists and secularists, but it no longer seems to threaten us with a type even so earnest as that. The desire to have a good time, and to earn sufficient to purchase it, seems to be the only aim of a growing majority. The result is a complete imperiousness not only to any religious appeal, but also to anything ethical, political, or educational; a polite and happy declining of any invitation to seriousness. With this disposition abroad happiness is not really achieved, and it only offers itself a ready prey to any charlatan who comes along, while it provides a market for the merely amusing and trifling, which is so debasing literature.

Many feel that the educational system is simply inadequate, and they bring forward various proposals to remedy this by the addition of moral and religious instruction, though it is very doubtful whether either ethics or religion can be taught. Others believe that the educational ideals are fundamentally wrong, and propose a variety of differing aims and systems. Others question whether we really have any educational ideals, and feel that we are just muddling along in hopeless confusion, hoping that something will somehow be achieved.

It seems open to suggest to those who have practical acquaintance with educational methods and organisation that they might consider whether we could not have an aim in education which should not need to have ethics or religion tacked on to it as something additional. Surely true education ought to waken the ethical sense as a natural consequence, and the writer holds strongly that a true ethical sense leads inevitably to the profoundest religious feeling.

There should be no possibility of division, not to mention competition, between the three things: education, ethics, and religion.

Is it not possible to teach every subject so that, as a result, the mind shall be more impressed with what it does not know than with what it does; not only by comparing the area of the known with the unknown, but the superficiality of the known with the mystery which is disclosed on closer questioning? A consistent application of this ideal might do something to destroy the devastating pride which regards everything as having been learned the moment schooldays are over, which makes the great problem for so many parents, and so utterly deadens desire for any kind of progress; and it might stimulate a persistent curiosity not only to accumulate facts, but to reach a deeper understanding of their significance. This humility is the beginning of knowledge, the foundation of all ethics, and it is the possession of the same spirit which will carry us past ethical complacency to a recognition of the infinite demand that rests upon us, and our dependence for continual inspiration and forgiveness, if we are to advance in knowledge, life, and self-realisation, upon some inexhaustive and active spiritual realm which everywhere encompasses us. To gain any true knowledge there must be a discipline and a dedication of the entire self; the whole man must be summoned to the quest of truth, for knowledge is not dependent only on external contact, but also on inner disposition.

All this may sound rather high philosophy, but it is not beyond the power of being imparted to the humblest by those who already realise its universal necessity and disclosing power. To those who clamour for definite ethical or religious instruction it may look hopelessly vague, but it is from this vague intuition of something more that all religion derives its strength; and if we once get religious feeling, definite belief and a true theology will have little to fear. The great reaction of our times against religion has been mainly against the external and instructional, which neither demanded nor trusted religious feeling. Awaken the mind to this something more in every direction, and we shall see mighty changes following in every department of human thought and activity. At present we seem to be only too effectually sealing the mind against any such recognition.

That such an ideal is very far removed from the bread-and-butter ideals which, under more euphemistic phrases, govern much of our present aims, may be admitted; but it must also be admitted that the bread-and-butter ideals have come very near to imperilling our very bread and butter. We are getting more and more unable to appreciate common realities, and civilisation is more and more organising itself away from prolific production of pure and wholesome necessities. Nor do scientific ideals in education always produce the real scientific spirit, which must always be profoundly religious. If we need religion dreadfully today, it is not perhaps so much to correct materialism as to restore our reverence for material things, to recover a love of things for their own sake, an appreciation of the physical, which will be far too wide awake to be deluded into identifying reality with the diagrams of physics or of experimental biology; not so much to rebuke the arrogance of science as to save it from slavery to industrialism and the twin gods

Mammon and Mars; indeed, to prevent science from committing suicide.

It may be said that these ideals can hardly be systematised. Probably not; but they can be the ideals which we desire to see animating those who devise and administer our educational system. And there are quite practical proposals which will go a long way to encourage these ideals. The teachers under our national system of education are insufficiently educated for their task, and especially for the imparting of that sense of humility which is the indubitable mark of all true education. This means that the nation must be prepared to spend more money on their training, and a thorough university education should be the aim. Our older universities would be greatly revived in spirit and earnestness by the presence of a large body of those who were going to teach in our national schools. If the education of our teachers is inadequate, that is something which only national action can remedy; but when we turn to their character and morale there is almost as fine material for the purpose as can be desired. On the whole, the teachers in our national system are a body of earnest and serious-minded persons, who have high ideals of their work, and whom the sense of their responsibilities has made anxious to serve the highest interests of humanity and the nation. This might be fostered by the opportunity of university education; but what would do more than anything else would be an increase in the respect in which the teaching profession is held. We can expect nothing better from our national system until the nation holds the teachers in higher honour. It would give them the sense of commission and raise their ideals. One mark of that increased honour will, of course, be a greatly increased remuneration. See what this increased respect has done for the clergy and ministry of this country, and the efficiency and revival that it is everywhere bringing to religion and the Church. We may expect something similar when the teaching profession, especially in our national schools, is lifted above the unconcern and even despondence in which it has been held by too many, and when the nation is resolved to mark that change of opinion by granting a better training and higher emoluments. As things are at present, how can the ordinary teacher feel otherwise than that the nation does not care? A change in this respect would enormously quicken the incipient idealism which already maintains itself in the profession under great discouragement, and this would effect a notable change, within a generation, in the result of education on the youth of this country, to whom such high destinies are to be committed.

BALZAC AND DUMAS.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—After reading the article on Balzac in EVERYMAN of July 18th, I felt that it was time to put a question before your readers which for some time has been a matter of curiosity to me.

I wish to know why it is that the greatest of all French writers, Alexandre Dumas, is so completely forgotten by those who write about Frenchmen such as Balzac?

It is hardly realised that Dumas excelled in every branch of literature, while Daudet, Balzac, or Sand were only novelists.

The chief objection levelled against Dumas is his collaboration with other writers, by no means so large as is supposed.

On the face of it, this objection is ridiculous. For instance, if a writer brought him a plot, and Dumas, with his marvellous genius, made that plot the basis of a book like "The Fencing Master," many critics want to affirm that all the honour should go to the insignificant scribbler who produced the half-formed idea.

One might say the same thing with equal "justice" about Shakespeare, who did not take the trouble to invent a single one of his plots.

To mention a masterpiece in each of the divisions of literature which Dumas wrote in is quite unnecessary. Everyone is familiar with the great romances and plays, the entrancing books of travel, the history, the biography, and the essays of this great man.

Why, then, is he so ignored? Is it because he is so undeniably "the one great man since Shakespeare"?

APPRENTICESHIP.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—In answer to a letter appearing in your issue of July 11th, entitled "Apprenticeship and its Effect on Unemployment and the Birth-rate," J. Johnson, the writer, admits that apprenticeship is practically a dead letter, and suggests its resuscitation for use as a weapon to combat other evils.

Let us see what killed apprenticeship. If we can remove the causes which have made it a dead letter, perchance it may recover and become a living fact.

There are three factors, to my mind, responsible for its death. They are, in their order, (1) foreign competition, (2) compulsory education, (3) co-operation.

Foreign competition had as a result the "Wake up, England!" cry. Our manufacturers flew to co-operation as a method of quicker, and consequently cheaper, production to combat the weight of foreign industry.

Co-operation reduced the knowledge and experience required of the artisan, and compulsory education increased his mental powers, rendering apprenticeship unnecessary. As a result of this, we have a standardising, a whole factory of 2,000 workers to produce a 20 h.p. car-engine, weighing, perhaps, three or four cwt., with every machine producing its part and every man performing his operation in endless repetition.

I have only taken the engineering section of our actual producers, assuming that no apprenticeship is necessary for coal miners or weavers and spinners. We can go back to the times when England was really "merrie" when free education and co-operation are removed, perhaps.—I am, sir, etc.,

HENRY DUNCAN WADE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I read with surprise in your issue of July 25th the statement of "M. Grace Cummings" that "Apprenticeship as a system is obsolete. It survives in the tailoring and dressmaking trades almost exclusively." The various branches of the engineering trade, the printing, bookbinding, lithographic printers, all the silver trades, the cutlery trades, and many others I could name, insist upon apprenticeship as a condition of membership with the trade union, and some of them, the printing group, for example, upon an apprenticeship of seven years. Even in industries which are

WHY NOT FIFTY-TWO BANK HOLIDAYS?

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—In his article, headed "Why Not Fifty-two Bank Holidays?" Mr. Henry Wright reasons as though every member of the community took a half-holiday each week by Government orders. After all, how many people get even the Saturday afternoon free? Our postmen, Customs officers, and other Civil Servants, warehousemen, railway workers, and many more, get no half-holiday during the week. Fifty-two Bank Holidays in the year could affect only a certain section of the community, and that section is not asking for any such change. It seems to be the rule nowadays to give us legislation for which there is no demand. Out of 168 hours a week, few of us sleep fifty, few of us work fifty. Let us add an hour on to each day's work by all means, but until the work of the nation can be evenly distributed, let us talk less of holiday and pleasure.—I am, sir, etc.,

EVOLUTION AND SCRIPTURAL DOCTRINE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Everyman does not consider seriously the result of scientific research concerning the descent of the genus homo, with other degrees of life, from a common ancestor, as ranged against the Scriptural doctrine. On the one hand, we are told that man, before he attained his present state, passed through stages of being as fish, reptile and mammal, and that he is still in the ascendant on the ladder of Evolution. On the other hand, the Scriptures say that man was created "a little lower than the angels," but that he fell, and a Redeemer was needed to offer a staff to him so that he might endeavour to uplift himself again.

This raises a question of great seriousness: Can the dogma of the Redemption be upheld in the face of the theory of Evolution? With your permission, this question might form the basis of an interesting debate amongst your readers. Do you not think that the average man's knowledge of Evolution would compel him to believe that Christianity was menaced?—I am, sir, etc.,

"UN CHERCHEUR."

Newcastle-on-Tyne, July 25th, 1913.

"EVERYMAN" AND G. K. CHESTERTON.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—You miss the point of "E. H.'s" protest. He is only one of many who are furious to find you truckling to the idols of the market-place. Are there no better leaders of present-day opinion than Chesterton, Bennett, Shaw, Galsworthy, and Wells? If you knew how these names reek in the nostrils of some of your readers you would give them and us a rest. You began well. You craftily concealed your hand at first. Appreciations of younger writers like R. H. Benson and Masfield promised independence, though the perfunctory nature of the Masfield article was worthy of the barber's block that illustrated it. But your climb-down before Bennett put an end to pretence. You had said something caustic about him.

Whether unwisely may remain a matter for doubt. The aggrieved author, with a petulance to prove that he does not learn the cheap lessons he teaches so glibly, objected. You lay low for a time. Then came a flaming cry-up of this bow-legged de Balzac, and all we fear now is that he is to be allowed to "honour" you with a series of self-advertisements.

What I, in common with others, hoped, was that you had seen the strong reaction there is against the dismal realism of the times. A braver decade is trying to lend to "the record of everyday life something of the uplift of poetry," as the Spectator happily put it. The Times, too, has had the courage to assert that Shaw ends where Kipling began. When will you learn that the public needs a wholesomer worship than the mean, merciless, middle-class mind of the Five Towns, the vegetarian diet and Jaeger underwear of Shavian gibing, the lop-sided sentimentality of vivisected "Justice," or the inky atmosphere of the new Machiavellism, or even the high-kicking of the White Horse?

We are sick of them all. They stand in the light of the spirit of youth (elder brother of the spirit of childhood), that wants a say, and deserves a say. They breed barnacles, limpets, hacks, and log-rollers. Your Literary Notes declare that. Who cares tuppence what Wells plays at in his spare time? Are not his working days long enough? Let me make a suggestion, for I wish you well. Give up a whole page each week to the coming men. Offer them a free hand. Tell them to utter the faith that is in them in their own way. I dare you to make the experiment. It is your only hope of retrieving lost ground. As long as you are dominated—I had written deluged—by clever men, whose world-weariness (G. K. C. excepted) poisons almost every periodical one picks up, so long will you be classed among the ruck. You have the finest title of all the weeklies. You could have the broadest basis in Literary England, because you deal with life and work as well as with books. But if EVERYMAN in his most need can find no one but Chesterton-Bennett-Shaw-Galsworthy-Wells rolled into one, and multiplied by countless imitators, then the Frankenstein you have created will be the death of him, and he will deserve his fate.—I am, sir, etc.,

THE WHITE SLAVE TRAFFIC.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—It is a pity that there are not actual figures about the earnings of prostitutes; but I think that your correspondent, A. S. Reeve, would find that the average income of a London street-walker was nearer fifteen and twenty shillings a week than "fifteen or twenty pounds." This, after expenses for treating in public-houses (the average prostitute has to make herself popular with the respectable working woman, and she can only do this by treating, tips, and promising to "leave her old man alone"), and the enormous item of her housing, are deducted. Where the girls make "fifteen or twenty pounds" a week, they have to pay for nightly entrance to a music-hall, and to keep up a flat in accordance with this income. Also, vast sums of it have to be paid to procurers. These procurers would not engage "street-walkers," they would not be pretty enough, clean enough, or fascinating enough. As a rule, they tout for their victims (quite straightforwardly: there is no attempted abduction or blinking of facts) among actresses, who are forced to accept minor engagements in music-halls or pantomimes, and thus a perfectly chaste girl has an opportunity of learning the facts if she is on the stage and down on her luck, and forced to accept an engage-

DENT'S 2/- NET NOVELS.

THE LABYRINTH OF LIFE.

By E. A. U. VALENTINE.

THE hero is a literary man, and one is enabled to realise some of the peculiar difficulties that befall a man of ambition and thought in the stress of misfortune. The problem that faces him subsequent to his marriage is one that has been variously stated in modern novels; but it will be conceded that in few cases has the solution been handled so sanely and so wisely as by Mr. Valentine in the present book.

BUBBLE FORTUNE.

By GILBERT SHELDON.

THIS is a buccaneer tale of the time of the South Sea Bubble. Mr. Gilbert Sheldon has a chastened style that raises what might otherwise be a story of broad and active interest into a novel that should repay the attention of all. It is quick in its movement, and throughout it is redolent of the sea and full of a lusty and healthy life.

BROKEN ARCS.

By DARRELL FIGGIS.

ALWAYS behind the stumblings and failures that occur throughout the course of this story there is ever the dim suggestion of a higher destiny achieving its end. The situation of the play is that of modern life, and the plot itself, apart altogether from the psychology of the characters, should be one to maintain a very deep interest throughout.

FATHER MATERNUS.

By ADOLPH HAUSRATH.

THOSE who wish to understand exactly how the mighty upheaval of the Reformation came to be cannot do better than by studying the psychology here presented of a German monk, who, coming from the sober faith and earnest homesteads of his native land, is faced with Rome in the height of its ecclesiastical corruption. In fact, something of the same problem that drove Martin Luther into revolt will be found to have engaged the serious attention of Father Maternus.

"THIRTY-THREE YEARS SINCE I SAW THE SEA."

Dear Friend,

"Thirty-three years since I saw the sea." This was told me by an old lady for whom I had just arranged a holiday. She had come to thank me, and in doing so mentioned that she had not been away for all these long years. From my knowledge of the woman I can vouch for the truth of this statement. Think what this means! Week after week, month after month, year after year, toiling and slaving, with no break at all in the monotonous grind, struggling to keep home together, and help keep a number of grandchildren, the idea of a real holiday at the seaside never seemed practicable. Many people would think themselves hardly used if they could only manage to go away every three years. Think then of no holiday for three and thirty years.

The above case is not an exceptional one. There are many others in similar circumstances—fathers and mothers without the slightest prospects of the much needed rest and change unless some kind person makes it possible by sending the means.—WILL YOU?

I hope soon to enjoy a holiday at the sea, and this makes me feel deeply for the less fortunate ones unable to leave London.

WILL YOU HELP ME TO GET THEM AWAY?

"He that hath pity upon the poor lendeth unto the Lord: and look what he layeth out, it shall be paid him again." A £5 note will send five adults to the sea for a fortnight; £1 5s. will give one a couple of weeks; 12s. 6d. send a needy one away for a week.

Gifts may be sent direct to me at the above address.

Yours in His Happy Service,

FRANK SWAINSON.

ment with a theatrical manager who does not surround his female artistes with a certain amount of protection.

If women are so naturally depraved, and they do at prostitution earn these vast sums of money, how is it that so many of the music-hall prostitutes are glad to leave their ghastly trade to become the mistresses of men at five and six pounds a week? These women dare not go on the streets; they would lose their custom if they did. Some of the demi-mondaines earn hundreds of pounds a week, but although they may tour the Continents, they do not walk the streets. And what are the poor things to do? They have beauty, they have fascination, they have diplomacy (while being of the wrong sex to make Cabinet Ministers), and they are too intelligent, while lacking special talent, for men to marry, and make the mothers of their children.—I am, sir, etc.,

"ONE WHO HAS BEEN KEPT VIRTUOUS BY THE TRUTH."

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I cannot see how Percy E. Reinganum read into my letter a claim that Suffragists were responsible for the promotion of the White Slave Traffic Bill. Any such Bill promoted by Suffragists would make it impossible for the promoters and customers of the Piccadilly flat to hide behind a woman's skirts. Secondly, "P. E. R." objects to my statement that a certain amount of prostitution is caused by the inability of human beings—I did not say men—to control their passions, and then says that "there will always be prostitution as long as men are men and women are women." His meaning is precisely mine, but he, like most Anti-Suffragists, thinks that this same lack of will-power is an unconquerable trait in the human character.

And now for his narrow horizon: "If all women's wages were to-morrow raised automatically there would be still more prostitution, for there would be more women unemployed." Similarly, therefore, "Since, in general, men's wages have been raised in the last twenty years, there is more crime to-day, for more men are unemployed." I wish he would study official returns. "Women are cheaper than men because there is always the one profession open to them at which they can earn more." If abnormally high wages can be earned in one man's trade, men flock to it, hence the demand for men in other trades increases, which results in a rise in wages in those trades. Prostitution, however, does not raise women's wages, because it is used by wage-earners merely as a final resort.

"P. E. R." claims that the Bill which ended the coal strike was not a result of men's votes. This is a delightful example of his shallow reasoning. Would there have been a Bill if there had been no strike? And a strike without a trades union behind it is doomed to failure, and parliamentary representation and political power solely have made our trades unions what they are to-day.

In conclusion, may I make a remark on A. S. Reeve's letter? Many girls on the streets could release themselves; some, however, we must admit, like the life, but others dare not return to their former life, because of that horrible system of convention which makes men and women who call themselves Christians shun those who have fallen.—I am, sir, etc.,
Birmingham. S. F. CAMPBELL.

THE TRAFFIC IN WOMEN.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—In his letter, which appeared in your issue of June 27th, "A. B. C." presumes to lay a large part of the blame for the existence of the White Slave Traffic on the mothers of the nation for not warning their daughters sufficiently against the dangers of the world; and also argues that legislation is useless, because the victims of the abominable trade are as willing to remain prostitutes as a disgracefully large number of men are that they should remain so.

Of course, it is only true that most of these unfortunate women are not willing to take the "chance of honourable life and work," which "A. B. C." states our charitable social system offers them in homes of various kinds, because they will never be regarded as anything but unclean by a large proportion of respectable people, and many of them are in such a condition that they are absolutely unfit for work, and they will only lose the artificial gaiety which makes their lives possible.

But is it so much the rescue of the prostitute which the women's movement hopes to effect? I think not. It is the prevention of this practically incurable disease which is hoped for; and for this purpose legislation may prove very effective.

A terrible percentage of the white slaves in London and other big cities are simply victims of a remorseless system of competition. The wages paid to young women in many large and prosperous shops and cafés are barely sufficient to keep the girls alive, and in the hopeless drudgery of their drab existences, when they have always to struggle to be polite and smart, they are just not strong enough to resist the advances of well-dressed men, which seem to offer a little excitement, and some slight variation of the monotony, and which so often end in the girl's ruin.

This may seem direct speaking, but it is no good mincing matters, and the sooner it is realised that this is largely an economic question the better. The remedy is obvious: a minimum wage, on which every worker can live decently, and is not forced to sin in the eyes of God and man to provide those few luxuries which make life worth living.

High religious ideals, which "A. B. C." talks about, are poor substitutes for bread and butter, when the entrance to the downward path is so broad and strewn with flowers.—I am, sir, etc.,

SERB, GREEK, AND BULGAR.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—The article contained in your issue of yesterday on Serb, Greek, and Bulgar is very interesting, but seems to be written from a Servian rather than from a Bulgarian point of view.

About the year 1878, when stories of Bulgarian atrocities were exciting the world, I spent much time in the study of Bulgarian history, and I found that entirely different accounts were given of the origin and history of that nation, by Servian, Bosnian, and Bulgarian writers. I eventually came to the conclusion that the most trustworthy authority on the subject was Jiricek, a Bulgarian, and I believe that this view is generally accepted.

The treaty of S. Stefano, a wise and statesmanlike arrangement, which, if it had subsisted, would have spared the world thirty years of Macedonian horrors, created a Bulgaria based on history and nationality, recognising that Tirnova and Ochrida were the two foci of Bulgarian political and spiritual life, and giving her Kavala as a port. This treaty was unhappily torn to pieces at Berlin, but all who are acquainted with the Balkan Peninsula are aware that no settlement can be stable which does not assign to Bulgaria Ochrida and Monastir, which are the very centre of her national and religious life. It is not surprising that Bulgaria should have considered any sacrifice worth while which prevented these holy places from being occupied by an alien race.

Europe seems to have forgotten the great part played by Bulgaria in the religious revival of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, when the Bulgarian faith stood for a purer and simpler form of Christian belief and worship, and was the parent of Huss, Wiclif, and even of Luther. This movement was put down by fire and sword, the Bulgarian Christians were denounced all over Europe as unbelievers. The unsavoury French form of Bulgarian, which had become so common amongst ourselves, meant at first nothing more than "heretic." We owe some gratitude to the people who kept the faith of God "so pure of old, when all our fathers worshipped stocks and stones."

It needs a single power to unravel the entanglement of the Balkan disputes, and the one power which can do this with success is the power which made the treaty of S. Stefano.

Let the European Concert put aside jealousy, forget past quarrels, and empower Russia to act in its name, and some stable result may come from the present confusion, which now seems beyond the wit of man to allay.—I am, sir, yours, etc.,

THE DECLINE OF THE CHURCHES.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—There is no surer sign of the decay of spiritual perception than blindness to one's own faults, and turning to one's fellow-men to inquire of one's defects and duties.

This thought occurs immediately when reading Mr. Charles W. Crump's queries, addressed to the people at large, as to the defects of the Churches, and the reasons and remedies for the decline in Church membership. Touting for popularity is a totally different thing from holiness, which makes its appeal to the common people by being palpably worthier than they, and not by waiting on their instructions.

The Churches have no oil in their lamps precisely because they have consulted the ways of men, rather than the way of Christ; and they have forfeited the confidence of the masses because they have become the mouthpiece of the classes. The remedy is not to become the mouthpiece of "humanity"; leave that to the Socialist, who fancies he can do it! The remedy is to become once more the purified vehicle of the Spirit of Truth.

It is distressing to read James Adderley's defence of ritual and drama. The vital objection to ritual is not that it is an externalisation. The objection to ritual is that it is the cheapest kind of externalisation.

Daily beauty and heroism of conduct is the only fit externalisation of God, and it is a confession of the Church's failure to sanctify life when she sets up dramatic and sacerdotal substitutes for external holiness in conduct. Who wants the altar when he has the saint? Or who wants the devotee when he has the apostle?

Or who wants stories and plays when he has once entered into real life, and found it more dramatic and strenuous? We want to live at first-hand, and not by proxy! We will thank neither priest nor actor for arranging a pretty proxy show for us; we cannot feed and grow on a pictured banquet. As Holmes observes, "What man ever grew lean by reading 'Romeo and Juliet'?"

The saint is not, as Mr. Crump opines, a hot-house product. Fancy Francis, or Clare, or Catherine, or Paul, or Stephen, or Becket, or Joan of Arc, or Fox as a hot-house product! The saint is the being who faces life with sincerity, purity and courage, and triumphs over hardships and obstacles that daunt the brethren of lesser faith and exotic frailty.

The real indictment against the Churches is that honesty is no longer part of their teaching, but policy has completely supplanted it.—I am, sir, etc.,

Leeds. T. H. FERRIS.

THE SUFFRAGE QUESTION.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—The letter on the Suffrage question contributed to your issue of July 18th by Mr. W. R. Burke seems to me to show extraordinary lack of knowledge concerning the attitude of militant Suffragists. The statement of Mr. Frome-Wilkinson's which he quotes was not a "glaring fallacy" at all. Suffragettes do not wish to undergo the torture they suffer—nor did St. Paul—but they are prepared to do so, as the facts show. They have been punished and tortured, and punishment and torture have not deterred them—this is what shows that their spirit is indomitable. Again, does Mr. Burke suppose that the Parliamentary army in the Civil War "incurred the proper hatred of ordinary men and women"? Nor do militant Suffragists. All talk about the evil precedent of yielding to force is futile—for force has passed all great reforms since England first was a nation—so the precedent was set long ago.—I am, sir, etc.,

THE ANGLICAN MARRIAGE SERVICE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—May I inform Mr. William Brown and others who may be interested in the subject of the reform of the Anglican marriage service that an unsuccessful effort has lately been made by some Churchwomen to have a discussion of this matter put on the official programme at the coming Church Congress in October, when the union of man and woman in marriage will be a subject. They wrote to the President, the Bishop of Winchester, in May last, giving their reasons, and making this request, and to strengthen their appeal they obtained in a short time more than two hundred signatures of representative men and women associated with church and social work—all members of the Anglican Church. Consideration will show that the average girl in her father's house is not in a position to resist the pressure put on her to accept the service; for her to do so might result in her marriage being broken off or in family relations being embittered. The woman who is economically independent is in better case; it is possible for her to obtain the offices of a clergyman who will abbreviate or modify the service, or she may adopt the method which now commends itself to many

2 Money-making Professions

by which Readers of EVERYMAN can
 . . turn their spare hours into Guineas . .

Can you Write?

Doubtless there are thousands of thinking men and women—readers of EVERYMAN—who have something to say which would be of real interest to the world, but they have not developed the power of expressing themselves interestingly and forcibly. To such readers, the journalistic profession offers unlimited scope, and, with training, should be the means of affording a very lucrative and fascinating spare-time hobby. To be successful in literary work necessitates a course of specialised training conducted by a successful journalist who is willing to impart the benefit of his own experience.

All readers of EVERYMAN who possess some literary ability are advised to send a specimen MS. to the Secretary of the Practical Correspondence College, 77, Thanet House, Strand. This MS. will be carefully read through by the Instructor of the Journalism Course, and a candid criticism will be returned to the sender within a few days, together with full particulars of the P.C.C. Course in Free Lance Journalism and Short Story Writing.

The openings in Journalism are more numerous, more interesting, and, above all, more lucrative than most people realise. As a spare-time hobby or a regular occupation, you can earn from 7s. 6d. to £2 2s. per hour if you know what to write and where to sell articles, short stories, and the interesting little paragraphs which constitute one-quarter of the contents of dailies and weeklies.

A young friend of the present writer, of twenty-two years of age, who began work for the Press three years ago, now earns the comfortable income of £2,000 a year. She had no introductions or influence; her success is solely the result of her knowing how to do just the work that's wanted. She works no harder than the average woman teacher, but she makes every stroke of her pen tell, and every Editor she works for knows exactly what to expect from her; he knows she is dependable.

Do not Delay.

Send at once. This is a golden opportunity which may make all the difference to your future success. You may have missed chances before; don't miss this one. Send now, before you forget it.

No matter how little you may know now, Correspondence Teaching will begin just where you need it to begin, and take you as far as you need to go. The work of the College is to train, encourage, and help students to succeed.

No other Institution has by correspondence helped so many men and women, in all parts of the world, to train their talents to earn money. No other Institution enjoys such wide and intimate acquaintance with publishers, editors, printers, and advertisers. This opens the door of employment to the students.

Can you Draw?

Other readers of EVERYMAN who may not possess literary talent are probably able to draw more or less successfully. Why not turn this talent to profitable account? Drawing for one's friends is interesting, but not profitable. Why not consider the possibilities of Commercial Art?

Send a Small Sketch,

in any media—pen, pencil, or colour—and we will return it to you with a personal letter from the Art Director (one of London's leading Designers) upon your chances of success in Commercially Applied Art.

We will send also a finely illustrated Prospectus of our unique Course of Home Study, which teaches all you need to know to make money by Drawing for Reproduction, Designing Posters, Book and Magazine Covers, Ex Libris, Advertisements, etc.

With our progressive, superbly illustrated lessons in the practical, professional side of designing, and the unlimited individual criticism, help, and advice of our Art Director, you may learn in your spare time what usually takes years to find out—just the essential facts that no Art School or hand codes ever tell you.

You can learn, too, how to turn a taste for drawing into guineas in the shortest possible time, how to make the designs that are wanted; how, when, and where to dispose of them to the utmost advantage.

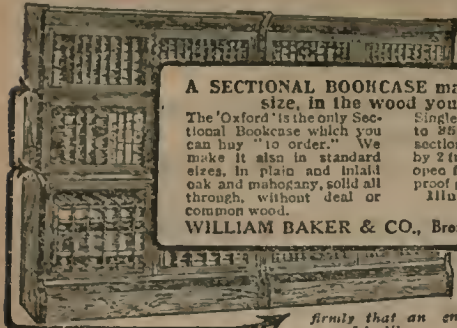

The lessons are clear and easy to follow, and drudgery of study is eliminated. Gaining a practical knowledge of the profitable branches of Applied Art by our system of Postal tuition is, in fact, a pleasant pastime. The student's difficulties and doubts give place to confidence and courage, and he or she is helped to earn while learning.

Among the objects taught in the Twelve Months' Course are: Lettering, Black-and-White, Line, Wash and Body Colour, Drawing effectively Figures, Pretty Faces, Drapery, Flowers; Landscapes and Portraits in Colours; Studio Economics; Time and Labour-saving Devices, Practical Hints, etc.

It costs nothing and you risk nothing in sending a sketch and receiving particulars of the only System that trains you until proficient, and that has helped so many men and women in all parts of the world to earn money by Art.

conscientious Church people of being married before a registrar, with a celebration of the Holy Communion afterwards. That Church men and women should be driven to such straits, and the mere discussion of the subject should be refused at a Congress nominally designed for practical purposes, is striking evidence of the present attitude of the leaders in the Anglican Church towards pressing social questions.

OUR ENGLISH SUNDAY.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Can you kindly find space in the columns of EVERYMAN for the following opinions of great statesmen and others in defence of our English Sunday?

THE EARL OF BEACONSFIELD, K.G.—"Of all Divine institutions the most Divine is that which secures a day of rest for man. I hold it to be the most valuable blessing ever conceded to man. It is the corner-stone of civilisation."

Mr. GLADSTONE, M.P. (Prime Minister).—"The alternations of rest and labour, at the short intervals which are afforded by the merciful and blessed institution of Sunday, are a necessity for the retention of a man's mind, and of a man's frame in a condition to discharge his duties; and it is desirable to restrain the exercise of labour as much as possible on the Sunday, and to secure to the people the enjoyment of the day of rest. The religious observance of Sunday is a main prop of the religious character of the country. From a moral, social, and physical point of view, the observance of Sunday is a duty of absolute consequence."

LORD MACAULAY.—"While industry is suspended, while the plough lies in the furrow, while the exchange is silent, while no smoke ascends from the factory, a process is going on quite as important to the wealth of the nation as any process which is performed on more busy days. Man, the machine of machines, is repairing and winding up, so that he returns to his labours on Monday with clearer intellect, with livelier spirits, with renewed corporeal vigour."

SIR CHARLES REED, LL.D.—"The defence of the Sabbath is a patriotic duty. It is the working man's only day of rest, and he is in danger of losing it. Those who would remove the ancient landmarks are not the working man's true friends."

SIR JAMES CRICHTON BROWNE, M.D.—"We doctors are now constantly compelled in the treatment of nervous disease to prescribe for our patients prolonged periods of absolute rest. Such periods are, I sometimes think, only Sundays in arrears. Such discipline is sometimes only necessary because the weekly rest has been neglected. It is the complete change of mental attitude on a well-ordered Sunday that is so valuable from a sanitary point of view.

"The overstrained powers are relaxed, the pressure is relieved, readjustments are effected, and that kind of introspection and retrospection that is profitable for reproof and correction is encouraged. In the hurry and turmoil and racket of these days there is one text worthy of constant remembrance, 'Commune with your own heart in your chamber, and be still.'

"Let us preserve, I would say, carefully our English Sunday in all its sedateness and tranquillity, if for no higher motive than for its health protective power. To the toiling masses it is essential to enable them to recuperate their energies, to make their monotonous lives endurable, and to sustain them; and even to the idle and frivolous it may prove beneficial."—I am, sir, etc.,

PERSONALITY IN LITERATURE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Are we to take Mr. Corkery seriously when he says that apologists for Masefield are "hard put to find a passage worthy of quotation"?

Surely the very opposite of this is the case. As far as "The Everlasting Mercy" is concerned, once having begun, the difficulty is to stop quoting, since, from the crisis of the poem onwards to the end it is one song.

The poem of Masefield's most nearly approaching the dramatic in treatment is "The Widow in the Bye Street." As such it is a dramatic whole, and is less easy to quote from. But both "The Everlasting Mercy" and "Dauber" contain scores of lines that are beautiful and unforgettable.

Will Mr. Corkery re-read—supposing he has read—the passage in the former poem, beginning,

"O Christ who holds the open gate," and the perfect little invocation to innocence at the end—

"O lovely lily clean,
O lily springing green,
O lily bursting white,
Dear lily of delight,
Spring in my heart agen,
That I may flower to men."

In "Dauber" there are the magical sea-scenes. May I give two examples?

"A great grey sea was running up the sky,
Desolate birds flew past; their mewings came
As that lone water's spiritual cry,
Its forlorn voice, its essence, its soul's name.

Then in the sunset's flush they went aloft,
And unbent sails in that most lovely hour,
When the light gentles and the wind is soft,
And beauty in the heart breaks like a flower.
Working aloft they saw the mountain tower
Snow to the peak; they heard the launchmen shout;
And bright along the bay the lights came out."

THE SCHOOLS AND THE CHILDREN.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—In Mr. P. W. Wilson's article in your issue of June 13th, I should very much like to ask Mr. Wilson what he means by the "rescue of the agricultural labourer from feudal servitude." What feudal corvées has he still to perform?

(1) I am correspondent for my church school here, but I assure you I am neither able to appoint nor dismiss the village teacher; nor should I dream of trying to do so, even through managers.

(2) I am doing clerical work for the managers, which is worth at least £10 a year, but which everyone is quite content to let me do for nothing; and if I try to get someone else to do it, I am told that if anyone else did it there would be endless quarrels.

One does not, as a rule, look for political claptrap in EVERYMAN, but Mr. Wilson is indulging in clap-trap which is an anachronism as well as false.—I am, sir, etc.,

E. R. NEVILL.

MARVELS OF THE MIND.

Initiation FREE to Our Readers.

There are hundreds, nay, thousands, of capable men and women to-day needlessly living a life of mediocrity, obscurity, and failure, whose very existence constitute an "apparently intended" succession of endless toil, trouble, and misery. Fatalists, no doubt, exclaim that all such things must be, but just ask yourself this question: Is there one single sound reason why every being should not attain success and happiness? No—most emphatically there is not.

Every human soul is heir to a rich and glorious possession—the sacred, cherished gifts of inborn capacities and talents. Everyone is born suitably equipped to play his or her rôle in the game of life, and given opportunities which, when grasped, lead to unbounded success and perfect happiness.

Mr. Frank Hartley, the greatest psychomenticulturist, positively denies that failure in any sense of the term necessarily exists. He maintains that the power to succeed lies within the reach of all; it is, in fact, inherent, a potent dormant force, requiring but a certain amount of scientific development to manifest itself in every individual. Hundreds upon hundreds of people in every walk of life who have followed his method testify to the wonderful results which this truly remarkable man has enabled them to accomplish.

Just read the following remarkable letter. Mr. Frank Hartley possesses thousands of similar ones, and he will hand a cheque for £1,000 to any London Hospital, fund, or charity, if anyone can prove that these are not absolutely genuine.

Professor Le D—, Fellow of the British Institute of Mental Science and Graduate of the American College of Sciences (Diploma and Honours), writes, March 3rd, 1913:—

"I have carefully examined your system on Personal Magnetism, etc., and find it far superior to any I have ever read. As a Psychologist I may say you have given the very secrets away to the world.—Yours very faithfully,
"LE D—."

No matter your age or position in life, whether you are engaged in artistic pursuits, in commerce, in finance, you may be either employer, employee, or independent, Mr. Frank Hartley will help you attain your most cherished secret ambitions. Every word you speak, every emanating thought, every moment you live is either right or wrong, and the secret of success in every phase of life lies in bringing your every wish, thought, and action into perfect harmony with your immediate surroundings and the hidden forces of nature.

A GENEROUS OFFER.

So absolutely convinced is Mr. Hartley of the infallibility of his system that he offers to send a free copy of his wonderful book, entitled "The Temple of the Mind," to any of our readers interested, and, further, to initiate them free of charge into his wonderful secret success method.

There is no age limit, no question of position, or obstacle of any kind. All you have to do is to write to Mr. Frank Hartley, Room 106a, London Institute of Menti Culture, 9, John Street, Adelphi, London, W.C. (mention you are a reader of EVERYMAN), and he will send you a free copy of his wonderful book, full particulars of his method, and show you what you must do in order to attain Success, Power, Personal Influence, and Perfect Happiness.

Those who wish to may enclose two penny stamps for postage, etc., but in any case a mere request will bring his book and information.

EXTRACTS FROM THE PRESS.

"A practical guide for travellers, without any ridiculous sentences."—New York Herald, Paris.

"A little book calculated to prove very useful to the English traveller in France and Italy."—Daily Mail, Paris.

"'Time is Money' is exceptionally well adapted for the traveller. A most useful section is the pages devoted to the translation of the menu of one of the popular Restaurants Duval in Paris. The conversation is practical, and the author wisely makes no attempt to give the pronunciation."—T.P.'s Weekly.

"'Time is Money' will be found specially useful, because it has been written bit by bit during years of life on the Continent. Travellers will find in it things they wish to say, and not the amusing but irrelevant remarks of the ordinary conversation book."—The Associates' Journal, G.F.S.

"Miss Augusta Ayliffe has published a very useful and clever work, entitled 'Time is Money.' The book aims at teaching languages to busy people, and 'is intended for those persons who jump into the train and go half-way round the world, while the sleepy ones are thinking the matter over, and studying a bit of French or Italian grammar before entertaining a thought of going on the Continent.' . . . The book should prove invaluable to all those who want to achieve a workable knowledge of French or Italian in the shortest possible time."—Everyman.

"Miss Ayliffe's 'Time is Money' is a publication of a very interesting and practical kind, superior to many of its class. With it in his hand the traveller might often save himself from embarrassment, and at least he can walk into a restaurant and order his meals. It is the experience of many travellers that in PRACTICE an aid to PRONUNCIATION is a failure. A pure accent cannot be obtained by self-tuition. The author of 'Time is Money' defies the best linguist of the day to give a written pronunciation of 'on' in 'bon,' etc.; 'en' and 'u' in 'rue,' etc. . . ."—The Florence Herald, June, 1913.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

EGYPT makes a romantic setting for a love story, and Miss Norma Lorimer utilises the scope the country affords her at a certain degree of success in her novel. A WIFE OUT OF EGYPT (Stanley Paul and Co., 6s.) does not open well, and the defects of style prominent in the first chapter recur again and again throughout the book. In her attempts to define the salient characteristics of Stella, the heroine, and to emphasise her attractions of beauty and of charm, the author falls back on clichés long outworn and more than a little dusty. It is not necessary in order to draw attention to the fact that your hero is a man about town to state that he is attired in "faultless afternoon dress," and the statement that the heroine is "perfectly gloved and perfectly shod" does not suggest a picture of ravishing beauty. Stella is the daughter of an Irish woman who married a Syrian chief, a man of astonishing amiability of character, though with certain native prejudices impossible to get over. Stella, brought up in an English school, finds it difficult to adapt herself to Oriental conditions. Finally, however, she throws in her lot with her father's people, breaks off her engagement with the hero in immaculate dress, and marries a man of the grizzled adventurer type, who shares her admiration for and her sympathies with the country of the Nile.

There is a never-ending fascination in the legends of the Dark Continent. An author with a capacity of imagination is always sure of enlisting the sympathies of his readers if he takes them to the wilds of Africa, and if, in addition to stirring adventures and hair-breadth escapes, he incorporates stories of buried treasures, magical white queens, and lost cities, the result is pretty sure to be a fair success. THE SECRET CITY (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.) has plenty of adventure, and Mr. Joseph Duke has mastered the art of arresting the interest of the reader with a series of pictures—the actual visualisation of scenes he desires to describe. We have the old tale of the MS. written in an almost forgotten language, and its subsequent elucidation by the teller of the story. We are introduced once more to a noble-hearted savage, one Lumkile, who shows traditional fidelity to the white man under whom he enlists, and saves his party from risks that no European could combat with. We meet also with the mysterious queen of an almost unearthly beauty, who has a penchant for other women's lovers and a pleasing fashion of torturing those of her subjects who attempt to cross her will. Reinhilda is true to her type, and does her best to get rid of all her rivals in the love of Paul Retief. How she is defeated, and the measure of happiness that comes to Paul and his true love, we leave it to the readers of this exciting romance to discover.

Most people know little more about Vane than that he was the subject of one of Milton's sonnets, and that Oliver Cromwell prayed to be delivered from him. Dr. Wilcox thus prefaces his book on SIR HENRY VANE, THE YOUNGER; STATESMAN AND MYSTIC (St. Catharine Press, Oswaldstre House, Norfolk Street). But remarkable as Vane most eminently was, much as one must admire him for his heroism and the severe logic of his opinions, he must have been pre-eminently difficult to live with. He was a man without that redeeming sense of humour which makes one pardon many glaring faults, and this lack of proportion—for humour infallibly corrects the vision—may account for his unhappy faculty of being wrong both in his quarrels and his opinions. Vane, says Dr. Wilcox, "moves as a stranger through the Protestant communities of the Continent, is in conflict with the Church of Rome, the episcopacy of Laud, and the Puritanism of New England, and refuses subjection to the Presbyterianism of Scotland. The principle of toleration was firmly rooted in his nature, and it would be hard to say whether Geneva or Rome, Canterbury or Edinburgh or Boston in those days hated it most." It may be said, however, that the one point on which Vane was not tolerant was in the expression of his opinion. In season and out of season he contended that in no section of organised Christian society had finality been reached, and while this philosophic attitude was eminently suited to a strictly logical mind, it may be that the advocacy of such a position may tend to the belief that finality not having been attained, it makes very little difference whether the temporal conditions on the road are good or bad. The volume sheds a clear light on certain aspects of those troublous years, 1613-1632, and the author has made it his business to fulfil the whole duty of an historian, as quoted by Cervantes. "truthful and wholly free from passion."

Mrs. E. M. Channon has written a delightful book about a woman who decided it was her mission in life to write novels, and to the consternation of her family set out to do it. The egotism of Petronella, in MISS KING'S PROFESSION (Mills and Boon, 6s.), is exquisitely sketched. She regards her mother and sisters from the lofty standpoint of genius, and deplores the fact that they find contentment in the simple things of every-day life, and are unable to follow her into the realms of higher thought, where she poses to her own contentment. Needless to say, she speaks of her work with a very large capital W, and inflicts her moods and fancies unmercifully on her long-suffering relatives. She is an excellent specimen of a type of woman who possesses neither originality nor talent, but with an irritable desire to exploit herself persuades her friends and family that a certain fatal facility in stringing words together constitutes a literary capacity. Sarah, the writing woman who does her work because she "must," and also because she wants the money, is an excellent foil to Nella. After many months of weary waiting and uniform rejection, the latter gets a novel accepted. Unconvincing in characterisation and mediocre in style, a certain strength of plot is the one redeeming feature. The book is accepted and produces a fair number of favourable criticisms. It is her one solitary success, however, and in the ultimate she discovers, to her insufferable humiliation, that the plot itself is not original. She had heard the tale from a friend on a summer afternoon, had stored it in her memory, and unconsciously come to consider it her own creation. In the end she marries the man whose idea she has adapted. He is a successful novelist, and a curate into the bargain, and she has from time to time inflicted various items of literary information, which he has received with becoming humility. She realises what an unutterable fool she has made of herself, and with the knowledge comes a realisation that she has neglected all her life the things that really matter. That she is completely cured of her vanity is proved by the fact that none of her children ever know that she once published a semi-successful novel. Mrs. Channon has an inimitable style, a swift sense of humour, and an insight into feminine psychology that make her work original, arrestive and real.

Knowledge is increasing so rapidly and in so many different directions that the busy man is coming to depend more and more upon a good Encyclopædia in which he can turn up all that is known upon any subject he is interested in. But it is essential that the information given should be absolutely reliable, and that the "Illustrated Chambers's Encyclopædia" is the only work at a moderate price that really serves this purpose is obvious from the following few names, taken from a list of over 1,000 famous contributors:—

1,000 Expert Contributors.

Prince Kropotkin, Viscount Haldane, S. Baring-Gould, Sir W. M. Conway, Sidney Lee, Andrew Lang, Lord Avebury, Professor Vamberg, Sir Charles Warren, Professor A. B. W. Kennedy, Professor Saintsbury, Duke of Argyll, Watts Dunton, Goldwin Smith, Mrs. Fawcett, J.L.D., Austin Dobson, Edmund Gosse, F. A. Gasquet, O.S.B., Bramwell Booth, Justin McCarthy, Sir W. F. Butler, Professor Caird, Dr. Andrew Wilson, Sir J. A. H. Murray, G. J. Holyoake, Herbert Spencer, Sir John Murray, Sir Edward Grey, K.G., Mrs. Annie Besant, Sir Clements Markham, Andrew Carnegie, Professor Cheyne.

Every subject is fully dealt with. In the case of the political and sociological matter the information here embodied is not otherwise obtainable save by consultation of hundreds of Blue Books and expensive Government publications. The articles on the Sciences—mental, moral, physical, natural, and of their various branches—are written by professors of those sciences in our great Universities.

The "Illustrated Chambers's" (Latest Edition) is a treasury of compact information and a reliable guide on subjects Literary, Political, Historical, Theological, Scientific, Musical, Artistic, Philosophical, and General. It is international in character. It consists of Ten Handsome Half-Leather Volumes, 200,000 subjects, with cross references, 8,000 pages of new, clear type, written by 1,000 contributors of world-wide distinction. There are 4,000 engravings, superbly reproduced, and 50 magnificent maps. There are also over 50 coloured plates, the finest ever produced in connection with any work of reference. Five thousand biographies of famous men and women are also included, with the histories of all the great movements with which many of them were associated.

Let the Children use It.

The boy or girl who has access to a reliable Encyclopædia and who is encouraged to use it on every possible occasion has a tremendous advantage over one not so situated. It is proverbial that the knowledge thus deliberately acquired is the knowledge that stays; and the youth who supplements the home lessons with additional readings on every subject is the well-informed man or woman who achieves distinction in later life.

Two Opinions.

LORD CURZON OF KEDLESTON writes—

"I have always regarded 'Chambers's Encyclopædia' as the most concise, scholarly and useful compendium of universal knowledge anywhere to be found within a similar compass."

HILAIRE BELLOC, Esq., writes—

"'Chambers's Encyclopædia' has been my principal book of reference for the last fifteen years. I have found it much the most accurate of such works, more trustworthy than others, and more comprehensive. . . . I have never found it to fail."

Mr. S. R. Crockett's latest novel, SANDY'S LOVE AFFAIR (Hutchinson, 6s.), is written in the author's usual popular style. It is the story of a young Scotchman who comes from his native land to Fleet Street and scores a success in the newspaper world, which helps him to achieve his ambition of writing a notable novel. He meets with a young actress, Miss V. V. Jones, and the two form a friendship which inevitably drifts into a closer tie. The admirers of Mr. Crockett will follow with interest the excursions of the hero into Bohemia, and will appreciate the adventures with which the little actress meets. Her sacrifices for the man she loves and her constancy under very trying circumstances will ensure the suffrages of all those who are attracted by the glamour of the footlights.

COLLISION (Duckworth, 6s.) is a novel the scene of which is laid in India of the present day, and the chief personality, one Benjamin Trotter, is very obviously modelled upon a politician whom it would be impolitic to name. The story is well told, and the book is a clever and picturesque presentation of a tragic episode. The two women who play the principal parts, Susan and Imogen, are strongly drawn personalities, and one is filled with regret that it should be possible to imagine the beautiful young Englishwoman, Imogen, treading such crooked paths in the service of Trotter, the traitor to his country. The nobility of Susan Digby's character, and the stern and simple devotion of the Government officials, are very clearly depicted. The fact that only in a future existence can the result of work done here be properly valued, is dimly hinted at, though not over-emphasised, and it seems a pity that the devotion and heroism of Mrs. Trueman should not be brought before the reader in a more attractive manner. She is a foil to the wonderful Imogen, and succeeds where the latter fails. Mrs. Bridget Maclagan shows a certain amount of insight into human nature in making this to be so. We cannot resist giving a short quotation, which describes a reception given to Imogen, who has been speaking on behalf of Women's Suffrage to the native women. They welcome her with embarrassing offerings of floral wreaths, which they place round her neck, and she is seated in the place of honour. "Imogen, with a mounting sense of the ludicrous, and beginning to perspire uncomfortably about the neck, gazed about her at the individuals whom she had been, somewhat pointedly, invited to meet. The men, got up for the occasion in frock-coats and patent leather boots, were not picturesque; and though the women were, their complete lack of aplomb, and the almost total absence of conversation, made them all seem idiotic. They sat in a circle round the wall staring at her and smiling, while a hollow-chested young girl in a black sari spotted with tarnished gold, passed tea with a tragic, ingratiating face." The picture is inimitable, as indeed is the whole scene.

WOMEN OF THE COUNTRY (Duckworth, 2s. 6d. net) is a charming little volume by Mrs. Gertrude Bone. It has no pretensions to style, but is a simple narrative depicting the life of the women of the peasant class in a typical country village in England. The characters are cleverly portrayed, and very skilfully has Mrs. Bone contrived to suggest their various idiosyncrasies. Anne Hilton, voted "peculiar" by her fellows, goes on her way, helping this one with a word or a little deed of kindness, and delivering her prim little homilies to another in the hope that she will see the error of her ways; but it should be noted that, in spite of her alleged peculiarities and the somewhat sudden lapses into the primness of her grandmothers, Anne is a real, loving woman, with a wonderful understanding of the weaknesses of her fellow-creatures. As we turn the pages we are filled with a somewhat shamefaced consciousness that, after all, what is so often regarded as "nobody's business" is perhaps only a responsibility which we too often get rid of by these well-worn words. Is it nobody's business to interfere with a kind word when we see others in trouble or distress? Would it not be well for us if we took a leaf out of Anne Hilton's book, and, in spite of the raised eyebrows of our neighbours, were to lend the helping hand and the sympathy to that stranger at our gates, without which they might be indeed in sore straits? The book is one which should find a warm place in the hearts of its readers, and we congratulate Mrs. Bone on having accomplished this little volume.

Messrs. Longmans have published a new volume, LIFE'S LITTLE TRAGEDIES (3s. 6d. net), by Mr. Guy Fleming. As the title indicates, it is a book of short stories, or rather a collection of tragic episodes, which are flashed on to the curtain, leaving an impression which it is hard to shake off. The scenes are vividly written, and show an amount of care and an appreciation of the strong emotions of humanity which is very rare. It would be as well to mention that the book is certainly not one to take up when one is feeling down in the dumps, but nevertheless it has the fascination which all tragedies seem to have for old and young alike, and if the tales make us feel unhappy, that does not deter us from eagerly turning to the next as soon as one is finished. There is an extraordinary power about one of these entitled "The Philosopher," and though it is a simple enough tale, perhaps for that very reason it goes straight to the heart. The poor broken wreck of a man, one time cynic, being cared for and loved by the woman he has wronged, appeal to one in a quite unexpected manner, and it is difficult to say which of the two is most to be pitied—or envied, the one for the ideals he has lost, or the other for the happiness she has cast from her.

HISTORY IN THE MAKING

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

MR. ASQUITH'S reply to the deputation, who sought from him some modification of the official attitude in regard to the Channel Tunnel scheme cannot be said to give great grounds for hope. The Premier remarked that the matter had been before the country ever since 1874. In point of fact, it is over one hundred years since Napoleon and Charles James Fox agreed generally upon this method of bringing the two great democratic nations of Europe into closer touch. But very little has been done since, and while the Official Committee appointed by the French Government have cordially approved the present scheme, we still hesitate. Surely every unbiassed mind will agree that this is deplorable. A company of Grenadier Guards would suffice to hold the tunnel against all Europe, and half a ton of dynamite would blow it to bits. Why, then, does our Government refuse permission to build?

Quite one of the most interesting events of the past week has been the discussion on the need for the co-ordination of anti-tuberculosis measures, by the delegates to the Conference of the National Association for the Prevention of Consumption. Sir R. W. Philp strongly emphasised the view that tuberculosis demanded, not only special treatment from the medical point of view, but also special legislation. Hospitals, he declared, were entirely inadequate to deal with "the great white scourge," and the time had come when a Special Department of Public Health Activity, convened exclusively on tuberculosis, should be constituted. Meanwhile, however, it should be noted that, apart from the inadequacy of existing sanatoria, medical opinion seems to be swinging round to home treatment for consumptives. In that case, provision of a new special department could do but little in the matter. Unfortunately, there is no disguising the fact that consumption is a disease born and bred of poverty, and not until we have raised the level of the standard of living of our people will its dreadful figures depreciate.

Lord Crewe's report on the Sitapur murder case will be generally welcomed by judicial reformers. He finds that the rules governing the procedure of appeal in cases of persons condemned to death in India are distinctly unsatisfactory, and it is understood that radical alterations in them will be proposed by the Government at an early date. Of course, this cannot restore the Sitapur victims to life, but it encourages us to hope that they are the last of a long line of victims of a system which it is impossible to defend.

The re-emergence of Mrs. Pankhurst into the political arena while she is still technically under arrest is, it must be confessed, an extraordinary anomaly, whatever views one may take of the aims and methods of the suffragettes. Assuming, as we are all entitled to assume, that laws are passed to be obeyed, the open and advertised defiance of the provisions of the "Cat and Mouse" Act is a remarkable achievement for those who are bent on reducing it to a farce. It is not so clear, however, as to what it is that they gain by this particular success. But the fact remains that, as the cards fall out, they have won the odd trick.

It is deeply to be regretted that the report of the Select Committee on Motor Traffic will not be presented to the House in time for effective consideration before Parliament rises. There can be no question as to the reality of the evils which the Committee were appointed to consider. The number of accidents, especially of fatal accidents, has risen to an alarming extent of late years in the towns, while in the country the people have lost all sense of possession of the highway, where the very children are afraid to play. It is scandalous that pedestrians should be allowed to lose their rights in the road. When will our legislators look to it?

News from China trickles through but slowly. Perhaps the most remarkable addition to our stock of knowledge concerning events in the Flowery Land is that communicated by the well-informed correspondent of the Daily Telegraph, who has succeeded in interviewing Dr. Sun Yat Sen, the revolutionary leader. His declaration is very noteworthy. "He is absolutely confident of the ultimate success of the South, and interprets the Nankin reverse as of small importance." Prophecy, we know, is the most gratuitous form of error, but if there be a prophet in China undoubtedly it is the man who led the revolt against the Manchus, and who is now in the field against Yuan-Shi-Kai.

One of the most notable events of this week has been the Doctors' Congress. To this Congress have come no less than five thousand medical men from all parts of the civilised world, among them the most eminent surgeons and specialists of the faculty. Sir Thomas Barlow, as President, referred to the triumphs of modern surgery and of the important part the discoveries of scientists play in industrialism generally. "The supreme gain is that many more useful lives are saved than in the last generation, that the realm of grave and hitherto incurable disease is invaded on every side, and that the danger of operation qua operation is retreating to vanishing point."

THE LAND HUNGER: THE PEASANTS' PLIGHT

By F. E. GREEN

I.

A FEW weeks ago I visited some allotments near Cheshunt, in Hertfordshire. There I found half a dozen men at work cultivating rows of peas and beans, cabbages and potatoes, with hardly a weed to be seen. From these few acres I noticed that the trees had recently been grubbed up, and the overshadowing branches of the tall elms surrounding the field had been lopped off.

"You should have seen this field before we made the District Council buy it," said a member of the Cheshunt Land Club to me; "and then they could only get it by putting the compulsory clause into force. It was simply a wilderness of brambles, nettles, and hedgerow timber. When we got possession we had to clear the place like pioneers clearing the bush in America. The land was quite worthless to anybody, and yet the owner would not sell except under legal compulsion. We all helped one another, and so made a clean job of it. And now it's a smiling garden, ain't it?"

The speaker had only one hand, and yet, with the aid of this and a hook, was known to be the best potato grower in the Land Club.

II.

What had been accomplished here by this man and his comrades was a striking instance of that love of the earth which characterises the contributors to the volume called "The Land Hunger," recently published by Mr. Fisher Unwin (2s.).

Mark Twain remarked in one of his books that the English had been mentioned in the Bible because it was written in holy script that "the meek shall inherit the earth." But evidently this did not refer to the working classes of Britain. The desire to inherit has not been a characteristic trait of English working men. Theirs has been the passion to use or till the earth, and this has run in the veins of the British race like a stream that never dries up. The passion for ownership is a baser one, and is a marked characteristic of the governing class.

Every year we have it recorded in cold print that so many thousand workmen are waiting for leave to use their lusty limbs upon our idle acres—a demand that remains unsatisfied every year, and one which drives thousands of our best workmen across the seas.

I have watched groups of workmen cultivating, with infinite patience and splendid care, their ten or twenty rod allotments on the top of the wind-swept Downs on soil noted chiefly for its crop of stones. Even will they do this where they are liable to be ejected from the land which they have made fertile by an arbitrary three months' notice to quit! And we see them laboriously harvesting their corn crops with an implement as primitive as that used by Boaz in the fields where Ruth gleaned.

III.

'Anyone who is aware of the difficulties even to-day confronting the labourer who asks for permission to till a strip of land, is conscious how ineradicable is the hunger for the earth; a craving which has outlived the destruction of those landmarks which once made our peasant civilisation something to be proud of.

thoroughly reactionary county council. His sympathy with the labourer is well known, and he wanted to experience the same ordeal that the labourer had to pass through. There was a gleam of humour in his kind eyes as he recounted to me his experience. He duly filled up his form: age, ninety; experience, sixty-five years in gardening and science; character—that he had attested to by his village postmaster! He applied for a definite piece of poor heath land, which really had no economic value. He would endeavour to bring it under cultivation, plant an orchard, and though only a cart-track formed the roadway to this acre or two growing nothing but heather and gorse, he offered to pay a rent of 10s. an acre.

When the customary few months had passed after the receipt of the application, some official came down to look at the land. Then, after a few more months had passed, our great scientist was informed that he could have the land by a certain date the following year, if he paid a rent of £2 and was prepared to pay as well compensation for disturbance to the outgoing tenant, who occasionally turned out cattle to graze upon this forbidding wilderness! Needless to say, the distinguished applicant, who knew something about soil values, rejected this preposterous offer.

IV.

The difficulty which confronts land reformers is this: a good deal of the land in England and Scotland to-day possesses what might be called a sentimental value. The owners are becoming plutocrats, or marrying into the families of plutocrats. They do not want to cultivate the land themselves, nor let others cultivate it. They want covert for game and forest for deer. They are not, as a rule, avaricious as to getting the highest economic rent, and this gives credence to the belief that landowners are a wrongfully abused class, for it is pointed out that they derive only two or three per cent. from the capital value of their estates. But this placing of pleasure before use does not help us nationally, nor does it bring any satisfaction to the men who are eager to gain access to the land.

We are still only producing £4 from the acre, whilst Belgium produces £20.

A smallholder of ten acres, writing from a village near the Cheviots to Mrs. Cobden Unwin, who inspired the making of "The Land Hunger," describes Northern England thus:

"This is the land of big estates, large farms, and landless men. . . . Within recent years a large area of land has been laid down to grass, thus lessening employment. With so much pasture land we could produce as good butter as Denmark, but the land system blocks the way. Game, not butter, is what the landlord wants, and so good dairying is not encouraged. Houses which might have been inhabited have been turned into shooting-boxes, to be used, perhaps, two or three times in a year for the sportsmen's lunch. Two or three years ago four old women in a neighbouring village, who had lived there all their lives, got notice to quit as their homes were to be pulled down. One of them died of a broken heart, and the others had to go to a town and start life in strange surroundings. . . . Within thirty years twenty-five houses have been pulled down, and only three built in their place. There are at present only eighteen houses, all practically owned by one proprietor. Houses cannot be had in the district, and anyone wishing to get married has to leave the district. The landlord will not sell a square foot of land. . . . As for sanitary inspectors, they dare not look at our village. The district council pays our inspector about £70 or £80 annually, but it is not his interest to interfere with any of the landlords, who might lose him his job. The landowners are the greatest law breakers in the country." . . . The population in this rural district in 1881 was 10,869; to-day it is 8,579.

What is described here as taking place in the North of England is true of many large estates in the South, where the owners have become possessed with the mania for sport.

V.

The pathway of reform before our Government surely is clear. To save both rural England and rural Scotland from becoming a wilderness for pheasants, deer, and grouse, and to prevent the lowering of our national standard of physical efficiency, our public authorities must have power to purchase land as they do in Germany, in advance of the demands of smallholders; and the price paid should be restricted to that which the owners fix as its value for rateable purposes. For this is an urban as well as a rural problem. In Germany many a township is entirely relieved of the burden of rates by the public ownership of belts of land, and the rents accruing therefrom.

Besides the power to purchase land for any useful object, public authorities should have a sum allocated to them from the Treasury sufficient to meet the needs of a class, the expropriated condition of which, Richard Cobden declared, "had no parallel on the face of the earth."

THE CASE OF THE PLAIN WOMAN

"THE CASE OF THE PLAIN MAN" having been so ably set forth by Mr. Arnold Bennett lately in the Strand Magazine, it is somewhat strange that, as far as I know, "The Case of the Plain Woman" has not met with similar treatment at the hands of a feminine writer. Though not myself possessing the pen of an Arnold Bennett, I will endeavour to describe to the best of my ability "The Case of the Plain Woman."

Lady readers must not be taken in by the idea that I mean to write about the woman of plain features. We all know our plainness, so there is no need to talk about it, and wishing we were pretty would only make us plainer.

Neither must it be thought that by Plain Woman I mean any one woman or class of women, though, to be sure, I shall leave out the very wealthy women, of whose lives I have no intimate first-hand knowledge, and whose wealth, while leading them sometimes into many pitfalls and dangers on the one side, yet provides on the other a means of escape from many of the evils and sorrows to which their plainer or poorer sisters have to get accustomed.

I think it will not be difficult to prove that the case of the Plain Woman, i.e., the ordinary, everyday woman, who earns her bread in the sweat of her brow, does not differ very much at heart, even in these days and in this country, from that of women of other countries and of older days. Externally, no doubt, there is a greater freedom, and women are allowed to compete with men in what were formerly masculine occupations, be it for good or ill remains to be seen; but a peep behind the scenes reveals the fact that, with all our vaunted higher education, man has not yet been taught to regard woman as his equal, nor even as a creature of likes and dislikes, the same as himself, whose wishes and whims, if you like to call them so, are as deserving of consideration as his own.

It is a question of teaching after all, and nations are composed of individuals; so if the little boys of the last generation had been properly trained by their mothers, we should not now have the humiliating spectacle of seeing the gentler (?) sex fighting and squabbling and trying like cats to scratch the men's eyes out over that scraped and bleached bone, "the Vote."

By the Plain Woman who earns her bread I do not mean the bachelor girl who gets up about eight o'clock, and eats her breakfast hurriedly, without giving a thought, perhaps, to the other woman, who has frizzled her face while preparing it; who goes off, clean and dainty, to the office, shop, or college, has her stated hours, her whole day on Sunday, and her half-day a week. No; I would more especially present the case of that other one of a great army of Plain Women, who are frizzling their faces over the bacon every day, and whose brains are occupied with as many knotty problems as ever furrowed statesman's brow. It is not for her that much-talked-of emancipation of women, not for her lot that amelioration is demanded. No one cares how much she is "sweated," least of all the man whose willing slave she is. It is on the sweat of the married woman's brow that the whole world exists. If she were to strike, what chaos would ensue! Looking at it from a monetary point of view alone, if a man working from 7 a.m. to 5 p.m. or 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. earns £2 a week, a woman who works from 6 a.m. to 10 or 11 p.m., as is usually the case, earns, if she never gets, £4 to £5 a week, especially as she rarely gets a half-day holiday, and has little or no leisure, even on Sundays.

Let us see then what is the case of this very Plain Woman, and whether she differs even from the heathen women whom we are taught to pity, and for whom we are told to pray.

She is hunted, and captured at last by the man who fancies her for his squaw, with only such mild weapons as "admiration" and "fair promises," which "promises" he straightway forgets or throws away, like a broken sling, as soon as he has the bird safely caged.

The Plain Woman is now dependent on him for everything, her roof, her clothes, her very bread and butter, all of which she must earn as truly as does the typist or the teacher. The man's every wish is catered for, and if she is ever so good a manager, it is downright hard work sometimes to keep within the limits of his income.

She goes without many things to provide him with an "extra" for tea or supper, but he would not think of giving up his pint of beer for her. She prepares a special hot dinner for him, only to have it kept waiting and spoilt while he gossips with a friend over a "pint" at the nearest bar. It matters not that she has her plans, that she wants to clear up, and go out with her baby. She must not use her only lawful weapon, the tongue, or else he will call her a "nagger," go out, and then perhaps sulk for a week. Or she may fill her house with sweet flowers from her garden; but the enjoyment of the scent is brief, for very soon the man comes in, and the smell of vile tobacco permeates every nook and corner. It may be at some special time when the very first whiff of the abominable stuff makes her really ill; then she must fly to some far room of the house, where the odour cannot reach her. It could not be expected of a man to put his pipe out. Oh, no!

Again, the Plain Woman, in addition to all the other work she takes upon herself in looking after her "man," bears him healthy, well-formed children, and discovers that he regards them as only so many "brats." It is then the iron enters into her soul; but one consolation remains, in that the oft-seared wound ceases to feel at last. The children themselves, too, help to heal the wound, and the woman lives again for them.

In spite of our supposed high state of civilisation, the man still expects that his woman shall be his housekeeper, parlour-maid, cook, sick-nurse, nurse-maid, valet, charwoman, sempstress, gardener, nay, even in some cases his house-painter, paperhanger, and carpenter. Besides which, if there is any dirty little bit of legal work to be done, such as answering a summons or interviewing the landlord or agent, it is she must do it.

Or, again, if she really wants something very badly, say, a new pair of blankets, a rug or carpet, she has to stoop to coaxing, cajolery, and even to pretence that she really does not want it, to get it at all. Odious and despicable this to a truth-loving woman, so she goes without the new thing as long as a thread of the old remains. Then there are the Plain Women who have implicitly trusted men with their little savings, only to find their trust misplaced, their "all" gone, and, for the sake of the children, have even kept the home together by their own superhuman exertions. One can hardly call these "Plain" Women; they are the most plucky beings the earth contains.

Shall we marvel then at Woman's desire for freedom?

Perhaps the burden becomes at last too great to bear, and the Plain Woman lets loose with her tongue, even as Sarah, before she died, commanded her lord and master, Abraham, and with divine concurrence he obeyed. But the modern Sarahs do it once too often, and drive away their Abrahams, to seek conviviality in the public-house. On their return thence later, the last state of that house is worse than the first; and to the Plain Woman's wrongs is added yet another, that of being kept awake all night by stertorous breathing and the stench of beer.

There are other things, too, which the Plain Woman must endure, which cannot be treated of here, so long as man will learn to master everything and everybody but himself.

It is said that by uniting and fighting will freedom be bought, but, with all due respect to authorities on the subject of "Union and Strength," I would like to point out that, in the world of nature, which is the garden of God, the opposite holds good. Plant several seeds in a heap together; what is the result? Is unity strength then? No; weak, frail, sickly plants, which bring no fruit or flowers to perfection. Plant a single seed in a hole by itself, and soon we watch with pleasure the sturdy growth, the large buds, the handsome, well-formed flowers. And the same thing applies to trees.

Is there any need to point the moral?

If the Plain Woman of to-day would be the Perfect Woman of to-morrow, let her push up her own vigorous growth in her own little hole. She must fight alone, but divinely aided, for her own rights in her own individual niche. But she must stick there, or else lose her power. And let her train those little boys committed to her care to be the comrades and champions of her sex in the next generation. A book which might be universally read with advantage just now, if it is still in print, is "Woman and Her Masters," a history of the female sex from the earliest period, by Lady Morgan, published by David Bryce, of Paternoster Row. No doubt many of those portrayed within its pages were the poor, plain, plodding women at one time; who rose by their quiet, spiritual power to exercise a phenomenal influence in each succeeding era of the world's history. What has been done before can be done again, so let the Plain Woman take heart.

THE GUARDIAN OF COASTS

By DOROTHY H. BROWN.

THERE is one who passes my cottage every night. Her way is by the worn cliff-track from the sea. She follows dusk. She steals past, whispering to herself, glancing from side to side, as if seeking the sky twilight. Her sudden whisper startles the lingering heat of day to flight.

She may stray sighing through the rain. She may dance singing beneath the moon. The words of her song are unknown as the secret speech of the sea. It is a vacant and a wandering tune, whose refrain none may learn.

She will run chanting down the mist-haunted valley. As an exorcist she frees the ridden valley, exultant, driving the mist-wreaths before her. Past my open window they drift, meek, silent as prayer-driven ghosts.

Through the wild autumn nights she is to be heard crying along the sea-cliff, all unsheltered, uncomfited. Do the grey thistles hear that lonely cry? Do the young gulls wonder, peering from rock-hung nests? The barren coast knows that wailing voice, even as it knows the heavy moaning of tide. From dread of these wailing voices is its aspect changed—worn, furrowed by unavailing fear. They are the two most lamentable cries of the world. There is none to silence them. . . . By the cliff-verge she roams restless. Her crying penetrates my dreams.

Her mirth is rare, but I have heard her strange laughter shaking the tamarisks. She will sometimes cease abruptly, pause and retrace stealthy steps as though to listen. There is silence: the sky is breathless, earth is still—only the sea murmurs. Perhaps she waited for that answering voice, for she goes her way, and soon her fitful laughter is heard echoing far among the hills.

There are nights when she speeds past terrible in wrath. The rumour of her approach fills high heaven. For fear of her coming earth shudders; the short-haired downs are stirred, the aged thorns strain inland, stretching shaking branches for shelter where shelter is none, the wakened sheep shrink closer to earth's frozen breast. The track of her flight streams far like the foaming wake of a ship; it is livid with dying life, it is strewn with life disordered. Heaven and earth are stunned.

Every night I listen for her coming. She will never cease to come. Long after house and sleeper are gone, will she pass nightly through space, her dwelling. When the familiar face of the land is changed, when the land itself is no more seen: long hence when there is no more world will she pass unchanged through the changing house of space. I am glad to think that always she will be there, laughing, crying, singing, as now, ever changing, yet the same. As now, solitary and invisible. . . . Even now she strays past singing. . . . She is the Wind.

THE MAN AND HIS WORK

IV.—THE MAN ON THE ROAD

IT was some fifteen years ago, in the days when the House of Commons was still dominated by the unique personality of Mr. Chamberlain, that master of destructive speech, that the weary watchers in the Press Gallery were rewarded by one of those sudden and dramatic interludes in debate that go far to reconcile them to the general greyness of their lot. The member for West Birmingham was at bay!

All the evening he had sat silent and impassive on the Treasury Bench, while speaker after speaker had launched into hot invective and indignant remonstrance that apparently left the Right Honourable Gentleman careless and unconcerned. But, suddenly, one of his critics touched the great man on the raw. He closed a telling speech very effectively by describing the Colonial Secretary's policy which should appeal to commercial travellers. A loud cheer drove home the hit, but before it had died away Joe was on his feet, hitting back at his opponent with deadly results. It was quite natural, he said, in the rasp that all of us knew, that hon. gentlemen opposite should ridicule him. But why attack bagmen? Why attack men who for keenness, ubiquity, and resource were unmatched in the whole sweep of modern commercialism? And, with a few deft touches, marked by that shattering realism he could use so well, he drew a picture of "The Commercial" speeding up and down the country, .

As that of a Bagman's,

from his home and family, with little leisure, sometimes with no repose, a stranger to many of the comforts of life, and always intent on doing his utmost for the firm he served. Was he going to be ashamed of the support of such men? Not likely! The members, who had been cheering but a few minutes since, looked rather glum, and all of us knew that Mr. Chamberlain's triumph that night was assured!

Fifty years ago, of course, such a picture would have been impossible. The man on the road was then comparatively a leisured individual. Charles Dickens sketched him for us in "Pickwick." "A stout, hale personage with only one eye—a very bright, black one, which twinkled with a roguish expression of fun and good humour," who observed, it may be remembered, "Our noble selves, gents. I always propose that toast to the company and drink Mary to myself." Times have changed since then with "The Commercial." The growth of the railway system and the consequent cheapening of all forms of travel have, of course, revolutionised his lot, while so adding to his numbers, that it is very difficult indeed to appraise these accurately. At the present day every trader in the world with any trade at all looks upon "The Commercial" as of business. According to some authorities, he may be counted by hundreds of thousands, and I find that one of them asserts that there are over 100,000 commercial travellers in Great Britain, excluding manufacturers' agents and canvassers, figures that I do not put forward as final or authoritative. But while in modern conditions have added enormously to his quantity, it is more than doubtful if they have not at the same time diminished his importance. The old type of "commercial traveller" was a man who, arriving at a town, spent at least a week in it. He cultivated his customers, took things leisurely, and—did big business! Often he earned his hundreds a year, and affected a status and a style that perhaps was a little beyond him. But "he pulled business." To-day things are different! The name of the commercial traveller is legion.

He has to be here, there, and everywhere. He is no longer able to use his railway journeys "to clarify his thoughts," as Carlyle recommended, rather must he study the railway time-table! In a great many cases he has to interpret the advertisement literally, "He lives on the line"! What does he earn? On an average he receives about £200 per annum. His expenses range from £1 1s. to £1 5s. a day. This expenses allowance has to cover not only his own travels up and down the country, but must include the conveyance of his samples. With the town traveller, of course, a "brougham," to be paid for by the firm, will suffice for these. In the country their carriage from point to point is a more difficult matter. At first blush, of course, it looks as if the expenses allowance permitted of a margin, but the seasoned traveller knows better. Even at commercial rates there is very little left for the traveller out of the sum named. A man who is going to travel, to take goods with him, and to talk them at the other end, needs to be to be charged with vitality, with energy and resource, or he will not get an order! Hence an allowance that seems even lavish to the man who has not travelled, proves in reality to be hardly adequate. I find that "commercials" are complaining that, instead of these really meagre allowances, they are paid out-of-pocket expenses only; that is to say, they draw some £10 on account, and account for it to the uttermost farthing! This system is, of course, a bad one—bad for the travellers and bad for those whose business it is to check their accounts. Obviously it is impossible for a man on the road to justify, or even to recollect equally obvious is it that an auditor can only pass accounts that are stated in proper form. The sane course is for a firm to give its representatives such resources as will not allow them to feel hampered by lack of "the ready." There is always about this question of expenses allowance an element of tragic squalor. There is something haunting, something dreadful in the idea of a man using his expenses to send home money to his wife and family, while he satisfies himself on tea and bread and butter instead of the ample luncheon that his docket attests. But this question of expense is not the only grievance that

Every Trifling Detail of his Expenditure;

"the commercial" complains about. Like almost everybody else, he says that the railways have refused to give him those reasonable considerations that, as one would expect, they would readily accord the traveller.

So far as railways go, they are the subject of bitter and frequent complaint by "commercial," who assert with great logic that, while everything possible is done by the companies to "coddle," and, as it were, entrap the man who travels once in a blue moon, nothing whatever is done to help the passenger who, like themselves, is compelled to travel all the time. Of course, we have to remember that against this there is the week-end ticket, which carries a "commercial" cheap at week-ends. There are also other advantages, such as the "luggage forwarding tickets," "the left luggage abatement ticket," which, however, the great army of "commercial" regard as wholly inadequate concessions to the vast constituency of which they are members.

Commercial travellers have other grievances. The combinations of big businesses, the amalgamations of competing firms, and the formation of cartels—all these are infringing on their ground. And the result is that the genuine "commercial" is faced with the competition of something like a new by-product of his own efforts—a traveller, who is given a certain limited range of country, and who must report to his superiors at the end of every day. Then, again, there is the agreement question. A traveller will often find himself compelled, under the terms and articles he has signed, to surrender a whole stretch of territory that he has opened up. What does this mean? Merely that the particular ambassador of commerce, who has helped, let us say, to develop "No-mans-woth" into a thriving trading centre, must be content to hand it over to anyone who chances to come along. Once he has opened the district, and his firm chooses to engage someone else to develop it, he is powerless; he must not set foot on the sacred territory again!

That, everyone will agree, is a hardship. On the other hand, unemployment troubles the traveller but little. "If he can do the work," said an authority to me, "he is always sure of a job." Sometimes his remuneration, as in the case of the soft goods trade and of certain specialised work—engineering, for instance—will mount as high as £1,500 a year—reminiscent of the old time, when the "commercial" still cut a great figure on the road.

That is not the only survival of old times. Even now the ancient functions and ceremonies survive. No commercial traveller would dare to sit down to the "commercial's" dinner without first requesting permission. "May I join you, Mr. President?" he asks, to which the response is, of course: "I shall be delighted, sir." And when the glasses are charged after the dinner it is customary to have "Your health, Mr. President," "Your health, Mr. Vice," pass round the table.

The Commercial Travellers' Benefit Society, the splendid schools for the orphan children of their comrades at Pinner, the United Kingdom Commercial Travellers' Association—all these attest to that camaraderie which the true traveller surely never forgets. "To travel hopefully," says R. L. S., "is better than to arrive. And the real success is to labour." Whoever else has forgotten that sombre but eloquent expression, it is not "the commercial." In his associations, in his benefit and benevolent societies, he remembers and provides for the comrade who has fallen by the way, and so he is able to go about the day's business with an unruffled front.

THE LITERARY SIDE OF SATANISM

IF you were to tell the ordinary "man-in-the-street" (a being, by the way, who is usually very much maligned) that the cult of Satanism was rife in London, he would most probably not understand in the least to what you were referring. Even if he was sufficiently enlightened to understand your meaning, he would most assuredly ridicule your assertion. Yet it is a sad, unholy fact. Devil-worship is as rife in London to-day as it was on the Continent during the Middle Ages. Indeed, in France and Italy, where it has always been carefully fostered, never quite exterminated, it is a widespread cult, in which many most prominent persons are under suspicion of being involved.

Most of us are familiar with Mrs. Hugh Fraser and Mr. J. I. Stahlmann's interesting novel, entitled "The Satanist," which gives the reader a most complete insight into the practices of devil-worship in modern Italy. But this was not the first novel of its kind, for about fifteen years ago a story, by an anonymous author, made its appearance in "Blackwood's," under the title of "Aut Diabolus aut Nihil."

The Italian poet, Carducci, but recently deceased, is famous (should I not say infamous?) throughout Christendom as the author of "A Hymn to Satan":

"Hail, O Satan! Hail, Rebellion!
Thou the avenging Force of Reason!
To thee the sacred incense of the prayers arise, Thou who hast conquered the Jehovah of the priest," is a typical excerpt, translated from the Italian. Very few realise that there is a statue to the memory of this Satanist in Rome to-day—and Rome is the centre of Christianity.

Father Chandlery, the Jesuit author of "Pilgrim Walks in Rome," points out that the revolution of 1870 gave unbridled license to the swarms of embryo Satanists, who entered the Eternal City under Garibaldi's protection. Hosts were stolen, and Satanist rites performed without any secrecy or interference. No wonder these devil-worshippers would like to see a statue of Carducci in their midst. It is a matter of a short time only before we shall see a statue to the Evil One himself in Rome, if the present régime continues, and if current tendencies are not checked.

The Ambrosian Library at Milan provides the most fruitful orchard for the student of Satanism, where ancient mediæval scrolls, "De operatione dæmonum," or "De diaboli servitaribus," etc., are to be found, which give one some slight idea of the nightmare rites that were in practice amongst the followers of Satan during the Middle Ages. The Black Mass, one notices, is not referred to as a novelty, so that one may form the opinion that this horror is nearly as old as Christianity itself. Görres, in his "Mystique Divine, Naturelle, et Diabolique," attempts the impossible feat of "explaining" Satanism. "Often the consent of the will to sin produces a certain intimacy between man and the devil," he says, and this leads eventually to Satanism.

The French Revolution afforded an additional stimulus to Satanism, and innumerable pamphlets were published at the time, relating to Satanist societies, but most of these have been lost. More than a century after the Revolution, a writer in Le Siècle, while exulting over the shrines of Lucifer in Paris, went so far as to assert that "what this age chiefly needs is to get rid of Christ," and that there are Satanists among us in London to-day we cannot possibly doubt.

BERNARD HAMILTON.

THE PRICE * * * BY C. B. PURDOM

I.

A RATHER clever novel was published some months ago, in which what the author called the Puritanical social reform of our times was mercilessly and wittily satirised. To-day all of us who are social reformers are busy doing things, or trying to do things, or talking about doing things for other people, wishing to make their lives easier, endeavouring to give them what will do them good. We want to abolish poverty, to destroy slums, to control the feeble-minded, to provide doctors for the sick, and to prevent the breeding of inferior types. We want to make everybody clean, and healthy, and wealthy, and wise. We want to get rid of all those things in our society which shock our finer feelings. We do not like dirt, or disease, or lunacy, or drunkenness, or prostitution, or gambling, or starving children. We do not like unemployment or strikes. We want everybody to be content, we want everyone to be efficient. And by "we" I don't mean Socialists or Radicals; I mean every decent man and woman.

All of this is very good. And all of this can be obtained. In the book I have mentioned everyone was well-paid, sober, industrious, religious, well-housed, and adequately provided for in every possible way. They were all educated, improved in mind and body, and efficient. All that we so much desire for the mass of men they had. And it was not an ideal state which was pictured. It was something that could easily happen to-morrow. It was something that already exists in embryo to-day.

The people in the book had everything we want, and all that is offensive in our cities was wiped out; but amidst their plenty they lacked two things: they lacked freedom and they lacked joy.

II.

If we take account of the condition of men at the present time we cannot but be conscious that joy is ebbing from life. There is not a popular movement in our day that possesses the vitality of the movements of thirty years ago. The Women's Suffrage movement is the only one that has any vigour, and that is hardly a popular movement. Every other movement is as good as dead. People have lost interest in politics, in reform, in revolution. They do not care. They have no joy. It is the same with religion. Everywhere the Churches are losing ground. People are indifferent to God. With sport it is the same. Men have lost heart. They no longer play. In the theatre, in art, in the public-house even, the signs are exactly the same. The pleasures of life are losing their bright colour, and greyness is settling upon them.

III.

All of this is taking place in a society which is doing more and more for the benefit of men, adding more and more to their comfort and security. We are improving their houses—witness Mr. John Burns's new model cottage; we are insuring them against sickness, we give them old-age pensions, we find them work, we support some of them in times of unemployment, we feed their children and inspect them from the day they are born, we flog the white slave trader.

And we are ready to do a great deal more. We will fix a minimum wage; force everyone to work; inspect the people in their houses day and night; build model factories for their employment; control their food and drink; regulate the number of their children; and protect them always against themselves.

IV.

The truth of the matter is that we have to pay the price for all that we buy, and make others pay the price for all we give them. We can get rid of all the evils of our time. Mr. Sidney Webb says so; the Socialists say so; the millionaires say so. All the desirable things of life can be got. We need no longer have beggars in the streets, outcasts on the Embankment, or children dying of hunger. We need endure no longer the sight of the bitter misery that the nineteenth century wove. In this twentieth century we can do other than what our fathers did; we are neither so callous nor so helpless as they. We can turn the happiness of the old time into content. We can do these things—but at a price; we cannot (of course) do them for nothing. We cannot make free gifts to the poor. The price we ask is a little thing—a little, poor, trifling thing. They will hardly know they have paid it. It is only their liberty. Let them give us that, and we will give them everything. And if, when they have everything, they find that when they gave away liberty joy went with her—well, what is that to us?

May we not, however, ask ourselves: Is it worth it? If the removal of the ugly blots on our civilisation means the destruction of man, is that removal worth while? For certainly the loss of liberty and joy is the loss of the soul, and without a soul even a man with a full belly is not a living man. Were we not warned against this temptation when it was said: "What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world. . .?" Is it, then, not time for those of us who value the soul above everything, for those of us who value liberty which makes men more than dogs, to see where our social improvement is taking us? Mr. Belloc is raising his voice to warn us. The author of "The Man who Would Not be King" (that is the title of the novel to which I referred at the beginning; why should the reader not know it?), though in rather harsher tones, utters the same warning. We are slipping on easy ways, which will bring us to the end of freedom and the end of joy. In our desire to see the abolition of poverty and physical distress we are careless about the most precious things that man has won. We are forcing the poor to pay too big a price.

V.

The reason that we are careless about the soul, or think that, once bread and meat are in the belly, the soul, if lost, can be won back again, is that we have departed from the first principles on which, and on which alone, the soul is held to be of supreme value. We have given up the ancient religion and taken up with modern inventions. The modern religions have no first principles, or, rather, they have a host of first principles out of which you take your choice. The old certainty that religion had is gone from all the Churches but one. I am not a Roman Catholic, but I see well enough that the modern spirit has attacked and destroyed the fundamental certainty of every Church but that which has its seat in the city of the Popes. And so to-day most of us are uncertain, and rather proud of being uncertain, as to the value of the soul; and the result is that we are seeing the poor sold into bondage, we feel the chains round our own necks; but when we see the land of milk and honey and content we treat the bonds lightly, and are ready to put down the price demanded of those who enter it, and call upon others to do the like.

ARTHUR JAMES BALFOUR

STATESMAN AND SCHOLAR

IN January, 1882—some five years, that is, before he rose to fame as Irish Secretary—Mr. A. J. Balfour, in reviewing Morley's "Life of Cobden" for the Nineteenth Century, declared that the great Free Trade leader "must be looked on rather as a political missionary than as a statesman, as an agitator rather than as an administrator." To whatever party we may belong, our opinion of Mr. Balfour must be the very reverse of his estimate of Cobden. He must be regarded as a statesman rather than as a political missionary, as an administrator rather than as an agitator. That is his title to greatness in the history of British politics. At the same time it is the explanation of the fact that it is infinitely easier to recognise the greatness of the man than to point out the greatness of his achievement. Mr. Balfour has none of that glowing enthusiasm which is an indispensable part of the equipment of the successful missionary. He has too much native caution, too studied a self-command, to make a convincing agitator. And so, while as a Parliamentarian he towers head and shoulders over men like Mr. Joseph Chamberlain or Mr. Lloyd George, he might have left a much deeper mark upon his times had he inherited something in their temperament which is entirely lacking in his own.

A fine example of the best type of Scot, improved by an English polish, Mr. Balfour may trace his administrative capacity and his metaphysical leanings—his "high seriousness"—to the land of his birth. Like most Scots, while embracing Science, he refuses to desert the Church. Like most Scots, while loving Peace, he revels in a controversy. Like most Scots, while desiring progress, he is ever inclined to "ca' canny."

Tradition, not ambition, made Mr. Balfour a politician. He had no real inclination to enter Parliament, and hence, no doubt, his early reputation at Westminster for languor and indolence. But on his father's side he inherited the blood of Secretary Maitland of Lethington, on his mother's that of Secretary Cecil, Lord Burghley; and blood will tell. The delicate dilettante was soon to prove himself capable of sustaining a long unbroken spell of heavy "collar-work," such as would have utterly broken men of far stronger physique and much less refined nature. For forty years Mr. Balfour has been a member of Parliament. For twenty years he was leader of his party in the House of Commons. As Secretary of State for Ireland during those anxious years from 1887 onwards, and as leader of a party routed and humiliated in 1906, and split into wrangling sects by the Tariff Reform controversy, Mr. Balfour showed powers of endurance, both mental and physical, that have never been sufficiently recognised by his country or his party.

This is not the place nor the time to survey Mr. Balfour's record in office and in Opposition. Party bias and want of perspective are bound to distort our view for years to come. But, think what we may of his legislation and his administration, all must grant Mr. Balfour qualities of courage, sincerity, and patriotism to a supreme degree; and even his political foes have bestowed unstinted praise upon not a few of his accomplishments.

As Leader of the Opposition Mr. Balfour found full scope for his wonderful critical faculty, and, in politics as in philosophy, he stands out pre-eminently as a destructive rather than a constructive force—as the leading and life-long opponent of Home Rule. Of this esprit negatif no one is better aware than Mr. Balfour himself. Again and again in his philosophical and non-political writings, after demolishing one after another the schemes and systems of other people, he frankly confesses his inability to suggest an alternative. In "The Foundations of Belief," he tells us plainly he has not a philosophy of his own to propound. He only seeks "to delineate, and, if possible, to recommend, a certain attitude of mind"; and he claims "it is surely permitted to those who do not feel themselves able either to frame a fresh system of philosophy or to acknowledge the jurisdiction of any old one, candidly to confess the fact, without thereby laying themselves open to the charge of being dangerous sceptics masquerading for some sinister purpose as defenders of the faith." "Increase the number of your open questions," is Mr. Balfour's advice to rival Church denominations. The bigotry of the "unco' guid" as of the dogmatist, agnostic and scientist, he denounces with equal vigour. He finds "little satisfaction in the all-inclusive unification of the idealist systems," and he "cannot, on rational or any other grounds, accept naturalism as a creed." He is neither a warm optimist, nor a cold pessimist.

As to Mr. Balfour the political guide, and Mr. Balfour the philosopher, opinions may differ. As to Mr. Balfour the friend, there is only one voice. Mr. Balfour is one of those happy beings who, if they happen to make enemies, cannot keep them. No one can hit, no one has hit harder in the fight than he, but the wound he leaves, though deep, is always clean. His dialectic grace, his courtesy, his imperturbability may help to provoke and confound his opponents, but they engender no lasting malice. His attractive personality has won him many friends on both sides of the House, and out of it, and his innate gentlemanliness invariably retains those friends he has made, through controversies ever so long and fierce. Mr. Chamberlain, speaking from intimate knowledge, once described his old Chief's "generosity to his opponents and his chivalrous loyalty to his friends." Mr. Balfour, in fact, is, in every sense of the word, a good sportsman, a thing which never fails to appeal to the British people.

It is typical of the man that his favourite outdoor pastime is golf—that most aloof, most philosophic, most leisurely, most Scottish of all games. In like fashion, indoors, his philosophic bent has made musical æsthetics a pet hobby of Mr. Balfour, who is an accomplished musician. Add to these gifts the mind of a ripe scholar, whose culture and good taste are ever in evidence, and you have a man such as few ages and few countries can parallel.

When one thinks of what Mr. Balfour has achieved in the realms of statecraft, of philosophy, of letters, and of sport, one wonders what he might not have accomplished had he been able to give undivided attention to one or other of these fields. As it is, we may be thankful to have in our midst, and still capable of notable services to his country in so many spheres, one to whom his inveterate political adversary, the Prime Minister, has referred as "by universal consent the most distinguished member of the greatest deliberative assembly in the world"; one whom that other eminent East Lothian philosopher-statesman, Viscount Haldane, has described as "endowed with one of the finest intellects that is anywhere to be found."

"EVERYMAN" INTERVIEWS

HENRY ARTHUR JONES ON THE NEED FOR A NATIONAL DRAMA

How can we get a national drama, a drama that, suffused with a morality, broad and sane, but arresting and profound, is in close touch alike with literature and with life; that is free from the sniggering indecencies of the musical comedy and the popular farce, but that realises to the full the permanent facts of human nature; a drama that shall set high literary standards, but whose themes shall be found in the lives of the people—a drama, in fact, that shall be worthy of the race that gave the world Shakespeare and Milton, Dickens and Defoe?

These were the questions that chased themselves through my mind the other day after I had enjoyed the mental exhilaration of a two-hours' talk with Mr. Henry Arthur Jones, the author of that delightful comedy, "The Liars," and the most persistent worker for the regeneration of the drama left in our midst. Frankly, before I met Mr. Jones, the topic would have bored me. I should have dismissed its importance with a shrug. "Those of the public who like really good plays," I should have said, "can see them if they would. For those who prefer legs and tomfoolery, are there not the musical comedies? Each to his taste. What is one playgoer's meat is another's poison. Let them choose for themselves, and let us leave it to the eternal law of supply and demand, and not trouble our heads with what is not our business."

It needed, not two hours, but two minutes' talk with the author of "The Liars" to convince me that this attitude of unconcern was one of treason, high treason, not only to the drama, but to the future of the race itself. Put shortly, his view came to this. Are you content with the present type of civilisation that threatens to prevail in England? If so, you will accept the present disorganisation and confusion of thought that reigns in our drama. If not, you must work for a drama that shall be really natural.

"Is there any art," Mr. Jones asked me, "so intimately associated with our daily life as that of the drama? Surely not! There is none that touches our conduct so directly, or that moves our thoughts and feelings, or stirs our passions, or inspires our actions with a quarter of the swiftness, the directness, the momentum that we get from the theatre. Painting, music, sculpture, architecture—these are dead things compared to the dramatist's art! Consider for a moment how enormously the playwright must react upon his fellow-citizens. Just think of the type of Englishman that we are breeding nowadays by the million—think of his immediate environment, his narrow home, his grey, monotonous life. Millions of our countrymen are living dull, ugly, changeless lives; packed together in dull, ugly, drab brick boxes; often without access to pure air; with few pleasures and limited hopes, and only a sense of duty to sustain them. The great majority are toiling all day long at some uninteresting routine work—work that, so far from quickening and refining their minds, deadens them. At last the dreary grind of the day is over. The millions pour out in search of pleasure and amusement, of colour, of relaxation. They find it at the theatre. Picture them as they sit there in their thousands and tens of thousands of seats, tier upon tier, row after row, listening and laughing, watching and weeping—at what? Sometimes it may be that, happily, they are tasting the fine flavour of a great Shakespearean passage; sometimes they are sobbing over a scene of domestic pathos; sometimes they are being charmed and exhilarated and humanised by a master stroke of comedy. But, frequently, they are roaring at some stale buffoonery or leering at a ballet girl's skirts; in a word, they are being coarsened, vulgarised, dehumanised to a degree. It is only during these few hours, remember, that our population can be said to live at all. Surely it is a matter of supreme importance what it is that they see and what they admire. Let me put it in another way. It is written that 'Where there is no vision, the people perisheth'; and if we are to inflame these inarticulate millions with a real enthusiasm for great national ideals, if we are to interest them in the things that really matter, the things of the spirit and the intellect, to sweeten their manners, to refine their lives, what hours for such a purpose are so precious, so rich in possibilities as those during which the great majority of our fellow-citizens escape from mechanical and uninspiring labour, and allow their souls free play?"

"But, Mr. Jones, herein surely the patient must minister unto himself. There is nothing under heaven to prevent all these thousands of playgoers going to see good plays if they really want to."

"No, but the point is this. At present we do not take our drama seriously. Nine out of ten of the present generation of theatre-goers look upon the theatre as a funny place, where funny people do funny things, intermixed with songs and dances. The great masses of English playgoers have largely lost all sense that the drama is the art of representing life; that there is a keen and high pleasure to be got out of it at that level. They chiefly demand thoughtless entertainment, whose one purpose is not to show the people their lives, but to afford some escape from them."

"Of course, this reacts enormously on both actors and playwrights?"

"Especially on the actors. Many are woefully deficient in the technique of their art; some are barely acquainted with the rudiments of elocution. Sir William Gilbert once told me that we had not half a dozen actors and actresses who can effectively and arrestingly deliver a speech of thirty lines. And can we wonder? When I first came to London, and worked in an old warehouse off Friday Street, some of us young fellows went, night after night, to hear Phelps give us his wonderful Shakespearean impersonations. More, we compared the rendering of separate passages by different actors. Do you think our successors are thus delighting themselves? I'm afraid not. You are a great deal more likely to find them at a revue. And, of course, this downward tendency affects the playwright also. It sometimes is forgotten in these days that a dramatic author is conditioned in his choice and treatment of themes by the possibility of getting them adequately played and staged. Remember, when a play is wrongly or inadequately played, and therefore fails, it is always the author who is held to blame."

"But that must always be the case, must it not?"

"No. The first step towards a national drama is to alter this state of affairs. Remember, first of all, that the author is not always to blame. 'Hamlet,' 'Othello,' 'The Winter's Tale,' to say nothing of dozens of modern plays, have met sometimes with enormous success, sometimes with abject failure, according to the circumstances of the individual production. There are all sorts of accidents which may determine the success or failure of a first night. It is an old saying of mine that a full house means a good play; an empty house makes a bad play. Empty seats are fatal to enthusiasm and to the actor. After one of my first nights, Sir Charles Wyndham said to me, 'The applause was like a wall. We all leant against it.' But supposing it had not been so well or so suitably played, or that for some other reason there had been no one there to applaud? Clearly, if playwrights are to do their best work, with faith that it will be received in the same spirit, they should, so far as possible, be protected against the infinite caprices of production."

"But how?"

"First by encouraging that system of publishing plays which has always prevailed in France, and which is at once the cause and the effect of their possessing a drama which is also literature. Consider the advantages of this course. It will set a standard. There is still a great demand on our stage for ideas. But there is no demand for literature. How many playgoers on a first night watch to see if the dialogue that delights them has any permanent quality in it? Again, the greater the play, the more defects it is likely to have. One could pick innumerable holes in 'Œdipus' or 'Hamlet.' How much better for the critic not to have to rely on the blurred impressions of a great play, which he must clarify and record in one short hour, but to have the opportunity of studying it at leisure before it is produced. Not only will this give that element of permanence to our plays that is so lacking, but it will react enormously on audiences. The publication of a play would help an author to find his public, and it would help that public to find themselves. There is an immense section of playgoers, or potential playgoers, who to-day neglect the drama simply because of the shoddy that has crept into its texture. If these can be got to take it seriously, we shall have advanced perceptibly towards that national drama which can do so much for England."

"But this new, or, rather, renovated, public, will it not need new dramatic foci?"

"I think so. That is why, for a certain class of play, I strongly favour the small theatre—the theatre where a specially trained, cultivated, sympathetic audience can give really serious plays a chance. Shakespeare will always demand a large theatre. But for much of our serious modern work a small theatre is more suitable. The day of the little theatre is on us. In New York there is a cosy, jewelled chapel for intellectual drama. In London several little theatres are achieving steady successes. These little theatres have an immense future and real significance. They will tend to rescue sterling plays from obscurity, and to restore the drama to the people by making it really national; for, depend upon it, good plays create an atmosphere in which the dramatic trash cannot live. They drive out bad plays even as good money drives out bad."

C. SHERIDAN JONES.

WHAT'S anybody's fame? Even Shakespeare's, if one thinks of it? A century or two of growing renown; a babble of confused criticism; a buzz of ignorant worship and applause; a tramp of Americans to his birthplace; a hash of his scenes, and a murder of his musical iambs by unversed actors; then, ten or fifteen thousand years of fading mention; a withering memory; a mere name; an echo fainter, and yet fainter. . . .—From Andrew Cutler, in "The Divine Gift," by Henry Arthur Jones.

EDUCATION AND THE WORKING MAN

By CYRIL E. ROBERTS.

AT a meeting recently held in connection with the Workers' Educational Association, a prominent member of the Parliamentary Labour Party remarked on the difficulty he had experienced as a boy in comprehending the meaning of the hackneyed proverb which states that "there is no royal road to learning." He went on to describe the consternation created among the well-meaning adherents of this belief by his contention, uncompromisingly shouted from the audience at an educational orgy some thirty years ago, that though there may be no royal road to learning itself, there is certainly a right royal road open to the more fortunate members of the community towards its acquisition. The idea, he said, seemed to strike the organisers of the meeting as quite a novel point of view.

Yet there are means whereby the niggardliness of Fortune may be to some extent remedied. An instructive article, published a short time ago, showed the use which working men may make of books, a matter which becomes easier day by day, and of which increased advantage is being taken, despite the enormous self-denial which evening study demands from the man who has worked hard with his hands all day.

There can presumably be no room for two opinions in these days as to the desirability of education for all, unless we are to take seriously the maunderings of a few reactionary fanatics. The working man himself is rapidly losing that suspicion of his more cultured fellow-being which was once so powerful, and is anxious to gain, both for himself and his children, those benefits which he missed in his youth—benefits of which he realises the importance, even as John Bright and other self-made men realised it, in an age when they could be purchased only by unaided and untold exertions. The sneers which we still hear levelled at the man of culture by "hard-headed business men," who know him for a babe and a fool in the practical affairs of the world, are too often justified. But the reproach, one thinks, should not be laid to the charge of learning itself, but to the fact that such learning, the toil of the individual in seclusion, is, from its unsocial character, sterile, and is thus largely wasted, both in its productiveness, and also as regards its effects on the character of the man himself.

If we ask, "What is education?" we are dealing with a problem that is as old as civilisation itself; but perhaps we shall have evolved a not unsatisfactory definition if we say that education implies the development and improvement of that which lies in a man. It is probable that such an end will be best attained by a scheme which involves a study of the humanities on what may be called a social, humanising basis. The value of books to a working man will be vastly enhanced by a system which directs the course of his reading, and at the same time brings his intellect into contact with those of others, with the result that his outlook is broadened, the problems which interest and perplex him are discussed and have new light thrown on them, and his whole intellectual being is enriched and invigorated.

It is astonishing to find how many are ignorant of the existence in their midst of a Society which endeavours to fulfil this purpose—I mean the idea of study, carried on by working people in their leisure hours, on a system that is co-operative and social in the truest sense. That Society is the Workers' Educational Association, the scope and influence of which is increasing yearly by leaps and bounds, falsifying the gloomy fears of those who held that the working man could not be expected to devote himself after the day's labour to aught but sleep and unprofitable amusement. When we consider the remarkable growth in numbers—one branch of seventy has in three years increased its membership to eight hundred, and this is only a haphazard instance—at the same time remembering the self-denial and enthusiasm which study under these conditions calls for, we are bound to admit that the driving power behind such a movement contains the very essence of vitality and determination.

And here we may note wherein the principles which control the movement differ from those which guided the sponsors of the theory of education launched in mid-Victorian days. For that dogma of the 'seventies—"the greatest efficiency of the greatest number"—they substitute the doctrine of "the highest development of everyone"; a lofty ideal, we may say, but the only one possible if in education lies the salvation of the democracy as a whole.

The function of education is conceivably twofold. In the first place its purpose is obviously to increase the efficiency of a man as a wage-earning unit, to help him to earn his daily bread. The capacity to earn a livelihood is the first essential of existence. But it is with the second function of education that the Workers' Educational Association concerns itself. To quote the words of the Oxford Report on Education and the Workers, the aim of such efforts is to provide "not a livelihood, but a living"; in other words, to ensure an opportunity for all to achieve some measure of intellectual culture, quite apart from the materialistic value which education, in the sense of technical training, may possess.

Opponents of the scheme are, of course, to be found in plenty. The criticism most often in their mouths is that "it makes a man a traitor to his class," a criticism born of an innate suspicion and distrust of education. But the movement draws its inspiration from the industrial element of the community: it is no "new dodge of the capitalist classes for the further enslavement of the workers." The principles which guide it are not identical with the spirit which drives the needy shepherd or the struggling mechanic to pinch and starve in order that his son may achieve the parson's hood or the medical diploma, and thus become a "gentleman." Far from seeking to remove a man from his class, the direct aim of the Association is to ensure that he shall remain within it. Reaction on environment is its one great objective; so that in the factory, the office, and the workshop, the influence of education may permeate all things, and tend towards the uplifting of the whole strata of society. Thus it will be seen that this idea of culture is no vague, impalpable creation of a few faddists, but a living-force, exercising enormous influence, and possessing infinite possibilities of development.

In addition to the recognised methods of kindred organisations, such as courses of lectures, excursions to the museums and historical monuments of the district, and a systematised programme of study, the Association carries on its work through the medium of tutorial classes, which are worked on the following lines: each class consists of thirty members, the only qualification being that each one of them must be earning his own living. The attendance of others interested in the work of the Association is secured by a system of honorary membership, but the number of such is wisely regulated, since it is felt that a membership of thirty is most convenient, both from the point of view of management, and from that of social intercourse. Where each one knows everyone else, he is not afraid to hear his own voice raised either in argument or interrogation.

Each week there is a lecture of an hour's duration, followed by an hour devoted to questions and debate on the subject of the previous week. In this way the lecturer is kept "human," and is made to realise that he is after all a very fallible being—a difficult matter to keep in mind at the lecture desk—and at the same time incalculable benefit is derived from the free play of intellect and the propounding and elucidation of problems among the members of the class. A still more interesting experiment, and one which we may shortly expect to see developed on a large scale, is that carried out in some districts. This takes the form of occasional week-ends in the country. Those members of the class who can manage it—and remember they are all working men—walk or take train some few miles out from their industrial centre, and, having previously engaged rooms at some farmhouse, spend the week-end in the reading and discussion of papers, and the debating of subjects previously arranged. Long walks are also a feature of such excursions, and the evening is generally devoted to a "sing-song," or some such jollification. Certain eminent men of intellect, who have been persuaded to lend their presence on these occasions, have been amazed and delighted at the success of the experiment, and have given the movement their heartiest support. I am assured by those who have taken part in these gatherings that the results far exceeded their wildest hopes.

There is, even nowadays, an amazing number of people who persistently shut their eyes to the fact of democracy. The armchair politician may discourse learnedly of Aristotelian theories of Government, and apply them—in his home—to present-day problems. But whether he likes it or not, he must realise in what portion of the community the political power of these days rests. In the guiding principles of the Workers' Educational Association lie the forces capable of imparting to the rising power of democracy that sense of responsibility through which alone true government by the people for the people can become an accomplished fact. If it succeeds merely in abolishing some part of the tyranny of words and phrases in which our political life lies enthralled, its existence will have been more than justified. "I had rather," said the same sturdy Labour member to whom I have already referred, "I had rather be followed by twenty intelligent men than by twenty thousand who are drawn by the short-lived fascination of name and personality." And I can quite believe that he meant it.

THE sun is set, the swallows are asleep;
The bats are flitting fast in the grey air;
The slow, soft toads out of damp corners creep,
And evening's breath, wandering here and there
Over the quivering surface of the stream,
Wakes not one ripple from its summer dream.

There is no dew on the dry grass to-night,
Nor damp within the shadow of the trees;
The wind is intermitting, dry and light;
And in the inconstant motion of the breeze
The dust and straws are driven up and down,
And whirled about the pavement of the town.

PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY.

THE LETTERS OF CHARLOTTE BRONTË

THE publication of Charlotte Brontë's letters to Professor Héger has revived the curiosity centring round the personality of one of the greatest of English novelists. The literary world has always been greatly exercised by Charlotte's genius. That a woman whose existence had been passed in purely domestic surroundings, whose experiences were of the type that fall to the majority of her sex, should have been able to produce a work of such amazing vividness as "Jane Eyre" gave occasion for surprise, suspicion, and much unkindly criticism.

It was, said a certain school, impossible that the daughter of a country clergyman, who had led a sheltered, almost a tame existence, could have written the scenes of passion that blaze from her pages had she not secret knowledge on which to draw. Incredible things were hinted; she was accused of holding immoral beliefs, nourishing unlawful affections. The world was staggered that a genius at once so eloquent and assured could rise from such a homely source; opinion was outraged almost that so insignificant a person could have set England ablaze with the issue of so catastrophic a novel.

The curiosity that raged round her living, on her death received an additional zest. How, when and where had she obtained her knowledge of the force of passion, her reading of human suffering, her understanding of the tragedy of the soul? Her life in Brussels formed a basis for a fierce and unscrupulous attack. She was accused of a liaison with Professor Héger, elderly, obese and obtuse, and her apologists were almost as offensive as her detractors. Rumour had it that she had written letters of a most compromising character, and the existence of these documents were cited as proof of her intrigue, the fact that they were not forthcoming merely serving to fan the flame.

And now, when at long last curiosity seemed satiated, the letters are produced, and once more discussion rages round her, and many-tongued gossip weaves fresh insinuations and innuendoes. Written from the vicarage on the edge of the moor, where the grave-stones of the dead crept right up to the walls of the house, the letters suggest the fret of genius that has not yet attained the full power of expression, the surge of an imagination that has yet to find the solace and the joy of creation.

Héger, with his Flemish stolidity, his pedagogic precision, his ponderous efforts to prune the genius of Charlotte into a prim exactitude, served as the lay figure on which to drape the cloak of romance. The very limitations of this middle-aged man served as a spur to Charlotte's imagination. Which of us has not in our first youth invested a most unlikely figure with the attributes of a Prince Charming? Charlotte, from her narrow home in the bleak parsonage, surrounded Héger with a mystery and delight that crystallised in the letters in which she poured out the longing of her heart—longing not for the Professor, but for romance—romance that at that moment was waiting her bidding. When she realised her capacity, understood that she could unlock the gates of the enchanted garden at will and enter a Paradise of her own creating—when she finally came into her kingdom what happened?

The obese Professor vanished from her perspective. The cloak of dreams fell to the ground. The lay figure became once more a creaking automaton. The photographs of Héger suggest a commonplace mediocrity. No one could suppose romance lay hidden behind that heavy chin and uninspired brow. Distance and the fret of temperament, the stirrings of a genius as yet unfledged, endowed him with the attributes of a hero—attributes that would have fled at a touch of commonsense or common courtesy on his behalf. Had Héger replied to the letters in the business-like fashion of a stolid man, Charlotte would have realised the impossibility of her model, and the episode would have been ended.

The Professor has been cited as a model of discretion and of right conduct in leaving the letters unacknowledged. The Philistine soul of the Flemish Bourgeois was incapable of facing such a situation, frightened to death of handling it. Only a very stupid man would have refrained from answering Charlotte's most impassioned appeal.

Day and night I find neither rest nor peace. If I sleep I am disturbed by tormenting dreams in which I see you, always severe, always grave, always incensed against me. Forgive me, then, Monsieur, if I adopt the course of writing to you again. How can I endure life if I make no effort to ease its sufferings? I know that you will be irritated when you read this letter. You will say once more that I am hysterical—that I have black thoughts, etc. So be it, Monsieur; I do not seek to justify myself; I submit to every sort of reproach. All I know is, that I cannot, that I will not, resign myself to lose wholly the friendship of my Master. I would rather suffer the greatest physical pain than always have my heart lacerated by smarting regrets. If my Master withdraws his friendship from me entirely, I shall be altogether without hope; if he gives me a little—just a little—I shall be satisfied—happy; I shall have reason for living on, for working. . . .

Professor Héger could have stopped the correspondence and destroyed the illusion with one letter; he preferred to ignore both the correspondence and the writer. While this course is difficult to understand, it had the merit of being logical. He chose to disregard the pitiful appeal for "friendship," but—and herein lies the gravamen of the charge against him—though he ignored the letters, he did not destroy them. The fact that at least three of them were originally torn in pieces, and were subsequently resuscitated and fastened together by means of linen thread, goes to show that the vanity of the man must have been as colossal as his lack of understanding. Had he entertained for Charlotte a touch of sentiment, had he answered her in terms of frank friendship, one could have understood the retention of the letters; to ignore the writer and to retain her appeals goes to show that he desired to preserve the proofs that a woman of transcendent genius had implored him for a word of kindness, a touch of understanding.

The publication of the letters strikes one as an offence against the best masculine traditions. A woman's letters should be held sacred by the man to whom she writes. If he desires the pleasure of reading and re-reading them he should take steps to see they do not fall into strange and alien hands. Above all, he should guard her against the risk of publication. And if this be true of a man who loves a woman, it should be even more imperative of a man who entertains no feeling for her who writes to him. The Professor not only had her letters "sewn with linen thread," but left them as a heritage to his heirs, who gave them to an expectant and voracious public.

The woman of genius and the stolid pedagogue—the gulf between the two for ever remains set. In the margin of the most eloquent, the most torrential of her appeals, he pencilled the name and address of his shoemaker.

MASTERPIECE FOR THE WEEK

CHARLOTTE BRONTË'S "VILLETTE" ❦ ❦ ❦ BY LIDDELL GEDDIE

I.

NO novel of Charlotte Brontë's has been more often, more highly praised by literary critics than "Villette"; yet it cannot be said to be the most popular of her works. And it may be that the public are wrong and the critics right in their selection of Charlotte Brontë's chef d'œuvre. Read simply as a story, without reference to the personality of its author, "Villette" is, one is inclined to think, less fascinating, less great a work than "Jane Eyre." But if you take into account the life and character of the novelist, "Villette" has a value unequalled by any other of the Brontë novels. The more interested you are in Charlotte Brontë herself, the more interested will you be in "Villette." Consequently, when any one belauds "Villette," it is hard to say how much of the praise is attributable to the book itself, and how much to the pathetic little lady who wrote it. When you have studied Charlotte Brontë's life ever so slightly, your appreciation of "Villette" as a work of art is bound to be coloured and intensified by its appeal as an autobiographical document.

II.

But the more closely a novel approximates to actual autobiography, the less claim has it to rank as fiction; and it is purely as a work of fiction that we would here regard it. To others may be left the task of re-examining "Villette" in the light of the recently published Héger letters, in quest of parallel passages and fresh conjectures. Let us try and forget that M. Paul Emanuel and Miss Lucy Snowe had any connection with M. Héger and his worshipping pupil, Charlotte Brontë; let us forget that many incidents are borrowed from the real life-story of the novelist. Let us peruse the pages of "Villette," as its first readers must have done, merely as a story, and not as a diary or book of confessions. What, then, will the verdict be? When it was published, "Villette," Mrs. Gaskell tells us, "was received with one burst of acclamation." Sixty years have come and gone since then, and the Victorian age of literature has gone with them. But "Villette" has stood the test of time, and although now, naturally enough, in some respects old-fashioned, it unquestionably retains its right to rank among the masterpieces of English fiction.

III.

The faults of "Villette" are not far to seek. In 1853, when it appeared, the three-volume novel held undisputed sway. "The Professor," of which "Villette" was a recast, had failed to find a publisher largely because it was not of three-volume compass, and in trying to give full measure, at a time when her health was bad and her spirits were low, Charlotte Brontë inevitably fell into what in these days we regard as long-windedness. Thus the door was opened for other defects, lapses of taste and judgment, for which in a shorter work there would have been less room. The only fault which Early Victorian critics seem to have found was a kind of "coarseness"—a charge which seems grotesque to twentieth-century readers, but which, no doubt, was gravely upheld in the prim and prudish 'fifties. Charlotte Brontë's treatment of love and passion, which to her contemporaries seemed indelicate in the pages of a lady writer, to us appears to err rather on the side of stilted decorum; and we are apt to forget that Charlotte Brontë was really a bold pioneer in matters of this sort.

IV.

In novels of the Brontë type undue length is apt to affect the reader more seriously than in novels of what Sir Walter Scott dubbed "the big bow-wow" style. Novelists are like steamer passengers—they belong to one or other of two classes; they either stay on deck during the passage or they retire to the saloon or their bunk. Full-blooded, hale and hearty novelists like Fielding and Scott tramp the deck, revel in the boisterous side of life, cast their eyes upon many people and distant horizons. Other novelists, like Richardson and Charlotte Brontë, promptly withdraw to the cabin, in whose seclusion and narrow precincts they study their own sensations, or watch, at close quarters, every mood and action of their neighbours. Some readers cannot stand the wind-swept deck. Some cannot tolerate the close and concentrated cabin. Most can bear its atmosphere for a time, but if the time be too prolonged, they gasp for the fresh breezes of the open deck. Happy are those who, on the good ship Fiction, can go down to the cabin or go up on deck at pleasure, without fear of feeling squeamish either above or below!

V.

The atmosphere of "Villette" at times grows decidedly sickening, but that is the penalty you generally have to pay if you wish to see a human heart laid open on the novelist's dissecting table. Only thus can you see what lies under the surface. Charlotte Brontë is never content with externals, as some story-tellers are, and in "Villette" she gives full rein to her introspective and analytical propensities. She probes deep, and we must not complain if in the process she evokes an abundance of sobs and sighs and shudders. Combined with this faculty, "Villette" reveals a remarkable visualising power and a glowing style. The words are simple, but the imagery is rich. There is a morbid tendency in almost every chapter, but so great are the gifts we have just enumerated that what is morbid and neurotic somehow becomes extraordinarily fascinating. A spell is cast over us, and we feel acutely all the weariness of spirit and body from which Charlotte Brontë's heroines, like their creator herself, never seemed able to escape. Perhaps nowhere in English literature is the utter dreariness of home-sickness and love-sickness, the oppression of loneliness and nerves and "vapours," so vividly, so powerfully, so painfully expressed as in certain chapters of "Villette"; for example, the chapter on "The Long Vacation."

VI.

One of Charlotte Brontë's most notable services to English prose fiction was her revolt against the perfect hero and the beautiful heroine of Romance. Sir Walter Scott, as no one knew better than himself, had failed to impart life to his young and handsome heroes. Charlotte Brontë, judging from Dr. John Graham in "Villette," would have succeeded little better had she made the attempt. As it was, she deliberately chose as heroes for her novels ugly men of middle age; and she partnered them for life with plain and far from faultless women. To do so required much courage; to do so with success required exceptional skill. M. Paul Emanuel is first introduced to us bluntly as "a small, dark and square man, with spectacles." His bilious temper, his jealous disposition, and a dozen other weaknesses are described in detail. Again and again Lucy Snowe tells how she turned in disgust from his ugly expression and his equally ugly temper. Then through this unpleasing exterior begin to shine rare virtues and qualities, and in time Paul Emanuel becomes Lucy's "dear little man" and a hero indeed. No greater tribute could be paid to Charlotte Brontë's genius than to say that she unerringly carries the reader with her through this surprising transition, and that in the end we instinctively take M. Paul Emanuel to our hearts, as a friend to treasure till death. It is less easy to understand M. Paul Emanuel's falling in love with Lucy Snowe, than it is to understand her falling in love with him; but the character of Lucy, if less sympathetically drawn, is nevertheless portrayed with consummate ability. Of the minor characters none is so well described as Madame Beck, in whose school Lucy Snowe taught. This is masterly portrait-painting:

"When attired, Madame Beck appeared a personage of a figure rather short and stout, yet still graceful in its own peculiar way; that is, with the grace resulting from proportion of parts. Her complexion was fresh and sanguine, not too rubicund; her eye blue and serene; her dark silk dress fitted her as a French sempstress alone can make a dress fit; she looked well, though a little bourgeoise; as bourgeoise, indeed, she was. I know not what of harmony pervaded her whole person; and yet her face offered contrast too: its features were by no means such as are usually seen in conjunction with a complexion of such blended freshness and repose, their outline was stern; her forehead was high, but narrow, it expressed capacity and some benevolence, but no expanse; nor did her peaceful yet watching eye ever know the fire which is kindled in the heart, or the softness which flows thence. Her mouth was hard, it could be a little grim; her lips were thin. For sensibility and genius, with all their tenderness and temerity, I felt somehow that Madame would be the right sort of Minos in petticoats."

VII.

And what of the plot? Well, as Miss Martineau pointed out when "Villette" first came out, the story consists mainly of falling in love, falling out of it, and then into it again. But it isn't quite so sentimental as it sounds. Most other novels tell the same sort of story, but the "love interest" is generally relieved by other happenings more or less striking. In "Villette," however, nothing else happens that is worth speaking about, and so Love monopolises the stage. Action there is very little. Even the incidents are mostly insignificant—a fête, or the receipt of a letter, or a lovers' quarrel. The scene scarcely ever changes. Out of such material only a genius could have fashioned so great and durable a story as "Villette"; and her achievement gives Charlotte Brontë a proud place, not only in English but in European literature. For in this—thanks, it may be, to her Celtic origin and her education abroad—Charlotte Brontë had a gift which is more Continental than English.

But there is one thing about the plot of "Villette" which must not be forgotten—to wit, the mystery. Not the trumpery mystery of the nun, but the mystery of the conclusion. Does "Villette" end happily? Surely not! Charlotte Brontë did not intend M. Paul Emanuel to return. To the sea she would give him, but not to Lucy Snowe. But "to leave sunny imagination's hope," she purposely wrote a conclusion to her book which may be read in two ways. Taken by itself, the last chapter is open to two interpretations; taken in conjunction with all that has gone before, there is but one interpretation. When she wrote "Villette" Charlotte Brontë's pen was dipped in gloom, an indelible gloom that not even the sunniest imagination can expunge.

LITERARY NOTES

A DELIGHTFUL "Selection from the Love Poetry of William Butler Yeats" was issued to subscribers a few days ago by the Cuala Press, Dundrum, County Dublin (subscription, 7s. 6d.). In the autumn this artistic press will publish a Volume of New Poems from the same pen (subscription, 10s. 6d.).

* * * * *

The approach of the autumn publishing season is heralded by a Special Export and Colonial Number of the Bookseller. The preliminary lists of forthcoming publications are sufficient guarantee that, as far as quantity is concerned, readers will again have no reason to complain of the supply. For overseas English readers publishers continue to make further and fuller provision, what with Empire libraries and Colonial libraries and special editions for India and the British Dominions. A propos, it would be interesting to compare the literary tastes and standards of the various parts of the Empire as represented by the volumes recording the largest sale for the year in the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, South Africa, New Zealand, and India respectively.

In view of recent events it is not surprising to learn that, "after long years," Lord Alfred Douglas has now decided to "break the silence and to give the real facts about his relations with Wilde from the period when Wilde was at the top of his fame to the time of his tragedy and death." "Oscar Wilde and Myself," by Lord Alfred Douglas (10s. 6d.), figures prominently in John Long's list, and we learn that the book "contains a serious side, inasmuch as it deals with the grave disasters this friendship has brought upon Lord Alfred. It possesses another side in the analysis of the purely literary aspect of Wilde's work; and a large number of anecdotes and sayings of Wilde are included which have never before been printed. It also gives an account of the Wilde circle, which included the most prominent persons of the period."

* * * * *

Among noteworthy translations about to appear may be noted Eucken's "Knowledge and Life" (translated by the Rev. W. Tudor Jones: Williams and Norgate, 5s.); Faguet's "Initiation into Literature" (translated by Sir Home Gordon, Bart.: Williams and Norgate, 3s. 6d.); and "Frau Bertha Garlan" (3s. 6d.), a novel by the famous Austrian writer, Arthur Schnitzler, which will form the first volume of Goschen's "Library of Translations," a series intended to introduce to English readers the work of some of the most interesting Continental masters of the novel and the short story.

* * * * *

Messrs. Constable announce that a second impression of Lord Milner's collection of speeches and addresses, "The Nation and the Empire," has already been called for. This fact, taken in conjunction with recent signs that the cult of Kipling as a poet is still very strong and widespread, would seem to show that Imperialism is not so out of fashion nowadays as some would have us believe.

* * * * *

Dickens was singularly fortunate in his illustrators, and it is difficult to dissociate his works from the familiar sketches of the original artists. In October Nisbet and Co. will bring out "Phiz and Dickens," by Edgar Browne. The volume (which will be published at 15s., 32s. for a limited edition of 175 copies, imperial 8vo.) will, needless to say, be illustrated.

THE MURDER OF HENRI IV.

BY HENRI MAZEL

I.

THE year 1610, which witnessed the assassination of Henri IV., gave promise of being an important date in the history of European civilisation, and would probably have been so but for that assassination.

Henri IV., finally triumphant over all factions, had been in undisputed possession of the throne for some fifteen years. This comparatively lengthy period he had spent in establishing his authority, in repairing the harm done to his kingdom by half a century of terrible civil wars, and at the same time paving the way for the pacification of Europe by destroying the oppressive domination of the house of Austria, which had been anything but auspicious for Christendom. Besides, the humbling of this power was not for him, as it was for his successors, a mere satisfaction of amour-propre; he had higher aims and had visions of a reorganisation of Christendom on a durable, well-balanced basis, which would respect the rights of one and all.

II.

This is not the place to recount the details of this Grand Dessein, as historians call it; and it would be still more out of place to inquire here whether, after all, it was the wise and prudent Henri IV. who nursed plans so far-reaching, or whether we are not in this matter rather the dupes of Sully, who, writing his Memoirs somewhat later, may have taken the liberty of giving his royal master credit for dreams that were in reality his (Sully's) own. One thing, however, is beyond dispute—at the moment he was assassinated Henri IV. was making ready, with a kingdom well rested and strengthened, to resume the struggle against the two monarchies of Spain and Austria, both weakened, impoverished, and in the hands of mediocre sovereigns. And, in all probability, the crisis would have been short and decisive, it would have spared Germany the horrors of the Thirty Years War, Belgium and Italy the régime of compression under which these regions languished for a couple of centuries, and it would have been salutary even for the vanquished, by allowing Spain to emerge speedily from its decadence, and Austria to repulse the Turk's attack alone and unaided, without need of a Sobieski.

III.

All these great projects depended on the existence of one man, and thus it is easy to understand why the Courts of Vienna and Madrid, so menaced, kept secretly arming hand after hand against Henri IV. This hapless King had lived all his life under the threat of the dagger. In the years preceding 1610 there had indeed been a recrudescence of conspiracies. As if he felt his death at hand, Henri IV. would fain have quitted Paris to go and put himself at the head of his army; he felt safer in the midst of his old comrades-in-arms than in this hotbed of sedition, whence might issue at any instant a Jacques Clément or a Jean Châtel. The Queen, Marie de Médicis, detained him because she wished, before his departure, to have herself crowned Regent, and very lively discussions had taken place in the royal household. "By heaven," said the King to Sully, "I shall die in this town and never leave it. They'll kill me, for I see plainly that in their danger their only remedy is my death. Ah, cursed Coronation, you'll be the death of me!"

The King, however, resigned himself to this ceremony. The Coronation was fixed for May 13th. The day after was to be a day of rest, or rather a day for the transaction of serious business. Then the fêtes were to begin—state entry of the Queen Regent into Paris, banquets and balls, and on the 19th the King was to set off to join the army. Well, the Coronation did take place on the 13th, but the following day the King was assassinated.

IV.

On the day in question Henri IV. desired to go and consult Sully, who lived at the Arsenal, near the Bastille. He started off in his coach with some courtiers and an escort of guards. To go from the Louvre to the Arsenal you had to pass through a maze of winding lanes. The Rue de Rivoli was not yet in existence, and the present Rue de la Ferronnerie, widened and straightened as it has been, affords no idea of what the old street of that name used to be. A block of carriages stopped the royal coach. The guards, losing patience, went round by side streets so as to get ahead. Then it was that a man who had followed the cortège managed to get close up to the carriage, now completely unguarded, and, taking advantage of a moment when Henri IV. was leaning towards his neighbour, the Duc d'Épernon, mounted a street post and, passing his arm through the doorway of the coach, struck the King in the side. "I am wounded," he cried. The man struck again, and his second blow reached the heart. The King murmured, "It is nothing . . ." and expired. The man had not stirred, making no attempt to escape. One of the officers drew his sword and was going to run him through, when the Duc d'Épernon gave orders that he must not be killed, and had him placed in safe custody.

V.

The assassin's name was François Ravailac. He was a big, strong fellow, with red hair and beard. He was about thirty years of age, and had lived a strange life. In turn lackey, lay-brother, schoolmaster, he had been imprisoned for debt and had long prowled about the main roads. He was the sort of man you find in anarchist circles, a bit of a scholar, glib of tongue, self-infatuated, and sticking at nothing, only with a religious fanaticism in place of the anti-religious fanaticism of his kin of the present day. He had had visions: for example, an ecstasy during which he felt the smell of sulphur, conclusive proof, he thought, of the existence of the purgatory which the Huguenots denied; and as a result he believed he could see upon his cheeks the image of Catholic hosts.

At that time Catholics and Protestants held the same views as to the right to slay a bad king. Agrippa d'Aubigné, an old Huguenot soldier, regarded the attempts on Henri IV.'s life which had occurred as punishment for his renunciation; and similarly Catholic pulpits rang with blood-thirsty incitements. The approach of a war waged upon the Catholic powers in favour of the Protestant princes raised to boiling point the rage of the old Ligueurs. At the end of the year 1609 Ravailac tried to have a word with the King; he adjured him to give him a hearing near the spot where, some months later, he was to stab him to death. Driven back by the guards, he set off for Angoulême, his birthplace, and then came back to Paris. The idea that the King was going to make war on the Pope made him mad, for, said he, "God was the Pope and the Pope was God." He had stolen a knife in an inn for the purpose of killing Henri IV. But before he could carry out his design his resolution failed him; he broke the point of his knife, and departed once more for Angoulême. An incident which took place on the road turned him back. In a suburb of Étampes he saw a picture representing a bleeding Christ, an Ecce Homo. He thought himself called on to avenge his God, made a new point to his knife on a stone, and returned to Paris. For several days he waited his opportunity. On the 14th he found it, and struck.

VI.

Did he act alone, or was he the instrument of a conspiracy? Few questions have been debated as much. According to certain historians, especially those who, like Michelet, are fond of melodramatic complications, Henri IV. was assassinated by the trio, Marie de Médicis, d'Épernon, Concini. The murderer, we are assured, was merely their instrument. When you read the glowing pages of Michelet, you can't help being convinced or shaken. These three people hated the King so, had so much to gain by his "taking off," and their friends had so heralded the blow which was to fall, that one cannot but be tempted to believe them guilty of this crime.

And yet when you study the case of the assassin, when you read his evidence, when you plumb to the bottom his poor, fanatical and brutal mind, you must needs recognise that Ravaillac was an isolé. He may have got the idea of his deed from pamphlets, from diatribes, from conversations; but no one put the weapon in his hand. When he acted, he acted alone. His very fanaticism acquits him of all suspicion of complicity. He would not have perjured himself; he would have shrunk from the thought of a sacrilegious oath. The priest who confessed him only granted him absolution on condition that he told the truth when he swore to having no accomplice, and under this threat of hell fire, of everlasting damnation, Ravaillac replied, "I accept it on that condition." The sincerity of such a man cannot be questioned.

The more so as all the other arguments adduced against these confederates are weak or worthless. One cannot really credit the tales of Madame d'Escoman and of Captain La Garde, who, in 1616 and 1619 respectively, accused d'Épernon of putting the knife in Ravaillac's hand. All their depositions were found to be false. Besides, had d'Épernon been the instigator of the crime, would he not have let Ravaillac be killed on the spot, so as to get rid of a witness so inconvenient, instead of preserving him for the torture-chamber, which might easily have drawn from him the name of his confederates?

VII.

And yet at the same time it cannot be denied that all the King's enemies knew he was going to be assassinated, and that, at Madrid as at Brussels, his death was announced to take place on a date which proved to be exact. The opening pages of the Cardinal de Richelieu's Memoirs are filled with these predictions or presentiments, which leave on the reader's mind the idea of something very different from a mere collection of chance coincidences.

Hence the explanation which an erudite scholar, Jules Loiseleur, has advanced in connection with this strange problem. All unknown to one another, two different enemies lay in wait for Henri IV. The men of the Concini and d'Épernon party, who awaited the King at the end of the Rue Ferronnerie, who had perhaps prearranged the street obstruction and withdrawn the escort, were about to fall upon the royal coach, when a solitary fanatic, an utter stranger, forestalled them. One could understand, then, the action of the Duc d'Épernon in saving the assassin, whom he recognised as not being one of his fellow-conspirators, and who, while serving his turn, acquitted him of all responsibility. This explanation is supported by a curious passage of the chronicler Mathieu, who relates that at the moment Ravaillac struck the King some eight or nine men on foot and two on horseback, who were waiting at the end of the street, slipped into the crowd and disappeared entirely. Chief President du Harlay, at the inquest on the King's death, tried to elucidate the rôle of these "persons unknown," but he failed in the attempt.

VIII.

The theory is ingenious, and finds favour with one of the most recent historians of the event, M. Léonce Pingaud (in Lavis and Rambaud's "Histoire Générale"); but none the less, to my mind at all events, it is not convincing. Such a coincidence would be amazing indeed! And these "persons unknown" are exceedingly shadowy! I wonder whether the recent works of our psycho-physiologists upon hypnosis might not authorise another and better explanation of this historical enigma. We know that not only the idea of committing a crime can be suggested to certain weak-minded people, but even the idea that they are committing it of their own accord; that they have no accomplice, and that in so acting they are obeying the voice of God alone. Now, Ravaillac is just the type of impulsive being, violent and mentally disordered, upon whom can be inculcated, either in a hypnotic state or it may even be in the waking state, the idea of a spontaneous act of vengeance. To boot, we find in the retinue of the Queen a person quite capable of having played the part of hypnotiser, Leonora Galigai, Concini's wife, the future Maréchale d'Ancre. She had a reputation for sorcery which must have been due to practices of this kind, and which, after the murder of her husband, led to her being condemned to be burned alive as a witch. When asked by what means she obtained her sway over the mind of Queen Marie de Médicis, she replied, "That of a strong mind over a weak one." She might very well have given the same answer regarding Ravaillac, had she been examined as an accomplice.

IX.

On this new hypothesis everything can easily be explained. Leonora Galigai had brought to her by one of her confederates this obscure fanatic, whom she knew to be violent, vain, and subject to hallucinations. She inoculated him with the idea of the crime, indicated the spot and the very day on which he was to strike down his victim, and then all she need do was to let the others into the secret, without the slightest fear of the murderer denouncing them, since he honestly believed his deed spontaneous. For their part, the others have only a few arrangements to make. As they are practically certain of success, their tongues wag over freely, and so it gets noised abroad that the King is to be killed about such and such a time. On the appointed day they make ready for the blow to fall, and Ravaillac has but to appear on the scene to strike home with deadly thrust, thanks to them, but all unwitting.

This theory would reconcile all historians—those who, with Michelet and Henri Martin, believe in the guilt of the Queen and her friends; those who, with Poirson and Mariéjol, believe in the spontaneity of Ravaillac's deed; and those who, with Loiseleur and Pingaud, believe in the parallel existence of two separate designs on the King's life.

PECKSNIFF ET L'HYPOCRISIE ANGLAISE

LE premier fruit de la société anglaise est l'hypocrisie. Il y mûrit au double souffle de la religion et de la morale; on sait quels sont leur popularité et leur empire au-delà du détroit. Dans un pays où il est scandaleux de rire le dimanche, où le triste puritanisme a gardé quelque chose de son ancienne animosité contre le bonheur, où les critiques qui étudient l'histoire ancienne insèrent des dissertations sur le degré de vertu de Nabuchodonosor, il est naturel que l'apparence de la moralité soit utile. C'est une monnaie qu'il faut avoir; ceux qui n'ont pas la bonne en fabriquent de la fausse, et plus l'opinion publique la déclare précieuse, plus on la contrefait. Aussi ce vice est-il anglais. M. Pecksniff ne peut pas se rencontrer en France. Ses phrases nous dégoûteraient. S'il y a chez nous une affectation, ce n'est pas celle de vertu, c'est celle de vice; pour réussir, on aurait tort d'y parler de ses principes; on aime mieux confesser ses faiblesses, et s'il y a des charlatans, ce sont des fanfarons d'immoralité. Nous avons eu jadis nos hypocrites; mais c'est lorsque la religion était populaire. Depuis Voltaire, Tartufe est impossible. On n'essaye plus d'affecter une piété qui ne trompe personne et qui ne mène à rien. L'hypocrisie vient, s'en va, et varie selon l'état des mœurs, de la religion et des esprits; aussi voyez comme l'hypocrisie de Pecksniff est conforme aux dispositions de son pays! Pecksniff ne lâche pas comme Tartufe des phrases de théologie; il s'épanche tout entier en tirades de philanthropie. Il a marché avec le siècle. Il est devenu philosophe humanitaire. Il a donné à ses filles les noms de Mercy (compassion) et Charity. Il est tendre, il est bon, il s'abandonne aux effusions de famille. Il offre innocemment en spectacle, lorsqu'on vient le voir, de charmantes scènes d'intérieur; il étale le cœur d'un père, les sentiments d'un époux, la bienveillance d'un bon maître. Les vertus de famille sont en honneur aujourd'hui; il faut s'en affubler. Jadis Orgon disait, instruit par Tartufe:

Et je verrais périr parents, enfants et femme,
Que je m'en soucierais autant que de cela.

La vertu moderne et la piété anglaise pensent autrement; il ne faut pas mépriser ce monde en vue de l'autre; il faut l'améliorer en vue de l'autre. Tartufe parlera de sa haine et de sa discipline; Pecksniff, de son confortable petit parloir, du charme de l'intimité, des beautés de la nature. Il essaiera de mettre la concorde entre les hommes. Il aura l'air d'un membre de la Société de la paix. Il développera les considérations les plus touchantes sur les bienfaits et sur les beautés de l'harmonie. Il sera impossible de l'écouter sans avoir le cœur attendri. Les hommes sont raffinés aujourd'hui, ils ont lu beaucoup de poésies élégiaques; leur sensibilité est plus vive; on ne peut pas les tromper avec la grossière impudence de Tartufe. C'est pourquoi M. Pecksniff aura des gestes de longanimité sublime, des sourires de compassion ineffable, des élans, des mouvements d'abandon, des grâces, des tendresses qui séduiront les plus difficiles et charmeront les plus délicats.

Les Anglais, dans leurs parlements, dans leurs meetings, dans leurs associations et dans leurs cérémonies publiques, ont appris la phrase oratoire, les termes abstraits, le style de l'économie politique, du journalisme et du prospectus. M. Pecksniff parlera comme un prospectus. Il en aura l'obscurité, le galimatias et l'emphase.

PECKSNIFF AND ENGLISH HYPOCRISY

THE first-fruits of English society is hypocrisy. It ripens there under the double breath of religion and morality; we know their popularity and dominion across the Channel. In a country where it is scandalous to laugh on Sunday, where the gloomy Puritan has preserved something of his old rancour against happiness, where the critics of ancient history insert dissertations on the virtue of Nebuchadnezzar, it is natural that the appearance of morality should be serviceable. It is a needful coin; those who lack good money coin bad; and the more public opinion declares it precious, the more it is counterfeited. This vice is, therefore, English. Mr. Pecksniff is not found in France. His speech would disgust Frenchmen. If they have an affectation, it is not of virtue, but of vice; if they wish to succeed, they would be wrong to speak of their principles: they prefer to confess their weaknesses; and if they have quacks, these are trumpeters of immorality. They had their hypocrites once, but it was when religion was popular. Since Voltaire, Tartuffe is impossible. Frenchmen no longer try to affect a piety which would deceive no one and lead to nothing. Hypocrisy comes and goes, varying with the state of morals, religion, and mind; see, then, how conformable that of Pecksniff is to the dispositions of his country. He does not, like Tartuffe, utter theological phrases; he expands altogether in philanthropic tirades. He has marched with the age; he has become a humanitarian philosopher. He has called his daughters Mercy and Charity. He is tender, he is kind, he gives vent to domestic effusions. He innocently exhibits, when visited, charming domestic scenes; he displays his paternal heart, marital sentiments, the kindly feeling of a good house-master. The family virtues are honoured nowadays; he must muffle himself therewith. Orgon formerly said, as instructed by Tartuffe:—

Et je verrais périr parents, enfants et femme,
Que je m'en soucierais autant que de cela.

Modern virtue and English piety think otherwise; we must not despise this world in view of the next; we must improve it. Tartuffe will speak of his hair-shirt and his discipline; Pecksniff, of his comfortable little parlour, of the charm of friendship, the beauties of nature. He will try to bring men together. He will be like a member of the Peace Society. He will develop the most touching considerations on the benefits and beauties of union among men. Men are refined nowadays, they have read much elegiac poetry; their sensibility is more active, they can no longer be deceived by the gross impudence of Tartuffe. This is why Mr. Pecksniff will use gestures of sublime long-suffering, smiles of ineffable compassion, starts, movements of recklessness, graces, tendernesses, which will seduce the most reserved, and charm the most delicate.

The English, in their Parliament, meetings, associations, public ceremonies, have learned the oratorical phraseology, the abstract terms, the style of political economy of the newspaper and the prospectus. Pecksniff will talk like a prospectus. He will possess its obscurity, its wordiness, and its emphasis.

THE CURE OF CONSUMPTION.

DR. EDWIN W. ALABONE'S TREATMENT.

After the severest tests, there can now be no doubt as to the success of the "Alabone Treatment" in the cure of Consumption. From all parts of the world reports have been received from medical men and others stating that cases of Phthisis have been permanently cured by its adoption.

In England alone thousands of sufferers only too gladly acknowledge its efficacy. Readers must bear in mind that this is not a treatment which has suddenly sprung up (like so many others only to speedily die a natural death), for Dr. Alabone has for fifty years made Consumption a special study, and it may safely be asserted that during that period a greater number of cases have passed through his hands than probably any other living physician.

Be that as it may, some thirty years ago he promulgated a system of inhalation which proved eminently successful, and from time to time came new developments, till at the present moment it can be said unhesitatingly it holds out the only hope of a real cure to the Consumptive patient. Dr. Alabone's last invention is an inhaler (which has been patented); by its use the inhalants used are received into the lungs in the form of a gaseous vapour which speedily finds its way to the actual seat of the disease, the disease thereby being dealt with locally as well as constitutionally, a fact which must commend itself to any intelligent person.

The open-air treatment which professed to do so much has proved a most ignominious failure, and not only that, but a positive menace to the life of those unfortunates who adopt it; it is generally acknowledged by leading physicians and medical officers of health, who are in the very best possible position to judge of the results, that Sanatoria are simply schools, not for the Cure of Consumption, but simply to teach Consumptives how to live when they leave these institutions. One well-known medical officer of health states "the rare and refreshing fruit" means in most cases "death."

For full results of open-air treatment we refer the reader to Dr. Alabone's pamphlet entitled "Facts Regarding the Open-air Treatment." (Price 1s., post free.)

Far different it is with the treatment under discussion, for although no infallibility is claimed, yet the results when analysed are surprising, especially when it is taken into consideration that the majority of patients who present themselves to Dr. Alabone are in a far advanced stage of the disease, they having been sent away from sanatoria to die at home. Yet in spite of this a very large percentage of these cases get perfectly well, and remain so.

The testimony from medical men is perhaps the more convincing, especially if they themselves have been the victims of Phthisis. A most remarkable case that of J. Christian, M.D., M.R.C.S., R.N., who was dismissed the service, being in Consumption. After trying other treatments from well-known specialists, he came to Dr. Alabone, when his condition was apparently hopeless with cavities in the lungs. He was perfectly restored to health, and started to practise his profession. After some months of practice he wrote the following letter :

"Sir,—I was under the professional treatment of Dr. Alabone, and during that time received the greatest benefit from it. I was placed on the retired list as 'unfit for further service owing to phthisis.' Thanks to Dr. E. W. Alabone's treatment, I have been able to resume the practice of my profession, and have now been actively engaged in practice for six months in good health.—Yours faithfully, J. CHRISTIAN, M.R.C.S., L.R.C.P. London."

Another well-known physician (Dr. C—) sent for Dr. Alabone in consultation in a case of Phthisis in its last stage; the patient had two large cavities, and Dr. C— informed Dr. Alabone it was really useless sending for him, but he did so at the urgent request of his friends. This case perfectly recovered; subsequently, Dr. C— called Dr. Alabone in consultation in many other cases, the majority of which responded to his treatment, regaining their health and remaining cured. A great point in this treatment is the permanency of the cure. Referring to these cases, Dr. C— wrote the following letter :

"SIR,—I look upon open-air treatment as it is at present carried on as a medical fad, which certainly involves great waste of valuable time (which should be utilised by a much more intelligent system of treatment for cure), and loss of money, which often can be ill-afforded by those who undergo it; besides this, it is sufficiently plain to me that it, is actually dangerous to the life of a patient.

"To expose patients with cavities in their lungs to draughts between open windows and doors in winter is, I consider, open air run mad.

"When we consider how exquisitely sensitive the mucous membrane lining the tubes surrounding the cavities in a consumptive lung must be, it appears to me the height of folly, and I might say even of cruelty, to urge the exposure of phthisical patients to such an ordeal.

"I am glad, however, that an opportunity has been given me to testify to the success which has attended Dr. Alabone's treatment of phthisis. I have seen cases of phthisis, with cavities, perfectly recover under his treatment, which does not include the possibility of danger of pneumonia or bronchitis from exposure to cold and damp air, nor does he advise the enormous excess of food which appears to be an important part of the open-air treatment.—Faithfully yours,

"A. R. C—, M.D., M.R.C.S. Eng., J.P."

A well-known medical officer of health, whose son had previously been treated by two specialists, but got rapidly worse, decided to place him under Dr. Alabone's inhalation treatment, which he did with the happiest results; he perfectly regained his health, and, after being cured for five years, married, and is still as well as ever he was. An immense number of such cases could be quoted, but these will suffice.

The same satisfactory reports are received from nurses who have been at sanatoria and seen the results of open-air treatment as contrasted with that of Dr. Alabone's.

Further cases and details will be found in "The Cure of Consumption, Asthma, Bronchitis, and Other Diseases of the Chest" (47th edition, 171st thousand), which can be obtained, post free, for 2s. 6d., from the author, EDWIN W. ALABONE, M.D.Phil., D.Sc., Ex-M.R.C.S. (Eng.), Lynton House, Highbury Quadrant, London, N.

BALZAC AND DUMAS.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Dr. Charles Sarolea's appreciative and interesting article on Honoré de Balzac has given rise, as I see in EVERYMAN'S issue of August 1st, to Mr. P. F. H.'s wish to know "why it is that the greatest (sic) of all French writers, Alexandre Dumas, is so completely forgotten by those who write about Frenchmen such as Balzac." According to Mr. P. F. H., Alexandre Dumas excelled in many branches of literature, and Dumas' "The Fencing Master" ("Le Maître d'Armes), although written by means of the help of others, should be reckoned among the literary masterpieces. As an argument in favour of Dumas collaborating with other writers, he is compared to Shakespeare, "who did not take the trouble to invent a single one of his plots."

I have made a study of a good many of Honoré de Balzac's novels, which all bear, as Dr. Charles Sarolea so well expressed it, "the imprint of his Titanic personality." It is the gigantic conception of Balzac's work which cannot fail to strike the earnest reader, and by means of which "synthèse" the author tried to write a kind of "histoire naturelle" of French society of the first part of the nineteenth century. Balzac did more; he created a new school, and his influence is still strongly felt in Zola, de Maupassant, and many others who came after him. To get an idea of what Balzac has been in French literature Mr. P. F. H. should read France, Flat, Sainte Beuve, Schérier, Taine, and so many other competent critics.

As to Dumas, he is read rather much in France, but then by people of a certain kind. Dumas wrote many and about many things, but notwithstanding the enormous amount of novels that were regularly "turned out" by his "factory," I cannot say of him that "nullum fere scribendi genus non tetigit, nullum quod tetigit non omavit." I think only the first part of what Johnson wrote about Goldsmith may be applied to Dumas. Among all his novels, from "Le Bâtard de Mauléon" down to "Le Prince des Voleurs," there are only four or five perhaps—"Le Comte de Monte Cristo," "Les Trois Mousquetaires," "La Tulipe Noire," and "Le Vicomte de Bragelonne"—which are readable, from a literary point of view. As a dramatist Dumas is at least of some importance. Yet he occupies a place only among the minor dramatists of France.

How Mr. P. F. H. can compare Dumas to Shakespeare I cannot understand. I think Shakespeare did invent all his plots, and it is in this very invention of plots that Shakespeare shows his great genius as a dramatist. If Shakespeare took some subject matter from Holinshed's chronicle or other older plays and stories, his dramatic plots are his own invention. I should advise Mr. P. F. H. to read "Shakespeare as a Dramatic Artist," by Prof. Moulton, and take "King Lear" and study Shakespeare here as a creator of plots. I suppose Mr. P. F. H. is English. I congratulate him on being able to call Shakespeare one of his national poets. Few nations have men like Shakespeare among their poets. We at least in Holland have not. Does Mr. P. F. H. really mean it—to name a man like Dumas in one breath with Shakespeare,

"The dear son of memory, the great heir of fame"?

I cannot believe it.—I am, sir, etc.,

SERB, GREEK, AND BULGAR.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I was glad to see Mr. Oscar Browning's letter on the above subject. In emphasising certain aspects of the Balkan problem, I tried to hold the balance even, and, in referring to the origin of the Bulgarians, I had in mind the account given by Professor Ivan Shishmanov (Sofia, 1900). Jiricek, in his "Geschichte der Bulgaren," lacked some of the materials available to the more modern writer, but, so far as I remember, his account does not differ in essential particulars.

When Mr. Browning says that "all who are acquainted with the Balkan Peninsula are aware that no settlement can be stable which does not assign to Bulgaria Ochrida and Monastir, which are the very centre of her national and religious life," he makes an assertion which bears little relation to ascertained fact. It would almost seem that he fails to grasp the complex nature of the case. Ochrida has belonged to Albanian, Greek, Bulgar, and Serb in turn, and it may be instructive to quote what Miss Durham thought of the situation during her visit to the place in 1904. "Everyone's claim to Ochrida is perfectly clear, but no one else will admit it. Greek and Serb lost no time in assuring me that sooner than be handed over to Bulgarian rule they would remain Turk. The Greeks, if they could not have the land themselves, would prefer it to be Servian, and the Serbs similarly made no objection to the Greeks. 'I teach the children to be Servian patriots,' said the active little Servian schoolmaster to me; 'their parents are Serb, and they wish their children also to be Serb, but unluckily this is only an elementary school. Those who cannot afford to go elsewhere to finish their education must finish in the Bulgarian school, and there they will be taught they are Bulgars. It is very sad.' 'How many children did they tell you were Servian in that school?' asked Petrov, a Bulgarian patriot, and he laughed derisively. 'All but the schoolmaster's children are Bulgar,' he said. . . . I was unlucky everywhere in the types of 'Bulgarian patriots' I met. They quite decided me that if Ochrida were mine to give away, they would be the very last people upon whom I would bestow it." ("The Burden of the Balkans." Arnold. London, 1905.)

Monastir is in the same category as Ochrida, but as the whole subject is eminently unsuitable for discussion in the pages of EVERYMAN, I must refer those interested to a brochure by Professor Cvijic, where the matter is competently dealt with. ("Remarks on the Ethnography of the Macedonian Slavs." Horace Cox. London, 1906.)—I am, sir, etc.,

ANONYMOUS JOURNALISM.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Dr. Charles Sarolea's article on the decline of the journalist's influence owing to the adoption of anonymity by the Press raises a question of much interest both to journalists and to the newspaper reader. The unsigned article is not satisfactory from any point of view. If an article is above the average, the reader is interested in the writer, and would like to know who the writer is. On the other hand, anonymity tends to encourage an irresponsible method of dealing with even the most important subjects. It destroys individuality, and it makes the journalist subservient to the policy of the paper for which he is writing. Signed articles would create among news-

"'Horace Walpole's World' is a charming book. Miss Greenwood, who has already placed us in her debt by her volume on the 'Hanoverian Queens,' has written a record of eighteenth-century society in England which is quite fascinating, and which, so far as its principal hero is concerned, goes far to redeem a character much maligned by the strictures of Macaulay."—Mr. W. paper men a greater sense of responsibility, and they would raise the tone of the daily and weekly Press.

If contributions were signed it would not be possible for a journalist to be the leader writer for both Conservative and Liberal papers. Nor could he always be ready to write whatever the policy of the paper might demand. This is the practical objection, I suppose, to Dr. Sarolea's proposal.

It is often argued that the journalist is, like a lawyer, ready to take up the defence of any cause or party so long as he is paid to do so. But if this is true, then the journalist is a mere hack; he exists to "write up" the opinions and the prejudices of other people for so much a time. Such a conception of the work of a journalist is a very low one, and so long as anonymity is the rule, this view of journalism will prevail.

It does not require much ability to "dish up" in readable form the opinions or the policy of a party, but it does require some ability and originality to attractively express your own view of some public question or event. This requires personal study as well as literary ability. This calls for just those qualities that are destroyed by anonymity. A journalist, if he is to be a force in the country—a maker of public opinion—must be free to think for himself; he must be something more than a mere newspaper echo of party cries. He ought to be capable, not only of giving an accurate account of things, but of giving the reader a distinct point of view, concerning the things he describes.

At present the articles that are signed are usually those contributed by writers on special subjects. These special articles appear to be increasing in the newspapers. I have found these to be more acceptable to the reader than the unsigned article. The up-to-date paper, while retaining its party policy in its leading articles, is becoming more disposed to accept articles that are quite opposite to its policy. In such cases it is customary for the articles to be signed.

A further objection to anonymity is that it deprives the journalist of the recognition and reward to which he is justly entitled.—I am, sir, etc.,

THE CURSE OF USURY.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—The statement of E. Bardsley in your issue of July 18th that the New York Loan Company charges five per cent. per month on loans should not go unchallenged, although it is manifestly absurd. I know that the laws of the State of New York allow pawnbrokers to charge three per cent. per month for the first six months, and two per cent. per month thereafter, and no more. I know further that the Provident Loan Association of New York charges only one per cent. per month on loans. If a loan is made by this company and the borrower repays it within two weeks, he is charged only one-half of one per cent. for that time. No fees are charged. This company makes small loans as well as large, but it does not make advances on feather beds.—I am, sir, etc.,

NEW YORKER,

Bad Neundorf, Germany, August 1st, 1913.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Whilst idling in Norwich a few years ago I strolled into a sale-room and witnessed a public (sic) auction sale of unredeemed pledges. The room was empty but for a compact group of men in the centre.

Clambering upon a high stool, I saw this group consisted of pawnbrokers, with the auctioneer securely entrenched in their middle. The procedure appeared to be thus: As each lot of pledges came up the broker interested in that particular parcel took his place by the side of the auctioneer, carrying in his hand a book—presumably containing the amounts lent upon the pledges—to which he referred when the auctioneer asked if he should knock the article down. A piece of jewellery would come up, pass rapidly from hand to hand of the group, accompanied with "Do you want it, Bill?" or, "Is it any good to you, 'Arry?" There would be a laconic bid, and in a few seconds the article had been knocked down.

If the publicity of this auction is typical, then I join with your correspondent "Dolly" when she says, "Let these public sales be watched."—I am, sir, etc.,

"EVERYMAN" AND G. K. CHESTERTON.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—One is provoked to write these few lines partly from a sense of the injustice of your correspondent "E. H.'s" method of objection, but most of all because one owes to Mr. Chesterton a long-accumulated debt of gratitude for the very many delightful hours spent in the company of his thoughts. Many a time and oft have we watched hungrily for the Saturday's Daily News, and after voraciously devouring what fare G. K. C. was pleased to provide, we have packed away to the moors, there (if the figure will pass) to chew the cud of the essay amid the heather and the solitude of Dartmoor. And what treats he used to give us in those days! Sometimes the matter was rather tough, for Mr. Chesterton is a logician of no mean order. Of the paradoxical method, so useful in stirring the slow-moving mind of the average Anglo-Saxon, he is a past-master, and many cannot forgive him on that account. That type of mind known as the "practical" cannot away with him. Such folk become confused and irritated by those exercises of mental gymnastics in which he so frequently indulges. Again, they cannot follow the ambitious flight of his imagination, for, like all the poets, Mr. Chesterton is a visionary, a seer. But above all, G. K. C. is a democrat, and if the spirit which pervades all his work is found to be in conflict with the aims and ideals of the Reform Club, so much the worse for that club.

EVERYMAN is a hero-worshipper, and in our own gallery of heroes G. K. Chesterton sits "crowned with vocal reeds."—I am, sir, etc.,

MARCUS AURELIUS.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—The article on Marcus Aurelius by Professor Phillimore, in a recent issue of EVERYMAN, seemed to me coloured with prejudice. The Emperor had learned the hard lesson "know thyself," and "to himself" very appropriately he addresses these "thoughts," "meditations," or what you will, which occur, indeed, unrecorded in that eternal colloquy of every serious thinking man with and within himself. He naturally begins with a consideration of what he owes to heredity and environment, but there is nothing namby-pamby, as your contributor suggests, in his references to his parents and relations. Nor does he show any smug satisfaction with himself. Montaigne sets out in his "Essays" to depict himself, the whole of himself, and slurs over nothing. Samuel Pepys confides to a shorthand of his own a very real revelation of the man he must have been. And so with John Wesley and John Woolman; we have no reasonable grounds for doubting their sincerity in what they wrote down from time to time on the subject of "themselves."

It may be that the tendency of the "Protestant experiment in the north of Europe" may be towards the stoicism of Epictetus and Marcus Aurelius, and to take the form of an intense individualism. Those who detest Protestantism will naturally detest this extreme development of its central principle. If Thomas à Kempis speaks with authority, it is the authority of the Catholic Church to which he bows, even when chronicling his soul in retreat. For the modern stoic there is no such authority. In default he is not without recompense; he retires to that mystic chamber where he is "alone with The Alone"—and the door is shut.—I am, sir, etc., J. M. KELLEY.

THE MAN ON THE IRON LINES.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Having read the article, "The Man on the Iron Lines," by Mr. C. Sheridan Jones, in your current issue, I regret to find that the writer does not offer any solution. The workers believe in Nationalisation. This, to my mind, is both unnecessary and undesirable. The first and principal obstacle is what you rightly call "dead capital." This should be weeded out, and should have been cancelled long ago. In my opinion, a Government auditor should be appointed, whether individual, firm, committee, or otherwise, to locate the dead capital, and the companies be compelled to liquidate this by gradual payments out of revenue, be the amortisation large or small. This having definitely been settled by Act of Parliament, the workers come next. In my humble opinion, they should always come first. As in the Civil Service, they should be treated as human beings, and not be subject to dismissal. Let their wages and hours be reasonable, and to this end I see no possible objection to meeting the unions, as there should be no necessity of beating them down, but really seeking a bona-fide, amicable arrangement, based on a minimum wage. At present human beings (workers) are treated worse than "material," which is subject to the law of supply and demand. Things having now been got down to bed-rock, the returns must be made to pay a reasonable dividend—not based on "sweat," but on honest business—and then the directors will be worth their fees, which they are not now.

Unless some such means as I suggest is adopted—and you will see I do not sacrifice anyone—there will and must be endless strikes, unrest, and unhappiness in all ranks. If things were thus put on a business footing, there is not one of us of the public who would not pay our quota in extra charges so that the dividend—to be agreed upon, if you like, with the Government—is assured.—I am, sir, etc.,

THE SUFFRAGE QUESTION.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—If women really wish to better things, the remedy is in their own hands and always has been. Intelligent people mostly limit their families. Let the working-class women refuse to have children unless the husband has £2 a week or more, according to the cost of living, and keep the family down to the wages given. Let the men see that their members of Parliament rigorously exclude all foreign labour. If these women really mean anything but a useless vote, let them teach ignorant men and women how not to breed paupers. When soldiers are wanted to protect the property of the classes, wages will rise, and not till then. The teachings of Malthus are not dead yet.—I am, sir, etc., J. S. BROWN.

 Wiveliscombe, Som.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Your correspondent, Percy E. Reinganum, is, like all anarchists, very dogmatical. The vote, no doubt, has never directly raised wages, but indirectly it has done much. For instance, had not Parliament legalised trades unions, the direct action of the coal and other strikes would have been impossible. It would be foolish to undervalue direct action, but it is supplementary to Parliamentary action. No well-informed person would deny that the law diminishes the number of murders. The various Irish Land Acts have diminished the number of murders of Irish tenants by Irish landlords. We want the same kind of murders diminished (extinguished, if possible) in the other parts of the United Kingdom. The whole of history, from the slave revolts in Greece and Rome, through the Wat Tyler rebellion, the French Jacquerie, and the peasant wars of Germany, are examples of the failures of direct action alone. The French Revolution owes its partial success to the grasp of the idea of representative government; its partial failure to its inability properly to control anarchist enemies who let in any tyranny that promised order and peace.

I see no reason why women should not take part in the government of the country, although I believe the present movement is largely controlled by reactionaries, and the militants are, in my opinion, very wicked criminals. Nevertheless, it would be unfair to condemn such a movement altogether on account of the crimes of a section, although that section is a very large one. Women will make mistakes just as men have done, and although there are different views as to the effect of women's suffrage in our Colonies, the evidence, on balance, convinces me it has been beneficial.—I am, sir, etc.,

WHITE SLAVE TRAFFIC.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I have carefully read many times Mr. A. S. Reeve's letter in your issue of 25th ult., and I scarcely think he can have realised the unspeakable horror contained in his last paragraph, where he mentions the financial earnings of street girls, whom he has "heard" boast openly of their astonishing takings. The whole tone of his sentence is distressing to the last degree, for it speaks volumes upon volumes of evidence in proof of the wickedness of "men." The demand for these girls is the only cause of their existence.

I am in a position to assure Mr. Reeve that any experienced Christian nurse or midwife is able to prove that "poverty and voluntary submission" are not by any means the only two factors at work in recruiting "white slave traffic." I personally know of a number of authenticated cases of girls losing their self-respect in perfect innocence, through nothing more than ignorance of their physical creation, and this, in more cases than Mr. Reeve is evidently aware of, is one of the primary causes of girls "taking to the streets." The greatest factor in the "white slave traffic" is not the man who for commercial gain perpetrates the "sin of the world," but the man who commits the crime for the sake of "betraying innocent blood."

Does Mr. Reeve realise that the average life of these poor creatures, in spite of "what they make," is usually not more than seven years, when once they have "taken to the streets"? What is this but slow murder, that of soul and body?

The fact of the matter is we need unending charity to both men and women who fall under this great sadness, and no one can realise this more than those who have the nursing and care of these creatures at heart, for they needed early teaching.

I believe William M. Brown's letter, also in your issue of the 25th ult., is indeed truth from beginning to end, and the sooner the Church realises the urgent call demanded of her, the sooner she will "deliver her land from error's chain."—I am, sir, etc.,

CONSTANCE GOODLIFFE,

Nottinghamshire, July 27th, 1913.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Percy E. Reinganum informs us in your issue of July 25th that "there will always be prostitution as long as men are men and women are women." We accept the fact. But let us hope that also there will always be those who raise themselves above the level of the prostitute; who are not content with the lowest or even with the average level of human conduct; who struggle towards something higher. In short, let us hope that there will always be people with ideals, people for whom the "ought to be" is higher than the "is."

I had read the article in the English Review to which your correspondent refers. It is an article which, if unchallenged, may do considerable harm to young readers. The author states—and states truly—that all men fall short of the highest standard of morality. But she concludes—and her conclusion is utterly wrong—that therefore men must be content with a lower standard. Surely the guiding principles of human conduct are to be found not in the careless indulgences of the many, but in the earnest upward strivings of the few.—I am, sir, etc.,

T. C. L.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Is it not high time that all this twaddle and small talk about the "causes" and the "cures" of immorality, i.e., "white slavery," should cease? Why not face the facts of the real cause and the real cure, and state it courageously?

The cause, then, of all this so-called "white slavery" is due to a natural physical condition. Nature must be satisfied, and, as all men are not united in the holy bonds of matrimony, the present state of affairs is called into existence. And, please, why batten on the prostitutes of the streets, as some of your correspondents do, when it is obvious to the meanest mental vision that the same state of affairs exists in every degree of society—Church, State (as witness the Divorce Court reports in the daily press), and plebeian? Nature evidently is not to be denied—nor is the argument. As a matter of solid fact, the present "law of the land" defeats its object by flying deliberately in the face of Nature. The law cannot prohibit or prevent sexual connection, and by trying to do so it has proved once more the truth of Nature recoiling on the meddler.

As to the "cure," I think we might with profit follow

France's wise step and develop it for the benefit of society by making provision for the human male, and stop this awful nightmare that stalks about our streets. We feed the starving, for we know too well what awful things are done in the name of "hunger."

The above statement of the facts of the case may be unpalatable to some of your readers, but only to those who wish to burke the facts and who deliberately live in a false relation to the whole subject.

If the "cure" above suggested is not adopted, the present "rotten" state of things will prosper, and at no far date, it seems to me, we shall be knocking at the gates of Sodom and Gomorrah!

With every best wish for the continued success of your magnificent paper. I have read it with deep interest from the first number, and it is "great," in the best and noblest sense of that word.—I am, sir, etc.,

EVOLUTION AND SCRIPTURAL DOCTRINE.
To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Your correspondent, "Un Chercheur," thinks he raises a question of great seriousness when he asks, "Can the dogma of the Redemption be upheld in the face of the theory of Evolution?" May I ask another question equally serious? Has the Evolution of the Body anything whatever to do with the Redemption of the Soul?

When our ancestors were fishes they lived in the sea. Had they elected to remain there we might have evolved into Fishmen and Mermaids; and still we might have been in need of a helping hand. I take it that the transitory form which we call Human is merely the tool with which the ego works, and its physiological characteristics are beside the question.—I am, sir, etc.,

H. HOLBY.

Holloway, N., August 1st, 1913.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—In a letter on Modern Scientific Research and the Dogma of Redemption as taught by all Christian peoples, your correspondent, "Un Chercheur," makes, I presume to say, a huge mistake—the mistake which many others make—that of imagining that the Bible is a scientific treatise. It is not; nor was it ever intended to be such.

Nor, again, do thinking Christian people presume to deny the theory of evolution. Since this theory commends itself to the majority of scientists, we cannot deny the truth contained therein.

But the writer of "Genesis" gives us what he imagines to be the true account of the Creation, and his conception in some respects is similar to those found in the mythology and legendary of other peoples.

But in spite of the theory of evolution, the doctrine of Redemption still, I think, holds true. As Mr. Allen Clarke points out in a book of his, "Science and the Soul," the word "evolution" seems to imply previous "involution"; you cannot, he says, unwind a bobbin of thread that has not been previously wound. Charles Kingsley, too, has this idea in the "Water Babies" when he speaks of the "Do-as-you-likes," through idleness, degenerating into beasts. In other words, I contend that the Creator made man perfect, and that man fell; that the allegory contained in Genesis i. is quite true, though, of course, not literally; and that man is now in the second process, namely, that of evolution. The very word redemption implies that man fell from his created state.

Christianity is not menaced by such a theory. In fact, it shows to intelligent people the value of Jesus Christ to the world—as it was when He came and as it is to-day. And even if the idea of involution be false, yet we all agree, I think, that there is much from which man needs to be redeemed, and that no one has done so much to this end as Jesus Christ.—I am, sir, etc.,

HAROLD MARSDEN.

Coppice Oldham, August 1st, 1913.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—“Un Chercheur” seems to overlook one or two points:—(1) The theory of evolution cannot be accepted as a mathematical formula of continuous progress, e.g., from fish to man. At present, it is scarcely more than a convenient basis for classification and analysis. (2) If accepted so far as to justify the conclusion that the world is, broadly speaking, on the path of progress, yet this path is strewn with failures. The most casual observation shows that nature is extravagantly cruel, that every improvement is won at the cost of something which was good. (3) No conclusions of science can prove as against the doctrine of the fall that a Beneficent Creator, unhindered by rebellion in His Creation, would have made the path of progress so fatal that a rebellion—which took place in time—is the only rational hypothesis which can account for existing chaos. (4) The dogma of redemption gives us the hope that man may enter into the kingdom of God, consecrated, perfected, entire. Evolution, without a Redeemer, only offers us the prospect of arriving as the maimed wrecks to which the world conflict reduces the strongest.—I am, sir, etc.,

AN ANTI-JACOBIN

THE publication of THE WINDHAM PAPERS (Herbert Jenkins, two volumes, 32s. net) cannot but be of the greatest value to students of the great epic of the Revolutionary Wars.

William Windham was a squire and politician of the eighteenth century, living in the full tradition of that ease and security which the English landed gentry inherited from their triumph a century before, and well equipped with that high culture which distinguished the flower of that class. Like most men of that historic type, he was, while the fixed tradition of English government remained unchallenged, more or less of a Liberal. Like so many of them, the armed appeal of the French nation against tyranny made him a Tory. His life divides itself naturally into two periods: the one of easy political success, lasting from 1782 to about 1792, and the other of stress, conflict, and enthusiasm, following upon the declaration of war against the revolution which England made in that year, and of which he was the warmest of approvers.

He was a disciple of Burke, and a far more vehement antagonist of the Revolution and its ideas than ever Pitt was: He joined Pitt's Government in 1794; but the two men never really worked smoothly together. Pitt was no crusader. He looked at the whole situation created by the French Revolution and the French War with the eyes of a politician. He trusted to diplomacy, to an excellent professional army, such as England then had, and to a great superiority at sea. He counted on these things to defeat the vast energy of the Jacobin, of which he understood nothing. He treated the new Government of France as he would have treated the Bourbons in one of the earlier quarrels of the eighteenth century.

Windham's temper was very different. He did not regard the war as one between England and France, but between that fixed society which he loved and the traditions of which he had inherited, and the Revolutionary Idea which challenged it.

The difference between the attitude of the two men comes out very strongly in Windham's continual appeals to Pitt to give effective support to the insurgent Royalists of France, and in Pitt's continual refusal to do anything effective in this direction.

To Windham the Royalists appeared to have a claim upon every atom of support that England could give them, for were they not the very martyrs of the ideas he sought to defend—the men who had defended them against the heaviest odds and at the greatest peril to themselves? To Pitt, who had no share in Windham's Royalist enthusiasm, they were at the most mere auxiliaries, and valueless auxiliaries at that—men ill trained and ill armed, incapable of military success, whose whole host, at its highest, was not worth a company of Hessian or Brunswicker Dragoons.

The friction between the two men went on intermittently until they left office together in 1800. One may guess that it was of little service to the national defence. It had been better that one or other of them had been able to carry out his policy without opposition or compromise. The resultant of Windham's assistance and Pitt's grudging and half-hearted concession was the disastrous expedition to Quiberon, which severely shook the public credit of both.

Windham returned to power when the Ministry of All the Talents was formed in 1804, but no great interest attaches to the rest of his public life up to his death in 1810.

These papers contain a number of documents and letters of the highest historical value, which no student of the period can afford to neglect. Lord Rosebery contributes an interesting estimate of Windham by way of introduction: “William Windham was the finest English gentleman of his or perhaps of all time. . . . He was a statesman, an orator, a mathematician, a scholar, and the most fascinating talker of his day.” The last-named quality may account for the fact that, of all his brilliant speeches, his effort as the successful advocate of bull-baiting has best stood the test of time. The reputation of a clever talker, who in his public life preserves a stringent independence, is apt to overload and overload his more lasting achievements, and popular tradition, like imagination, seizes ever on the most salient point. Brilliant in the galaxy which included Johnson and Burke, Pitt, Fox, and Sheridan, his memory has not survived with theirs. He stood aloof from party and the partisanship it implies, and as a consequence his fame has suffered. His oratory, says Lord Rosebery, must have been remarkable, though his voice was ineffective. But the real reputation of Windham lay in the charm of his conversation. In that vanished realm, says Lord Rosebery, he was a prince.

HOME FOR THE HOLIDAYS —AND AFTER.

I wonder if we ever shall arrive at any approximately satisfactory solution to the problems of "What to do with our Boys? and What to do with our Girls?"

At this time of the year, when the young people are home from the Schools and 'Varsities "for good," this question becomes more pressing than ever.

Of course, we have long known of the magnificent work carried on by Kensington College, but it must be admitted we had never paid a visit to the Institution in its new home in Paddington, at the corner of Gloucester Terrace and Gloucester Gardens, opened by her Grace Katharine, Duchess of Westminster.

So the other morning we went round, knowing the Director holds himself disengaged at all hours to give the advantage of his twenty-five years' experience as Head of this splendid College to all interested in the Training of the rising generation for dignified and remunerative positions in the world. We found Mr. Munford surrounded by Letter Baskets and Secretaries, Files and Reports, engrossed in his fascinating work. Busy as he was, he nevertheless gave us a most hearty welcome, and drew attention to the letters in one of the baskets, from which he allowed us to take the following extracts:—

From His GRACE THE DUKE OF —, P.C., K.T., G.C.M.G., G.C.V.O.

Dear Sir,
I return with thanks your Article, and am glad to hear so good a statement of the success of Kensington College.
Yours faithfully, etc. (Sd.) —.

From THE RIGHT HONOURABLE LORD —.

... I should like to take this opportunity of congratulating you most heartily on the success achieved by the Kensington College at the Festival of Empire.

From THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE EARL OF —.

Dear Mr. Munford,
... my Secretary ... is doing very well indeed, and I am very glad we engaged her, and I hope she will be here a long time.
Yours sincerely, etc. (Sd.) —.

From DR. A. HOLZBERG, Principal, Heidelberg College and Neuenheim College, HEIDELBERG, GERMANY.

... Allow me to take this opportunity to congratulate you heartily on the high distinction which you received at the great Festival of Empire, with which I should like to couple the hope and wish that many other honours may follow to reward you for the excellent work you are doing. . . .

I shall certainly gladly take every opportunity of recommending your Institution to any pupil of ours who may be desirous of availing himself of your assistance.

Dear MR. MUNFORD,

I hasten to tender you my most grateful thanks for your kind introduction to the Earl and Countess of X., who have engaged me as Secretary at a Salary of £240 a year. Resident.

It is a delightful post; but the College does seem to get hold of all the best things. I often tell people that anyone who has had the good fortune to be trained under your auspices may consider herself (or himself) made for life! I am sometimes asked whether you really do carry out your guarantee to obtain a satisfactory appointment for all your students, and I am only too pleased to afford them a long list of examples.

I am really very grateful to you for having helped me to this splendid appointment ("satisfactory" hardly seems adequate!), and I need not say how glad I shall always be to give my personal testimony in favour of the College whenever an opportunity occurs.

With very many thanks,
Yours very gratefully, K. B.

The walls of the Director's office were crowded with photographs of eminent personages and of past and present pupils, forming a Picture Gallery of surpassing interest. Here was a photograph of the Private Secretary to Professor Rippmann, now so much to the front in connection with the Reformed Spelling movement; the next was that of the Private Secretary to the Earl of Lytton, a great supporter of the College; again, there was the Private Secretary to Lord Ardilaun, the eminent and rich Irish Peer, brother of Lord Iveagh; photographs of secretaries to Members of Parliament; indeed, photographs of young men and young women from all parts of the globe. Occupying the place of honour over the Adams mantelpiece was a handsome silver Rose Bowl, with the following inscription:—
"1912. Presented to James Munford, Esq., Director, by Past and Present

Students, in Celebration of the 25th Anniversary of the Foundation of Kensington College."

The Diploma of Honour, a magnificent document, and the Gold Medal were, in the Director's opinion, the crowning glories of the College, for it was only after investigating the merits of the various Institutions represented at the Festival of Empire, that the Council unanimously conferred these unique distinctions on "the only Institution in the world which enters into a Binding Contract to provide for every Student, when qualified, a choice of satisfactory Appointments from which to select a Congenial Career."

Of considered legal opinion there was no lack.

Sir Samuel Evans, when Solicitor-General, speaking from the chair at the 21st Anniversary of the College, said:—"That part of the educational system of this country which is deficient in many respects from the public point of view, appears to me to be admirably done by this College."

Sir Albert Rollit, on the same occasion, stated his opinion that "The College had solved one of the greatest and the most difficult of all educational problems—that of securing employment after education."

Shortly before the close of the previous term no less than 100 applications had been received for the services of Kensington College Graduates. Of these 100 applications—so greatly were they in excess of the number of Students available—only 15 were satisfied, and 85 would-be employers had to be sent empty away. Among the 85 were many most attractive positions which the Director would have been only too happy to fill had not his stock of qualified Students been entirely exhausted.

Every Student, when qualified, has the offer of at least half a dozen appointments, from which to choose a congenial career.

So far as we know, Kensington College is certainly the only Institution pretending to give any kind of Secretarial or Commercial Training which insists on proofs of a good general education from every Candidate for admission.

There may yet be a few of our readers not so fully acquainted as they ought to be with what Lord Lytton calls "The magnificent work which this splendid College is doing." We were glad, therefore, to receive Mr. Munford's assurance that he would have pleasure in placing the advantage of his experience at the disposal of any parent or guardian desiring advice as to the choice of a career for boy or girl.

Students are now being enrolled for next Term in order of receipt of their applications.

Candidates desiring full particulars of the Training under the only Gold Medal system extant, for a variety of appointments from which to select a congenial career, should fill in and post the appended coupon ($\frac{1}{2}$ d. stamp on envelope).

charming girl, and in these days of feminine strenuousness one feels that now and again it is permissible for a heroine to exist without a purpose, and for the sole reason that she is delightful. The author seems to have lost his sense of humour; possibly the gravity of the question accounts for the absence of that comedic sense that has hitherto distinguished him. "When Journeys End" was a book one could ill spare; the swift characterisation, the occasional simple pathos, the grip of reality that marked the story made it of real account. There is little that is distinctive in Mr. Forman's latest novel. We feel regretfully that it might just as well have been written by somebody else. The militant suffragette has of late dominated our fiction, and we resent the fact that Mr. Forman has surrendered to her influence and has forsaken the atmosphere of "The Garden of Lies" for the stir and stress of a political meeting.

THE STRICTLY TRAINED MOTHER (John Murray, 3s. 6d.) is one of the most fragrant and charming books we have read for a long time. We must all of us have met and shuddered at the strenuous unmarried woman who hectors her mother in public places telling her how to eat, where to go, what to see, and what to say. Spinsters of this type belong to the strong-minded category; as a rule, they have voices that rasp, and are impressed with a sense of their own efficiency and the hopeless inferiority of their mother. Mrs. F. F. Montresor has hit off the type with amazing fidelity, at the same time putting the case for the spinster with understanding and with sympathy. "The Miss Bettertons seemed to me to have been born middle-aged, and Mrs. Betterton, in spite of white hair and invalid ways, and a knitted shawl and an ebony stick, has the look of imprisoned youth in her beautiful grey-blue eyes!" There is a third daughter named Ellen, who is hectored by her father in the same way as the old lady is hectored by Marion and Harriet. She escaped from the rigid discipline of home, and made a runaway match, and it is towards this daughter that the heart of the mother turns. Mrs. Betterton is not unkindly treated in an active manner by the spinsters, it is the utter lack of freewill that is denied her. They reprove her for a lack of interest, and give her horrible worsted comforters to make, and quote to her the cheerful good nature of an afflicted Irish charwoman, as an incentive to be cheerful. Finally, Mrs. Betterton does a very rash thing. She runs away from her big house and her overwhelming daughters, and takes a refuge with her son-in-law and his child Polly. Ellen is dead, and the poor old lady clings to her granddaughter with a pathetic desperation. Her act of revolt has most surprising results; for the first time the spinsters realise she has an entity of her own, and when at length she returns, it is to find that her freedom will not again be interfered with. The imprisoned look has left her sweet old eyes; she has in the most delicate and feminine manner at last asserted herself. Instinct with understanding, and written in a charming leisured style, this book is one that will create a lasting affection and appreciation in the hearts of those who read it.

Gouverneur Morris, in his new novel, goes into Bohemia. The heroine of THE PENALTY (Constable, 6s.) is a charming girl, with ambitions to succeed as a sculptor. She has great talents and is likely to succeed, but love once more upsets the calculations of an ambitious woman, and she leaves the studios to share the home of the man she loves, and, in defiance of all the prophesies of political women, finds complete satisfaction in the change. There is a fine study of horror in the volume. Blizzard, one of the studio models, is "a legless man," and the author, without crediting him with a long list of enormities, contrives to suggest an atmosphere of evil that is supremely effective. The book is written with freshness and humour, and there are certain scenes of undoubted and dramatic power.

Mrs. Almon Hensley has written a book on the eternal feminine. She sets out to say a great deal about the future of the advanced members of her sex, but LOVE AND THE WOMAN OF TO-MORROW (Drane, 3s. 6d.), though suggestive, is neither convincing nor constructive. "A new clarity of thought, a new freedom of action, a broader outlook, and a high, fine tolerance is the new century's gift to the world," says the author. This does not say very much, and though we have the same sprinkling of eulogistic adjectives throughout the volume, we do not get down to plain fact. The Woman of To-Morrow is credited with ambition startling to the woman of to-day. It will not be sufficient for her to love her husband, or rather the man whom she selects for that high estate. Before she marries she must pass through a number and variety of experiences. She is to train herself "in speaking, writing, agitating, reforming," and then, having gone through all these preparatory exercises, she is to bestow herself on the fortunate individual that meets with her favour. To quote the author, she is to return "with eyes open and senses all a quiver to the mystic realm of the heart, that before she felt she could not explain; wanted, but could not explore; loved, but could not utilise."

It does not seem to occur to Mrs. Hensley that these excursions and alarms are likely to occupy some years of the life of this new type of feminine excellence, and that when she has conquered the various kingdoms she sets out to explore, the man she has marked down for her husband may resent her choice. We suggest that the author will have to depict the man of the day after before she succeeds in making us believe he will respond to the belated affection of the woman of to-morrow!

HISTORY IN THE MAKING

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

IT is seldom that there is given to the world in the form of a Blue Book a volume at once so interesting and so sinister as the report of the Board of Trade to which the Daily Mail to-day directs attention. Prepared by Mr. F. H. McLeod, Director of Labour Statistics, the volume possesses a profound significance for the student of social dynamics, for it makes clear beyond cavil or dispute the melancholy fact that ever since 1896 there has been a steady and persistent upward rise in prices all over the world. The cost of living to the London workman has risen between 11 and 12 per cent., although there has been an actual decrease in the rents of 1.8 per cent. Of course, the serious factor in the situation is that there has been no corresponding rise in wages. In some industries, indeed, there has been actual fall. Is it not high time that an authoritative inquiry was held into this subject, which is absolutely vital to our civilisation?

It seems more than probable, now that Mr. Lind, the unofficial envoy from the U.S.A. Government, has been unofficially received by the Mexican Government, that matters will be straightened out in that turbulent territory. It is easy to guess the purport of Mr. Lind's representations: he has come to tell the Mexican President that the anarchy which, with brief intermissions, has endured now for close upon two years, must cease, or, however reluctantly, America will intervene. There is no alternative, and, once that is understood in Mexico, we may be certain that order will be restored.

Once more we are told that peace is assured—provided Turkey will listen to reason and evacuate Adrianople. Each day the war has taken a new and unexpected development, and with the question of Turkey's European possession still in abeyance, it would be worse than useless to persuade ourselves that hostilities are over. Diplomacy may induce the Turk to revert to the terms of the Treaty of London, and the Moslem may yet be driven to his last European stronghold, but the Eastern has a marvellous capacity for passive resistance, and he has not yet come to the end of his resources.

The light side of things was touched on at the Doctors' Congress on Tuesday, when a discussion raged hotly over the question of baths. The point at issue was whether or no the daily tub should be hot or cold. On the one side it was urged that the introduction of hot baths into Imperial Rome coincided with the beginning of her downfall; on the other the argument put forward was that the cold bath is unsuitable to the majority of people, inasmuch as it is too severe a shock to the nervous system. The compromise arrived at was characteristic. The faculty decided that a "warm" bath of short duration was the real right thing, and the Congress broke up happy.

The death of Colonel Cody removes from us one of the most remarkable and picturesque figures of our time. Despite the occasional crudities and exaggerations that at times marked his conduct, Cody was, without question, a man who touched real greatness. He rendered simply invaluable services to the British army, and to military aviation. Uneducated and without friends, he succeeded, by the sheer force of his personality, in compelling even the War Office, the most obtuse of departments, to listen to his representations. He was forty-seven years of age when he made his first flight in an aeroplane designed and built by himself. His most remarkable feats in aviation took place during the last two years of his life, and though youth is considered an essential possession for an air pilot, nobody ever suggested Colonel Cody was unfitted by age or temperament for his work. Perhaps the most ironical circumstance of his death was that the catastrophe was due to a defect in his hydroplane, and it was against these little defects of workmanship that poor Cody was always inveighing.

It is satisfactory to note that the Colonial Office declares that there is no cause for alarm or for serious emergency measures in Somaliland, where our camel corps have sustained a nasty reverse. It is not at all unlikely that the whole policy of our Government in regard to the Somalis may be changed, and drastically, and therefore it is very desirable indeed that a full and frank discussion of the new situation should take place before Parliament rises. Who will see that this is done?

While it would be a mistake to attach too great a significance to the victory of the "Single Tax" M.P.s, Messrs. Wedgwood and Outhwaite, in resisting the Chancellor's concessions to the Land Union, the incident is distinctly instructive. Those members of the advanced wing who have staked everything on the taxation of land values, are likely to press Mr. Lloyd George even further in their particular direction. The tug-of-war between them and reformers of other schools will come when the great land campaign is opened and the attack on the "central position" commenced. It will need all the arts of that consummate tactician, Mr. George, to hold his forces together.

PRIVATE AND PUBLIC MORALITY

BY CHARLES SAROLEA

I.

THERE are two spheres of human action, the private sphere and the public, and those spheres are controlled by different forces. And the majority of men seem to lead double lives, and those lives are actuated by different motives, are regulated by different principles, are judged by different standards of values. Indeed, the motives and principles and standards of value are not merely different, but contradictory. Even the most rigidly honest citizen will often have little scruple in defrauding the Custom House officer. He will often have an elastic conscience in dodging the income-tax collector. Certainly our moral temperature decreases as we get away from the sanctity of the home. Our morality relaxes as we enter the province of business. The merchant who leaves behind him in the morning the quiet and dignity of his luxurious suburban home also leaves behind him many of his moral scruples. He has been praying on his knees on Sunday; he will prey on his neighbours the rest of the week. He was generous; he becomes greedy. He was affectionate; he becomes hard.

And the moral temperature falls still lower when we enter the province of politics. The business man still retained most of the elemental principles of honesty and integrity. But even these desert him in politics. He was careful of the interests of his shareholders; he becomes careless of the nation's millions. He was truthful and trustworthy and just; for the sake of his party he becomes untruthful, untrustworthy, and unjust. He will be bribed by a title, he will connive at corruption, and the most honest politician, if he is a keen partisan, will not be above telling a wicked lie.

But there is one further stage of immorality still to be reached, and that is reached when we enter the province of international politics and diplomacy. In home politics we are only lax; in foreign politics we become positively immoral. The merchant immersed in his business is only blind to the claims of the State; he is what Mr. Wells calls "State blind." The patriot becomes blind to the claims of humanity.

II.

That contradiction between public and private morality is so glaring that in those politicians whose whole existence is divided between the family and the State it produces something like a double personality, and that double personality often gives to their biographies all the interest and unexpectedness of an exciting romance. "The Strange Case of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde" is enacted in the real life of many a prominent statesman. The French Terrorists, who sent thousands of innocent victims to the guillotine, were many of them humane and kindly men in their private capacity. Under Napoleon, not a few of them were raised to the peerage, and nearly all of them became exemplary civil servants. Robespierre was a sentimentalist, and Marat was a philanthropist. Talleyrand and Fouché were amongst the most depraved public characters in all modern history, the incarnation respectively of vice and crime; yet Fouché, who caused hundreds to be tied together and drowned in the Rhone, and Talleyrand, who again and again betrayed France to the allied monarchs, and who for so doing received sixty million francs—about ten millions sterling in present-day value—were both delightful men of the world and devoted relatives. Cromwell, Napoleon, and Bismarck were relentless statesmen, but loving husbands and fathers. Napoleon, from the shambles of his battlefields, sent beautiful love letters to Josephine. The case of Bismarck is even more striking. Of Napoleon it may be said that gradually the immorality of the statesman killed the morality of the private man. On the contrary, Bismarck, until the end, remained the same gentle, adoring husband, and the same ruthless, vindictive, unscrupulous, machiavellic politician.

III.

The contradiction between private and public morality is very frequently as between the individual and the nation. It is well-nigh general as between one nation and another. Morality, which is universal in theory, is limited in practice by geographical boundaries. In the words of Pascal: "Vérité en deça des Pyrénées, erreur au delà!"—"What is truth on this side of the Pyrenees is an untruth on the other side." As between nation and nation, virtue and vice actually change names. What would be considered abominable in private life becomes admirable in public life. Selfishness and injustice are dignified into patriotism. Boastfulness, which would be repellent if we were indulging it in our private capacity, becomes legitimate patriotic pride. We minimise the merits of other nations; we maximise and glorify our own merits. We deprive Blucher of all share in the victory of Waterloo to attribute it solely to Wellington, who alone is supposed to have saved Europe. We are so steeped in patriotic cant that we cease to be conscious of it. We are constantly repeating that such and such a deed is unworthy of an Englishman, as if we wanted to imply that what is unworthy of an Englishman may, for all we know, be worthy of a Frenchman. We are constantly repeating that such and such virtues, loyalty, truthfulness, are characteristic of our race, forgetting that when we are monopolising those virtues for Great Britain we are thereby defrauding and maligning humanity.

IV.

It would be well if those contradictory standards of value were only apparent in our judgments and speeches, or, at the worst, if they were restricted to our individual dealings with other nations. Unfortunately, they are almost invariably extended to our collective dealings. In our international relations we are cynically committing crimes which we could not conceivably commit either in our national or in our private capacities. Corruption, perjury, espionage, extortion—all the deadly sins are enlisted in the service of diplomacy.

We are reproving other nations for their misdeeds, and we are boasting of our political philanthropy. We are proud of having abolished the slave trade. We forget that we were the first to establish it on a large scale, and that one of our national heroes, a hero of song and romance, was one of the most notorious slave raiders and slave traders of his time.

We are reproving Germany, and rightly reproving her, for her blatant militarism and for her predatory instincts. We are lamenting her policy of naval expansion, but we forget that we are largely responsible for it. The eminent editor of the Economist, Mr. Hirst, has just written an admirable book*, which I cordially recommend to readers of EVERYMAN, in which he conclusively proves that Great Britain alone insists upon the right of capture at sea of merchant vessels, that she alone insists on maintaining the traditions of piracy, and on destroying the private commerce of the belligerent nation. And it is obvious that in doing so Great Britain gives the best of excuses to the German scaremongers. For those German scaremongers, in order to justify German armaments, contend that in time of war German commerce must be protected against British privateers. It is obvious that if Great Britain surrendered the right of capture, there would be no need for such protection, and that the chief pretext for an increase of naval armaments would vanish.

* "The Six Panics." By F. W. Hirst. (Methuen.) 3s. 6d.

We are rightly reproving Russia for oppressing Finland, and Prussia for oppressing Poland, and Hungary for oppressing Croatia. But is our record in foreign politics much cleaner? No doubt we are less stupid, having learned our lesson in the stern school of experience. But is our foreign policy more consistently inspired by morality? We may pass over the iniquity of the Transvaal War, because we have expiated our sins, and because we have tried to restore self-government to the nations we have injured. But let us consider the disastrous results of our Near Eastern policy. We have deliberately kept the Christian population under the heel of the unspeakable Turk, and when Russia liberated Macedonia in 1878 we compelled the enfranchised Bulgarians to submit for another generation to a reign of terror and massacre. And even as in 1878 we did not allow Russia to emancipate the Bulgarians, so to-day we allow Russia to oppress and plunder the Persians.

And in the Far East our conduct is even worse. We continue to spend millions in sending out missionaries to China, but as a nation we do our best to frustrate their work and to demoralise the people whom we pretend to Christianise. A few years ago China achieved an heroic reform. Whereas we failed to carry even a moderate measure of temperance reform, the Chinese succeeded in suppressing the curse of the opium traffic. But Great Britain will not allow China to work out her own salvation. Seventy-five years ago she declared war against the Chinese to force the opium traffic upon them. To-day Great Britain is repeating the same political crime, but by more hypocritical means. She insists on compelling China to buy the poisonous drug. Millions of Chinese must, forsooth, be poisoned and stupified in order that a few millionaire gentlemen from Bombay may further add to their ill-gotten shekels. Can there be a more glaring instance of the total disregard of moral principle on the part of a civilised government?

V.

"Liberty!" said Madame Roland, in ascending the scaffold, "how many crimes have been committed in thy name!" "Patriotism!" we might echo, "in thy name how many abominations have been perpetrated, and are still being perpetrated!" We do not want to be moral purists and pedants, but is it not about time that the collective conscience should awaken to so many and so glaring contradictions between our private morality and our public morality, between our national morality and our international morality? Is it not about time that we should revise our standard of moral values? Is it not about time that we should extend the boundaries of our morality beyond the mare clausum of our home waters? If it is our duty to be good Britons, let us realise that it is neither necessary nor desirable that we should be at the same time good Britons and bad Europeans.

THE IMPORTANCE OF THE LAUREATESHIP

MR. ASQUITH, who has better critical qualifications for making such an appointment than any of his predecessors for many years past, has appointed a Laureate whose name commands the respect of every man of letters in England. And doubtless the general public, for whose applauses he never laid any rank baits, will now buy the works of Dr. Robert Bridges. But now, this excellent choice safely made, one reviews with a new interest some of those principles which are implied by the existence of the office.

If we had a Painter Laureate, and he were appointed by newspaper plebiscite, doubtless we should find on the roll of honour the names of Frith, Millais, the inspired authors of "The Soul's Awakening" or "His Master's Voice," etc., etc. The same electorate would have given us Mr. Rudyard Kipling for Poet Laureate. Nor is it an altogether contemptible recommendation to be the poet of those who read no other poetry. Those who most detest the roystering, pharisaical cant and brag of Imperialism, which so largely employs Mr. Kipling's great natural talents, would not deny that he was the prophet of the stockbrokers and the English public-school boys, ten years ago, in a degree which no other poet could approach.

But, after all, this kind of success carries its own immediate reward in popularity and profits: ought there also to be assigned to it the butt of wine and the venison (what perfect symbols for the purpose! Our habit of picturesque survivals never made a prettier hit than this), and the responsibility of being the ceremonial mouthpiece of England? Or—a larger matter,—of Great Britain and Ireland?

I see in this question another form of that same issue which is often debated pro and con in the case of an Academy of Literature. When he appointed Dr. Bridges, Mr. Asquith was indeed playing the part of Richelieu. Are there any such things as authority and discipline? Are there lessons in the tradition of good craftsmanship which even genius must submit to learn? Is it good to have somewhere embodied the prudence and caution and economy which vindicate the collective mind against the individual fancy? If a nation answers Yes to these questions, it will institute and maintain something like the Académie Française. If it says No to them, the centrifugal tendency will run its course until it be spent in dissolution and anarchy. Absit omen. Dr. Bridges is not one of those writers who waste and destroy the literary forms which they work in: he will not leave the instruments of language with a blunted edge and a precision impaired by misuse. All the tendency of his writing is towards sobriety and economy. But for such scholarly influences as his we should be in danger of having the language as clumsy for literary expression as it is already degraded in musical value by our slovenly talking. Against the silly assertion of puny originalities, and the squandering of real strength in fissiparous variations, we look to the new Laureate's influence to protect the English language. Bureaucracy is mighty in this country: the official imprimatur gave a certain semblance of importance even to the fatuities of Alfred Austin. So good a poet, so skilled a master in the literary craft, so sane a critic, and so well rooted a scholar as Dr. Bridges may now, thanks to this factitious title, avail much more widely than hitherto to call up the forces of goodwill to arrest decay and degradation in English style, and to repair the journalese negligences and ignorances which have been ruining the fabric of our language.

EVERYMAN'S FRENCH PAGE

LA CITÉ D'ANTIQUITÉ

UNE cité alors était une vraie patrie, et non comme aujourd'hui une collection administrative d'hôtels garnis. Que m'importent à moi aujourd'hui Rouen ou Limoges? J'y ai un logis dans un amas d'autres logis; la vie vient de Paris. Paris lui-même, qu'est-ce, sinon un autre amas de logis, dont la vie vient d'un bureau où il y a des cartons et des employés? Au contraire, les hommes ici faisaient de leur ville leur joyau et leur écrin; l'image de leur acropole, avec ses temples blancs dans la lumière, les suivait partout; les villages de notre Gaule, la Germanie, toute la barbarie du Nord, ne leur semblaient que cloaque et désordre. A leurs yeux, qui n'avait pas de cité n'était pas véritablement un homme, mais une demi-brute, presque une bête, bête de proie dont on ne pouvait faire qu'une bête de somme. La cité est une institution unique, le fruit d'une idée souveraine qui a régi pendant douze siècles toutes les actions de l'homme; c'est la grande invention par laquelle il est sorti de la sauvagerie primitive. Combien l'homme l'a aimée, comme il y a rapporté et enfermé toute sa vie, aucune parole ne peut le dire. Le reste de l'univers lui était étranger ou ennemi, il n'y avait point de droits, ni ses biens ni ses membres n'y étaient en sûreté; s'il y trouvait protection, c'était par grâce; il n'y songeait que comme à un danger ou à une proie; cette enceinte était son refuge et sa forteresse. Rien plus, il y avait ses dieux propres, son Jupiter ou sa Junon, dieux habitants de la ville, dieux attachés au sol, et qui, dans la pensée primitive n'étaient autre chose que ce sol lui-même avec ses sources, ses bois et son ciel. Il y avait son foyer, ses pénates, ses ancêtres, couchés dans leurs tombeaux, incorporés au sol, recueillis par la terre, la grande nourrice, et dont les mânes souterrains, du fond de leur repos, continuaient à veiller sur lui, en sorte qu'il y trouvait en un faisceau toutes les choses salutaires, sacrées ou belles, qu'il devait défendre, admirer ou vénérer. "La patrie est plus que ton père ou ta mère," disait Socrate à Criton, "et quelque violence ou quelque injustice qu'elle nous fasse, nous devons les subir sans chercher à y échapper." C'est de cette façon que le Grec et le Romain ont compris la vie; quand leurs philosophes, Aristote ou Platon, fondent un Etat, c'est une cité, une cité bornée et fermée, cinq ou dix mille familles, où le mariage, l'industrie et le reste sont subordonnés à la chose publique. Si l'on joint à tout ces traits l'imagination précise et pittoresque des races méridionales, leur aptitude à se représenter les objets corporels, les formes locales, tout le dehors coloré, tout le relief sensible de leur ville, on comprend que cette conception de la cité a dû produire dans les âmes antiques une sensation unique, source d'émotions et de dévouements auxquels nous n'atteignons plus.

Toutes ses rues sont étroites; la plupart sont des ruelles qu'on franchirait d'une enjambée. Le plus souvent elles n'offrent de place que pour un char, et l'ornière est encore visible; de temps en temps de larges pierres permettent au passant de les traverser comme sur un pont. Evidemment on ne trouvait point ici la grande circulation de nos villes, nos lourdes charrettes chargées, nos voitures de maître qui courent au grand trot. Les chars apportaient le blé, l'huile, les provisions; beaucoup de transports se faisaient à bras et par des esclaves; les riches allaient en litière.

THE CITY OF ANTIQUITY

THE city in those days was a veritable fatherland, and not, as now, a government collection of lodging-houses. Of what significance to me are the Rouen or Limoges of to-day? I can lodge there amidst piles of other lodgings: life comes from Paris. Paris itself, what is it but another heap of lodgings, the life of which issues from a bureau filled with clerks and red tape? Here, on the contrary, men regarded their city as jewel and casket; they bore with them everywhere the image of their acropolis and its bright illuminated temples; the villages of Gaul and Germany, the whole barbaric north, seemed to them simply mire and wilderness. In their eyes a man who belonged to no city was not a man, but a kind of brute, almost a beast—a beast of prey, out of which nothing could be made but a beast of burden. The city is a unique institution, the fruit of a sovereign idea that for twelve centuries controlled all man's actions; it is the great invention through which man first emerged from a primitive state of savagery. How he loved it, how devoted he was to it, and how absorbed by it, no tongue can tell. To the universe at large he was either a stranger or an enemy; he had no rights in it; neither his body nor his property was safe in it; if he found protection there it was a matter of grace; he never thought of it but as a place of danger or of plunder: the enclosure of his city was his sole refuge and fortress. Moreover, here dwelt his divinities, his Jupiter and Juno, gods inhabiting the city, attached to the soil, and who, in primitive conceptions, constituted the soil itself, with all its streams, its fruits, and the firmament above. Here were his hearth-stone, his penates, his ancestors, reposing in their tombs, incorporated with the soil and gathered to it by the earth, the great nurse—his ancestors whose subterranean manes in their silent bed watched over him unceasingly; it was a combination of all salutary, sacred, and beautiful things for him to defend, to love, and to venerate. "Country is more than father or mother," said Socrates to Crito; "and whatever violence or whatever injustice she inflicts upon us we must submit without striving to escape from it." So did Greece and Rome comprehend life. When their philosophers, Aristotle or Plato, treat of the State, it is as a city, a compact, exclusive city of from five to ten thousand families, in which marriage, occupations, and the like are subordinated to the interests of the public. If to all these peculiarities we add the accurate and picturesque imagination of southern races, their aptitude at representing corporeal forms and local objects, the glowing exterior and bold relief of their city, we comprehend that such a conception of it produced in antique breasts a unique sensation, and furnished sources of emotion and devotion to which we are strangers.

All its streets are narrow; the greater portion are mere lanes, over which one strides with ease. Generally there is room only for a cart, and ruts are still visible: from time to time wide stones afford a crossing like a bridge. There was evidently no great traffic as in our cities, nothing like our heavily loaded vehicles and fast-trotting, fanciful carriages. Their carts transported grain, oil, and provisions: much of the transportation was done on the arm and by slaves: the rich travelled about in litters.

THE MAN AND HIS WORK

V.—THE MAN BEHIND THE FOOTLIGHTS * * BY C. SHERIDAN JONES

I SUPPOSE that we shall, all of us, agree that quite one of the most remarkable social portents is the extraordinary change that has come over the public mind in regard to what used to be called facetiously "the profession." Fifty years ago an actor was often in fact, as he is now in law, "a rogue and a vagabond." That virile novel "No Name," so fresh and modern in many of its aspects, contains a description, almost incredible to this generation, of the horror of an austere maiden aunt at the success which the heroine has achieved as the bright particular star of a travelling company. We have changed all that. To-day the most austere of maiden aunts would look with pride at the posters announcing the prowess of her relative. The actress and the actor have long ceased to be taboo. They are fêted, courted, honoured, and sought after till, as Mr. George Moore warns us, we are Practically in Danger of an Excess of Mummer Worship.

How has this revolution in public sentiment affected the profession itself? First and foremost it has added enormously to its numbers. The increase in actors during the last twenty years has been nothing short of astounding, and has caused the very liveliest surprise even to those whose life has been spent on and about the stage. There are now, it is computed, some ten thousand actors on the legitimate stage, excluding, of course, the humble necessary super and the lower ranks of the chorus. This accession, authorities tell me, has profoundly modified things histrionic. The new recruits are, as a rule, of an altogether different calibre to the old-time actor that one reads of in those far-off days

When Mr. Vincent Crummies Received Nicholas

"with an inclination of the head, something between the courtesy of a Roman Emperor and the nod of a pot companion"; when agreements were arranged and signed in the bars of hotels, and when the lion comique sported his fur coat one week and was hard put to it to find a clean collar the next. All that belongs to a dead past, and the more modern actor has become a comparatively sedate and methodical person, very different from the old Bohemian stars whose eccentricities were the talk of the town. So far as their conduct and mode of life are concerned, the change has been all for the good. But, artistically, it is at least open to question whether there is not another side of the medal.

Authorities tell me that the actor of a generation ago took his profession with deadly seriousness. He knew his Shakespeare and his Sheridan. He had read Molière and had heard Phelps. The new young man is familiar with musical comedy, and perhaps he once saw Irving, and even though he drinks nothing stronger than ginger beer, this is hardly an adequate equipment.

In one other respect the profession has lost by the army of new adherents that have poured in.

Salaries have Fallen Steadily

The inrush of competitors has pulled them down. True it is that conditions generally have improved. There are better dressing-rooms, there is an infinitely higher scale of treatment all round. But the fact remains that, so far as money is concerned, the remuneration of the average actor has fallen even as that of the star has risen, until I find that quite a considerable number of actors are contributing to the Insurance Act, their wages being under £160 per annum, while the average remuneration, fluctuating from £2 to £6 a week, is generally nearer the lower figure, and at once the question arises why an occupation so arduous, so precarious, and so ill rewarded should prove, at the same time, irresistibly fascinating to thousands and tens upon thousands of men on the threshold of life.

There have been several explanations of this phenomena attempted.

The Strange Sense of Power that the Actors' Craft gives to a man who can sway vast audiences, moving them to pitying tears and joyous laughter; the fierce excitement that follows on his triumphs; the great prizes that are still within the reach of the humblest histrion, if he can but ring the bell—all these answers to the riddle have been attempted. But I think the cause lies deeper. "Fellowship," said William Morris, "means life. The lack of fellowship—death." And as modern business has grown more stereotyped and stratified, the clerk, working day by day in an unsocial groove, thinks longingly of the Camaraderie that Marks Life on the Stage, with its ups and downs, its colour, its quick changes, its infinite variety. And once he has heard the call, it is certain that his employer will have a vacancy ere long, and that he himself will within a few short weeks be on tour, even if it is only a place in the chorus that he has secured.

To go "on tour" is to the novitiate one of the most joyous experiences of the histrion's life. Alas! the seasoned hand knows its vicissitudes too well to take it otherwise than with resignation. There is something inspiring, something infectious in the gaiety with which the company sets off. Their friends are crowding the platform, wishing them God-speed on the long tour, waving their handkerchiefs and shouting farewell; the members of the company are taking their places in the saloon, which resounds with happy laughter and bright badinage, and new friendships are formed, new comradeships entered on. But the old hands take it all a trifle sadly. They have been through it too often. They know how soon bitter jealousies, angry quarrels will develop. And I never see their faces without thinking of that little parable of the battle of Bunker's Hill, that may be familiar to some of my readers.

When the First Storming Party of Raw Recruits went out to turn the American position, they cheered lustily, and then were driven back. So the second and the third. It was the veterans who took the stockade. They did not cheer as they went up the hill. They knew too well what the work before them was like.

So with the old actor going out on tour. He is a trifle sceptical, a little cynical maybe, as the men pair off into parties, who are going to mess together during the run of the piece, dear boy. For on tour the actor makes his attenuated remuneration go a good deal further by digging with two or three of his "pals." Every town has its own theatrical lodgings, every theatrical landlady is addressed as "Ma," and every breakfast is served not earlier than ten, and consists invariably of ham and eggs, which are eaten with the heartiness and jollity that are the actor's chief assets, and which, it is perhaps worth while recalling, we have been taught "make a dinner of herbs better than a stalled ox." It is this blitheness of spirit, this invincible optimism and resilience that carry the poor "pro" over many an awkward stile, through many a dark bypath. This and one other quality that distinguishes the true actor—the quality which, born in the old barn-storming days, is with him still, and which will not let him see a comrade want, or refuse aid to a friend. There are faults to be charged against the histrion, as against most of the denizens of this grey world. Let it at least be recorded in his favour that in all the eternal vicissitudes of his craft, there is one part he rarely plays, that of the Levite

Who Went By on the Other Side.

I suppose also that the histrion is sustained in a rather adverse struggle by the recollection of the fact that the great prizes of his profession are won quite suddenly, and almost, as it were, by accident. Edna May stepped from the chorus to the front rank. Sir Henry Irving once played at the roadside for coppers. Still, it must be confessed that to-day the actor is ill paid, and that, from a pecuniary point of view, his position seems likely to deteriorate rather than improve. The competition of popular and splendidly equipped music-halls, together with the success of cinema shows, have, of course, severely pulled on the receipts of the theatres proper, while material additions to their expenses have been made in the form of increased advertising and the more lavish style of furnishing that modern conditions have rendered essential.

To some extent the cinemas have helped to relieve this by giving the actor who is resting, i.e., out of work, an opportunity of pulling his fortunes together. But, on the whole, the fact remains—that the actors' remuneration is likely to diminish rather than increase. The syndicate is the curse of the modern actor. It is the actor-manager on whom he relies, and with wisdom, for deliverance. The actor-manager has himself been through the mill. He knows the vicissitudes, the struggles, the difficulties of an actor's life. More, he knows this: that it is to his interest to see that he has standing by him, as it were, a faithful and devoted company, on whose services he can call at any moment.

Sir Henry Irving retained a splendid company to the last days of his Lyceum management, and every one knows that his sagacity and generous policy in so doing was well rewarded. It is, in fact, on the lines of the repertory theatre that there lies not only

but economic deliverance for the actor. It is, when one comes to think, quite ridiculous to engage a man for the run merely of one play, which, as Mr. Henry Arthur Jones recently pointed out, may fail for half a dozen different reasons. Surely the more excellent way is the old method, whereby the actor-manager kept his company at his disposal—and ensured them that security of employment, the withdrawal of which is the worst curse that has fallen on a great and noble calling—a calling that, depend on it, can only be practised when its votaries are free from carking care.

I am afraid that the worst part of the actor's life is his old age. The officials of the Actors' Association (that unique organisation that quietly, steadily, day by day, and all unacknowledged, does so much to protect the interests of professionals, and to improve their lot), take that view. "A young man can play old parts, but an old man cannot play a young one." That is an eternal, an insurmountable difficulty, and one shudders a little as one thinks of the veterans of the profession spending the twilight of their arduous days that, alas, have not brought them the fame they fondly hoped would come fifty years ago, Spending Their Old Age—Who Knows How?

I have said nothing of the psychology of the actor's life, but I cannot close without doing so. A great man of letters, Mr. Birrell, has opined in a brilliant essay that acting rots the brain; that to become everybody but one's self, to have everybody's troubles but one's own—that way madness lies. I have never been able to accept the dictum, for if it be true, then, not only the man who acts, but he who created Macbeth and Hamlet, must have been a degenerate; and the only story that an author can write in safety is the cramped, selfish, pitiful narrative of his own circle of hopes and fears. But experience shows surely the falsity of this. It is the man who broods continually upon his own lot who ends in a madhouse cell; not he who loses his soul that he may regain it. The great actor is he who forgets himself in the joys and sorrows of others; who loves all sorts and conditions of men; who realises that "comprehension is our only true possession."

It is interesting to note that the last message which Sir Henry Irving ever sent to his brother professionals was that which he despatched on October 13th, 1905, five days before his death, urging them one and all to join the Actors' Association. This body is doing admirable work. It conducts a ceaseless war upon the bogus manager, that bane of the mummer, who constantly takes out companies, and as constantly leaves them stranded. The Association has induced the leading theatrical papers to boycott the "ads." of these gentry, whether under their known names or aliases. The Association also provides its members with an admirable medical service for a nominal annual fee—thanks largely to the generosity of another great profession, that of Æsculapius, whose representatives are always glad to help the boys on tour who fall sick by the way. The greatest triumph achieved so far by the Association has been the smashing of the bogus agent—a victory that, even if it stood alone, would justify the existence of this organisation.

THE TRAGEDY OF THE PLIMSOLL LINE

BY OUR SPECIAL COMMISSIONER

WHO was Samuel Plimsoll, and what exactly was it that his famous "mark" accomplished?

Twenty years ago the question would have sounded strange in our ears. We all knew the story of how this one obscure, quiet, simple, Quaker-like man had practically coerced the whole House of Commons; of how he had pleaded, passionately and for years, on behalf of men too broken to back their deliverer, till at last he had roused the nation. We were all proud to tell our children

The Story of his Heroic Struggle.

We were all certain that his triumph would endure for ever.

To-day Plimsoll is a fading memory. His life-work, the famous "Load Line" that has saved the lives of tens of thousands of sailors, has been quietly, decorously, and painlessly abolished. Worse than all, it seems almost as if his spirit, tireless, resolute, indomitable, had passed away with him.

It was in a very different Parliament from our own that Plimsoll won his victory. The Lords were still paramount. There was no Labour party. The Tories were in office.

But Plimsoll Stands Out

as a great example of what one man, acting independently of clique or caucus, can achieve—and he won his point! There was then a type of vessel known as "coffin ships." They were heavily loaded—and heavily insured! Thousands of them never returned. The deaths of sailors at sea amounted to more than 1 in 60, as against 1 in 315 miners killed underground. It was this evil that Plimsoll strove might and main to end. He asked that every owner should be compelled to mark on his ship a disc, with a horizontal line through its centre, down to which, and only down to which, it could be loaded, so that it had a sufficient space of freeboard to ensure safety. To this end he worked incessantly in the House. There were questions, inquiries, commissions, his own Bill, which was defeated by three votes, and finally a Government measure that was on July 25th, 1874, ordered to be withdrawn.

Then it was that the nation and the Commons first realised what manner of man Samuel Plimsoll was, for no sooner had the fateful Announcement Come from the Treasury Bench than he was standing at the table. In a voice that could be heard in the lobbies outside he denounced the withdrawal of the Bill. "Were the sailors to go down in coffin ships during another winter's storms when the Bill could be passed there and then?" he asked. "If every coffin ship owner were in the House, the Government's duty was still clear." He raved; he stormed; he protested. The House was aghast—but his words rang through England—and the Bill was saved!

It is that Bill, subsequently improved and strengthened till the "Load Line" in an effective form was made compulsory all round—it is that Act, rather, which in our own time has been virtually destroyed!

The story of its dissolution affords excellent material

For a Study in Parliamentary Anæsthetics.

Plimsoll scored by being open, direct, and emphatic. The opponents of the "Load Line" have achieved success by secret lobbying, by wirepulling, and by intrigue, with the result that the large majority of Englishmen, proud of their sailors, ready to protect them if need be, do not know that the "Load Line" is absolutely a thing of the past!

The shipowners have always been opposed to the line. Beaten in the Commons, they went to the Lords, who inserted a clause in the Act leaving it to the discretion of the owner where the line should be placed. At once a sportive captain placed his in the middle of his funnel. The Act became, of course, a laughing-stock. Still Plimsoll kept on. He moved Mr. Chamberlain, when at the Board of Trade, to action.

"Joe" Denounced the Whole System in a memorable circular and appointed a Committee to consider and report. The Committee sat for two years closely investigating the subject, and their report is remarkable for the declaration that the "Load Line" should not be fixed by any but a representative body, to include, among others, seamen and shipowners, both of which classes they had consulted. Still nothing was done. Other questions had arisen: the country's attention was distracted. But Plimsoll and his friends persisted, and at last, in 1890, they got passed their Compulsory Load Line Bill, adopting the scale of freeboard recommended by the Chamberlain Committee.

Thus, after nearly twenty years' work, Plimsoll saw his life's task accomplished. The loss of life at sea fell from 3,500 in 1885 to less than 1,600 per annum—although, of course, the number of seamen had largely increased. The coffin ships were scuttled and the Plimsoll line scored.

I shall tell in my next article how this great work was undone.

A MIDSUMMER TWILIGHT'S DREAM

EARLIER in the day thunder seemed pregnant in the air. It was an evening the calm solemnity of which hung as a pall upon all around. The birds had hushed their evening song, no sound came from the sleeping animal world; the wind had gradually been dying through the hot afternoon, till now, the twilight slowly merging into night, not a ripple disturbed the serenity of the water. Thirty minutes earlier the speckled trout had jumped for fly; now, the peculiar whistling sound as they rose had gone, the plunk and wimple as they fell had ceased.

Nature was still.

The shadows deepened, the water absorbing mystery from the gathering gloom, the hush awing the watcher, his imagination stirring; the song of the sirens seemed to come, floating over the water, clearly, insistent in its crooning, lulling the senses and drugging the brain.

Into this magical realm of fantasy breaks a harsh, discordant "croak, croak," rousing the drowsy apathy into reality again; the ear quickens to catch the first repetition of the sound, unplaced in its category by the sleepy brain. Again it comes, the insistent call of the frog waking from his slumber to signal the advance of night; the nocturnal cock-crow, as it were. Another answers and yet another, till here and there, all around, the chorus is piping. A rat squeals at the water's edge, an owl hoots in the wood.

Night has fallen.

LITERARY NOTES

AT a time when the output of new books is at a very low ebb, the publication of Mr. Hall Caine's latest novel, "The Woman Thou Gavest Me," has received more than its due share of attention, the more so as its issue in book form by Wm. Heinemann was followed by a squabble between the novelist and the Circulating Libraries' Association of a kind which may or may not enhance our admiration of Mr. Hall Caine, but which will unquestionably tend to make his story a ubiquitous subject of conversation and discussion, and—more satisfactory still from the point of view of writer and publisher—a general object of demand. In the encounter the Circulating Libraries' Association undoubtedly came off second best. By proposing to subject "The Woman Thou Gavest Me" to a sort of semi-censorship, the Association brought upon itself a letter from the indignant author which filled two columns of a daily newspaper, and contained a threat of retaliation in the shape of a boycott of the libraries. The outcome of this wordy warfare was that the Circulating Libraries' Association abandoned its intention of standing in any way between the Manx novelist and the reading public at large, while Mr. Hall Caine, having vindicated his motives in writing such a book, naturally gave up the idea of taking a step which must have made "The Woman Thou Gavest Me" more or less inaccessible to such as can't afford to pay 6s. for a novel, however fascinating.

"A quelque chose malheur est bon." Mr. Hall Caine, at any rate, has no reason to be dissatisfied with the net result of the controversy. He has been given—and has promptly seized—a splendid opportunity of expounding his moral purpose, and his book has been given an invaluable introductory advertisement, which will impress many people who have been left cold by the announcement that "The Woman Thou Gavest Me" is being "translated and published in twelve different European languages, into Japanese and into Yiddish." As for the Circulating Libraries' Association, the excellence of their purpose is no more open to question than that of Mr. Hall Caine; but as in his case, it is debatable whether the end justifies the means; as in his case also, it is not unlikely that the effect will be very different from that intended. By threatening not to send out "The Woman Thou Gavest Me" except to subscribers who specially ask for it, the Circulating Libraries' Association has taken a course which is certain to result in the demand for the book being very special indeed.

In commemoration of the centenary of the birth of Sir Isaac Pitman, a revised and improved edition of that valuable text-book, "Pitman's Shorthand Instructor," is to be issued this month. The whole of the work, we are informed, has been rewritten and entirely reset, and new exercises have been compiled throughout the book. In preparing this new edition the publishers, Sir Isaac Pitman and Sons, Ltd., have had the assistance not only of their own staff, but of some seventy or eighty of the most experienced teachers and practitioners of Pitman's shorthand, and some of the ablest phonographers in the world. Although the system as a whole remains very much as its inventor framed it, various simplifications and improvements have been introduced, all of which make for ease, speed and legibility.

There is always a wide circle of readers in this country for a good biography of a notable statesman. It is not surprising, therefore, to hear that a second impression of Mr. G. M. Trevelyan's "Life of John Bright" (published by Messrs. Constable) is now ready.

While some delight to read the life of the "Tribune of the People" by the scholarly grandson of Macaulay's sister, others may prefer to study the career of a more modern tribune, Mr. Lloyd George, as set forth in a work of a very different kind by Mr. G. E. Raine. This little shilling volume, "The Real Lloyd George," published this week by Messrs. George Allen and Co., has some advantages over the recently issued biography of the Chancellor of the Exchequer—it is much shorter and much cheaper—and it may serve a certain purpose as a counterblast to that flattering publication. From first to last it is an acrimonious attack on Mr. Lloyd George, such as Unionist candidates may find useful at bye-elections.

On October 13th this year will be celebrated the centenary of Verdi's birth, and the occasion is not likely to be ignored by publishing firms. Next year, we are informed, an edition of the Italian composer's correspondence covering the years—so eventful in musical history—from 1840 to 1900 will be published.

Mr. W. H. Helm is preparing a biography of that dainty portrait-painter, Madame Vigée-Lebrun, and as part of his book is to consist of a catalogue raisonné of her works, he invites owners of her pictures to send him (care of Messrs. Herbert and Daniel, 95, New Bond Street, W.) full particulars as to the subject, nature and history of the canvases they possess.

RESULT OF ESSAY COMPETITION

THE WORKING OF THE MEDICAL INSURANCE ACT:
CRITICISMS AND SUGGESTIONS

THE criticisms of the Insurance Act were neither so numerous nor so vehement as might have been expected. The essays sent in were characterised by common sense and earnestness of purpose rather than by originality of ideas or treatment. Many of the defects in the Act pointed out by competitors are among those which this year's Amending Act seeks to remedy.

The Prize of Two Guineas is divided between

W. ROBERTS,

6, Harold Road, Upton Park, E.

and

ISABEL BARNETT,

Fawley, Wokingham.

The criticisms of Mr. W. Roberts, who writes as himself an insured person under the Act, are reasonable and comprehensive, and he has not omitted, like some competitors, to add constructive suggestions. Miss Isabel Barnett's essay is couched largely in the form of interviews with working men and women of different types who find fault with various features of the Act as it affects them.

Among others of the following deserve commendation:—

TOWN OR COUNTRY?

BY EDGAR M. APPLETON

WERE we compelled to spend our lives either in the town or in the country, which alternative should we choose?

The question is a question of temperament. If one is not happy in the country, the chances are that one would not be happy in town. There is a type of mind which finds a dinner at the "Trocadero" or a walk down a Devonshire lane in springtime equally tedious.

The capacity for enjoying life—which, of course, is something vastly different from a mere acquiescence in the stream of events—is possessed by a comparatively small number of the sons of men. "We look before and after, and pine for what is not." Is a man compelled to spend his years pent up in a city, then he will ever be "a-babbling o' green fields." Is a man forced to spend his years by the green pastures, then London becomes the Mecca of his dreams.

The truth is that most of us have not learnt to savour life. We are subject to remittent attacks of ennui. It is only the unusual and extraordinary which is capable of taking us out of ourselves. Hence the search for something which shall stimulate more and more the jaded palate of the public. There is a fortune awaiting that man who shall invent some new amusement, some amusement "with vinegar and pepper in 't."

But the chosen know that the time to be happy is now, the place to be happy is here. The trouble is that most of us visualise our New Jerusalem just beyond a horizon which "fades for ever and for ever from our view." We do not possess the faculty for taking an interest in things. There lies the secret of content.

Francis Thompson, witnessing the returning pageant of summer, takes up his pen and writes: "The smouldering rosebud chars through its sheath. . . . The long laburnum drips its jocund spilth, its honey of wild flame."

While Kipling, imbrued with the romance of modern machinery, writes a prose poem around a tramp steamboat, "The Ship that Found Herself," and could as easily have written one around a railway station. Wherever we be, in town or country, we are compassed about with the clouds of romance.

"The poem hangs on the berry-tree when comes the poet's eye,
The whole street is a masquerade when Shakespeare passes by."

But supposing we are possessed of this capacity for taking an interest in things, the question as to whether the town will have an appeal for us stronger than that of the country depends upon our particular cast of temperament.

Some great ones have been as loud in their praise of the town as others of their compeers have in its condemnation. Johnson habituated himself to consider living in the country as a kind of "mental imprisonment." Whether he would have held to this opinion had he lived in these latter days is a question which admits of no ready answer.

In the Doctor's time, the village was an isolated community, self-contained, and almost self-supporting. It was essential to the Doctor's happiness that he should be able to practise his wit upon a circle of friends capable of appreciating it, of providing the flint for his steel. In his day it would have been exceptional to find a village capable of providing such a circle. But the telegraph and newspaper have changed all that. One may not safely lay odds against a country vicar's being a disciple of Bernard Shaw, and the village doctor is probably an enthusiastic Ibsenite.

Gray casts his vote against the town. "I have been at London these three months," he writes, "that tiresome, dull place! where all people under thirty find so much amusement." So the delights of the town are permissible in our "green and salad days," but having attained to maturity, we ought to cast them behind our backs.

There is something apposite in thus associating the town with the early, strenuous years of life, and the country with those latter, more peaceful years. It seems in keeping with the fundamental fitness of things. Think of the dreamy-eyed Fitzgerald, translator of the immortal Quatrains, in his country, retreat, as the years begin to weigh upon him.

Picture him among his books and flowers, carrying about with him the precious transcript, which a friend had made for him, of the rare manuscript written on yellow paper, "with purple-black ink profusely powdered with gold."

There is a passage in one of his letters which epitomises for us his secluded existence.

"Here I live with tolerable content; perhaps with as much as most people arrive at, and which, if one were properly grateful, one would perhaps call perfect happiness. Here is a glorious sunshiny day: all the morning I read about Nero in Tacitus, lying at full length on a bench in the garden, a nightingale singing, and some red anemones eyeing the sun manfully not far off. Such as life is, I believe I have got hold of a good end of it."

For those whose delight is in the study of raw human nature, the town will always possess irresistible attractions. Where a genius is concerned, locality counts for nothing, but all students of humanity are not of this class; and to your even Christian the town presents itself as a more accessible mine from whence to draw material. There the volume of humanity lies open to one's hand.

A walk down the Strand will provide one with almost as many types as individuals. There is no need to go out of the way in order to study those types. A seat in the corner of a café may provide one with sufficient material for a three-volume novel.

Something of this was felt by Lamb, that inveterate townsman. The panorama of life which every night unfolded itself before him in the streets of London never ceased to fascinate him. "Let them talk of lakes and mountains and romantic dales—all that fantastic stuff: give me a ramble by night in London. A mob of men is better than a flock of sheep, and a crowd of happy faces jostling into the playhouse at the hour of six is a more beautiful spectacle to man than the shepherd driving his silly sheep to fold."

The clergy are continually bemoaning the fact that this is an age of compromise; and for the life of me I have never been able to discover why the age should be any the worse on that account. If such be the case, however, I confess I am at one with the spirit of the age. Although "Blackfriars, to me, and old Whitehall, is even as much as is the fall of fountains on a pathless grove," so long as railway companies remain accommodating, I hope to continue to earn my living in the town, and to enjoy my leisure in the country. 'And so to supper and to bed.

J. M. SYNGE * * * BY J. M. HONE

I.

SYNGE belonged to a family of English extraction which had long been established in Ireland. Among his forefathers were an Archbishop of the Irish Protestant Church and various clerics of distinction. Dublin has to-day its Synge Street as well as its Shaw Street. Both date from the days of Protestant Ascendancy: (in parenthesis) let us hope that the habit of giving Dublin streets a more patriotic nomenclature will not affect these thoroughfares, and that Synge Street and Shaw Street will be allowed to stand in honour of the relationship of the two most original of contemporary playwrights with the Irish capital. Synge, therefore, was of the race or caste which, while it has given to modern Ireland its greatest men, yet has never quite succeeded in abandoning an attitude of detachment, often hostile, towards the county in which its lot is cast. It would certainly never have occurred to Synge himself to speak of Ireland as the country "in which he had the misfortune to be born"; and yet in his case, too, the curse of Swift, "to be a man of genius and to be born in Ireland," did to some extent operate. Synge never did, and probably never will, obtain the affectionate regard of his Catholic fellow-countrymen. The instance is a remarkable one, for apparently no Protestant Irishman was ever more free from the influences of hereditary prejudice, whether political or theological. It was among the Irish-speaking peasantry of the West that Synge delighted to live; it was there that he "found himself" as a writer. England and English life were truly foreign to him. And one will search with difficulty among his books and plays for a reference to the existence even of that "other Ireland" which bred him, and whence, indeed, came that literary movement with which he is associated.

II.

Once, however, in his published writings, he permits himself to meditate on the fate of his own people in Ireland. There is an essay among his travel sketches, "A Landlord's Garden," in which he "feels the tragedy of the landlord class," as well as of the peasantry, and "of the innumerable old families that are quickly dwindling away." "The broken greenhouses and mouse-eaten libraries, that were designed and collected by men who voted with Grattan," were perhaps as mournful in the end "as the four mud walls that are so often left in Wicklow as the only remnants of a farmhouse." The playwright who chose to go through the Irish country houses would, he adds, find material for many gloomy plays. "Gloomy" is not the word which precisely expresses the character of Synge's peasant comedies; but his outlook on Irish life was not encouraging to the reformers or regenerators of the island, of whom there are so many. It was seldom, indeed, that he expressed any kind of general opinion. But once an English newspaper asked him to report on the proceedings of the Congested Districts Board in Connaught. The result was amusing. Synge began by admitting his dread of any movement that would tend to lessen the individuality of the people. It was, he explained, a part of the misfortune of Ireland that nearly all the characteristics which gave colour and attractiveness to Irish life were bound up with a social condition that came near to penury.

III.

The broad facts of Synge's career illuminate his temperament. He was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, but spent a considerable part of his earlier manhood on the Continent, chiefly in Paris. It was always his ambition to write. He became an excellent French scholar, and hoped to acquire the gift of criticism. He supplemented an income of £40 per annum by means of a little journalism, and was a reviewer for the Speaker (now the Nation). When Mr. Yeats first met him in Paris, Synge seems to have been in a disheartened mood; his creative work did not hitherto amount to much, and he was ready to adopt Mr. Yeats's suggestion and go to the Aran Islands "in order to express a life that had not yet found expression." He had never cut himself off entirely from Ireland, nor forgotten the Gaelic he had picked up as a boy; and it must have been evident to him at the beginning of the experiment that Ireland was his "subject," although he continued for a while to write criticisms of French books. Unhappily, ill-health now began to trouble him; a premonition of early death had already slipped into that strange poetry of his—a poetry in which he wished to use his personal life as his material:—

"With Fifteen-ninety or Sixteen-sixteen
We end Cervantes, Marot, Nashe or Green;
Then Sixteen-thirteen till two-score and nine,
Is Crashaw's niche, that honey-lipped divine.
And so when all my little work is done
They'll say I came in Eighteen-seventy-one,
And died in Dublin . . . what year will they write
For my poor passage to the stall of night?"

He wrote "after reading the dates in a book of lyrics."

IV.

At the end of his life he may have felt the approach of the fame which he so greatly desired; but it is only quite recently that his work has received a widespread recognition. One remembers the casual paragraphs which appeared in the newspapers on the morrow of his death. A complete edition of his works was in contemplation, and he had a handful of devoted admirers. On the whole, however, his plays, particularly the "Playboy of the Western World," were, so far as they were known, unpopular, and such notoriety as he had in Dublin literary circles, owing to the rioting that had attended their production, he found distasteful, and perhaps dreadful. Other Irishmen would have revelled in his situation. In one respect, however, Synge was very little of an Irishman; he had no taste at all for controversy. Someone, indeed, once told the present writer that Synge was incapable of sustaining an argument, and he might well be bewildered by the ingenious attempts that are now made to explain his mind and his art. It is certain that he did not wish to libel his country! Naively egoistic, he talked, not of himself, but of his work and methods of work. He told how he spent four months of the year in Paris, four months in the West of Ireland, and four at home in Dublin. An independent income of £40 a year made all the difference to a writer—latterly he was rather richer. He would confess to having been bored once or twice by the primitive life on the western seaboard of Ireland. There was no pretence about Synge, and although he had, indeed, something of the spirit of Borrow, it was literature which he sought and served with a single mind. He died in Dublin four years ago at the age of thirty-eight.

"I've thirty months, and that's my pride,
Before my age's a double score,
Though many lively men have died
At twenty-nine or little more.
I've left a long and famous set
Behind some seven years or three,
But there are millions I'd forget
Will have their laugh at passing me."

HOW THE CARNEGIE MILLIONS ARE MANAGED IN AMERICA

I.

IN 1905, shortly after he gave his two millions to the Scottish universities, Mr. Andrew Carnegie presented a similar sum for the advancement of university education in North America. The main object of the former bequest, which is administered by the Carnegie Trust, was to pay the fees of Scottish students attending university classes; the purpose of the latter bequest, which is administered by the Carnegie Foundation, is to provide retiring allowances for the professors of the universities, colleges and technical schools of the United States, Canada and Newfoundland. What a strange contrast these two methods of promoting Higher Education offer! In the one case the students of Scotland were to be relieved of the necessity of paying for a university education in their youth; in the other case, the professors of America were to be relieved of the necessity of teaching in their old age. In both cases, obviously, the donor's motives were of the highest—to assist teachers and taught at a time when they most require assistance, and to further the cause of learning among English-speaking peoples on both sides of the Atlantic.

II.

If asked to state which of these two methods they thought more likely to attain the end desired—the extension and improvement of university education—most people would unhesitatingly declare in favour of the Scottish scheme of paying the fees of students, in preference to the American plan of supplying professors with pensions. A little reflection, however, ought to convince them that, despite appearances, the Carnegie Foundation is more of an educational agency and less of a charity institution than the Carnegie Trust.

Each year the Carnegie Trust pays the class fees of some 4,000 students at the Scottish universities, devoting thereto a sum of nearly £50,000, i.e., half its income. The Carnegie Foundation annually pays allowances to some 400 professors and professors' widows, the allowances totalling some £120,000. The payment of class fees in the Scottish universities is supposed to be in the nature of an advance rather than a gift, but so far very few recipients have refunded the amounts expended on their behalf. In 1911-12, for instance, nineteen former beneficiaries voluntarily repaid £419; whereas the number of students whose fees were paid in that year was 3,810, and the amount disbursed £44,705. From every quarter come laments that the once-boasted independence of the Scottish student has been undermined, and one frequently hears complaints that the general standard of students has changed for the worse since the Carnegie Trust began to defray university fees. It seems only too clear that this feature of the Carnegie bequest to the Scottish universities has been grasped indiscriminately as a gratuity, and not accepted with a full sense of responsibility as an "accommodation"—a result detrimental to the self-respect of the students concerned, and in every way contrary to Mr. Carnegie's intentions.

III.

So much for one function of the Carnegie Trust—its shortcomings in other respects have already been dealt with in the pages of EVERYMAN. What, then, has the Carnegie Foundation done for university education in North America? It is only eight years since Mr. Carnegie established his 10,000,000 dollars fund, but in that short time it is no exaggeration to say that the Foundation has been of inestimable service to the universities, colleges, and technical schools of the Republic and the Dominion, to their staffs and to their students; and, in addition, by its investigations and publications, it has proved of immense value to university authorities throughout the world.

IV.

On the benefits derived from the Foundation by American professors and instructors it is needless to insist. Mr. Carnegie was led to make his bequest by the consideration that "the least rewarded of all our professions is that of the teacher in our higher educational institutions," and by his desire "to remove a source of deep and constant anxiety to the poorest paid and yet one of the highest of all professions." The fund, he stipulated, was to apply to unsectarian universities, colleges, and technical schools, "without regard to race, sex, creed, or colour." At first, State institutions of this kind were not included, but in 1908 Mr. Carnegie placed another 5,000,000 dollars at the disposal of his trustees for the purpose of extending the benefits of the Foundation to State universities.

From the outset the Foundation has insisted that it is an educational, not a charitable organisation. The allowances it awards must be earned by the fulfilment of certain conditions; they cannot, like some other pensions in America, be secured by begging, wirepulling, and political influence. To be entitled to a retiring allowance a professor must have attained the age of sixty-five and served at least fifteen years as a professor, or not less than twenty-five as instructor or professor. In case of disablement he may be pensioned at an earlier age, and a period of twenty-five years' service as a professor, or thirty years as instructor or professor, also entitles university and college teachers to a retiring allowance before the age of sixty-five is attained. The average retiring allowance paid by the Foundation is about £350—an amount which is far from princely, especially in a land where the cost of living is so much higher than in Britain. But the average salary of American professors scarcely exceeds that sum, so that it can be imagined how welcome such a pension must prove.

V.

By offering a guarantee against the financial hardships of old age, the Carnegie Foundation is dignifying the calling of university teacher in America, and attracting to it men of high qualifications who would otherwise have entered some other profession. By any improvement of the teaching staff the students are, of course, bound to profit; and, thanks to the Carnegie Foundation, not only will their younger teachers be more gifted in future, but their older teachers will be put on the retired list as soon as their term of usefulness is at an end. Thus the universities and colleges will be continually freshened by an infusion of vigorous new blood.

VI.

But the Carnegie Foundation is raising the standards of American universities in other directions as well. Nowhere, except perhaps in India, has the word university been more atrociously abused than in America. All over the United States pseudo-universities have sprung up in such numbers that Americans have completely lost count of the number of degree-granting institutions of higher learning under the Stars and Stripes. In North America there are at least a thousand universities and colleges, but the number of those which really deserve the title is, needless to say, only a fraction of that imposing total. In many parts of America, we are told, "any five citizens of the United States, resident anywhere, although all of them might be unable to read or write, and might be dependents of the community in a poorhouse, can form themselves into a university under authority of an Act of Congress." And, we are told further, these powers have been freely exercised.

The Carnegie Foundation, therefore, on entering on its work, found itself faced with a very perplexing problem. It had to grant pensions to professors in American colleges and universities, but it found no generally accepted definition of a university or college in the United States. Nothing daunted, the Foundation—whose trustees include the most eminent university presidents and authorities in America—began straightway to weed out the sham from the true institutions of higher education. They decided that, in order that members of its staff should be eligible for retiring allowances, a university or college must satisfy certain conditions. They laid it down that "an institution to be ranked as a college must have at least six professors giving their entire time to college and university work, a course of four full years in liberal arts and sciences, and should require for admission not less than the usual four years of academic or high school preparation, or its equivalent, in addition to the pre-academic or grammar school studies."

VII.

What has been the result? The real universities of America have been sifted from the soi-disant universities. The smaller colleges and universities have been given an incentive to raise their entrance standards and improve their teaching facilities; in order to participate in the benefits of the Carnegie Foundation many of these weaker institutions have, of their own accord, acquired new strength and status. Others, again, have been spurred into shaking off the denominational control which kept them from having a share in Mr. Carnegie's benefaction. As a powerful centralising influence in a country where unity in matters educational has been sadly lacking in the past, the Carnegie Foundation is doing its best to ensure that for the next generation university development in America shall be in the direction of better quality rather than of greater quantity, as has been the case in the past twenty or thirty years.

VIII.

And if the Carnegie Foundation has already done so much for university education in North America, and is destined to do still more in years to come, other parts of the world are also profiting by the labours of the Foundation, which is conducting a series of investigations into university problems whose scope is not confined to that particular continent. The results of these inquiries are published in the form of bulletins. Already valuable reports on medical education in the United States and Canada, and also in Europe, have been prepared for the Foundation by an expert Commissioner, and similar bulletins are promised on legal education, training of teachers, graduate schools, dentistry, training of nurses, and kindred subjects of enduring, international importance.

THE LIE

By CHARLES FOLEY

IN one of the side chapels of the old church of Maurecourt, dedicated to the Holy Virgin, its little altar all bright with azaleas, Amélie and her aunt fell reverently upon their knees as the sacred Host was elevated. Clear and sweet the little bell rang out in the solemn stillness, and the young girl humbly bowed her snowy neck with its silken tendrils of soft chestnut hair. As she knelt there, fervid and devout, her delicately cut features stood out in clear relief in the shadow of the pillar. Above, the time-worn old organ groaned and gasped and creaked, wheezing out one by one, as if chary of letting them go, the opening notes of the hymn "O Salutaris." Then a man's voice, soft, solemn, and rich, rose, at first wavering and tremulous; then, taking flight boldly, it soared aloft, strong and powerful, in swelling waves of sound. The voice seemed to stir and thrill her with a poignant recollection, and, bending lower still, she hid her burning cheeks in her trembling hands. In vain she strove to banish the haunting vision and give herself up to the contemplation of the Divine Sacrifice; the voice, so like the much-loved voice, seemed to enfold her gently and caressingly with its harmonious tones, and swiftly and irresistibly her thoughts flew back to the past.

She recalled the château of Maurecourt, the property of her aunt and guardian, Madame Mazubert, and the lawn where they used to play croquet. She could see herself, the orphan of seventeen summers, in all the pride of her first long skirt.

She could see the Abbé Fustel's nephew—shy, silent André, a tall boy of nineteen, whose black, velvety eyes expressed all that he could not put into words. He was always ill at ease, and blushed absurdly whenever he happened to be near her, and if she was watching him at croquet he always missed his hoop. The other young men paid her visible homage. Fustel invariably held aloof. Yet hardly had she turned away when she was conscious of rapturous glances resting upon her. The youth was much chaffed for his self-conscious timidity, and she would join in the laughter, to try and rouse him from his torpor of shyness and urge him on to be bolder. When the others ventured to talk love to her, her mind was full of him, sad, silent André. He absorbed her, attracted her, slowly fascinated her. One evening, when the rest of the party had gone to watch some fireworks on the lawn, they two stayed behind alone in the fir avenue. Why, she never knew, but she felt very penitent at having pained him, and tearfully and humbly she asked his forgiveness. Enfolding her with one of his caressing looks, André, in his sonorous deep voice, which made the most trivial words seem solemn, answered: "I was quite sure that you were too beautiful not to be good and kind as well." Then he took her hand without a trace of awkwardness. And in the dark avenue, wrapped in mist, side by side they wandered, lost to the outside world, murmuring sweet, vague words to each other. No solemn plight of love had passed their lips; but their eyes had pledged eternal vows, their souls had made but one that rapturous evening.

Meanwhile, up in the organ-loft the deep voice had ceased, its last echoes blending with the priest's bell, then dying away. The congregation rose from their knees, but Amélie, plunged in her dreams, knelt on. Her aunt, Madame Mazubert, always careful of appearances, was for moderation in everything, and, fearing lest her excessive devoutness should be remarked upon, laid a thin, imperious finger on her niece's arm.

GENERAL BUILDINGS,
ALDWYCH, LONDON, W.C.

Thus suddenly aroused out of her reverie, still seeing nothing but the dark shadows of the pine trees of her dreams, Amélie blushed and rose hastily. And now, the drawling, nasal chant of the choir drove the memory of that balmy night, scented with the wood anemones, away, and she recalled the subsequent sudden journey to Paris. For several years after that her aunt had travelled about with her. They had been to Switzerland, to Italy, to Germany, everywhere save to the little village so near—sweet little Maurecourt, the very name of which moved her to the very depths of her soul. Once only in despair had she asked what had become of Fustel, and Madame Mazubert pretended not to know, and answered with simulated indifference: "Who did you say? Ah, yes, Fustel, that tall fellow with the stupid eyes. What has become of him? How should I know? Anyhow, he hasn't a penny, has no prospects whatever, and no manners. . . . I never wish to see him again!" . . . And never again was André Fustel's name mentioned—tall André, who in the fir avenue had possessed himself of her heart in that slight clasp of the hand.

"And why," wondered the young girl, as the mass came to an end, "why am I brought back to Maurecourt to-day? And was it by chance merely that I heard that voice, so like the voice of him of whom I may not speak?" Her heart was brimful of anguish and hope. At all costs she must know. Turning to Madame Mazubert, she said in a low, trembling voice: "Don't you think the voice that sang the Salutaris . . .?"

"What about the voice?" asked her aunt sharply, with a cold, stern look glancing keenly at her.

"That it must be André Fustel's voice?"

"Very likely," said Madame Mazubert, affecting a chilly unconcern. "It is most probably Fustel's!"

She was just about to add some explanatory remark, but the young girl turned so pale and clutched her prie-dieu so convulsively that her aunt checked herself, fearing a scene in church.

Fortunately, the service had come to an end. They both rose and walked towards the porch, then crossed the broad space in front of the sacred edifice to the row of lime trees that enclosed it. Neighbours and friends pressed round her with words of welcome, and Madame Mazubert smiled amicably, but never once lost sight of Amélie.

She saw that the poor child was terribly upset, and either from pity or from fear of a scene in front of prying, inquisitive eyes—or was it that her courage failed her to tell her niece the whole truth?—she said to her hurriedly:

"Go and congratulate Monsieur Fustel from me; he sang very well indeed; you have my full permission. It is a matter of indifference to me now. It is better, you should know."

"So it really was André?"

Very troubled in mind, full of a vague apprehension, Amélie walked back to the empty church as if in a dream. At the foot of the dark, narrow staircase leading up to the organ she found herself suddenly face to face with Fustel. In the dim light her eyes sought those of the young man. They seemed to her as in the old days, full of a deep joy, and yet they were changed: they had a sadder expression, and looked sunken in the thin face.

And as he pushed open the door wider to let the light in upon the gloom, a chill despair struck her breast. She saw that he was wearing a priest's cassock.

He held out his hand with a faint, melancholy smile. "Is it really you?" she said, shrinking from him, and her face grew ashen and her voice died away. To put her at her ease he answered the questions that he knew were trembling on her lips.

"Well, you see, I was only ordained three weeks ago. This is the last time I shall sing here. I leave to-day for my small living, right on the other side of the diocese, in a very lonely part of the country, but I shall be amongst kind, good people. I entered the priests' seminary very soon after your betrothal. I made up my mind finally about the time that Madame Mazubert informed me of your marriage.

"At first I thought it seemed hard; . . . then gradually, very gradually, I grew to like my vocation, and now I am quite happy. And you, Madame, you are happy too?"

That cruel word "Madame" pierced her to the heart. Now she understood it all—their one walk together, that single lovers' walk spied upon; then Madame Mazubert's brazen untruth, which with one blow had irrevocably put an end to all hope in that great, simple soul.

Seeing he expected an answer and that he was surprised and concerned at her strange silence, Amélie roused herself. Not even with the shadow of a regret would she dim the calm purity of this humble priest's life, and with a strong determination she resolved to keep all her sorrow and pain to herself.

So she answered, bravely lying: "Yes, thank you. I, too, am perfectly happy." Then, heedless of appearing ungrateful and inconsistent, she said good-bye, as if impatient for him to go. And when he was out of sight she fled to the darkness of the narrow staircase to hide the big tears that scorched her eyelids.

They never saw each other again.—Translated by Margaret Hogg.

TO A DEAD LOVE

AH, little love of mine laid low!
When soft as shrouding snow upon a dying flower
Your wearied eyelids met and held; when in that hour
Your little hand in mine lay cold and still, and Death
On sable wing leaned down, and gleaned the last slow breath

That bore your tender soul back to Infinity;
When to unheeding ears, so eager once to lend Themselves at Love's behest, did my vain cries ascend

Like sparks that scatter, soar, then futile fall
Into the fire's most fiery heart again; when all
The bitterness that empty endless years will roll
With devastating grief upon my stricken soul
Pass'd in grim prophecy before me; did you know
Aught of that anguish'd hour, O Love of mine laid low?

Nay! for on your calm dead brow grief's finger left no trace

To mar the still aloofness of your quiet face;
Impregnable in Death's cold isolation,
No burdened sighs, no tears, no bitter supplication
Dimm'd in that solemn hour of Passing the serene Inscrutability of your majestic mien.
'And as the autumn leaves unheeded from the tree
Descend in eddying uncertainty, Caught by conflicting winds, but reaching earth to die,

So on your unresponsive lips my kisses lie,
Kisses wherewith your fleeting soul I thought in blind
Self-seeking longer yet to bind;—
Too late, alas! . . . And I thank God 'twas so—
You did not know, O little love of mine laid low!

MASTERPIECE FOR THE WEEK

THE CONFESSIONS OF SAINT AUGUSTINE * * BY PROF. J. S. PHILLIMORE

Miserationes tuae de medullis meis confitentur

"Here is a copy of my 'Confessions' which you wanted. Scrutinise me in them, and there is no fear that you will praise me for more than I am; take my word, in them, about myself, not what other people say of me; study me in them, and see all that I was, in myself and of myself. And if you shall anyways think well of me, join with me in praising, as I do in them, Him whom I sought to make men praise on my account."—Letter to Darius.

"My 'Confessions,' in XIII. Books, praise the goodness and justice of God alike in the good and in the bad of my life, and arouse the intellect and emotions of men towards Him. This was their effect on me personally in the writing of them, and so it is in the reading of them. How they may strike other people, I leave it to them to say; but I do know that they please, and have pleased, many of the brethren greatly."—From the "Retractationes," written thirty years later.

"Men are as curious to hear about other people's lives as they are slow to amend their own."—"Confessions," Book X., Chap. 3.

"What am I now, at the very moment when I make these Confessions? Many would like to know this, many who know me, and yet know me not; who have heard something from me or of me, but have never put their ear close to my heart, where my real self is, such as it is. Well, they would like to hear me confess what I am in myself, inwardly, further inwards than their eye or ear or thought can carry. But this wish implies that they mean to believe my word, and not to pursue their own investigations. That would be impossible. In fact they find in the charity of their own goodness the assurance that in these Confessions I do not lie: it is just this charity in them which believes me."—Ibidem.

I.

SINCE the value of this and of all such books as enter into the same category, whether they lie nearer the frontier of devout ejaculations or march with Autobiography, depends absolutely on their sincerity, it seemed well to put forward these few texts as a key to the spirit in which we ought to approach the "Confessions." Let me suppose a new reader approaching the book for the first time. What must he expect to find? Scandalous secrets? A cynical violation of the accepted reticences, as in Rousseau? He would totally misconceive the work. Let him bear one thing in mind: that Augustine is not so much the penitent at the tribunal of penance, taking the reader for his witness to attest a solemn abjuration of past error, as the Confessor in the sense in which our English King Edward and others have been canonised, declaring, asserting, vindicating, professing his faith: never in any sense is the reader installed as Confessor. Put away from your mind the "Confessions" of Jean Jacques and recall rather the "Confession" of Saint Patrick, written a generation later. Something of a defiance, something of a defence against detractors; but, above all, the thankful, exultant narrative of a miracle of grace. The miracle has been worked in his own person, and the book must be alive with personality in every line. In language that exploits the whole register of praise and awe and admiration, Augustine on his hilltops sings a pæan over his old dead self, lying away back in the valley.

II.

In this book, which is so mainly concerned with ego, there is a marvellous freedom from egoism, for Augustine's key is not "See what I have done!" but "See what the grace of God has done in me!" No archness of sensitive though hungry vanity, no pretending that this is another's story and not his own, no shy self-consciousness, no awkward toning down of the full, natural rhetoric of great emotions into an academic reserve. The truth cries aloud. If anybody refuses to accept the sincerity of the "Confessions," it is idle to argue with him: you cannot prove that a beanfield smells sweet, or that the "Ode to a Nightingale" is a good poem. If they are not sincere, the "Confessions" are nothing: do not read them. Is not their sincerity guaranteed by the very frequency of the ego, ego? But it is no egoism (unless egoism be also a virtue, as Froude suggested) to state in the first person a personal experience and an assertion which can be made on no other person's authority. He is no more egoistic than the Psalmist or St. Paul. We judge these matters rather superficially in English: perhaps the only necessary spelling reform in our language is to write the first personal pronoun with a small instead of a capital letter: je and ich can go monologuing away by the page together, unembarrassed.

III.

Augustine wrote his "Confessions" just 200 years before his great namesake came to Canterbury. Already eight years a priest and three years a bishop, he reviews the forty-three years of his life. He looks right back beyond memory to the very rudiments of infant sensation and expression, inferring from what he has seen in others what must have been in himself. Then it is the elementary school at Tagaste; how he was beaten; how he hated his Greek and the paraphrases they made him do at the grammar school of Madaura; the vanities and absurdities of a rhetorical education. (It is one of many points in him which remind us of Newman, when he avows that, though he condemns the literary education he had got, literature he loves and cherishes; for language makes "elect and precious vessels," only the contents may disgrace them.) Then it is that boyish theft of some pears, stolen (as he mercilessly analyses it) in mere bravado and lawless mischief; and now a still-burning shame in memory thirty years after.

IV.

His intellect first awoke to problems of philosophy when he read Cicero's "Hortensius"; he had a great literary contempt for the Bible, which lasted as long as he misconceived it as an oracle for every private mind to interpret it as best it might. As a University student in Carthage he found the older classical sects all in dissolution, and it was Manichæism which captured his youthful restlessness and detained him prisoner for nine years. With horror and astonishment he looks back on this obscene system of fads and superstitions, which we can nowadays see creeping up around us, revived under other names, daily increasing in popularity and power. (A single specimen will suffice: "It is a sin to pick a fig, because it gives the fig pain.") It must be said that he was a nominal adherent rather than an enthusiast in that City of Confusion. From nineteen to twenty-eight it is a story of literary and scholastic ambitions (at twenty-two he is a professor at Carthage), and the faithful liaison with the woman who had made him the father of Adeodatus at eighteen. He broke with her, after fourteen years, in 385.

In 383, his fortieth year, he had escaped from Manichæism only to fall into Academicism: but this could only be an interval of suspense; such a rocketing impulse towards the truth could not stay long in a polite negation. His removal to Rome comported a spiritual move which he little thought of: his immediate motives were ambition and a desire to escape the barbarous rowdiness of the African students. Few pages are more dramatic than his account how he gave Monica, his mother, the slip at St. Cyprian's Tomb, and sailed without her for Rome.

V.

'And now begins that spiritual pilgrimage of doubt and search which reads to us as poignant and actual as the journal of some waif in the modern welter. He could not rest: whither must he turn? He had long looked askance at Catholics, imbued with the feeling that they had a secret, but it could be no good to ask them for a clue. And, besides (how modern it seems!), at the same time, he is quite sure he knows all about their doctrine without learning it. That claimant might be dismissed unheard. The anxious inquiry proceeds through an atmosphere of increasing intensity: the language of this marvellous master of style rises and subtilises in riches and finesse, exploring and voicing in lyrical eloquence the distress and anguish of mind of a doubter's crisis, and the first faint sense that he is pointing right towards convalescence. There is nothing rigid, formal, legalistic about this Latinity, which stands as great a monument of personality expressed in pure, single jets of speech as Catullus' lyrics or Cicero's Letters 450 years before. All is breathing, sometimes sobbing with emotion: the most trivial phrases seem to glow and vibrate. Now one "difficulty," now another holds and torments him; now the painful effort of his mind, which dealt so readily in the real and pictorial, to conceive God as incorporeal, unextended Spirit; now the problem on which he was afterwards to write so much—the Origin of Evil.

VI.

Further promotion transfers him from Rome to Milan, near the Court and near St. Ambrose. At this time Plato was leading him safe through some of his tangles. And soon we are in the penumbra of truth. The last shadows are to disappear, not by more reading and more meditation, but before a great personal influence. When Augustine first heard Ambrose preach "he took no interest in the matter, which he scorned"; but the manner and style he admired, and he liked the man. Next we find him wistfully admiring and envying Ambrose's great authority and influence, "but not his celibacy." And now, once in contact with lives and not books merely, once within the atmosphere of the Church, he "rejoiced and blushed at once" to find that he had been rejecting imaginary doctrines of a misunderstood system. And at last the crisis comes quickly: with his dearest friends, Nebridius and Alypius, he makes a kind of retreat, determined to solve the intolerable question, to capture "the great hope which has arisen before us."

VII.

The famous Victorinus' conversion gives the devout seekers a further shake. In writing of this event, Augustine has an admirable answer to a charge of spiritual snobism: "Do not many return to Thee from a deeper abyss of blindness than Victorinus, and draw near, and are illuminated, by receiving that light which all who receive from Thee get the power to become Thy sons? Yes: but if they are not such public personages, even their friends rejoice less over them. For when there is a general rejoicing, the joy is the richer for it in each individual, because they warm one another and are mutually fired."

Hearing of the marvels of Egyptian monasticism excites them yet further; and now we read the most penetrating analysis of a soul which feels the grace approaching very, very near, and feels itself borne forward to fuse in a consummation. But the last is not quite yet: there are the last shrinkings and shudderings of the natural man of desire: "Give me chastity—but not now": "the 'will to believe' still half disabled, not sturdy and entire." How these are all suddenly consumed, when, sitting in the garden at Ostia, suffering extreme mental distresses, he hears the "Pick it up and read!" which led his hand to the copy of St. Paul's Epistles and to the precise text, "Not in riotings and drunkenness," etc., is an episode known even to many who know nothing else of the "Confessions." The long crescendo of stress and of striving culminates in a full and steady contentment. He has arrived. His instruction and baptism by St. Ambrose and the deathbed of St. Monica complete the IXth Book.

VIII.

The remaining four are very different in character, more metaphysical and theological, less of the history of a soul. The general reader may be pardoned for thinking them rather dry by contrast. And yet Dante, who borrowed from Bk. IV. the hint for his famous Amor che a nulla amata amar perdona, borrowed also from a phrase in Bk. XIII. (Ch. 19) some part of his vision of spiritual luminaries in Paradise. For even here the language is of that quality which excites to poetry by countless stimuli.

IX.

But how full of famous and splendid sayings are those first nine books! "I was not yet a lover, only in love with love." "Grown-up people dignify their nonsense with the name of business." "The human heart is restless until it find its rest in Thee." "Thine ear was listening at my heart, and I knew not; and when I sought resolutely in silence, the speechless contritions of my heart were great voices crying aloud to Thy mercy." One could stock a commonplace book from here only. How suggestive are the very digressions—such as that discussion on the pleasure of tragedy in Bk. III., Ch. 2!

X.

The Second Spring of Latin Literature has several great names: in Prudentius, a poet who rivals Lucretius and Catullus in spontaneous energy; in St. Augustine, a prose writer who shows how the huge sails of Ciceronianism could be refilled with a wind of new emotion and reality. One may guess that he wrote none of his works, not even that great philosophy of history, the "De Civitate Dei," with such a single and unfaltering gusto of inspiration as these "Confessions," which speak to us moderns on whom once more, as in his days, "the ends of the world are come," with the power and persuasion of a living voice.

SEE the mountains kiss high heaven,
And the waves clasp one another;
No sister-flower would be forgiven
If it disdained its brother.
And the sunlight clasps the earth,
And the moonbeams kiss the sea;
What is all this sweet work worth
If thou kiss not me?

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Owing to the large number of letters received it is necessary for correspondents to write briefly if their letters are to appear.

BALZAC AND DUMAS.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I find in your issue of August 1st a letter, entitled "Balzac and Dumas," which would first startle and then tickle the fancy of any French person (of ever so little literary culture and taste) coming across it. With apologies to you and EVERYMAN for my incorrect English, may I try to answer it? "P. F. H.," of Birmingham, the writer, taking upon himself a task which surely even Faguet or Lemaître would decline to perform, starts by declaring unhesitatingly Alexandre Dumas to be "the greatest of all French writers." That he does without the shadow of a doubt, either in thought or expression, it seems, because what can be more superlative than his lapidary way of putting it? It sounds almost threatening to venturing contradictors! Then he wishes to know "why it is that this greatest of all French writers is so completely forgotten by those who write about Frenchmen such as Balzac," and wonders, finally, if it is "because Dumas is so undeniably the one great man since Shakespeare"?

I entertain the vague hope that the above is but a paradox "à la Jean Jacques Rousseau." But if it is not, if "P. F. H." is really in earnest, my second hope—precise and strong this time—is that such a literary heretic (I humbly beg the correspondent's pardon) may, at least, not be French. I know how very difficult it is for a foreigner reading French to master and appreciate all the subtle "nuances" of our "delitable parole." I fully realise that for those unable to read French, translation is a gigantic hindrance to their appreciation of "le style." Therefore, if "P. F. H." belongs to either of these two classes, his literary sin may be less grievous than it appears.

To his two brief questions may I answer as briefly:

(1) Those who write about Frenchmen such as Balzac know that in writing for a weekly paper of EVERYMAN's literary standard they must deal with literature, and leave out, possibly, a man like Dumas, who does not really belong to this realm. Dumas's huge imagination and extreme facility of writing may have been mistaken for genius by many with an erring taste, but he does not deceive the scanning eye of modern literary criticism.

(2) The reason, then, of his being ignored by people who know would be that "he is so undeniably the one writer without which pure literature in general, and French literature especially, would not have lost one jot of its intrinsic value."

I wish I could go deeper into the matter and make a closer comparison between Dumas and the glorious three whom "P. F. H." brushes aside so contemptuously. Indeed, I wish I could compare him yet to another one, whose "Madame Bovary" "P. F. H." did not perhaps think of when he granted the final literary "est" crown of the superlative to the author of "Les 3 Mousquetaires" and "Monte Cristo." . . . But we are asked to be brief, and I have still another point to discuss.

I heard an Englishman say once about an ugly girl that, "after all, beauty was only a matter of degree." I am inclined to think that the same thing might be said of fame. Dumas is still famous in France, still widely read in a wide circle of admirers. But who are these and where do they read his pseudo-historic (?) romances (which cannot be called "history"!). They are (1) the men and women of the poorer classes, "le rude populaire," to quote Ronsard, who have not had the luck of being educated; (2) the enthusiastic school-boys of fifteen, whose untaught taste relishes volumes of thrilling adventures better than a beautiful page of perfect French. They will all find the ever-flowing stream of their favourite's prose at the "rez de chaussée" of some halfpenny daily paper in the beloved "feuilleton," or they may buy it in weekly penny "livraison" (which Jules Rouffe edited so profusely in the days of my youth!). Educated children will grow out of this lack of refinement; working people may keep to it, finding in these romances a solace to their sufferings, the fulfilment of their denied hopes. I do not know if there would be many other readers beside these nowadays.

Lastly, could I ask "P. F. H." whether, before crowning Dumas with such "désinvolture," and being sorry for him, he gave all the other writers a fair chance by examining their works? We have had many a writer since Shakespeare died. Even if the quality seems to be in "P. F. H.'s" eyes "to write a masterpiece in each of the divisions of literature"—thus barring our seventeenth century and modern times—what place would he give men such as Voltaire, Rousseau, Chateaubriand, Hugo, and Michelet?

No, most decidedly, "Nul n'est prophète en son pays": never could Dumas have expected from his compatriots to be raised above so many and placed in the immediate neighbourhood of "The Swan of Avon." Might I suggest he would have been surprised?

With all best wishes for the growing success of EVERYMAN, to which I am indebted for many agreeable holiday hours,—I am, sir, etc., J. DOZAT.

Chanonat, par Veyre, Puy de Dôme, France,
August 4th, 1913.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Although I presume that Mr. Maurice Endepols' letter is intended as a reply to mine, the writer has entirely failed to understand my letter, and has also misconstrued my references to Shakespeare, whom I may say I consider, with every other student of literature, to be the greatest man the world has ever seen.

To develop my meaning. When I said that Dumas often got his plots ready-made, and because of this his genius was discredited, I said that the same thing could equally well be said about Shakespeare. Let me take "King Lear," for example, as Mr. Endepols recommends. The plot of this was found by Shakespeare in Holinshed and an old play called "The True Chronicle History of King Lear and his Three Daughters," while the plot centring round Gloucester was suggested by part of Sir Philip Sidney's "Arcadia."

To consider Dumas in the same way: the basis of "The Three Musketeers" was "The Memoirs of D'Artagnan"; and as Shakespeare created from his raw material the magnificent drama of "Lear," so Dumas created the immortal pages of "The Three Musketeers." This is as far as I intended the comparison of Dumas to Shakespeare to go, and as far as this I still maintain it—but no further.

This reference to Shakespeare is a minor point which has been made too much of by Mr. Endepols. The basis of my letter he leaves practically untouched; that is, my question why Dumas is so often ignored. He does insinuate that Dumas is not a great writer, not even to be compared with Balzac. Mr. Endepols

MYTH AND LEGEND in Literature and Art

A SERIES OF SIX BEAUTIFUL BOOKS OF SPECIAL INTEREST TO "EVERYMAN" READERS.

HEY retell in prose the world's great legends, those old stories of undying interest and charm that have come down to us from the earth's earliest era; from a time when imagination was given free rein, and fancy went uncurbed.

The great world of nature and the deep facts of life, from which these stories arise, are the same to-day as thousands of years ago; hence their enduring life.

To Book-lovers

these volumes will appeal irresistibly, owing, in the first place, to the fascination of the great stories they enshrine, and to an even greater degree, because of the light these stories shed upon the work of the greatest prose writers and poets of the world, who have drawn freely and abundantly from mythology; with the result that no one can fully appreciate the best literature without a knowledge of mythology.

To Musicians

and people with musical tastes and interests these volumes come as a real boon. A knowledge of the basic idea enables one to enter into the spirit of a composer's music; to obtain a firmer grasp of his aims and objects. Practically all the librettos of Wagner's operas are founded upon mythology, while among other composers who have found inspiration from this copious source may be mentioned Gluck, Bellini, Weber, Gounod, Berlioz, Liszt, and Mendelssohn.

To those interested in Art

it will be unnecessary to point out that the most famous painters and sculptors have, from the most remote times down to the present day, drawn very largely upon mythology for subjects. As an aid in estimating their artistic achievements, an acquaintance with the attributes of the gods and heroes of ancient days is most useful.

To Stamp Collectors

the volumes also appeal because many of the postage stamps that are in use, or have been used, throughout the world, bear representations of mythological characters and heroes. A knowledge of the exploits of the originals of these figures will add a new interest to the hobby.

LAVISHLY ILLUSTRATED & ARTISTICALLY BOUND

The volumes are illustrated with numerous beautiful reproductions of famous pictures and original drawings, executed in colour and duotone. There are close upon TWO HUNDRED of these full-page plates included in the complete set of six volumes. Each volume is strongly bound in cloth richly decorated with gilt.

"T.P.'s Weekly" says:

"An understanding of the personalities of the Nibelungen would help many of those who attribute their non-comprehension of Wagner's 'Ring' to the author's philosophy rather than to unfamiliarity with the legendary background."

"The Bookman" says:

"The study of the old stories of the world is one which is becoming increasingly popular, and in the handsome volumes issued by The Gresham Publishing Company we have them set before us in a highly attractive form. Mr. Moncrieff's version of the mythological stories of Greece and Rome is written in a most fascinating manner, and one which cannot fail to claim the reader's attention from start to finish."

BEAUTIFUL BOOKLET FREE.

To The GRESHAM PUBLISHING COMPANY,

34-5, Southampton Street, Strand, London, W.C.

Please send me the Illustrated Booklet describing "MYTH AND LEGEND IN LITERATURE AND ART," and containing five specimen plates (one in colours), also special terms to readers of "EVERYMAN."

NAME.....

ADDRESS

...uses Balzac's importance on being the leader of the Realistic movement, but Dumas is quite as important as the leader of the Romantic movement, one much greater than that of Realism in its influence and consequence in France.

Lastly, I should like to correct one more misstatement of Mr. Endepols; he writes that I say "The Fencing Master" should be considered as one of the world's literary masterpieces. This is hardly to be gathered from any part of my letter, and I do not wish to rank "The Fencing Master," although a good book, so high as Mr. Endepols suggests.

From the "only four or five" masterpieces which Mr. Endepols mentions I am inclined to doubt if he has read any of Dumas' works; and to gather a faint idea of the sway of Dumas' work and personality in England alone, might I recommend to Mr. Endepols the numerous essays and critiques in appreciation of Dumas to be found in the works of some of England's greatest men; for instance, Thackeray, Stevenson, Lang, Henley, Swinburne, Rossetti, and Saintsbury, to mention but a few?

Finally, if the few loose statements and objections of Mr. Maurice Endepols are all he has to say "against" my letter, he only makes me confirm still stronger to my statement that Dumas is the greatest of French writers.—I am, sir, etc.,

PERCIVAL F. HINTON.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I did not answer Mr. P. F. H. last week because I thought it was not serious to call Dumas "the only great man since Shakespeare." But as your correspondent, Mr. Endepols, has taken the trouble to show how insignificant, considering the influence they had on their generation, Dumas appears when compared to Balzac, may I add the following hints:

(1) Unfortunately Balzac has indulged in many of his books in that "Las romantisme" which is the chief character of Dumas' works, and let me say at once, had he not written "Eugénie Grandet," "Father Goriot," "César Birotteau," etc., he would be as unimportant in French literature as Eugène Süe.

(2) It is absolutely wrong to suggest, as Mr. P. F. H. does, that one has to invent the subject of one's works to be a great writer. I shall simply remark, after many others, that Racine and Corneille never laid claim to inventing their plots. And what about La Fontaine! He did not invent one of his fables. A writer may imitate all his life, as long as "cette imitation n'est pas un esclavage." It would be possible to quote here A. de Musset's famous words: "C'est imiter quelqu'un que de planter des choux." Dumas is simply considered as a minor writer because in his plays he never rose above melodrama, and his novels contain no more psychology or study of characters than "feuilletons."

(3) Mr. P. F. H. seems to believe that a man who writes in every branch of literature is greater than one who confines himself to a particular way. Nothing is more untrue. Even the greatest geniuses who have stretched their sphere of activity everywhere, nearly always owe their fame to a particular branch (Shakespeare to his plays, V. Hugo to his verses). And we may be sure that Daudet, G. Sand, and Balzac, though they were only novelists, occupy in French literature a higher place than Dumas, who tried everything.—I am, sir, etc.,

L. SENEQUIER.

High Barnet (Herts), August 9th, 1913.

"EVERYMAN" AND G. K. CHESTERTON.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Though "E. H.'s" protest against G. K. Chesterton was sufficiently obscure, the letter from "C. B.," which appeared in your issue of August 1st, appears, to my mind, to make confusion worse confounded. What are the grounds and what explanation is there for this sudden and strange attack upon Chesterton, Bennett, Shaw, Galsworthy, and Wells—the pilloried authors—whose names are said to "reek in the nostrils" of some of the readers of EVERYMAN? "C. B." charges EVERYMAN with having sacrificed its independence by "truckling to the idols of the marketplace." Surely narrowness is not independence, and it seems to me to be a gross form of odious provincialism to suggest that a formal taboo should be established against the authors whom "C. B." mentions. Chesterton, Bennett, Shaw, Galsworthy, and Wells may not be the best leaders of present-day opinion, but they are, at all events, indubitably the leaders in certain definite lines of thought. Mr. Wells particularly is incontestably one of the most original and striking of present-day social theorists, a clear and penetrating thinker and a master of lucidity in style. Though wholly in agreement with the desirability of EVERYMAN fulfilling its function and extending encouragement to writers of lesser fame, I must strongly protest against "C. B.'s" suggestion that the columns of EVERYMAN should be flooded with literary mediocrities.—I am, sir, etc.,

Folkestone.

DONALD R. SPENDLOVE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—If there is any significance in the name of your paper, then its pages are open to your correspondents' display of wisdom and—within reason—of their folly. With this latter limitation in mind, one can imagine how you must have hesitated to include the contributions of "E. H." and "C. B."

Will not the bulk of your readers agree that those who eagerly read Mr. Chesterton far outnumber those who (as your correspondents would have us believe) are "tired" of him? There are doubtless some who have not the comprehension or literary insight to detect in this particular writer the sustained effort made to uphold the cause of democracy, to preserve the freedom of choice, and to protest that the theories and social life of to-day are surely tending to obscure the fixed aims and natural aspirations of the normal human being. These things he has plainly stated, and also presented to us in a hundred fanciful ways, for our consideration and guidance; and even when dealing with or reviewing the specific lines and work of such men as Dickens, Watts, Blake, or Browning, the same notes are sounded and maintained.

To listen to what this observant and thoughtful man has to say, to recognise his daring literary genius, and to honour him as a redoubtable fighter are all surely within the scope of EVERYMAN?—I am, sir, etc.,

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—In some points I agree with your correspondent "C. B.," though I am an admirer of Chesterton; but my object in writing is simply to point out an irritating error into which he (in common with so many!) falls when he says, "The Frankenstein you have created will be the death of him." If he reads Mrs. Shelley's famous book he will see that Frankenstein was the name of the creator of the monster, not of the creature he created.—I am, sir, etc.,

CHARLOTTE BRONTË'S LETTERS.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I read with interest Miss Margaret Hamilton's article on the letters of Charlotte Brontë. It is good to know of her sympathetic understanding with the self-tormented, unhappy genius; but it seems to me that she has dealt tenderly with the woman at the expense of the man. When speaking of the silence which was the only reply Charlotte's impassioned letters received, Miss Hamilton says, "Had Héger replied to the letters in the business-like fashion of a stolid man . . . the episode would have been ended. . . . The Philistine soul of the Flemish bourgeois was incapable of facing such a situation, frightened to death at handling it. Only a stupid man would have refrained from answering. . . ."

This is indeed a hard criticism. It would tax some other souls more sensitive than that of a Philistine-Flemish bourgeois to deal rightly with "such a situation."

A young and more than ordinarily romantic English girl made an ideal of her professor. He had treated her apparently with some little kindness, and his brusquerie and even rudeness she had transformed for herself into satisfactory behaviour. When she left the school she desired innocently a friendly correspondence. Her desire was not shared in the same way by her professor. It is true he authorised her to write to him (Letter II.), but then he was pre-eminently a teacher, if we may judge from "Villette," and would be interested in his pupil's progress. A teacher may bid a pupil write, but it does not follow that the teacher always answers, nor is even bound to do so.

Her letters proved to be rich in feeling—even passion. Should he have given a shock to her niceties by forbidding her to write to him when she had probably told him how much his friendship meant to her (and how could such a letter be composed?), or should he have feigned a friendship and have replied? If he had replied no one can ever tell where the correspondence would have led, but at least we may be sure that Charlotte would have loathed the pretence had she known of it. Only one course was left open—silence. For many women (this is not intended to cast a slur on Charlotte's behaviour) silence would have worked, and would have been less terrible than words on paper.

Again, Miss Hamilton is averse to the publication of the letters, but she blames not so much those who caused them to be published, but Héger. She says, "A woman's letters should be held sacred by the man to whom she writes . . . he should take steps to see that they do not fall into alien hands." When friends of like or unlike sex have plighted troth, letters should be sacred, but even then it must be remembered that sacredness is not synonymous with privacy. Héger did not treasure Charlotte's letters as she did his. He could not help that; we are unfortunately not always masters of our regards. There are many reasons, though, which may account for his not destroying them.

With regard to the publication of the letters of eminent people, I think with G. K. Chesterton that nothing which can be appreciated is too sacred to be given to the public. Letters such as those of the two Brownings, understandable only to each other, should never have been published. But we should be thankful for these letters, which throw light on a dark spot and place Charlotte Brontë yet a little higher in the estimation of the world.—I am, sir, etc.,

THE MAN BEFORE THE MAST.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Born and reared within sound of the "multi-tudinous laughter of the sea," and numbering many seafarers among my friends, Mr. Sheridan Jones's able article on the above subject proved of more than ordinary interest to me.

No one can question the premises and general conclusions of his article, and his sins are rather those of omission. Of course, in a short article it is impossible to deal with details, but I fear that when Mr. Jones proceeds to review and account for the seeming unattractiveness of the sea to Britishers nowadays, he has omitted many salient reasons underlying same. I should like to refer to one especially, viz., the exacting regulations of the Board of Trade, as evinced, say, for example, in the eye-tests. It is imperative that maritime regulations should be strict in such a dangerous vocation, but when exacting tests are introduced which have no relation whatever to the requirements at sea it is hardly to be expected that parents should desire their sons to follow a profession where the chances of advancement are so precarious and dependent upon the whims of the Board of Trade "experts." These eye-tests account in a very large measure for the present dearth of officers in the mercantile marine.

I know several sailors who are far from being colour-blind, but have been "turned back" because of their inability to distinguish between slight shades in colours—colours which could hardly, by any possibility, be met with at sea.

Is it likely that fellows are going to bear the drudgery of the necessary four years' experience in the fore-castle, only to find when they present themselves for examination that they are unable to circumvent the absurd regulations of the Board of Trade examinations?—I am, sir, etc.,

EVOLUTION AND SCRIPTURAL DOCTRINE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I, for one, am delighted to see this subject taken up in your columns. Though there is often much noise and a good deal of smoke evolved in the controversial battles which are fought around the subject of Evolution, yet perhaps some aspect of the truth may be set before us, or some false position—built on wrong conceptions—may be revealed in its true light.

For some years past I have given this subject earnest thought, and I have encountered various problems, some of which I have solved—or partially so—and others, again, which I cannot reduce to simpler denominations.

Now, granted that Evolution be true, it follows that there has been no period of "perfection," with a subsequent falling away from that state, but a gradual progression (not necessarily linear), or evolution to a higher and more intelligently and organised form of life. I therefore do not see the need of a "Redeemer" in the sense of that term, as used in the orthodox doctrine of Redemption. Except as one of the great Lights of the world, for what purpose would such a personality exist, and from what would he "redeem" us?

It seems to me, in the face of the evolutionary interpretation of the facts of Embryology, Palæontology, etc., etc., that the orthodox interpretation of the life and death of Christ is not tenable. Such interpretation, I submit, is not on a rational basis consistent with the facts of this universe, and the interpretation of such facts which is put upon them by every normal consciousness free from bias, religious, or otherwise.

I do not ignore the existence of sin in the world, but

RECORD BOOM IN CANADA.

GREAT FORTUNES MADE BY LAND OPERATORS.

£100,000 FOR £5.

"Express" Correspondent.

Montreal, May 31.

A block of land in Edmonton, Alberta, changed hands a few days ago for £100,000; twenty-one years ago the same block was sold for £5. These figures tell the story of a Canadian real estate boom without a parallel on the American Continent, and probably without an equal anywhere.

There is scarcely a clerk, shopkeeper, or wage-earner of any kind who has not feverishly invested his savings in a piece of land, hoping for a quick "turnover." It is estimated that in Winnipeg alone there are dozens of men who have made fortunes owing simply to the enormous rise in values due to the boom.

One man bought a lot in Winnipeg for £200 a few years ago; last summer he sold it for £1,000.

Here are some further examples which have come under our own notice.

40 lots, 2 1/2 miles from the centre of a large Canadian Western town, were purchased at $90 per lot. Circumstances compelled the owner to resell in two months, but he realised a profit of $10 per lot. The man to whom he sold, owing to an unforeseen local development, resold in twelve months at prices varying from 250 to 275 dollars per lot.

The decision of the Canadian Pacific Railway to build their western car shops in Calgary caused land in the vicinity to jump from $250 per acre to $2,000 per acre.

One fortunate man, after holding some City lots for five years, sold them for $15,000 each, having only paid $300 each in the first instance.

SOME EXTRAORDINARY OFFICIAL FACTS.

There is an inexhaustible supply of natural gas. MEDICINE HAT will be the PITTSBURG of CANADA, because Steel Works, Brick Works, Foundries, Cement Works, Milling Companies, NOW BUILT AND WORKING, have only to run a pipe to their Factories, light the gas, and they have enormous heat practically for nothing.

"The Daily Telegraph," 15th July, 1913, under the heading AMERICAN TARIFFS, quotes the Governor of Massachusetts:

"All over the United States the tendency among the principal manufacturing interests is towards the establishing of plants in Canada. This movement has been going on for many years, and it is estimated that from £60,000,000 to £100,000,000 of American capital is now invested in these Canadian plants."

This has happened in Medicine Hat. The development is so enormous that HUNDREDS OF PEOPLE are living in Tents. The houses cannot be built fast enough.

Here is your chance with Freehold Land as Security. So get into a Splendid Money-making Proposition. Our organisation comprises—Opportunities for all—For the weekly saver up to the big capitalist.

We are arranging ourselves to build upon the Estate we offer you because hundreds of workpeople are arriving and living, as already stated, in tents, and houses are sold as fast as they can be erected.

that is a personal matter, for which each individual himself must atone. Granting that there be a God, and that He is "Love," it does not accord with my idea of His justice to believe that someone is punished for sin which he has never committed. Sin, per se, is not hereditary, though its effects may be, and it remains for each to atone for individual sin, and to seek to let the ignoble traces of our evolutionary past sink into oblivion. The record of man's progress in the past gives the promise of the attainment of a nobler future, for Evolution of Man has surely not yet run its course.—I am, sir, etc., H. HEIGHTON.

THE CURSE OF USURY.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I would not consider your correspondent "Dolly's" letter worthy a reply were it not that, through appearing in EVERYMAN, the statements, though absolutely without foundation, might find credence in some quarters if allowed to go without challenge. Your correspondent says that the when and wherefore (sic) of the public auction is hushed and known alone to those in the trade, that these sales are attended by the few "in the know," and that it is by devious ways following upon this that "Uncle" makes his huge profits. Well, the method of hushing the when and the wherefore of the public auction is by publishing same in the leading daily paper, where a complete list of every sale of unredeemed pledges appears every Monday. This is printed in the form of a displayed advertisement, and appears upon the front page. All the auction rooms are in Trongate and Argyle Street (I am speaking of Glasgow, where I have been a pawnbroker for over thirty years), and outside of every auction room there is a sandwichman carrying a board announcing the sale, and with a summarised list of the goods to be sold. In addition to this, abbreviated catalogues of the "unredeemed pledges" are posted on the hoardings throughout the city. Quaint people are pawnbrokers and pawnbrokers' auctioneers for choosing such methods for "hushing" the when and the wherefore of their "sales."

The truth is—and I am speaking as one who knows—the matter of "unredeemed pledges" is, and has been as long as I remember, the bugbear of the business. The pawnbroker who one year with another makes any profit at all upon his "forfeits" is unknown; the pawnbroker who realises the amount advanced upon the goods is exceedingly fortunate, and there are very few such. The general experience is that there is a loss, usually equal to the amount of the rental of the premises. That is in normal times. When trade has been bad I have seen a year's entire profit swept away by losses upon "sales." But your correspondent says that the "sale" is attended only by relatives of "Uncle," who arrange that the goods are sold at a low price by auction, and then resold at a profit. This strikes me as being very much like a charge of criminal conspiracy. In Glasgow, in the course of a year, there are held over 3,600 auction sales of pawnbrokers' unredeemed pledges, at which more than 120,000 lots are disposed of. Now, if your correspondent can prove that what he alleges is a common occurrence has happened in one single instance in the sale of the aforementioned 120,000, I will willingly give £10 to any charity he names. I will go further, and multiply his chances by 20 by allowing him to go back for the last twenty years in his search for evidence.

"Another source of profit is wrappers," says your correspondent. "Wrappers" are charged at the price of a halfpenny. When a very large size is required a penny is charged; never more. They are cotton cloth, and the large size measures about a yard. In the concluding paragraph your correspondent harks back to the auction sales, and recommends that they be watched. I go further, and say go to the auction sales and buy at them, for then, through competition, the prices might be raised to a level which would eliminate loss upon "sales," and thus give the pawnbroker, not "huge profits," but a fair return for his labour and the capital he has invested. That is what he does not receive.—I am, sir, etc.,

THE WHITE SLAVE TRAFFIC.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I think the practical and sensible letter written by "V. H." a most valuable contribution to this discussion. In this letter he plainly tells us the cause of prostitution, namely, that nature has implanted a sexual desire in males that must be satisfied. I agree, and the majority of the cannot-afford-to-marry, lusty young manhood of the country—most of them decent, straight-limbed, healthy fellows—will endorse this view. Is it right that we should expect these young men to live in an unnatural state of celibacy? They should "control their passions," says one correspondent. Such advice reminds one of the dear old lady who tried to sweep back the Atlantic with her mop. You cannot stamp out prostitution; you cannot even diminish it, unless our marriage laws are completely altered. Why, then, should not the State control and regulate this traffic, and so prevent the frightful diseases that the street-walker spreads abroad like a pestilence? If we cannot be moral by Act of Parliament, let us be clean.

It is not a bit of use stating, as Constance Goodliffe does, that "the sooner the Church realises the urgent call demanded of her, the sooner she will 'deliver the land from error's chain.'" Why has not the Church realised the call ere this? Prostitution has been with us longer than Christianity. The Church has had plenty of time. Merely to mention such a subject in respectable Church circles would be highly improper. No, it is not to academic parsons or philosophic bookworms that we must look for light on this question; we need the advice and help of the hard-headed, clear-sighted Englishmen who have travelled the world. "People with ideals," mentioned by "T. C. L.," are generally those who get on the roof and imagine they see beautiful visions on the horizon, but are blind to the foul and hideous wrecks of humanity that lie on their very doorsteps.

I should just like to add how very much I admire the fine and courageous article written by "A Mother" in the English Review.—I am, sir, etc.,

A LONDONER.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—May I, as a practising physician who knows what he is talking about, be allowed a word? Your correspondent "V. H." must excuse my telling him, but he is making a very serious blunder. No doubt, under strictly "normal" conditions, practically all adults would be married, and thus the problem we are dealing with would at least be rendered less acute.

Present-day circumstances, however, such as the unequal distribution of wealth—itsself resulting largely from the selfishness of a few—make it impossible for many of us to marry. Those of us who are in this position owe a duty to society and to ourselves; we must remain continent.

That "nature must be satisfied" is nonsense, at least in the way in which "V. H." understands "satisfaction." It is quite possible for each of us to divert his or her specifically "sexual" impulses into various paths of artistic and creative work. This, doubtless, is not always easy, but it is certainly quite possible—is being done every day. We must also remember that the animal passion is only part of a much wider impulse, of which love of yoke-fellow, of children, and home are all equally important parts. Women whom the conditions of modern life prevent from having children of their own are very wisely constituting themselves the teachers of the coming generation, for woman's sphere is "rearing," no less than "bearing." Is man to be always more of a slave to his animal nature than woman to hers? Does "V. H." suggest that the ordinary patroniser of prostitutes becomes, ipso facto, a healthier and happier man? My experience of him is that he soon begins to get bored with life, takes to over-eating and over-drinking, and is either cut off suddenly with an apoplexy or perishes slowly in an asylum as a general paralytic. "V. H." must also remember that even marriage in itself will not save such selfish and un-self-controlled beings; they are just as parasitic on womanhood as are the bachelors.

I agree with "V. H." that no legislation will stop this traffic. As well try to cure the "drug habit" by prohibiting the manufacture of alcohol. In this, as in other matters, a real and true education is the one panacea.—I am, sir, etc.,

MR. BALFOUR'S LINEAGE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—In your valuable character sketch of Mr. Balfour in issue of 8th inst. you state that he "inherited the blood of Secretary Maitland, of Lethington." This is hardly correct, as he is really descended from the Secretary's brother John, who became Chancellor on the fall of the Earl of Arran, and was raised to the peerage as Lord Thirlstane on May 17th, 1590. The Secretary's family was overwhelmed in misfortune, and had to sell all their lands; the grandchildren retired to Rouen, in France, and had a small pension from the Duke of Lauderdale in 1682. Very sad; as even crabbed George Buchanan admitted the "prodigious ability and brilliant talents" of the Secretary. Sic transit. I say nothing as to the descent from Secretary Cecil, which no doubt is authentic.—I am, sir, etc.,

THE PARADOX OF PATHOS.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—The "Paradox of Pathos" may surely be explained without the necessity for religious mysticism. (This becomes apparent when we realise that the peculiar relation between pleasure and sadness is a conception common to all, whereas religious mysticism is by no means a commonly accepted condition of mind. The pleasure yielded by external sadness through the medium of art is a very different thing from our own individual sorrow, which is real enough and permits of no paradox. Then, again, this ambiguity is not confined to sorrow, since danger, combativeness, and other unwanted emotions assume an opposite complexion when conveyed to us through the medium of the imagination.

Now the sum total of these and other emotions is Life, and what is there of more vital interest to living beings? Thus it is that through the imagination we seek these experiences, since we acquire them without disturbing the stability of our physical condition. In art we live by proxy, without the burden of fatigue and gathering roses without thorns.

But the real essence of the joy of sorrow is the insight we gain into the brotherhood of human experience. The floodgates of sympathy, and thus of truest happiness, are opened by the feelings which teach us we are but parts of the brotherhood of man.—I am, sir, etc.,

RUSSIAN KINDLINESS.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—The allusion in Helen Voronoff's story to the kindness of the "simple Russian" recalled an experience of a friend of mine. She is very careless regarding money matters, and on one occasion arrived at the Russian frontier without money to buy her ticket to her destination, many hours' journey distant. She mentioned her dilemma to the porter who was looking after her luggage. Without more ado he went off and pledged his own credit for the ticket, neither asking nor accepting any security. Such an act of unreflecting kindness on the part of a poor railway employee is surely only possible to the "simple Russian."—I am, sir, etc.,

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

It is very seldom that a book about schoolboys is anything like reality. The heroes, as a rule, suggest "Sandford and Merton," and either die young of an attack of acute religion or emigrate as missionaries to the benighted heathen. The other kind of school book flies to the opposite extreme. The boys are frankly brutal, delighting in the infliction of pain and deliberately defying all decent instincts. THE HARROVIANS (Methuen, 6s.) marks a new departure, and Mr. Arnold Lunn is to be congratulated on having given us a picture, which, in spite of shortcomings, is something like a human boy. The book is full of slang, unintelligible except to those who know Harrow as well as the author, but the local colour is vivacious, and the adventures of the heroes convincing. The book provides an antidote to that mawkish school that exalts the smug youth.

"I suppose," said Manson, 'in an hour when work was technically prepared, that they paid the blighter who wrote this tosh?'

"What tosh?" asked Pater.

"Oh, an article in this mag., 'The Public School Spirit.' It is by a chap called Handleby."

"Usual bilge?" asked Kendal, without much interest.

"Oh, yes; stale old tosh. I'll give you the snappier extracts: 'The public schools teach boys something which is more important than the classics. They teach them to play the game.'"

"Kendal shouted with wrath, 'Chuck it away! A man who uses a tag which one's aunts are beginning to understand should be shot.'"

PARIS: GEORGES CRÈS ET CIE,
116, BOULEVARD ST. GERMAIN.

The parody is occasionally over-emphasised and the effect at times crude. But the book has the merits of vivacity and humour, and is valuable for its unique points of view.

Mr. Stopford Brooke is a born lecturer. When he publishes a book he transports us in spirit to the lecture hall. He commences by telling us facts with which we have been long acquainted—things that, like everybody else, we already know. It arouses a certain feeling of impatience until we realise that the author is "talking" rather than writing, and that it is by the spoken word we must judge him. The lecturer commences with the laggards in learning, and therefore goes back to the beginning. Once Mr. Brooke is in his stride, however, his enthusiasm and conviction rouse and stimulate us. In his latest book, TEN MORE PLAYS OF SHAKESPEARE (Constable, 7s. 6d.), the author gives us a highly illuminative discourse, in which the analyses are well thought out and constructed. His most effective commentary is one upon the madness of Othello's jealousy: "He has never quite understood why Desdemona loved him. He feels in contact with her his colour and race, and his soul is forced to feel this by the accusation of Brabantio that he must have practised by drugs on Desdemona, otherwise she could not have loved him. Strange reasonings would beset him from time to time, and he is prepared to receive the insinuations of Iago. . . . The root of jealousy is selfishness—self-love which believes itself to be love; which claims all for itself alone." This is perhaps not a very subtle criticism, but it is a sound one, and as such commends itself to the plain, straightforward man. We commend this volume to the notice of all Shakespearean students.

HUNT THE SLIPPER (Stanley Paul, 6s.) is told with a rollicking sense of humour and a swiftness of movement that intrigue the reader from the start. The story is written supposedly by the people concerned, and the various points of view are put in an entertaining and unexpected fashion. We have pages from the diary of a fashionable pickpocket possessed of an intimate knowledge of the Bible with an aptness for Scriptural quotation at times delightfully apposite to his misdeeds. He is on the track of a diamond necklace, and, but for the intervention of an amiable old gentleman whom he meets on the voyage to America, would have been arrested on suspicion, if not for previous felonious acts. Sir Edward Fanhope, the benevolent person in question, also contributes his quota to the story. He is engaged in the quest of a missing granddaughter, whose fortunes become involved with those of Peyton Darell, the fashionable thief. Mr. Oliver Madox Hueffer writes with an intimate sense of fun that occasionally crystallises into the dramatic. He weaves the various interests into a most convincing whole, and we feel grateful to him that he has evolved a nonsense novel that never flags in its high spirits and zest.

THE WOMAN THOU GAVEST ME (Heinemann, 6s.), Mr. Hall Caine's latest contribution to the literary world, is a very long way off his earlier novels. There was always a suggestion of plagiarism about his work, but there was a strength and sincerity in "The Manxman" that redeemed it from faults of style and lack of originality in plot. His last novel is neither strong nor sincere. The story purports to be the tale of a young girl, virginal in soul and in body, who is coerced into marriage with a profligate nobleman, one Lord

Raa. Her father is not poor, nor has he borrowed money on his family estates. The motives beloved of the sensational fictionist are lacking, and there is the less excuse for the apathetic conduct of Mary O'Neill. Educated in a convent, separated for years from her father, she consents, at his bidding and to gratify his ambition, to marry a man who, from the first, inspires her with repulsion. Mr. Hall Caine, having postulated a girl of anæmic character and inoperative will, presents her to us, after the marriage ceremony, in a totally new light. She declines to live with her husband as his wife, at the same time refusing to consent to his suggestion of nullity of marriage. Failure in characterisation, however, is a defect common to other of Mr. Hall Caine's novels. The distinguishing qualities of his latest departure belong to a very different category. The author enters into the most intimate details of Lord Raa's attempts to establish conjugal relations with his wife, and contrives to introduce an atmosphere of unpleasant suggestiveness, offensive to all canons of taste. The same taint runs through the book. Mary, having refused to accept marital relations, elaborates her toilet, practises all kinds of allurements, and endeavours in every fashion to arouse her husband's passion. "I loaded myself with bracelets, rings, and necklaces. I was dressing for my husband, and for him I did many things I had never dreamed of doing before. For him I filed my nails, put cream on my skin, perfume on my handkerchief, and even rouge on my lips." Finally, this virginal young lady dressed with feverish care "in a white satin gown, which was cut lower than I had ever worn before." There have been other novels in which the heroine discovers immediately after the wedding ceremony that her husband has led a disreputable past, and declines to live with him. This is a tenable point of view, and as such it is legitimate for the novelist to urge it. But to surround the woman's refusal with salacious details is an offence against decent feeling and good taste. Mary ultimately severs all connection with her husband, and forms an alliance with Martin Conrad, her old playmate. Her relations with her lover are treated with a certain reticence, though now and again the same suggestiveness that marks the first part of the book appears. It is a nasty theme, written in a style bordering at times upon illiteracy.

Mr. W. L. Comfort is a romanticist who occasionally loses the thread of his story in the deep waters of mysticism. THE ROAD OF LIVING MEN (Lippincott's, 6s.) tells the story of a boyish fancy that blossomed into a man's love. Thomas Ryerson is a dreamy youth, who is at times almost unable to distinguish the dividing line between real life and that of the imagination. The same drawback is evinced by the author. He confuses images—visions as he calls them—with actual everyday occurrences, so that the picture he paints of the love of Ryerson and Mary Romany is blurred, and though his colours are vivid, neither the man nor the woman stand out clearly in the foreground of the play. The hero first encounters Mary at Oporto, "a little watering-place in Northern Spain." The opening chapter intrigues the interest, and there is a clever scene in which the boy to prove his courage dives half a hundred feet to the sea. "It was twice the height I had ever before attempted, though I loved the sport, and had thought much of the science of it; dived amazingly in imagination, as a youthful mind fascinated with billiards describes possible cannons in the dark. Aiming far out towards a patch of darker water, I held the point luckily, struck the sea at a good angle, and ruddered with my hands at the impact, since the depth was so slight. Then I fought the surf for a rock and climbed upon it. For a moment the girl's horrified face strained down from the cliffs." We visualise the picture and the incident is telling, but this is the only landmark in the first part of the book that centres our attention. The story trails off into introspection, self-analysis, interminable imaginings which, though written with a certain charm of style, fatigue the mind and weary the interest. Ryerson meets Mary ten years later in a casual manner the other side of the globe, and their relations are conducted in the same intangible fashion. The incidents of real life fade into the background, and the introspective chapters that follow are a weariness to the flesh. Now and again the narrative ceases to be amorphous, and is lit up by an incident as forceful as the dive in the opening chapter. The scene in which the hero is shot by Mary's father, who has mistaken him for a Chinaman—for by this time they have been transported to the flowery land—is graphic and incisive. The author having given us a taste of his quality, however, relapses into introspection once again. There is much that is dainty and charming in this novel, but it suffers from a confusion of imagery with actuality, and creates a feeling of impatience at its unnecessary imperfections.

Mr. William S. Thomas has written an interesting and illuminating volume, TRAILS AND TRAMPS IN ALASKA AND NEWFOUNDLAND (Putnam and Son, 7s. 6d. net). He is a crack shot, and gives a spirited account of his adventures with gun and rifle. But while he suggests a full enjoyment of the chase, he sets up a strong case against killing "for the mere zest of it, for vanity, or for purely commercial reasons." He is not very definite as to exactly what is justifiable in the killing of game, and we are left to the conclusion that he feels that the sporting instinct is the only thing that counts. But while he is a little paradoxical in his opening, he is entirely convincing when he leaves the question of "killing," and describes the bird life of the far north of North America. He gives us an intimate account of the life of the red-wing black-bird, the blue-gray gnat catcher, the goldfinch, and the wood thrush. So vividly does he depict these creatures of the wild that we seem to hear the flutter of their wings, catch the trill of their notes. Mr. Thomas shows us photographs of the birds he describes, with their picturesque surroundings. The author has run considerable risks in taking his snapshots. No trouble was too great for him, no hardships too severe. He tells a good story in this connection. "I took a stroll through the woods. There I happened upon half a dozen native boys shooting at a mark with guns. They were not aware of my presence until one of the boys standing apart from his fellows noticed what I was doing. Before he got away, however, I had his image on the film. I walked away a few steps, and sat down on a log to put in a new film. When I lifted my head, to my surprise, every last one of the little rascals had me covered with his gun." Mr. Thomas escaped that time owing to his coolness and courage, but this was only one of many experiences equally dangerous. The book is written in a leisured style, and is notable for the very human strain in which the rights of the animal of the animal kingdom are considered. We can do no better than quote the author's sentiments: "Whatever tends to spread the knowledge of nature, and consequently the love of it, makes it harder for the man who kills either for the mere zest of it, for vanity, or for purely commercial reasons," and thus each convert becomes, in a limited sense at least, a game warden.

Mr. Frank Dilnot has written an amusing book about Fleet Street. THE ADVENTURES OF A NEWSPAPER MAN (Smith, Elder and Co., 6s.) has caught something of the atmosphere of the street that never sleeps, though the author suffers from the limitations of his profession. He is pre-eminently a reporter, clever at recording impressions of men and things, and while this aids him in his descriptions it prevents his arriving at the intimate relations between writer and reader necessary to a full understanding. He tells of his adventures across Europe, how he went to Russia to report the doings of a Peace deputation, and while he depicts with swift and telling phrases both men and things, he produces on the mind of the reader something of the effect of a cinematograph. His creations are clever puppets, and respond to the pulling of the strings; but they are puppets all through, and never rise to the dignity of human beings. The rush and hurry of a newspaper office is produced with graphic detail, and one is conscious all the time of the driving power of the journalist's brain.

HISTORY IN THE MAKING

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE great outstanding event of the week has been the blandly courteous, but adamant, refusal of Turkey to evacuate Adrianople. To say that this revolutionises the situation is only to utter a truism, and, of course, it reduces the peace that has been declared to a farce. Twelve years ago the world watched with wonder the progress of "a sort of war" in South Africa. To-day we are experiencing the perplexities and excitements of a "sort of a peace" in the Near East that is worthy only of Gilbert and Sullivan. Every day, almost every hour, confronts us with some announcement ratifying the peace that is not, and every day brings news that makes us ask, "What next?" It is impossible to say. One thing, alas! is certain. The Sublime Porte remains master of the situation, and will continue to do so until Europe has answered her cynical but pertinent inquiry, "Who is going to turn us out?"

It is impossible to read the accounts of the rioting in Derry without feeling that the Government, who have overcome so many formidable difficulties, have here a problem calculated to give the most resolute statesmen pause. Worse than the bloodshed during the recent encounters, which seem to have been of an unusually serious character, is the recrudescence of that racial and religious bitterness which men of all parties in Ireland deplore. It is not, therefore, surprising that efforts are still being made to persuade the Government to yet another attempt at compromise along the lines of "Devolution." The Cabinet, however, are said to incline to the view that the course suggested is, however tempting, foredoomed to failure.

It is difficult to write without indignation of the latest disclosure concerning the methods of the notorious firm of Krupp. According to a Reuter message from Peking, the German firm of Carlowitz have offered to advance £3,000,000 to the Governor of Yunnan for the construction of a railway from Yunnan-fu eastwards to Posetung, on the West River. No doubt the line is badly needed; the whole problem of industrial China, in fact, may be said to consist in the provision of adequate railway accommodation to deal with her vast mineral resources. But note the proviso: "Messrs. Carlowitz, who represent Krupps, are to have for a period of twenty years a monopoly of all Government contracts for the supply of arms and ammunition and all mining and other machinery, in addition to an extensive series of mining concessions along the projected railway." When will the civilised nations of the world realise the fearful danger that lies in the operations of this mammoth firm?

The escape of Harry Thaw brings vividly to our mind all that has been said, and said with most effect by patriotic Americans, of the worship of the "Almighty Dollar" in the States. We are not surprised to read the messages from the other side, in which it is stated that "the American people widely believe that money, as the phrase is, has talked at each juncture of the case," which they assert has become "a duel between dollars and the law." What other view is possible? Is it conceivable that, but for his money, this unfortunate young man would have ever been tried twice for a murder as callous and indefensible as was ever committed; still less that he would have ever been allowed to escape from the asylum?

A serious allegation is made against President Wilson's Government in regard to Mexico by one who speaks with authority. Mr. de Kay, the founder of the meat-packing business in Mexico, declares that if the U.S.A. really want to stop hostilities in the smaller Republic they have only to prohibit the importation of guns and ammunition, which are at present being supplied from America. Even Mexicans, of course, cannot fight without weapons. There seems some hope of the U.S.A. carrying the suggestion out, but, even so, there remains the inevitable Krupps.

The Daily Mail raises a question of profound importance by its article on the treatment of British inventors by the State. Fifty years ago Charles Dickens dealt with the topic in his own inimitable fashion, and though some of the evils he ridiculed have been modified, the essential ineptitude of Government departments towards inventors remains, alas! unchanged. It is not as if the Dunne aeroplane, which we allowed France to capture, was a solitary case. As the Mail reminds us, there are letters extant in which the Admiralty unmercifully snubbed an inventor who urged iron instead of wooden ships. And did not the Legislature for long prevent the development of the motor-car? It is high time that our views of inventors and inventions were recast.

The by-election at Chesterfield raises in an acute form an awkward dilemma for the Labour Party. If they adhere to the course laid down by Mr. Ramsay Macdonald, and discountenance candidatures like that of Mr. Kenyon, they assuredly run the risk of alienating powerful organisations, such as the Miners. If, on the other hand, they lend their support to candidates standing under Liberal auspices, then clearly they will offend the most active spirits of their own organisation. How are these two conflicting tendencies to be reconciled?

THE MAN AND HIS WORK

THE MINER * * * PRIZE ESSAY BY J. E. ASHMORE

I.

THE miner's industry is one which, above all others, illustrates a famous economic doctrine, viz., Cairnes' theory of non-competing groups in industry. Once a man becomes a miner, he remains a miner. A boom may arise in the engineering, the textile, or the agricultural industries, but it leaves him unaffected. He always remains within the groove into which he slid when a youth. On the other hand, there is the liveliest fluidity of labour within the mining industry itself, noticeable wherever a new mine is opened or better conditions arise. In South Yorkshire during the last few years there has been a veritable coal rush, and it would be safe to say that 99 per cent. of the adults taken on have been experienced colliers.

II.

No doubt it has often puzzled the thoughtful that the mining industry, which is undeniably a disagreeable and dangerous occupation, should be able to attract such vast numbers of men, especially when one considers that the wages they receive do not compare favourably with those of the average artisan. The solution probably is that the industry can only be entered during youth. When a boy has passed a certain age, and has no knowledge of mining, he finds it as difficult to get work at the pit as he would in an engineering shop.

But why should boys be so anxious to work in the pit? There are several answers to this question. Environment plays an important part. In the mining villages of the Midlands and the North, where everything and everybody is connected with the pit in some way, where the conversation in the home, in the street, and among the growing school lads is almost wholly pit talk, one can understand that a lad becomes a pit-worker as naturally as the son of a farm hand in some isolated village becomes an agricultural labourer.

In towns where alternative employments offer themselves, there are two very good reasons why the boy prefers the pit. The first is that, whilst a boy, he receives a higher wage than he could get elsewhere. The second is a psychological reason. In the same way as the soldier or the aviator is often moved to take up his profession more from the love of excitement and for the gratification of his vanity than from the desire for monetary reward, so it is with the boy who wants to go down the pit. He wants the excitement for himself, but he also wants to show his youthful friends that he is not afraid to brave the dangers of the mine.

III.

In this manner the great mining industry recruits by far the largest number of its workers. It is not very long before the glamour of the work wears off and the boy begins to doubt the wisdom of his choice. However, the relatively higher wages he is receiving militates against his desire to get a job out of the pit, and so he remains on, year after year, until all hope of getting work outside is given up.

He passes from pony driving through all the stages of pit work until he is receiving the maximum wage. Then he marries and settles down, and considers that the seal has been set to the nature of his activities as a wage-earner for the rest of his life.

From now, every working day is pretty much the same. If the pit he works at starts at 7 a.m., he will probably arise about 4.30 a.m., in order to have a little breakfast and catch the workman's train, or walk the necessary distance. It is surprising how few miners there are who live near their work. Mining villages contain only a fraction of the total mining population, the great majority preferring to live in the nearest town and take advantage of what facilities there are for reaching the pit.

IV.

When the miner reaches the pit-bank after his journey, he first goes to the lamp-cabin, calls out the number of his lamp, and then goes on to the pit-head. Here, owing to the men not being able to descend as quickly as they receive their lamps, a queue is formed, and he takes up his position behind. When his turn comes, the banksman lifts the bar of the cage, and he, with eleven others, or such number as the Board of Trade regulations allow, steps on and takes hold of an iron rail fixed inside the cage for that purpose. He hears the whir of the electric bell in the engine-house, which is the banksman's signal to the driver that all is ready, he feels the cage raised an inch or two to allow the catches beneath to be withdrawn, and then—down.

There are few things a collier remembers more vividly than his first descent into the mine. He remembers how, on that occasion, he dropped into inky blackness, thinking that the bottom of the cage must have fallen out and that he was being suspended in mid-air by the bar above his head, which he gripped for dear life, almost fearing that that too would snap or melt in his hands and precipitate him to the bottom of the shaft. He remembers, too, the rush of air, the gasping for breath, and the speculation as to how soon the crash would come; and also how, to his intense relief, he thought he felt the cage suddenly begin to rise.

The awe of this daily journey soon wears off, but the impression of the cage changing its direction when half-way down always remains to some extent. The explanation of this is quite simple. When the cage has gone a certain distance the engine-driver applies the brakes, which, owing to the impetus the body has received in the descent, brings the cage more firmly up to the feet, and makes one feel that one is rising instead of being lowered less quickly.

V.

If the morning be a very bright one before he descends, the miner generally rests a few minutes in the pit bottom until he has got his "eyesight," for until he has accustomed his eyes to the darkness the one-candle-power lamp he is carrying is almost useless. Then, with his dim light, he starts to pick his way along the underground roads to the workings. He first takes one of the two main roads which stretch away on either side of the pit bottom right to the furthest ends of the pit. These roads are broad and high, with a roof which is well supported by steel girders. To get to his stall, the miner finds it necessary to leave this road and go along one of the narrower and more disagreeable roads which branch out at intervals of four hundred yards or so from both sides of the main roads. Out of these secondary roads run passages which can only be traversed in a crouching position, but which tap the coal face at all points in the pit.

When it is remembered that the coal extends in a continuous wall right round the pit, it would seem that this network of roads is not unlike the roots and fibres of some gigantic tree, which reach out and sap nurture from an ever-widening area, discharging it through the trunk into the myriads of channels for which it is intended.

VI.

The actual process of coal-getting varies from place to place, according to the nature and thickness of the coal. The method to be described here is one which obtains in a soft coal seam of a Nottinghamshire colliery. The stall, which is a certain length of the coal face, is taken charge of by three contractors or "butties." These men then have working under them two loaders, two holers, and two day men. The height of the stall is about four feet six inches. A yard of this is coal, and underneath this half a yard of heavy grey stone.

It is the holer's duty to cut away this stone from underneath the coal, and to build it into square packs to sustain the roof in places from where the coal has been previously taken. He places short wooden sprags under the edge of the coal, at a distance of six feet from each other, to support it while he lies underneath and cuts away the stone.

When the holing work is done, there is a yawning cavity along the coal face for a distance of thirty or forty yards, half a yard high, and extending underneath for a distance of eight or ten feet. By this time the mass of coal begins to creak and groan and to give every indication of instability.

When everything is ready, the butties begin to knock out the sprags, starting at the two ends and working towards the centre, where just two or three are left remaining. Now the coal is shivering in its efforts to break over the remaining supports. These latter are carefully removed, one by one, until only one remains, the men doing the work being quite ready to spring back at a moment's notice. Now everybody has got out of the way. It is clear from the incessant creaking, cracking, and groaning that it will now liberate itself. It does. In a moment one sees the whole black mass move slowly forward and, with a roar, crash over with such a force as to make the whole place vibrate.

Then the loaders set to work. They break the coal into convenient lumps, fill it into tubs or small waggons, chalk on it the stall number so that the check-weighman will know to whom he must credit the weight it contains, and then they push the tubs into the roadway ready for the pony driver to take away.

As soon as there is a space cleared, props are set, the roadway is extended about three yards nearer the new coal face, and the holers set to work to prepare the coal for another fall as soon as that already down has been loaded up.

VII.

Thus the work goes on for eight hours, day after day, broken only by a twenty minutes' interval, aptly called "snap-time," to enable the perspiring men to have a drink of water and a bite of bread and butter. As may be imagined, the end of the day is always welcome to the miner. Then he hurries down the roads in order to get an early turn for the cage, and, once on top, he goes straight home, washes himself, changes into dry things, and at last sits down in comfort to a substantial meal.

This is the working part of the miner's life. During spare time the younger generation still spend a good deal of time in sport, but now there are increasing numbers who take advantage of the educational facilities that are offered. For the more thoughtful of the older men, the local political club, the affairs of the local Co-operative Society, and matters relating to the trade union give plenty of scope for what administrative talent they may possess.

VIII.

While mining to-day is probably a much better occupation than it was years ago, it is still a degrading occupation. It is true the hours worked are not unduly long, but they are extremely tense, enough work for twelve hours being packed into eight.

Working thus at high pressure all the day leaves a man totally unfitted, through sheer physical exhaustion, to follow such pursuits as the acquisition of knowledge in the evening with any measure of success. This one thing alone is sufficient to call for a change in the present system. For if any system can be shown to dull the intellect of any man, or to nullify any attempt made by him for its improvement, then it should be removed, for it is not only a detriment to the individual himself, but is also a danger to society.

RESULT OF "EVERYMAN" ESSAY COMPETITION

THE writer of the essay reproduced above,

Mr. J. E. ASHMORE,
43, Bannerman Road,
Bulwell, Nottingham, has been awarded the prize of THREE GUINEAS offered by EVERYMAN for the best paper on THE MINER. The competition was remarkable for its popularity and for the uniform standard of excellence of the essays sent in. When the competition was announced it was stated that a description of the experiences of an actual miner would be preferred to the narrative of a politician who had once descended a coal mine. The result has been most gratifying. Almost without exception those who have taken part in the competition are miners, or have been miners at one period of their life. The winner, Mr. J. E. Ashmore, himself writes: "I have worked for eleven years in the mine, having been employed at three collieries, all in the Nottinghamshire district."

"You would be surprised to know in how many miners' homes EVERYMAN is to be found," says one correspondent. The large number of entries for this competition amply bears out his statement. From every coalfield in Great Britain have come essays of the most interesting and informative kind. South Wales is best represented, then Notts, Durham, Fife and the Lothians. Of the Welsh papers the best is that of Mr. L. D. Havard, Merthyr, Glamorgan; of the Scottish the best is that of Mr. George D. Hardie, Benview, Clarkston, Busby, near Glasgow; both are written from practical experience.

The work of the following competitors is also deserving of high praise:—Hugh R. Anderson, Cardenden, Fife; J. Brooksbank, Ruskin College, Oxford; Ellen Callinan, Sunderland; Hugh Clarkson, Whitburn, West Lothian; "A Collier's Son," Colwyn Bay; Arthur Cowlshaw, Mansfield; J. Monk Foster, Wigan; Rev. James Francis, Cowdenbeath; G. H. L.; C. F. Goodwin, Aberdare; Charles C. Harvey, Tredgar, Mon.; Philip Hodge, Kelty, Fife; C. T. Houghton, Lavender Hill, London; Roger Hutchinson, Newburn; Arthur Johnson, Somerset; Wm. M. Kilpatrick, Larkhall; George Lee, Chesterfield; G. E. Owen, Pontypridd; Willie Park, Blantyre; N. Thomas, Rhondda Miners' Student.

THE CASE FOR NATIONAL HOUSING

I.—HOUSING AS IT IS * * BY L. G. CHIOZZA MONEY

I.

AT the date when the latest official information was compiled for the purposes of the Inhabited House Duty, which is levied in Great Britain only, there were 6,300,000 houses in England, Wales, and Scotland which, being of an annual value of less than £20 a year, were not charged to duty, and 1,500,000 houses of an annual value of £20 a year and upwards, a total of 7,800,000 private dwelling-houses. I wonder what proportion of these, whether above or below the £20 line, could honestly be said to conform to the most modest standard of comfort and beauty. Whether we examine the villas of the middle class, the hillside cottages of the Welsh miners, the grimy rows of shapeless dwellings which house the hard-working inhabitants of the Northern industrial towns, or the cottages of rural labourers, we are bound to confess that in the thing which matters most of all, existing conditions are deplorable, and utterly unworthy of a scientific age which has determined the conditions of health.

The housing question is too often discussed as though it were a matter that concerned one class alone. Indeed, we pass Acts of Parliament with the title "Housing of the Working Classes Act," as though the other classes were quite well housed and could look after themselves. As a matter of fact, the middle classes, although relatively better housed than the working classes, get, as a rule, very bad value for the rents which they pay, and are condemned to suffer many unnecessary discomforts, and to lack many simple and common-sense contrivances which ought by this time to be within the reach of everyone who desires to establish a home.

II.

The low average standard of housing which obtains is so generally accepted that many even of the most ardent housing reformers obviously cherish the most modest ideas as to the possibilities of housing. How often we see this illustrated in connection with municipal housing schemes! A little town decides to put up municipal houses for working men. As often as not it is content to put up a dreary row of cottages lacking proper aspect and without garden ground, in spite of the fact that it is in a position to buy land at an absurdly low price and, without spending a penny more or even as much, to put up houses on the Garden City principle. Fairly well-to-do people are not infrequently found to commit the same sort of folly. I have in a number of instances lately seen costly houses deliberately built upon absurdly restricted sites, which made it impossible for an architect with all the skill in the world to give good value for the money spent. People have got so accustomed to the conception of houses being crowded together that they seem to accept crowding as a matter of course. It is not realised that land, if properly dealt with, is the cheapest commodity in the country, and that to buy space is to buy health and happiness.

III.

The house is man's main defence of life against the assaults of Nature. The making of houses means the construction of the chief part of the framework of civilisation, the making of a picture which is both the foreground and the background of life. A man's house does not merely concern him; it concerns other people, because it is a solid object which endures for a considerable time, and which either defaces or beautifies its situation. It is impossible to exaggerate the responsibility which attaches to building construction. The process may give us a sanatorium or a slum, the preservation of health and life or their destruction, a lovely and smiling township or a sordid and depressing environment driving those who endure its greyness to Drink and the Devil.

The majority of our existing population have been nurtured in the belief that Beauty is an "ornamental" commodity which is plastered on to life in rare patches, to be occasionally enjoyed within the frame of a picture or the limits of a theatrical proscenium. Utility and Beauty are conceived as diverse qualities utterly incompatible with each other. It is not realised that one of the most magnificent things possible in human life is to inhabit a beautiful town, and that to build a beautiful town is an absurdly cheap operation, cheaper by far and simpler by far than many things which we now do and think it of no account to do. It costs not a penny more to build things up beautifully than to build them up in ugly heaps. Whether a house be made of brick or stone or concrete, the materials shaped into ugliness and discomfort cost exactly the same as though they were placed in forms worthy the intelligence and taste of cultured men.

IV.

I have remarked that building may give us sanatorium or slum. A well-constructed town ought to be a sanatorium, a place in which, knowing the conditions of healthy human life, we deliberately create those conditions by artificial means well known to us. It requires so little space to house liberally a large population that there is no excuse for the housing of any of us in other than healthy situations. The time has long passed when town life was conditioned by the limits of slow transport, or the necessity of crowding together within town walls for mutual protection. If a mediæval town was crowded there was every excuse, and, indeed, necessity, for it; but to-day a crowded town is an anachronism, and, in view of the means at our command, a crime. Forty-five million people—say nine million families—housed at the Garden City rate of ten families to the acre, would obviously occupy only 900,000 acres, which is an almost negligible fraction of the area of the United Kingdom. We have plenty of room, we have plenty of space, the problem of cheap transport has been solved, the building of houses is a combination of simple crafts, and yet it is but an exceedingly small fraction of our population which is worthily housed.

From the point of view of health, I might give the most harrowing details as to what is bred in our multitude of unhealthy homes, but it is not my object merely to dwell upon the worst phases of the problem. Broadly speaking, it is true that our houses, as they are, kill outright tens of thousands every year, and that their conditions deprive of health millions of those who survive. Our National Insurance Act is chiefly needed because so many of our houses are a disgrace to our civilisation, and to be insured against loss of health is poor compensation for the loss of that good health which ought by this time to be the birthright of every child born to the nation. We shall soon be raising for a National Insurance fund about £25,000,000 a year. Twenty-five million pounds is the price of fifty thousand good houses costing £500 each, and fifty thousand houses means the homes of two hundred and fifty thousand people. Because we will not make the determination to create the first condition of health, we are condemned to pour out £25,000,000 a year to succour the unnecessarily sick.

We want to do something more than merely to make efforts here and there to eradicate slums. For a people living in a country which has been peculiarly gifted by Nature for the creation of industrial wealth, possessing as it does one of the most magnificent supplies of easily won coal in the world, situate in an island with a good seaboard, the building of really good houses for its inhabitants ought to be regarded as a primary duty.

V.

What we want to do is to conceive of Housing as we conceive of a Navy. On the defence of our shores we spend about £50,000,000 a year, and we are assured on the best authority that the expenditure of this sum secures our homes from the attentions of possible invaders. The Navy, considered as an industry, is a thing of magnificence. Upon the ships which compose it we lavish the best of materials and the latest inventions. Nothing is too good for the purpose, and we cheerfully build battleships worth £2,000,000 each, although we know that the passage of only fifteen years will render them obsolete, and condemn them to the scrap heap. It is not a little remarkable, therefore, that the majority of the homes which are so carefully and so lavishly defended are as inefficient and out of date as a battleship is efficient and up to date. The battleship, the difficult thing, the complex thing, the costly thing, the short-lived thing, is built. The house, the easy thing, the simple thing, the inexpensive thing, the enduring thing, goes un-built.

The case for National Housing is largely the case for the Navy. Good housing means national defence—the defence of the life and strength of a great people. We might almost say that if we care to build good houses the Navy will take care of itself; but at least it is true that a nation which has shown that it can so easily afford to spend fifty millions a year on ships can afford to find one-half that sum to rebuild and recreate the homes of its people. A nation is an aggregation of homes, and the strength of nations is only to be found in the homes of its people. Our chief national danger, against which no Navy can guard, is the mass of dirty and sordid brickwork out of which there pour into the streets the deteriorated children of a nation which speaks of Empire.

SONNET

How sweet it is, when mother fancy rocks
The wayward brain, to saunter through a wood!
An old place, full of many a lovely brood,
Tall trees, green arbours, and ground-flowers in flocks;
And wild rose tip-toe upon hawthorn stocks,
Like a bold girl, who plays her agile pranks
At wakes and fairs with wandering mountebanks—
When she stands cresting the clown's head, and mocks
The crowd beneath her. Verily I think,
Such place to me is sometimes like a dream
Or map of the whole world: thoughts, link by link,
Enter through ears and eyesight, with such gleam
Of all things, that at last in fear I shrink,
And leap at once from the delicious stream.

WILLIAM WORDSWORTH.

POETRY AND THE PUBLIC

WHAT has been the cause of the gradual depopularisation of poetry which the advance of civilisation has brought in its train? For if we put aside that affectation which demands the possession by every respectable family of a few choicely bound (if rarely read) copies of reputable poets, there can be no denial of the fact that poetry has lost its grip upon the public mind. For this the modern rhymester naturally blames the public; the modern public finds it easy to retort, "Give us another Dante, another Browning, and we will acclaim him"; while, at the same time, it apologises for having but an imperfect acquaintance with either of these poets on the score of having so little time for reading. Well, perhaps both the poet and the public have just cause for grievance. But what of Poetry itself? Has it any place? (I do not mean a pedestal; we are all of us willing to grant the poet a pedestal where he will be out of the way; but has Poetry a place in modern life?)

Poetry is essentially of the soul, and therefore, like the soul, is unchanged in its inner nature by time or circumstance. Unlike other forms of literature, Poetry cannot, if it be real poetry, adapt itself to any particular age. The novelist or the dramatist finds himself relentlessly influenced by the thought and action of his time; indeed, it is his duty, as an artist, to give them expression. But the moment the poet attempts to adapt himself to circumstances he ceases to be a poet. For the poet must have no ties which bind him to earth. His fancies must not be dictated by outward influence; they must spring from within. His creed must not be the creed of any particular school or sect; no popular trend of thought must capture his intellect; though he be the paid piper, it is he who must insist on calling the tune, or else renounce payment. The true poet simply sings because he must, and, however changed the nature of his song, its inspiration will be, as of old, from the soul, which knows no shifting quicksands of human thought and ideas, being cradled in the rock of truth.

Thus it is easy to see that poetry must of necessity be strangely out of accordance with an age when the public is something of a fetish to the artist, and the voice of the people is too often welcomed as the voice of God. We are apt to prefer the skilful versifier, with his dexterous subservience to the caprices of the hour, to the simple poet, with his one rugged, eternal message from Truth, which flaunts our fashions and mocks our modes. We cry out for a great poet who will attune himself to the spirit of the age, and all the time it is we who should endeavour to attune ourselves to the spirit of the poet. There is no necessity for us to listen to the pessimistic critic who dolorously declaims that the twentieth century is innocuous to the birth and growth of poetic thought or feeling. It is nothing of the sort. No age, whether it be the age of barbarism or the age of machinery, has the power to hinder the growth of poetic feeling so long as men and women have the courage to call their souls their own. What we have to do is not to deplore the lack of poets because there has appeared no second Dante or Browning, but to shut our eyes and ears occasionally to the material din and strife that are raging around us on all sides, and to cultivate that garden of the soul wherewith is sown the spirit of truth, which is the spirit of poetry. And when we have taught ourselves to love and appreciate true poetry it is just possible that we may realise that we possess some true poets amongst us.

DUDLEY CLARK.

EVERYMAN'S FRENCH PAGE

UN PORTRAIT FRANÇAIS DE
SAMUEL JOHNSON

ON voyait entrer un homme énorme, à carrure de taureau, grand à proportion, l'air sombre et rude, l'œil clignotant, la figure profondément cicatrisée par des scrofules, avec un habit brun et une chemise sale, mélancolique de naissance et maniaque par surcroît. Au milieu d'une compagnie, on l'entendait tout d'un coup marmotter un vers latin ou une prière. D'autres fois, dans l'embrasure d'une fenêtre, il remuait la tête, agitait son corps d'avant en arrière, avançait puis retirait convulsivement la jambe. A peine servi, il se précipitait sur sa nourriture "comme un cormoran, les yeux fichés sur son assiette, ne disant pas un mot, n'écoutant pas un mot de ce qu'on disait autour de lui," avec une telle voracité que les veines de son front s'enflaient et qu'on voyait la sueur en découler. Si par hasard le lièvre était avancé ou le pâté fait avec du beurre rance, il ne mangeait plus, il dévorait. Lorsqu'enfin son appétit était gorgé et qu'il consentait à parler, il disputait, vociférait, faisait de la conversation un pugilat, arrachait n'importe comment la victoire, imposait son opinion doctoralement, impétueusement, et brutalisait les gens qu'il réfutait. "Monsieur, je m'aperçois que vous êtes un misérable whig." "Ma chère dame" (à Mrs. Thrale), "ne parlez plus de ceci, le sottise ne peut être défendue que par la sottise." "Monsieur, j'ai voulu être incivil avec vous, pensant que vous l'étiez avec moi."

Alors tout bas, avec précaution, on questionnait Garrick ou Boswell sur l'histoire et les habitudes et cet ogre grotesque. Il avait vécu en cynique et en excentrique, ayant passé sa jeunesse à lire au hasard dans une boutique surtout des in-folio latins, même les plus ignorés, par exemple Macrobe. A vingt-cinq ans, il avait épousé par amour une femme de cinquante courte, maflue, rouge, habillée de couleurs voyantes qui se mettait sur les joues un demi-pouce de fard, et qui avait des enfants du même âge que lui. Arrivé à Londres pour gagner son pain, les uns à ses grimaces convulsives l'avaient pris pour un idiot; les autres, à l'aspect de son tronc massif, lui avaient conseillé de se faire portefaix. Trente ans durant, il avait travaillé en manœuvre pour les libraires qu'il rossait, lorsqu'ils devenaient impertinents, toujours râpé, ayant une fois jeûné deux jours, content lorsqu'il pouvait dîner avec six pence de viande et un penny de pain, ayant écrit un roman ("Rasselas") en huit nuits pour payer l'enterrement de sa mère. A présent, pensionné par le roi, exempt de sa corvée journalière, il suit son indolence naturelle, reste au lit souvent jusqu'à midi et au delà. C'est à cette heure qu'on va le voir. On monte l'escalier d'une triste maison située au nord de Fleet Street, le quartier affairé de Londres, dans une cour étroite et obscure, et l'on entend en passant les gronderies de quatre femmes et d'un vieux médecin charlatan, pauvres créatures sans ressources, infirmes et d'un mauvais caractère, qu'il a recueillies, qu'il nourrit, qui le tracassent ou qui l'insultent on demande le docteur, un nègre ouvre; une assemblée se forme autour de lit magistral; il y a toujours à son lever quantité de gens distingués, même des dames. Ainsi entouré il "déclame" jusqu'à l'heure du dîner, va à la taverne puis disserte tout le soir, sort pour jouer dans les rues de la boue et du brouillard de Londres, ramasse un ami pour converser encore, et s'emploie à prononcer des oracles et à soutenir des thèses jusqu'à quatre heures du matin.

A FRENCH PORTRAIT OF

THERE appears, then, a huge man, with shoulders as broad as a bull's, and proportionately large, with a gloomy and unpolished air, his countenance disfigured by the king's evil, and blinking with one eye, dressed in a suit of plain brown clothes and not overclean linen, suffering from morbid melancholy since his birth, and, moreover, a hypochondriac. In company he would suddenly mutter a Latin verse or a prayer. At other times, in a window recess, he would roll his head, sway his body backward and forward, stretch out and then convulsively draw back his leg. Hardly was dinner served when he darted on the food "like a cormorant, his eyes seemed riveted to his plate; nor would he say one word, or even pay the least attention to what was said." The veins of his forehead swelled, and generally a strong perspiration was visible. If by chance the hare was high, or the pie had been made with rancid butter, he no longer ate, but devoured. When at last his appetite was satisfied, and he consented to speak, he disputed, shouted, made a sparring match of his conversation, snatched a triumph, no matter how, laid down his opinion dogmatically, impetuously, and maltreated those whom he was refuting. "Sir, I perceive you are a vile Whig." "My dear lady" (to Mrs. Thrale), "talk no more of this; nonsense can be defended but by nonsense." "One thing I know, which you don't seem to know, that you are very uncivil."

About that time men would ask Garrick and Boswell, cautiously, in a low voice, the history and habits of this strange being. He had lived like a cynic and an eccentric, having passed his youth reading miscellaneous, especially Latin folios, even those least known, such as Macrobius. At twenty-five he married, for love, a woman of about fifty, who was small, very fat, with swelled cheeks of a florid red, produced by thick painting, flaring and fantastic in her dress, and who had children as old as himself. On coming to London to earn his bread, some, seeing his convulsive grimaces, took him for an idiot; others, seeing his robust frame, advised him to buy a porter's knot. For thirty years he worked as a hack for publishers, whom he used to thrash when they became impertinent. He was always shabby. Once he fasted two days. He was content when he could dine on sixpenceworth of meat and a pennyworth of bread. He wrote a novel ("Rasselas") in eight nights in order to pay for his mother's funeral. When pensioned by the king and freed from his daily labours he gave way to his natural indolence, often lying in bed till mid-day and after. This is the time to visit him. We mount the stairs of a gloomy house in a narrow and obscure court on the north side of Fleet Street, the busy quarter of London, and as we enter we hear the scoldings of four women and an old quack doctor—poor, penniless creatures, bad in health and in disposition—whom he has rescued, whom he supports, who vex or insult him. We ask for the doctor, a negro opens the door, and we gather round the master's bed; there are always many distinguished people at his levée, including even ladies. Thus surrounded, he "declaims," until dinner-time, when he goes to a tavern and talks all the evening; thereafter he goes out to enjoy in the streets the London mud and fog, picks up a friend to talk again, and goes on pronouncing oracles and maintaining his opinions till four in the morning.

REFORMS IN OUR PUBLIC SCHOOLS

By EMERITUS PROFESSOR H. A. STRONG

I.

THERE are two lines in Goethe's "Faust" which might fitly be taken as epigrammatically descriptive of the attitude of the governors of our so-called public schools, and of the pupils educated therein. The first of these is "Nur zu Hause bleibts beim Alten"; the second is "Mir ekelt es vor allem Wissen." The aspect of the world, of its civilisation, and its demands on our adaptability to its requirements has undergone such mighty changes in the course of the last two or three decades that no effort must be spared by those nations which hope to survive in the struggle for life to adapt themselves to their environment. To ensure success energy has always been necessary, but to meet the requirements of the present day energy requires to be supplemented by the development of intelligence, instruction, and thought. This development can only be brought about by education, and, of course, it is imperative that the education which we give to our youth of both sexes should be such as will enable them to confront with knowledge and thought the manifold problems of our modern civilisation.

II.

Now it happens that in our own country, which may be defined as a democracy tempered by caste, the majority of the sons of what Dr. Gray calls our "ruling caste" are educated in a limited number of big schools, most of them enjoying large revenues, and some of them boasting of a proud and historic past. From them have indeed sprung most of the men who have created our history in the past, our generals, lawyers, statesmen, and to a less degree our men of letters. It has been also frankly recognised, not merely by our own countrymen, but by foreign observers like M. Taine, that the training given at our public schools did, in fact, succeed in producing types of young men dissimilar to those brought up at other schools, and markedly so to those educated at the Lycées or Gymnasias on the Continent. It was commonly admitted by all, excepting, perhaps, the teachers of the public schools, that the atmosphere of these schools was not intellectual; that the pupils passed from them with little taste for learning, and with little capacity for forming new ideas, or grasping general principles. But it was contended that, on the other hand, they acquired a high standard of morals, of self-respect, and of discipline. They were hardened by the somewhat Spartan régime of these schools existing in bygone days, and yet were not brutalised by coarse or violent repression. There is no doubt at the present day much of truth in this picture. But the fact remains that the parents of the boys educated at our public schools are not satisfied that, as a commercial people, to put it frankly, they are getting their money's worth.

III.

The task which Dr. Gray has set himself (in "The Public Schools and the Empire") is to consider under what conditions our public schools might be made a truly valuable national asset, and he expresses his strong conviction that vast and deep-rooted reforms are necessary before they can be considered such. He considers that our main characteristic at the present day is our national apathy. "Some veteran warrior, with convictions ripened by long service in his country's cause, may have censured us in trumpet tones for our national apathy, urging our unpreparedness for the stern arbitrament of war, the necessity for some form of national service, and the near peril of imperial disaster." Our present condition of listless apathy "springs from an increasing unwillingness of the man to do things himself, and an unwholesome desire to get things done for him by others." Dr. Gray asserts that young men who have not been taught during the days of their youth to use their hands, or to submit to discipline in the service of their country, are of no use in the colonies, at least in those occupied by the white races, where men are perpetually fighting with nature, and where each man is judged according to his sterling qualities, and not according to his manners.

IV.

Now if it be maintained that our public schools are to be the nurseries of our future ruling class, and if we in the Mother-country are to hold our pride of place as guardians of the whole Empire, it is obviously necessary that our young men should acquire some qualities fitting them to exercise a just influence in the new countries under the British crown, and that they should unlearn some others, which undoubtedly stand in the way of their influence, even in this country, and still more in communities unfettered by the chains of tradition. They have to learn something of science, of modern history, of the literature, at least, of their own country, of geography, political and physical, of political and domestic economy. They have to unlearn the idea that the world cannot be governed without the aid of caste, and to realise the fact that they will in no long time be called to believe that those who trust to their caste for their prestige are indeed a vanishing minority.

V.

Philosophers, too, who make it their duty to expound educational theories must adapt their precepts to the times. It is not in these days of fierce competition altogether satisfying to the ambitious son of poor parents to be told that he is expected during the whole of his school and university career to engage in perfectly disinterested study; indeed, some authorities have gone so far as to say that studies, until the professional career has actually begun, should be practically useless, and should merely serve as a mental gymnastic. This is certainly not the view of the ordinary paterfamilias, who is not a little puzzled at finding that his hopeful son, on quitting school, seems to have learnt so very little of the subjects which may afterwards aid him to earn his living. He is puzzled because he does not possibly know that those of his boy's companions who are at once rich and studious (there are not many of this class) are quite content with the present course of studies, while a very large number are not particularly interested in what they have to learn, for the simple reason that they feel that it is not likely to be of any particular use to them in after life. The moral of this, of course, is that we should aim at the introduction of new and varied studies into our large schools, and taking more care that the course of study fit the intellectual and material prospects of the boy.

HILAIRE BELLOC * * * BY J. K. PROTHERO

A POET has plaintively complained of Mr. Belloc that

"He seems to think nobody minds
That all his books are of different kinds."

There is certainly something very versatile, not to say variegated, about his literary output; and one suspects that this may be partly due to a very variegated and adventurous early career. Of mixed blood, part French, part English, part Irish; brought up on the great downs of Sussex, the beauty and comfort of which he has sung so often in some of his noblest poems, he received his education at Edgbaston under the shadow of the great name of Newton. Having served his apprenticeship to journalism under so different a personality as the late Mr. Stead, he suddenly resolved to serve his term in the French Army, and became for a year a driver in the Artillery. When his time was up he went to Balliol, and carried off all the honours, especially in the department of history. He succeeded in getting into the House of Commons, where he won a new reputation as a brilliant, if unmanageable, member. He fought another election and won it without "official" help; then threw up his seat and commenced that attack upon the Party System with which his name has been so prominently connected. He founded and edited for a year a militant weekly paper devoted to the propagation of his opinions on this and other subjects. And all this time he was literally pouring out books and articles—history, descriptive travel, poetry, satire, novels, and politico-economic treatises. Such fecundity and variety is of itself amazing enough, but it becomes more amazing when we note the conscientious maintenance of a high level in every department. For in one aspect Mr. Belloc is a French classicist, and is almost fidgety about the quality of anything he offers to the world.

The very variety of Mr. Belloc's work makes it very difficult to "place" him in literature, or to say on what part of that work his permanent repute should be based. One does not know whether to give the palm to some of his exquisite lyrics or to delightful fantasias like "Mr. Burden" and "A Change in the Cabinet," or to historical studies like "Danton" and "Robespierre," or to intensely suggestive speculative essays—sound or unsound—like "The Servile State." One suspects that it is perhaps by his contributions to history that Mr. Belloc is most likely to live.

He possesses two qualities rarely found in combination, which, when found in combination, go far towards the make-up of the great historian—a careful accuracy of detail and a power of vision.

These qualities are perhaps best illustrated in those excursions into military history in which he peculiarly delights. It is very characteristic of one side of his temperament that he can hardly be induced to describe a battle until he has visited the field and carefully examined the terrain. It is equally characteristic of the other side of him that when he has done so the battle seems to come to life for him. He sees the troops moving and hears the guns.

This quality in him—which is as marked in his speaking and even in his conversation as in his writings, and which makes him, when in the mood, the most fascinating of talkers—was responsible during his political career for a rather amusing misunderstanding. It was when he was in the House of Commons, and some question connected with the Army came up for discussion. Mr. Belloc spoke, strongly emphasising the importance of artillery in modern warfare, and illustrating his point by a description of the decisive battle of St. Privat, which turned the course of the Franco-Prussian war. So vivid was his account of the progress of the fight, and so exact his knowledge of the distribution of the various forces, that some journalist or other—probably vaguely remembering that the speaker had served in the French Army—said that "Mr. Belloc gave a graphic account of his experiences at the battle of St. Privat." Whereat another journalist, looking up "Who's Who," remarked that at the time of that engagement Mr. Belloc appeared to have been only about six months old, and that if all the French artillery was served by infants of this tender age the Prussian victory was fully accounted for. That same quality of startling vision which, to those acquainted with Mr. Belloc's manner, lends point to this anecdote comes out very strongly in a fascinating little volume of historical studies called "The Eye-Witness," which, even among his innumerable admirers, is much less well known than it deserves. It is very difficult to read the account of the Barons' march through Staines, or of Robespierre's attendance at the Committee of Public Safety, without half unconsciously falling into the aforesaid journalist's error—and with even less excuse.

Mr. Belloc's satire is mainly notable for the powerful use of irony in a manner that sometimes almost recalls Swift. At least, it is difficult to go anywhere else for a parallel to some of the stinging sentences which will be found in his long series of fantastic assaults on contemporary follies and hypocrites from "Lambkin's Remains" to "The Green Overcoat." The method reaches, perhaps, its highest point in "Mr. Burden." But it is omnipresent and apparently inexhaustible.

In fact, he himself seems in every way inexhaustible, and the impression that most forcibly arrests one in his work is the same as that which meets one when in contact with his personality—the impression of an immense vitality which he can hardly contain, a vitality which will not let him rest, and which will force him to attempt anything—whether it be walking forty miles a day, or writing ten different kinds of books in a year, or seeking out all the details of a long-past campaign, or making a revolution in England. But his concern with international politics does not prevent his intimate appreciation of the domestic side of things, as witness the following:—

"They say, and I am glad they say,
It is so, and it may be so,
It may be quite the other way.
I do not know—but this I know:
From quiet homes and first beginnings
Out to the undiscovered ends,
There's nothing worth the wear of winning
Save laughter and the love of friends."

Whether his vitality will carry him remains to be seen. He is a man of strong and even passionate convictions, which are the deep and indestructible root of all his joyous combativeness and all his almost riotous humour. The quality of these convictions is pretty familiar to the modern world, which he so strenuously attacks. A fixed belief in an unpopular religion; a faith in the unalterable value of primal human tradition; an immense sense of the pride and honour of arms; a rooted distrust and fear of the moneyed power, especially where it is modern and cosmopolitan; a conviction that the Equality of Man is an eternal and absolute truth, and that men are happiest when they are free and self-governing—these are the rooted certainties upon which his mind reposes, and out of which his work has come.

COUNTRIES OF THE WORLD

XIV.—THE UNION OF SOUTH AFRICA * * * BY LIDDELL GEDDIE

I.

SOUTH AFRICA is Africa south of the Zambesi. Eliminate German South West Africa and Portuguese East Africa and you have British South Africa. Then take away Rhodesia and the Bechuanaland, Basutoland and Swaziland Protectorates, and there remains the Union of South Africa, which alone concerns us here.

The Union of South Africa is but three years old. The South African nation is in its infancy. Nevertheless, it may safely be predicted that this youngest of the British self-governing Dominions Oversea will in due season play a great rôle in the world's history. True, along with its great stores of mineral wealth and agricultural riches scarce yet tapped, the Union has inherited problems fraught with difficulty and danger. Our immediate purpose, however, is neither to turn back to dark pages of the past nor to skip forward to dazzling pages of the future, but to concentrate our attention on the page of the present day.

II.

The baby Union of South Africa is blessed with a sound constitution. The South African Constitution is compact with courage and statesmanship, sacrifice and caution. By the South Africa Act four self-governing States became one. Four parliaments and four administrations were abolished, and one parliament and one administration set up in their place. Under any circumstances, such a step demands great mutual trust and far-sightedness. Under the circumstances prevailing in South Africa, the unification of the Cape, Transvaal, Natal, and Orange Free State was little short of a miracle.

These four States were permeated with racial antipathies and provincial jealousies. Only eight years before Union came about in 1910 two of the States were at war with the other two. One State (Natal) was overwhelmingly British, one (the Free State) overwhelmingly Boer; the remaining two were partly English, partly Dutch in speech and sympathy. The white population was split into hostile camps—Dutch Afrianders and English Uitlanders. Those born in the land called themselves "Colonials"; new arrivals were only "Colonists." Descendants of the old Dutch settlers were nearly all farmers; those of British descent were mostly directly or indirectly dependent on the mines. The country districts, accordingly, spoke Dutch (or the "Taal"), as a rule, while the larger towns spoke English.

These racial and occupational divisions were complicated by inter-State divisions. The Transvaal and the Free State had long upheld republican institutions; the Cape and Natal had long been part of the British Empire. The former were land-locked States, the latter were coast Colonies. Economic disputes—chiefly touching railway and tariff questions—ranged each and every State against its neighbours. Bitter competition raged between the Cape and Natal. The Free State nursed feelings far from friendly towards the Transvaal, and in economic matters was inclined to side with the Cape; whereas Natal, for geographical reasons, was disposed to favour the Transvaal. On the native question, again, South Africa's greatest and most enduring problem, divisions were on territorial rather than racial lines, North (including Natal) opposing South (the Cape).

III.

These and a thousand and one other rivalries threatened the peace and prosperity of South Africa. Only true and signal patriotism could have inspired the course which the South African States and their Dutch and English citizens took to remove the danger of recurrent strife. The four Colonies gave up their State rights and independence and merged themselves in a lasting Union. Dutch South Africans by the Act of Union accepted British-hood, and English South Africans submitted themselves to a Dutch Government. But there was ample compensation for these sacrifices. The whole is sometimes greater than the sum of its parts. The Union of South Africa is infinitely greater than the four Colonies it absorbed. At the same time English-speaking South Africans secured what they set most store by—equal franchise rights; and Dutch-speaking South Africans also secured equality in the form they most desired—equal language rights. And so the Union is built on a foundation that is sure and stable as the Cape of Good Hope itself.

IV.

South Africa is endowed with a fine, healthy climate and a bounteous soil, and in days to come it will be a land of agriculture like the other great Oversea Dominions. Meantime, the backbone of the country is mining. Minerals account for over eighty per cent. of the total annual value of the Union's exports. Some fifty millions sterling of mineral produce are now exported yearly. Of this gold represents over thirty-eight millions, diamonds over nine, coal over one million, copper and tin about three-quarters of a million.

Since the days of King Solomon, South Africa's yield of mineral wealth has been fabulous. Within the past fifty years over £500,000,000 worth of gold and diamonds have been extracted from reef, blue-ground and river-bed. For half a century South Africa has owed its weal—and its woe—almost entirely to its mines. The wages and salaries paid by the Transvaal mines alone total over thirteen millions sterling per annum. Between 300,000 and 400,000 persons (of whom nine-tenths are natives) are employed in the mines of the Union,—and the number would be greater still but for the shortage of native labour, the perpetual handicap of the mines. As it is, over 100,000 labourers are recruited in Portuguese East Africa.

The Union of South Africa furnishes the world with practically all its diamonds and with more than a third of its total gold supply, far outstripping Australia, the United States, and other gold-bearing countries. For regularity and reliability of yield the Witwatersrand gold area is unrivalled throughout the globe. The gold mines, in fact, are conducted as if they were gold manufactories. The production increases rapidly year by year. In the next thirty years the output of gold is expected to be at least £1,000,000,000. By the reduction of working costs, thanks to more and more efficient machinery, the life-time of the mines is being indefinitely prolonged, and the twentieth century is not likely to witness the exhaustion of South Africa's precious mineral stores.

The mines have provided South Africa with the two things the country most requires—white population and capital. They have created well-paid employment for white and black alike. They have lightened taxation for both townsman and countryman. They have opened up railways in every direction. They have given the farmer a splendid market. In a word, they have made South Africa what it is to-day. When the mines suffer, as during the diamond crisis of 1907 or the Rand Strike of the present year, the whole of South Africa suffers. When the mines flourish, South Africa flourishes with them.

V.

Agriculture is backward, but its day is fast approaching. Farmers are taking a lesson from the mines and substituting scientific methods for the primitive methods of their forebears. Irrigation and dry-farming are quickly gaining ground. Long-standing pests such as locusts and East Coast fever are being overcome. Live stock is increasing enormously and breeds are being improved. Government experts are spreading broadcast modern ideas and giving instruction in up-to-date farming in its various branches. Exports of produce of the land rose from £6,630,000 in 1908 to £11,163,000 in 1912. Last year the Union sent oversea wool to the value of £4,780,000, ostrich feathers to the value of £2,609,000, hides and skins to the value of £1,691,000, and Angora hair to the value of £967,000. But for scab and slovenliness the figure for wool would be considerably higher. The feather industry, on the other hand, has been carried to a high pitch of excellence, and South Africa is jealously guarding the virtual monopoly which it enjoys.

The agricultural and pastoral industries are going ahead in every direction, but they still have a big leeway to make up. In 1912 articles of food and drink valued at £6,359,000 were imported into the Union, a total which reflects little credit on South African farmers. For instance, the Union is dependent on imported grain and flour for two-thirds of its bread supply—and yet the white population is only a million and a quarter, and the area of the Union is nearly half a million square miles. There are, of course, vast tracts of land where the plough will never enter, but with only 2.3 per cent. of the total area under cultivation there is unlimited scope for agricultural development in the Union. It is high time a vigorous policy of land settlement was inaugurated in South Africa.

VI.

The other primary industry of South Africa, fisheries, is also capable of much expansion. The "sea sense" is sadly lacking in South Africa, which is strange when one considers the proud part British and Dutch have played in maritime history. Hitherto the fishing industry has been left in the hands mainly of Italians, Norwegians, and Indians.

VII.

The Union has no manufactories worth mentioning. Such manufactures as there are are mostly offshoots of the mining and farming industries—dynamite works, wine-making, and the like. The reasons are not far to seek. Agriculture, in which industry has its beginning, is not sufficiently developed. The white population is small. The cost of living for Europeans is high. Skilled labour is, therefore, costly. Distribution is difficult. How to remove these obstacles is the task with which South Africa is now faced. Instead of devoting all its energies to digging up its garden, the Union seems inclined at present to occupy itself first with building round its estate the high wall of Protection. But the permanent fiscal policy of South Africa has yet to be decided upon, and the forces of Free Trade and the supporters of a low tariff for revenue purposes only have still to be reckoned with.

VIII.

South Africa is burdened with a plethora of population problems. There is the problem of the Dutch-speaking Afrikaner and the English-speaking South African. That problem has passed its acutest stage. The racial question is not dead, but it is what the French call agonising. It may cause friction and it will involve expense, but it will cost South Africa no more lives. And so we may leave it as a problem of the past. Then there is the problem of the Indian, the undesirable immigrant with whom the white man cannot compete on equal terms. But that problem is as good as settled. South Africa will keep the Indians she has got, but she will take good care not to allow any more to land on her shores. Next, we have the problem of the coloured man, the half-caste, a baffling problem, which is, however, insignificant in comparison with South Africa's greatest problem of all—the native question.

The 1911 census showed a total population for the Union of 5,958,499, of whom only 1,276,242 were of white race. Europeans, therefore, are outnumbered by nearly 4 to 1. Instead of disappearing like the Red Indians and the Australian aborigines, the South African natives are multiplying fast, considerably faster than the European population. South Africa, therefore, can never be a white man's country in the same sense as Canada and Australia. White and black must live side by side in the Union. All South Africans are agreed that there must be no intermixture: there must be a dividing line. How is that line to be drawn? That is the question South Africa has to answer. It will have to be answered, and answered soon. Hitherto the line has been horizontal. The black man has done the unskilled work, the "Kaffir work"; the white man has reserved for himself the domain of skilled labour. But the native, thanks to education, is becoming capable of more than unskilled labour, and aspires to higher fields. And the white man is beginning to realise that dependence on the native for unskilled labour is a very mixed blessing. Hence the growing popularity of a segregation policy, whereby a perpendicular line should replace the horizontal line between black and white. Within their own reserves natives would be free to rise as high as they were able on the ladder of life, to become skilled labourers and professional men. Elsewhere the white man would be free to begin as low as he liked on his ladder, to become an unskilled labourer without losing caste as a European by so doing. Thus, it is hoped, the dignity of labour will be established in South Africa. Meanwhile, South Africans of European descent have to shoulder the white man's burden, but refuse to carry their own tools—that is the black man's burden.

LITERARY NOTES

How few school children realise that Shakespeare's plays were written for acting and not for examination purposes! Thanks to defective teaching methods, the master dramas of the English language are regarded in most classrooms as so many passages to paraphrase, so many lines to scan or to parse, so many phrases to elucidate, so many words to look up in the glossary. "Macbeth" and "The Merchant of Venice" appear not as real live plays to be acted, but as extinct texts to be annotated.

True, enthusiastic Shakespearean actors like Mr. F. R. Benson have done much to counteract this deadening influence by offering special facilities for school children to witness stage representations of the plays. But that is not enough. The teacher as well as the actor ought to show that Shakespeare can enthral audiences to-day as he did three hundred years ago. For this purpose nothing could be more helpful than the Bankside Acting Edition of Shakespeare for Schools, the first three volumes of which ("As You Like It," "Julius Cæsar," and "King John") were issued last week by Messrs. Wells Gardner, Darton and Co. The series is edited by Mr. F. J. H. Darton, under whose direction many of the plays have been produced in London by L.C.C. scholars under fourteen years of age. Each volume costs but sixpence, and contains, in addition to a somewhat abridged text of the play, a valuable introduction giving practical hints as to staging, costume, summary of the plot, glossary, etc.

Mr. Darton explains that these versions of Shakespeare's plays have been edited upon four principles: (1) to give the play in the order in which, so far as we know, Shakespeare wrote it, with no transposition or entire omission of any scene, however short; (2) to allow it to be acted in the simplest and most straightforward manner, with no scenery, and with a limited number of performers; (3) to shorten scenes (not to omit them) reverently and carefully, only to such an extent as to render the acting of the greater part of the play not beyond the powers of young people; (4) to make the play seem real to the players—neither a lesson nor a stage creation calling for pomp and pose, but a living pageant of vital actions.

These are excellent principles in the main. Mr. Darton strongly favours modern methods of presenting Shakespearean plays, with a projecting stage, no elaborate scenery and no intervals between the scenes. The thorny question of costume is touched upon, and will be more fully dealt with in "The Bankside Book of Costume for Children," by Melicent Stone, which the same publishers are to bring out in September. The whole scheme is appropriately described in the Introduction as a "compromise between scholarship, economy, and the limitations of youth; it is intended to be entirely practical, but with an ideal behind it." The series deserves to meet with signal success.

Lady White is collecting materials for a Life of the late Field-Marshal Sir George White.

Messrs. Nisbet will publish in September a new book of nature stories by Mr. F. St. Mars, entitled "The Prowlers." The illustrations will be by the well-known animal artist, Mr. Warwick Reynolds.

MASTERPIECE FOR THE WEEK

ROBERT LEWIS STEVENSON'S "WEIR OF HERMISTON"

To his old friend, Charles Baxter, in December, 1892, Robert Lewis Stevenson wrote—"I have a novel on the stocks to be called 'The Justice-Clerk.' It is pretty Scotch, the Grand Premier is taken from Braxfield—(oh, by the by, send me Cockburn's 'Memorials')—and some of the story is—well—queer. The heroine is seduced by one man, and finally disappears with the other man who shot him. . . . Mind you, I expect 'The Justice-Clerk' to be my masterpiece. My Braxfield is already a thing of beauty and a joy for ever, and so far as he has gone far my best character."

The novel of which Stevenson thus wrote was never finished. "It seemed unprovoked, a wilful convulsion of brute nature . . ." are the last words in the printed book, and these he dictated on the morning of his death, on the third of December, 1894. His Braxfield, or his "Weir," of whom Braxfield was the prototype, could only have been a "thing of beauty" in the sense that a Scotch terrier is "bonny wi' ill-fairedness." The painted picture of Braxfield had profoundly affected Stevenson, when it was exhibited at an exhibition of Sir Henry Raeburn's pictures in the later seventies, and though, as Sheriff Lyall has well shown, the Robert McQueen, Lord Justice-Clerk Braxfield of history, is extremely unlike the Judge whom Stevenson drew as Adam Weir, Lord Justice-Clerk Hermiston, the two are now almost inextricably mixed in the minds of all Stevensonians.

Adam Weir, the Lord Advocate, a recognised risen man, the conqueror of many obstacles, somewhat late in the day courted, if it were not profane in the connection to use such a word, Miss Jean Rutherford, of Hermiston, whose ready money and broad acres were ready to fall wholly to the husband, to lend dignity to his descendants, and to himself a title, when he should be called upon the Bench. "On the side of Jean, there was perhaps some fascination of curiosity as to this unknown male animal that approached her with the roughness of a ploughman and the aplomb of an advocate. . . . He was an ill man to refuse. A little over forty at the period of his marriage, he looked already older, and to the force of manhood added the senatorial dignity of years; it was perhaps with an unreverend awe, but he was awful. The Bench, the Bar, and the most experienced and reluctant witness bowed to his authority—and why not Jeannie Rutherford?"

And so they were mated, this taurine hanging-judge and the "dwaible," ineffectual lady; and penalties began to be paid. The house in George Square, Edinburgh, was wretchedly ill-guided; nothing answerable to the expense of maintenance but the cellar, which was my lord's own private care. "It was often wondered that Lord Hermiston bore all as he did. Indeed, he was a stoical old voluptuary, contented with sound wine, and plenty of it. But there were moments when he overflowed. Perhaps half a dozen times in the history of his married life—'Here! tak' it awa', and bring me a piece bread and kebbuck!' he had exclaimed, with an appalling explosion of his voice and rare gestures. None thought to dispute or to make excuses; Mrs. Weir sat at the head of the table whimpering without disguise; and his lordship opposite munched his bread and cheese in ostentatious disregard. Once only Mrs. Weir had ventured to appeal. He was passing her chair on his way into the study: 'O, EDOM!' she wailed, in a voice tragic with tears, and reaching out to him with both hands, in one of which she held a sopping pocket-handkerchief. He paused and looked upon her with a face of wrath, into which there stole, as he looked, a twinkle of humour. 'Noansense!' he said. 'You and your noansense! What do I want with a Christian faim'ly? I want Christian broth. Get me a lass that can plain-boil a potato, if she was a whüre off the streets.' And with these words, which echoed in her tender ears like blasphemy, he had passed on to his study and shut the door behind him."

A son, Archie, was the only child of a scarce natural union. The child was the mother's bond to life. "The sight of the little man at her skirt intoxicated her with the sense of power, and froze her with the consciousness of her responsibility. . . . It seems strange to say of this colourless and ineffectual woman, but she was a true enthusiast, and might have made the sunshine and the glory of a cloister. Perhaps none but Archie knew she could be eloquent; perhaps none but he had seen her—her colour raised, her hands clasped or quivering—glow with gentle ardour. There is a corner of the policy of Hermiston where you come suddenly in view of the summit of Black Fell, sometimes like the mere grass top of a hill, sometimes (and this is her own expression) like a precious jewel in the heavens. On such days, upon the sudden view of it, her hand would tighten on the child's fingers, her voice rise like a song. 'I to the hills!' she would repeat. 'And O, Erchie, are nae these like the hills of Naphtali?' and her tears would flow." Upon the impressionable child the effect of this continual and pretty accompaniment to life was deep. The mother's quietism and piety passed on to his different nature undiminished; but whereas in her it was a native sentiment, in him it was only an implanted dogma.

So much for Archie and his relations to his mother. "The character and position of his father had long been a stumbling-block to Archie, and with every year of his age the difficulty grew more instant. . . . There were some whom it was good to pity, and, well (though very likely useless), to pray for; they were named reprobates, goats, God's enemies, brands for the burning; and Archie tallied every mark of identification, and drew the inevitable private inference that the Lord Justice-Clerk was the chief of sinners."

"I'll tell ye what, mamma," said the little man of seven to his mother. "I don't think you and me's justifeed in staying with him." The woman awoke to remorse, she saw herself disloyal to her man, her sovereign and breadwinner, in whom (with what she had of worldliness) she took a certain subdued pride. But her success in unbuilding what she had built too well was what might have been expected. To talk of Archie's youthfulness and immaturity of judgment was to get the answer pat, that babes and innocents were the type of the kingdom of heaven. At another time—"It seems he's called 'The Hanging Judge'—it seems he's croool. I'll tell you what it is, mamma, there's a tex' borne in upon me. It were better for a man if a milestone were bound upon his back and him flung into the deepestmost pairts of the sea."

That year Mrs. Weir died quite suddenly. It was at Hermiston, where Kirstie Elliott, her kinswoman, was housekeeper. "Keep me, Kirstie; what's this?" she gasped. "Kirstie, what's this? I'm frich'ened." They were her last words. Kirstie went to meet my lord, who had been out riding. He reined in his horse, and looked upon her with the hanging face. "Has the French landit?" cried he. "Man, man," she said, "is that a' ye can think of?" "Is onybody deid?" said his lordship. "It's no' Erchie?" . . . Lord Hermiston sat in the saddle beholding her. "Well, it's something of the suddenest," said he. "But she was a dwaibly body from the first." . . . "Her and me were never cut out for one another," he remarked as he looked upon her body, in death the very image of the insignificant. "It was a daft-like marriage." And then, with a most unusual gentleness of tone, "Puir bitch," said he, "puir bitch!" Then suddenly, "Where's Erchie?"

Archie went the usual round of other Edinburgh boys of his class, the high school and the college, and it was not till he was twenty that the inevitable collision with his father came. For Weir of Hermiston, in so far as it is a finished study, is mainly that of strained parental and filial relations. Archie had inherited from Jean Rutherford a shivering delicacy, unequally matched with potential violence; at his father's table, when he was old enough to join the revels, the coarse expressions he heard there turned him pale and sick. One of his father's guests alone he tolerated, David Keith Carnegie, Lord Glenalmond. "His exquisite disparity with any of his fellow guests, his appearance as of an artist and aristocrat stranded in rude company, riveted the boy's attention," and Lord Glenalmond was attracted by the boy, and when at the dawn of manhood young Weir, by denouncing his father very publicly for the part he had taken at the trial of a "disjaskit" miscreant called Duncan Jopp, brought upon himself banishment to Hermiston, it was Lord Glenalmond who did what was possible to bring Archie to a recognition that there was in the Justice-Clerk a something that was not all ignoble.

Banished to Hermiston, Archie's relations were now with Kirstie Elliott, the housekeeper there, a woman of over fifty, "long of limb, and still light of foot, deep-breasted, robust-loined, her golden hair not yet mingled with any traces of silver, the years had but caressed and embellished her"; with Frank Innes, a school and college companion, who found it convenient to quarter himself at Hermiston; with the four brothers Elliott, who were later, by Stevenson, meant to be young Weir's deliverers, and, above all, with Kirstie, the young sister of the four brothers. The love that the older Kirstie bore for the son of her "dear Miss Jeannie": the fierce yet sane love that is what a woman, even of her years, may have for a man of half her age; the jealousy for him and that he might do what was right by her kinswoman, the younger Kirstie, are all studied and set forth by Stevenson in a way that makes the reader draw his breath, and cry, as Mr. Thackeray cried of one of his own passages, "By God, this is genius!"

The courtship of the younger Kirstie by young Hermiston, his good resolutions of avoiding any conduct compromising her good name, and her unhappiness and wounded vanity thereupon, are Frank Innes' opportunity for pursuing his purpose of seduction. And Kirstie, still caring for Archie, allows herself to become Frank's victim.

Of the trial of a son by his own father, and of the breaking of prison by the Elliott brothers, we know only from the scenario.

IN A RAILWAY CARRIAGE

AT first only two of the corner seats were occupied; but it was a Parliamentary train approaching one of the minor centres of industry which darken the fresh rural greenery of the North so frequently. A third corner was taken up by an individual of some importance, since he was ushered into the compartment by the station master, while a porter carried the passenger's handbag, which was deposited carefully upon the seat.

"Went to the races yesterday," he explained, "D—— bad luck—stone broke!"

Accepting the resultant silence as a sympathetic tribute, he burst forth, "And now we've got the Suffragettes to contend with. What's your cure for a Suffragette?" he asked No. 1 corner pointedly.

No. 1 expressed the opinion that he would rather have nothing to do with Suffragettes.

"But, m' dear frien', what if they come tormentin' your business?"

"Leave them alone."

"But they won't be left alone!"

No. 1 had no alternative suggestion to offer, and a short period of quietness followed.

"What's your cure for a Suffragette?" was the inquiry repeated to No. 2.

"Give them the vote on the same conditions as men," was the prompt reply.

"But they're not men," objected No. 3, "an' they never will be men!"

This was incontestable, and the strain of the position was relieved by a rush of workmen, who invaded the carriage in businesslike style, a concerted dash being made for the fourth corner by the two foremost.

"Bill's scored agen," commented one of them when the clatter of empty dinner-baskets had subsided.

"Ay, Bill's aw reet for scraffin', if he is a bit thick i' t' yed," remarked the defeated one.

Bill smiled genially as he stretched his legs. Incidentally they touched the patent leathers of No. 3.

"What would you do with a Suffragette?" whispered the horsey one, fixing Bill with his eyes.

"Nowt," replied Bill decisively.

"And if they wouldn't allow you to do it," suggested No. 3 calmly.

"Hum—it's one o' them things as d' want a bit o' thinkin' out," said Bill at last. "What'd tha do thisel'?" he countered, after a lengthy pause.

"Whip 'em," said No. 3 promptly.

A prolonged silence followed.

"Whip 'em!" repeated No. 3 with triumphant emphasis.

The men shuffled uneasily.

"Hum!" exclaimed one man; "it might be aw reet up to a certain peynt."

"It is all right—altogether. I know what I'm talkin' about," was the decisive response.

"Ay. But supposin' t' Suffragette happen t' be yer own sister, or mother, maybe?" suggested Jack's mate.

No. 3 was palpably shaken, and flushed visibly. "I'd—I'd—treat 'em like men," he said lamely.

"Then you'd give 'em t' vote," chuckled Bill, speaking very slowly.

The laughter was still loud when Bill rose to get out as the train stopped.

"Tha scored theer, reet enow," said his friend, moving into the vacant corner seat, "an' th'art noan so thick i' t' yed as tha us' t' be. So lung, Bill—tak' care o' thi sen—specially t' yed part." H. LEATHER.

BOUM-BOUM * * * BY JULES CLARETIE

I.

THE boy was lying upon his little white bed, and, his eyes dilated with fever, was gazing straight before him with a strange fixity of expression, as though he saw something which was invisible to normal eyesight.

His mother, sitting at the side of the bed, was biting her fingers to keep herself from crying, as she followed, anxiously and racked with suffering, the progress of the malady on the poor thin face of the little one; and the father, an honest workman, was struggling hard to keep back the tears which were scorching his eyelids.

The day rose, clear and soft, slowly flooding with the light of a beautiful June morning the stuffy room in the Rue des Abbesses, where little François, the only child of Jacques and Madeleine Legrand, lay dying.

He was seven years old. Such a fine, rosy little fellow, as merry as a cricket less than three weeks ago. But one evening he was brought home from school burning with fever, with a head like lead and his hands hot.

Ever since he had been in bed, and sometimes, in his delirium, when his eyes caught sight of his little, well-polished shoes, which his mother had placed carefully in a corner of the room, he would say:

"You will be able to throw away François' shoes now. He will never put them on again. François will never be able to go to school again, never, never!"

Then the father would cry out in anguish: "Don't talk like that," and the mother would bury her fair head in the pillow so that the child should not hear her weep.

To-night he had not been delirious, but the past two days he had sunk into a strange lethargy, which had greatly troubled the doctor. He seemed suddenly to have lost interest in everything, as if, after seven years of life, he had already tasted the weariness of living.

He lay there, silent, sad, his head tossing about on the pillow, refusing to take anything, and with never a smile on his poor emaciated lips, gazing, with haggard eyes, as if he were looking for something, one knew not what, far away in the distance.

"Up above, perhaps!" thought Madeleine, shivering.

Whenever he was asked to take a cooling draught or a little beef-tea, he refused. He refused everything.

"Do you want anything, François?"

"No, I want nothing."

"We must get him out of this mood," said the doctor. "I don't like this torpor. You are his parents and understand your child. Try and think of something to cheer him up and bring his mind back to earth!"

Oh, yes! without a doubt they understood their François! They knew well enough how to amuse the dear little fellow. They recalled, now, how they used to take him to ransack the hedges on Sundays, returning to Paris loaded with may in the evening, or visited the Champs Elysées to see "Punch and Judy" in the enclosure among the children of the rich.

Jacques Legrand bought some gilt cardboard soldiers, which he cut out and placed on the boy's bed, making them dance before the haggard eyes of the little one.

"Look, François, this one is a general! . . . Don't you remember the real general we saw once in the Bois de Boulogne? If you take your medicine, I will buy you one with a cloth tunic and golden epaulettes. Would you like it?"

"No," answered the child.

"Would you like a pistol, a crossbow, some marbles?"

"No," repeated the little voice, clear and almost cruel. And to everything they said to him, to all the toys that were promised him, the boy made the same response: "No. No. No."

"But what would you like, François?" asked his mother. "There are so many things you used to wish for. Speak, tell me, tell mother, darling," and she lay her cheek against the sick boy's pillow and murmured gently in his ear, as though she were telling him a secret.

All at once the boy, drawing himself up on his bed and stretching out his hands eagerly towards some invisible object, replied in a tense, excited manner, at the same time supplicating and imperative:

"I want Boum-Boum!"

II.

Boum-Boum!

The poor mother looked in a bewildered way at her husband. What was the little fellow talking about now? Was it that terrible delirium again?

Boum-Boum!

She did not understand what it meant. She was frightened by these strange words, repeated by the child as if, not having dared before to put his dream into a definite shape, he was now clinging to it with an invincible obstinacy.

"Yes, Boum-Boum! Boum-Boum! Boum-Boum! I want Boum-Boum!"

The mother nervously seized her husband's hand, saying in a low voice, distractedly: "What does this mean, Jacques? He is lost!"

But the father's toil-worn face broke out into a smile, almost happy, though stupefied also, the smile of a condemned man who sees a possibility of liberty opening out before him.

Boum-Boum!

He remembered now, clearly, one Easter when he took François to the circus. He could almost fancy he heard again the boy's joyous laughter when the clown, covered with beautiful golden spangles, with a large butterfly sparkling with many colours at the back of the costume, cut his capers in the ring, tripping up a performer, standing on his head on the sanded floor, catching soft felt hats skilfully on his head and forming them one by one into a pyramid. And at every turn, every buffoonery, like a chorus, he uttered the same cry, accompanied each time by a roll of the drums in the orchestra: "Boum-Boum! Boum-Boum!" And every time his clever and witty face appeared in the ring, the circus resounded with bravos, and little François burst into a roar of laughter.

Boum-Boum! This, then, was the Boum-Boum, this circus clown, who was famous all over that part of the city, whom the boy wanted to see and wanted to have, but whom he could not see and could not have, since here he was, helpless, in his little white bed.

That evening Jacques Legrand brought the child a mechanical clown, all covered with spangles, which he had bought on his way home from work.

It had cost him the equivalent of four days of his pay, but he would willingly have given twenty, thirty, even the price of a whole year of his labour once more to bring back a smile to the pale lips of the sick child.

François glanced an instant at the toy, which sparkled on his white sheets, then, sadly: "That's not Boum-Boum!"

"Ah," thought the father, "if only I could wrap him up in his blankets and carry him to the circus, so that he could see the clown capering under the glittering chandelier." But, as it happened, Jacques did something better. He went to the circus, asked for the clown's address, and, on arriving at the house in Montmartre where the artiste lived, he went up, his legs trembling under him, one by one the steps leading to the flat of Boum-Boum. His courage almost failed him when he reached the door, but, he thought, after all, these performers do go and sing and recite in the drawing-rooms of the rich.

Perhaps this clown would consent to come and perform for François, and he, Jacques Legrand, would pay him whatever sum he might ask.

When he had rung the bell, however, his fears increased. How would Boum-Boum receive him?

As a matter of fact, it was not Boum-Boum at all. It was Monsieur Moreno, who, in his elegant rooms, surrounded by books, engravings, and choice and artistic furniture, received Jacques very much after the manner of a fashionable physician receiving a patient.

Jacques stared at him, not perceiving the clown in this well-dressed man with charming manners.

The other waited for him to speak. Jacques, nervously twisting his hat round and round in his hands, began to excuse himself for the liberty he had taken.

It was something quite out of the way that he had come to ask, but the position was serious. "It concerned his boy, his only child, a dear little fellow, sir, and so intelligent. Always the first at school, except at arithmetic, which he does not understand. Somewhat of a dreamer, this little chap. . . ."

Jacques now hesitated, stammered, but he plucked up courage and continued: "That is why he thinks only of you; you are like a star shining in front of him which he wants to possess."

When he had finished, Jacques, very pale, had beads of perspiration on his forehead. He hardly dared to look at the clown, whose eyes were fixed on him with a keen, penetrating gaze.

What was Boum-Boum going to say to him? Would he take him for a fool, and show him the door?

"Where do you live?" quietly asked Boum-Boum.

"Quite near here, sir, Rue des Abbesses," replied Jacques, whose heart was beating furiously.

"Come along then," said the other. "Your boy wants to see Boum-Boum, does he? Very well, he shall see Boum-Boum."

III.

Throwing open the door of the room where little François lay, Jacques Legrand cried out joyfully: "He's come, François; look, here is Boum-Boum!"

A happy smile, the first since his illness began, came over the face of the sick child. Raising himself in his mother's arms, he turned his gaze towards the two men as they entered, looked an instant at the frock-coated, smiling gentleman beside his father without recognising him, and when Jacques said, "This is Boum-Boum," he let his head fall back slowly on his pillow, the gleam of hope which had for a moment irradiated his face died away, and his beautiful large blue eyes once more assumed their fixed expression, looking beyond the walls of his little room for the spangles and the butterfly of Boum-Boum.

"No," said the boy, in a sad tone of voice, "that isn't Boum-Boum."

The clown, at the side of the bed, was looking down at the child with deep and thoughtful eyes, full of infinite kindness. He raised his head, looked at the anxious father, the stricken mother, then said smilingly: "He is right! this is not Boum-Boum." With these words he went out.

"I shall never see Boum-Boum again," murmured the child, in a faint, weary voice.

All at once, in less than half an hour of his departure, the door opened, and, in his black tights and spangles, with the yellow tuft on the top of his head, the golden butterfly on his breast, with his wide-open smiling mouth, powdered all over, Boum-Boum, the real Boum-Boum, Boum-Boum of the circus, little François' Boum-Boum, appeared.

Then, on his little white bed, with the joy of life once more in his eyes, laughing, crying, saved, the child clapped his poor, feeble hands, shouted bravo, and said:

"Boum-Boum! that's Boum-Boum, hurrah for Boum-Boum!"

"Good morning, Boum-Boum."

IV.

When the doctor came, later in the day, he found, seated by the child's bed, a white-faced clown, who was making little François laugh and laugh again, and who was saying, as he stirred a piece of sugar in a cooling draught:

"Drink, François; if you don't, Boum-Boum won't come to see you again."

And the child drank.

"Wasn't that nice?"

"Very nice, thank you, Boum-Boum."

"Doctor," said the clown, "don't be jealous; but it seems to me that my antics have done him more good than your prescriptions."

Jacques and Madeleine were weeping, but this time they were tears of joy.

And until François was on his legs again, a carriage stopped every day outside the house of the workman in the Rue des Abbesses at Montmartre, and a man, enveloped from head to foot in a long overcoat, alighted. Underneath he was dressed for the circus, and his face, almost hidden by the upturned collar of the coat, was powdered all over.

"What do I owe you, sir?" asked Jacques, when the boy, now fully recovered, went out for the first time. The clown held out his two big hands to Jacques and his wife, and said, "A shake of the hand." Then, patting the now rosy cheeks of François, he added, smiling, "and permission to have printed on my cards:—

"BOUM-BOUM,

"Doctor-acrobat, and physician-in-ordinary

"To Master François Legrand."

ON THE POOR OF LONDON

ALMIGHTY GOD, whose justice like a sun

Shall coruscate along the floors of Heaven,

Raising what's low: perfecting what's undone:

Breaking the Rich, and making Odd things Even—

The Poor of Jesus Christ along the Street

In your rain sodden, in your snows unshod,

They have not hearth, nor sword, not daily meat,

Nor even the Bread of Men: Almighty God!

The Poor of Jesus Christ whom no man hears,

Have waited on your vengeance much too long.

Wipe out not tears, but blood. Our eyes bleed tears!

Come: smite our damnéd sophistries so strong

That Thy rude Hammer, battering this rude wrong,

Ring down the abyss of twice ten thousand years.

THE TRAGEDY OF THE PLIMSOLL LINE

BY OUR SPECIAL COMMISSIONER

II.

IN my article last week I showed how Samuel Plimsoll, by twenty-five years of almost ceaseless effort, and in the teeth of overwhelming difficulties, won from Parliament that great charter of our seamen—the Compulsory Load Line.

That was in 1890. In 1898 Plimsoll died. It is perhaps not a little remarkable that within a few weeks—a few days almost—of his decease the shipowners, who had always resented the imposition of the line, had commenced their long but Silent and Subterranean Campaign Against It.

They objected to ships taking in cargo north of the Chesapeake River not being allowed to load so deep as ships on the south side, and when the point, a small one, was decided in their favour they boasted that they had driven in the thin end of the wedge. The fact is that the owners always hated "the line," even as the earlier factory owners detested the Acts that Lord Shaftesbury and old-time reformers got passed to stop the sweating of women and children. So that when, on Monday, June 9th, 1890, the Royal Assent was given to the first compulsory Load Line Act, Fair Play, the organ of the shipowners, showed its contempt of Parliament by announcing that "our shipbuilders will find a way of discounting the load line." In other words, of rendering the measure a dead letter!

Apparently the task of Frustrating the Intentions of the Legislature did not prove so easy as the Shipping Federation had anticipated. The line remained in force. The shipbuilders found it impossible, presumably, to dodge it. Mortality at sea fell steadily, and even so, and despite their doleful prognostications, the shipping industry, so far from being ruined, flourished exceedingly.

Notwithstanding, the shipowners continued steadfast in their opposition, and worked perpetually against the line.

It was in 1906 that they effected their great stroke. The Parliament of Mr. Balfour was dying. Lassitude, amounting almost to paralysis, had set in among the members. There was a general sense, as there always is with dying Parliaments, of indifference, carelessness, unconcern. The shipowners saw their opportunity, and moved out eagerly to seize it.

They brought pressure to bear on the Government, and, with scarcely an effort to resist them, the Government surrendered.

Quietly, Cautiously, and all Unsuspected of the seamen or their friends, they appointed a Committee "to consider and report." They did this without any announcement in Parliament, without any statement outside, and they took good care to see that no representative of the seamen was included. Not a single expression of opinion was sought from the officers or men who had in the course of their experiences at sea seen the effects of overcrowding, and who, as practical mariners, knew what result would follow any deepening by extra cargo of a vessel's hull. Mr. Chamberlain's Committee had laid it down as a cardinal doctrine that only a body representative of the seamen, as of other interests, could competently advise the State in this matter; but the first thing one notices about this ad hoc Committee is that, not only does it exclude the seamen from its membership, but it does not even hear their evidence.

The Committee, in fact,

Represented the Shipowners, and the Shipowners only.

What followed? The Committee concluded its labours in November, 1905. The General Election took place almost immediately after. The Liberals were returned, and Mr. Lloyd George found himself at the Board of Trade. Almost the first document that he found put before him for signature were the rules altering the load line in accordance with the findings of the Committee. In an evil moment for himself and for his party, and under the advice of the permanent officials of the Board of Trade, he authorised the rules that destroyed Plimsoll's life-work!

Then, and then only, if we are to believe the testimony of the seamen's representative in Parliament, did the House hear of the alteration in the rules, and that they heard of it too late I shall show in my next article.

For the Undoing of the Plimsoll Line has meant the drowning of poor Jack in thousands; the revival of horrors worse than the coffin ships; the perpetration of cynical injustices more cruel than any of those against which Plimsoll thundered. In a word, it has meant the needless sacrifice of our seamen to enrich capitalists who admittedly are among the most prosperous of our merchant princes.

CORRESPONDENCE

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Owing to the large number of letters received it is necessary for correspondents to write briefly if their letters are to appear.

NEW ZEALAND AND DEFENCE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I observe that this country is still being flooded with literature headed "Warnings to Emigrants," etc., and many newspapers with letters regarding New Zealand's Defence scheme; also pathetic stories are being told respecting a few stormy petrels who have left the Dominion.

It is as well to make it quite clear that New Zealand has a Defence scheme in operation which has met with the almost unanimous support of our Parliament, and has been before the people at three elections; and a case has recently come under my notice of a man with a grown-up family regarding the Defence scheme as an additional reason for his settling there. The intention of the Act is to train our young men so that they may take a manly and effective part should ever an attack be made upon our country. It is absurd for us to rely upon, and improper that we should expect, Britain's furnishing us with the means of defence in a case of emergency. We realise that if Britain is involved in a war she will require all her forces for that war. We are also aware that we are not far distant from Asia, from which continent trouble may come. Our people live in a delightful country, and in no place on God's earth is there a better opening for industrious, well-doing folk. That being the case, it is the intention of our people to retain, if possible, that country for those who realise the great privileges they enjoy in living there.

Certain people have returned to the Old Land, and we New Zealanders are heartily glad to be rid of them. They used the money of the colonists to help them to travel to New Zealand, and they took very little with them; some of them did remarkably well during the time they lived in the Dominion, and I might say that not only did some create disturbances there in connection with our military training, but in a few instances they quarrelled with Church, School, and Councils.

We wish it to be distinctly understood that we have no desire to receive anyone in New Zealand who has not the manliness to take his share in defending that country and in protecting its women and children should ever troublous times arise. We do not want them, and we are glad to be rid of those who have, unfortunately, used our money to go to our country, and who have broken the obligations they took upon themselves when they received that money. I would add that these people, before being assisted to emigrate, were supplied with literature showing that they were subject to be called upon to render military service. It should be mentioned that those who undergo military training receive at least 28s. per week during that training, and are provided with food and accommodation. I notice my predecessor in office is reported to have said since his return to New Zealand that he had heard of objections to universal training made there by a small section of people, but it was his opinion that if there were men who were not prepared to do their duty to protect their mothers, sisters, and wives from a foreign foe, he would gladly contribute his share in assisting them to leave the country.

More people are applying just now to go to New Zealand than we are prepared to take, so that those who are spending their money in warning their friends to stay away are really rendering us a most valuable service, because they are preventing the undesirables from going, and leaving room for people of grit and courage to take the available space on board the vessels.—I am, sir, etc.,

CANADA AND ITS NEWSPAPERS.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I have read with very great interest the articles from the pen of Mr. G. C. Thompson, of Swift Current. Many of the statements appearing in those two articles I agree with, but some seem very wide of the mark. In particular, I would like to register a protest against Mr. Thompson's remarks anent Canadian newspapers. He says: "But the Yankee journalism has gripped Canadian papers. With a few creditable exceptions, they are sensational, inaccurate, and violently partisan"—and more along the same lines. As a newspaper man, I want to say that Mr. Thompson is egregiously in error. Canadian papers, for the most part, are absolutely opposite to the yellow press papers over the line. They are not sensational—not anything like as much so as the London Daily Mail or the one-time Morning Leader.

They are remarkably accurate. The Canadian Press Association sees to that. They have an excellent cable service, and their news is generally reliable. Exaggeration is taboo by the majority of editors, both of dailies and weeklies. As to being violently partisan, they are not as much so as the London or New York dailies. There is, of course, a certain amount of political mud-flinging, but of the press of the three countries, England, the States, and Canada, I firmly believe that Canada stands first as representing to the people the news, uncoloured by party sentiment.

Of course, every twopenny-halfpenny town along the prairie can't be expected to write editorials such as appear in the Times. The public doesn't give them the same support!

I am surprised that Mr. G. C. Thompson has seen one of the most important institutions in Canada through coloured glasses. Canadians and Britishers alike can point to the Toronto Globe, the Manitoba Free Press, the Toronto Star, to mention only a very few of the leading dailies, and find there complete refutation of Mr. Thompson's remarks.—I am, sir, etc.,

THE PRICE OF SOCIAL REFORM.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I have read with interest the article in your current issue by C. B. Purdom entitled "The Price." May I endeavour to express my opinion that there is yet another reason, reacting upon the religious one, which goes to aggravate discontent amongst those for whom we work in matters of social reform. This, it seems to me, is the lack of adherence to the maxim, "Aide-toi, le ciel t'aidera." We do much for these people—we do so little with them. We agitate for the passing of laws which will make ill-health a punishable offence, but we do little (a little albeit) to encourage them to build up for themselves and by their own effort a strong race of men and women. If they were put in the right way of winning for themselves those advantages which we lavish upon them gratis, they would assuredly value those advantages, and their happiness would be well earned, without the price they can so little afford to pay.—I am, sir, etc.,

C. M. DAVIES.

Kew, August 10th, 1913.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—The audacity, nay, the absurdity, of Mr. C. B. Purdom's contention is apparent if his argument, or at least the logical issue of his attitude, is put into plain language. In short, it is this: it is a loss rather than a gain to provide our working classes with the necessities and comforts which are theirs by right. They must not have stable employment, clean, healthy and beautiful homes, or any material prosperity, because, we are told, they will pay the price (and more than the price) in the loss of their freedom—a loose generality, which rolls well on the tongue.

But, to be quite blunt, what freedom has the poor man of to-day except that of going to the devil as quickly as possible? What freedom has he except that of making himself a nuisance not only to himself, but to everybody else?

We are asked to allow him to be free to do as much harm as he likes (to bring into the world in sordidness and misery, for instance, a generation which, born in poverty and squalor, is doomed by the circumstances of its upbringing and environment to a brutish existence, devoid of either spiritual or physical health, to a life fruitful of nothing except degradation and disease), with the certainty that he is competent under existing conditions to do nothing else but this mischief. For—and this is the important point—your poor man is disqualified, through no fault of his own, from the possession of any true freedom, either physically or spiritually, by that very weight of poverty which your contributor quite readily admits can be removed (but about the results of which dis-

GALA WEEK AT LE TOUQUET

LE TOUQUET'S INVITATION TO "EVERYMAN" READERS TO VISIT THEIR DELIGHTFUL ARCADE BESIDE THE SILVER SEA.

A WEEK'S HEALTH AND PLEASURE CARNIVAL AT LE TOUQUET.

Here at last is something new in the way of holiday enjoyment—something bright, brisk, fashionable, and yet inexpensive—something that takes in the full round of the best outdoor sports and pastimes, the most attractive indoor amusements, and at the same time offers, at a small inclusive charge, a full week's healthy relaxation in one of the richest beauty-spots in Europe. At Le Touquet, the glow and glory of the Atlantic Ocean is ever present to stimulate the mind and exhilarate the system; and it enjoys the romantic charm of a lovely setting of pine-wood forest; while it has had the good fortune to attract to itself some of the most prominent of modern pleasure pioneers, who have provided it with such an equipment of hotels, casinos, and sport and pleasure grounds as put it in the first rank of holiday resorts.

THE CONDITIONS ARE IDEAL.

Le Touquet is only 4½ hours from London, and from taking train at Charing Cross on Friday, the 12th September, to the return on the following Friday, the guest need not worry about anything. He travels first class by rail and boat, and all he has to do is just to enjoy himself. Even his tips to railway porters and hotel servants are paid for him throughout, nor has he anything to pay for motor conveyance for himself or luggage between trains and hotel. And at Touquet he is free to everything: first-class accommodation in one of the two principal hotels—the Atlantic or the Hermitage; free entrée to the two casinos, to the operas, concerts, and balls; to the golf links and tennis courts, for tournaments—in fact, he has practically the full liberty of the place, in addition to free transit to and fro, for

AN ALL-EMBRACING COST OF TEN GUINEAS.

The Atlantic Hotel, on the seashore, and the Hermitage, in the Forest, are real hotels de luxe, and are under the proprietorship of Messrs. Diétté and Recoursine, the well-known hosts of the Royal Palace Hotel, Paris. So the best entertainment is assured as far as hotels are concerned. The environment on every side is enchanting, and the company always fashionable and select, yet wonderfully animated and chic. The stretch of sandy beach is always lovely, and at there is life and gaiety enough for anyone. Here, indeed, we feel the joy of life in the highest degree. The edifice is stately, the rooms are magnificent, the grounds are exquisitely laid out, and all around is the health-giving pine forest, with its aromatic odours and picturesque groves and avenues. And for this great Carnival Week the Casino will be a wondrous scene, inside and out. The two orchestras will discourse the finest modern music, and Parisian Opera Companies will perform in the theatre.

UNSURPASSABLE OPPORTUNITIES FOR GOLF AND TENNIS.

Harry Vardon, who spends a considerable time here every year, has pronounced the Le Touquet 18 and 9 golf course, rich in natural hazards and perfect greens, to be the finest on the Continent; it combines the properties of seaside and inland golf in a manner not to be found elsewhere. There are thirteen lawn tennis courts, in perfect condition, beautifully situated in the forest, with pleasant and ample accommodation for onlookers.

THOSE WHO WISH TO DANCE THE TANGO

will be able to enjoy themselves to their heart's content in the great ball-room. A Tango Competition, for which there will be a lady's and a gentleman's prize, will be one of the features of the week. The Tango dancers from Paris, London, and other places will be in great evidence. Dancing will be in progress, moreover, at all hours after dinner, one orchestra playing in the ball-room until 12, and, for those who desire, another orchestra will play at the Supper Club, from 12 onwards. This will be

A WEEK TO BE REMEMBERED.

Every day of this week will be full of incident and delight. The scene will at all times, by day or night, be one of infinite pleasure. Dulness will be impossible. The company will be such as it will be a gladness to associate with, and, with so universal a favourite as Miss Harding, well known in dancing circles, acting as hostess, to help matters forward and spread the social feeling, the enlivening pace of things will be admirably maintained. Two grand balls will take place during the week, and the Tango dancing will be a revelation in the animation, grace, and refinement of movement displayed. The Tango competitions will bring together the most active exponents of this new terpsichorean exercise. The time of the year for this Festival Week has been happily chosen. Even those who have already had a holiday will be glad of this opportunity for a final "round up" for health and pleasure's sake, before turning to the workaday business of life and the trials of the wintry climate. We shall realise that, with "Youth at the prow and pleasure at the helm," it is always inspiring to glide down the stream of life. A week of this kind gives a new zest to existence.

BOOKINGS.

Scores of nice people have already booked for the Gala week, and readers should lose no time in registering their names, as the accommodation of the Hermitage and Atlantic Hotels at this time of the year is, of course, limited, and immediately the accommodation is all booked up no more names can be accepted. Further information, with the week's programme illustrated in colours, will be furnished with pleasure by the Secretary, Le Touquet Gala Committee, 25, Sardinia House, Kingsway, London, W.C.

INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS OF MEDICINE.

At the International Congress of Medicine, which was held in London during the first week of August, Messrs. A. Wulfging and Co. were awarded the Grand Prix for their well-known tonic-food, Sanatogen. It is a significant fact that an international jury of leading medical men should have singled out this preparation for the highest possible award, and the makers are to be heartily congratulated on their success. Sanatogen has a world-wide reputation, and thoroughly deserves the good opinion held of it by the medical profession.

placement he comes to such a faulty conclusion)—is disqualified by that very poverty which throws such a torpor over his mental faculties, and which binds his intellect with such iron chains of ignorance and stupidity.

The daily existence in slumdom not only stunts the growth of the body, but crabs the development of the mind. The lack of free air and proper nourishment emaciates the flesh; the degrading life in factory or hovel shrivels up the soul. No true freedom is possible under such conditions, and it is only through the removal of such restrictions and impediments that the poor man can hope for freedom—for free play of muscle and mind, for depth of feeling, and for clearness of vision—in short, for purity of soul.

E. E. R.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—As a Socialist, I cannot let Mr. Purdom's provocative article go unchallenged. I cannot understand how he can seriously argue that the abolition of poverty would inevitably rob the masses of their liberty and their joy in life. What liberty is possible to the man who is compelled to perform some monotonous act of drudgery for twelve or fourteen hours a day without respite till a pauper's grave shall claim him? What joy is his who labours for a bare subsistence wage which leaves no margin for those things which lend refinement and meaning to life? This is the condition of millions of our "imperial" race, and yet Mr. Purdom seems to think that it is in these circumstances that the soul will attain its highest development. It follows that in future we must look to the slum and the sweater's den for all our great artists and teachers!

I agree with Mr. Purdom that the tendency of modern social legislation is to restrict liberty—the unlicensed liberty of those anti-social forces which undermine the liberties of the mass of the people. The history of civilisation is the record of the struggle to obtain the greatest good of the greatest number by the restriction of the liberty of the jungle. To-day we are finding that laissez-faire has not resulted in the promotion of the common weal, but rather in the reduction of the people to a state of wage-slavery. We are realising that the class which controls the economic conditions of liberty controls liberty itself, and that only when the exploitation of man by man is utterly abolished will man be free. The Socialists—who represent the greatest international force the world has ever seen—are therefore demanding the transfer of economic power from the capitalist class to the whole people by the collectivisation of industry.

Mr. Purdom, as a true disciple of Mr. Belloc, would tell us that this would result in the establishment of the Servile State, and that people would soon discover that official is but employer writ large, to adapt Milton's famous saying. But that is to ignore the fact that in a democratic Socialist State the destiny of the people would be in their own hands. An autocratic bureaucracy is impossible if adequate democratic control is exercised.—I am, sir, etc., H. CAVE.

THE LETTERS OF CHARLOTTE BRONTË.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—The article on the above subject by your contributor, Margaret Hamilton, is such as to call for a strong protest. In her anxiety to vindicate Charlotte Brontë she falls into the error of disparaging Professor Héger, not perceiving that what detracts from the worth of the one seriously accuses the judgment of the other. If Professor Héger was "elderly, obese, and obtuse"—"a stolid Fleming," how shall we acquit the perception of Charlotte Brontë for investing such a figure with the attributes of a Prince Charming? Our great English writer emerges from the ordeal more honourably and creditably when Héger is faithfully portrayed, for her sense was more wonderful than her genius.

When Charlotte Brontë went to Brussels she was twenty-six years of age; Professor Héger was a little over thirty. He could scarcely be called "middle-aged or elderly." So far from being a stolid pedagogue, he was an accomplished man—enthusiastic, passionate, and tender. Imagination played as large a part in his nature as "pedagogic precision," as the following incident reveals. When Charlotte Brontë was writing for his inspection on the subject of Moses on Mount Nebo, after stating the circumstances in which he took leave of the Israelites, her imagination became warmed, and she launched forth in a noble strain, depicting the glorious future of the chosen people. Before reaching the middle of this glowing description, however, she interrupts herself to discuss the doubts that have been thrown on the miracles of the Old Testament. M. Héger remarks, "When you are writing, place your argument first in cool, prosaic language; but when you have thrown the reins on the neck of your imagination, do not pull her up to reason." Does this savour of "pedagogic precision"?

Mrs. Frederika Macdonald, who was a pupil of M. and Madame Héger's twenty years after Charlotte Brontë returned to England, bears testimony to the magnetic influence of Héger, and says "it is absurd to describe him as an insignificant little Belgian schoolmaster who would never have been heard of but for the idolatry of a woman of genius."

The preservation and publication of the letters may move some to censure Héger. But let us be charitable. When we look into our own hearts condemnation dies on our lips. Who would not be proud to be the recipient of such letters? In conclusion, let us be thankful that the suffering soul of Charlotte Brontë passed stainless through a path beset with many pitfalls; and if the letters show how severe was her suffering, they reveal also the saintly purity of one who, in more ways than one, was a whole heaven above us.

THE MAN BEFORE THE MAST.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Mr. Sheridan Jones' article under the above heading proved of immense interest to me, as I have had two years as apprentice on a foreign-going steamship. Your correspondent E. A. Davies makes an erroneous statement when he says the exacting eye-tests of the Board of Trade have no relation whatever to the requirements at sea. It is imperative for a seaman to have perfect sight, whether he is on deck or on the bridge. Seafarers generally are only too glad to pass these tests, knowing what it means to them. They know, only too well, that, in case of the stranding or wreck of the vessel, the odds are, if they have defective sight, they will be blamed. A man at sea has a soul. He knows that if his sight is not good he may be the cause of the drowning of numbers of his fellow-creatures.

I think, personally, that the eye examination is not strict enough, and I know that it is frequently laughed at by men in the mercantile marine. I was forced to leave the sea through defective eyesight. Two Board

A simple, easy, and painless method of curing weak sight will appeal to every sufferer. Since my Treatment was first announced I have enabled thousands to discard glasses entirely, even in people of sixty and more years of age.

I want every sufferer from weak sight to read this announcement. I want even sufferers from terrible diseases such as Glaucoma and Cataract to write to me. Read the wonderful letter of Miss Jane Walker, who, writing for her mother, Mrs. Julia Walker (aged 68), of Church Street, Tenbury Wells, Worcester, says:—"Mother suffered from Cataract, but derived much benefit from your treatment. She would have been blind by now but for you." Mrs. Walker's sight failed 30 years ago, and she wore glasses for 25 years.

I have cured so many that I am confident I can cure you. To this you perhaps reply, "If you are so confident, send me your Treatment on free trial. You can give me no better proof than this."

I offer all sufferers a 10 Days' Free Trial, on the understanding that if their sight is not improved the trial will not cost them a penny. No offer could be fairer. Either the trial benefits your sight or you pay nothing. You will be the sole judge of the efficacy of my system, and I pledge myself to accept your word without the slightest hesitation.

of Trade examiners passed my sight as "excellent," but, after I had been about two years at sea, it was found my sight was not all that could be desired. SATANISM.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Not a few statements in Mr. Bernard Hamilton's article (August 8, p. 519) on "The Literary Side of Satanism" must have taken the readers of EVERYMAN by surprise. Why was a statue of Carducci erected in Rome? Not because he was a Satanist, but because he was a great poet, of whom Italy is justly proud. But was Carducci a preacher of Satanism? There is nothing in his poetry to support the assertion except the title, and the title only, of one of his poems, "The Hymn to Satan," where Satan is merely the symbol of rebellion against the restraints of freedom. Moreover, the poet himself held this youthful performance as of no account in his life-work. In fact, the accusation of Satanism would be better founded if directed against Milton and Goethe than against Carducci. Then, again, what about the spread of Satanism in present-day Italy? That cannot be proved either by modern novels or mediæval treatises, and intelligent and observant Italy is not aware of its existence. Italian friends in whose company I am spending my holidays—men and women of literary culture, interested in social and intellectual movements, and connoisseurs of Carducci's poetry—confirm my views. I am afraid (or, rather, I am glad) Mr. Hamilton's facts and assumptions do not justify his conclusions. There always have been and will be cranks and weak-minded followers of them, but the twentieth century is not in the least likely to have to face the question of Satanism versus Christianity, or Satanism versus any other alternative.—I am, sir, etc.,

Les Bossons, Haute Savoie.

F. N.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—In writing on the subject of Satanism Mr. Bernard Hamilton has, it appears to me, shown himself frightened at the word. As regards the subject, no one can hold it in greater abhorrence than myself. But I am not impressed either with blessed or cursed words. And it is evidently the hatred of a word that causes Mr. Hamilton to label Carducci a Satanist. I maintain, however, that l'Inno a Satana has nothing whatever to do with Satanism or devil-worship. The poem was written by Carducci in 1863 under the name of Enotris Romano, but on being called the "Poet of Satan" he immediately repudiated the title and the hymn, calling it a chitarronata. I am not for a moment going to defend the tone or the taste of the poem; my contention is that it is not representative of Carducci. Carducci regarded it as a juvenile outburst. Never again did he use such violence against Christianity. In reality, the poem is of the Nature school and full of the classical spirit. It is a protest against slavery of any kind, and a plea for the joys of the earth. The Hellenism of the poem is as far removed from Satanism and devil-worship as is the Paganism of Wordsworth's famous sonnet, "The World is Too Much with Us." The man was no Satanist who could write such masterpieces as "Alle fonti del Clitumno," "Dinanzi alle terme di Caracalla," "Sermione," "Per la morte di Napoleone Eugenio," "Scoglio di Quarto," "Miramar," "Alla Regina d'Italia," "Alla stazione in una mattina d'autunno," "Presso l'urna di Percy Bysshe Shelley," and "Lauda Spirituale." The last is one of the few great Christian odes of the nineteenth century, and for matter and style is little inferior to any of Manzoni's Inni Sacri. Why a statue to such a genius as Carducci should so annoy Mr. Hamilton passes my comprehension. Instead of denouncing the man, would it not be better to read the poet?—I am, sir, etc.,

E. J. WATSON.

August 10th, 1913.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I know nothing about Satanism, but, if it means a worship of evil, I am sure Carducci's "Hymn to Satan" has nothing to do with it. It is a capital hymn to life and the modern spirit, in a good swinging rhythm. Satan is addressed as the enemy of despotism and priestcraft, much like what was probably Goethe's first conception of Mephistopheles in "Faust" as the enemy of mediævalism. The poem appeals to Wyclif and Huss, Savonarola and Luther, as champions of the cause it advocates. The lines your correspondent quotes are not so bad, surely, if you put them in such a context. "Force, champion of Reason," is not a bad thing to be. "The Jehovah of the priests" stands for the cruel old gods of barbarism and sacerdotalism. I wish I could translate a few verses of it; but Carducci's metre and rhymes are too felicitous for me to venture on. Here is a very rough attempt:—

"See how they tremble—
The crown and the mitre;
Out of the cloister
Thunders the fighter,

Preaching rebellion
Under the "stola"*
Of Brother Girólamo
Sávonaróla.

There is a lovely verse which I have constantly in mind:—

"Quándo le ioniche
Aure serene
Béd la Vénere Anadróméne."

(When Venus, rising from the sea, drank the tranquil airs of Ionia.)

I have marked the rhythm, which is great part of the beauty.

The end of the poem identifies Satan (i.e., progress) with the steam engine!—I am, sir, etc.,

BERNARD BOSANQUET.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Your contributor Mr. Bernard Hamilton thinks "the man in the street" is much maligned. Why, then, should he proceed to malign literary London? "Devil-worship," he declares, "is as rife in London to-day as it was on the Continent during the middle ages." And, in support of this frightful accusation, he refers to Fraser Stahlmann's novel "The Satanist" (a piece of fiction about Italy), to the Italian poet Carducci, who lived on the borders of insanity, and to an anonymous story in Blackwood's published about fifteen years ago, ending his sensational article

It gives me great pleasure to say how much my wife and I enjoyed our holiday in Paris and Rouen.
The arrangements made by you for our comfort were most satisfactory, and enabled us, under the guidance of your very able conductor, to visit many places which otherwise we should not have seen.
The extent of the satisfaction may be gauged by the fact that we are already contemplating a visit to Switzerland next summer under the "Everyman" auspices.

I feel I must write a few lines to thank you for the very pleasant holiday I enjoyed in Normandy this month. Though very diffident about joining the party alone I never regretted it, and enjoyed each day thoroughly. The happy result was chiefly due to the conductor's unflinching courtesy and kindness, and in great measure to the friendliness of the very agreeable people who formed the party.

with the words, "That there are Satanists among us in London to-day we cannot positively doubt." This is the evidence for devil-worship in London, the support he relies on for an insinuation that could not be worse. But the mere recital of this evidence should suffice to reassure your readers. As a fact, the devil in these days is scarcely a personage substantial enough to command worship, but, if he were, I should hold amongst his most ardent worshippers those who, out of some inner superstition, seek to blacken the features of humanity. There is one comfort: a breath of wholesome sanity quickly disperses these miasmatic suggestions.—I am, sir, etc.,

AN OLD TIME LEGEND

MR. BERNARD CAPES, in his latest novel, THE POT OF BASIL (Constable and Son, 6s.), has revived an old legend with exquisite results. The tale of Isabella and her soldier lover is one of those world-myths that are eternal. It needs an artist to select the essentials of a legend, to prune away the excrescences that have grown up round the main motive, and at the same time to preserve in its entirety the essence of the romance. The author's style, swift and dramatic, capable at once of delicate humour and rare pathos, lends itself admirably to the telling of the tale. Isabella, the Infanta of Spain, falls in love with Tiretta, the soldier of fortune, who is acting as deputy for Joseph, Archduke of Austria, in treaty for her hand. It is in the orange grove that they realise what has befallen them. "All the glowing air was steeped in incense, . . . the smell of warm, moistened grass rose to mix with and threaten the languider perfume, whose excess had otherwise been cloy. No whisper breathed, no blade stirred in all the lovely grove." Isabella, a child in emotion for all her rank, gives her heart, in all its untutored affection, to Bonbec, as she calls the Chevalier. No love tokens pass between them save those that might be bestowed by a peasant maid upon her sweetheart. She gives him a faded flower, a sprig of love-in-a-mist that she dropped and he stole at their first meeting. He gives her a pot of sweet basil, the plant that "flowers best when watered with the blood of murdered men." It is in the midst of this love idyll, when the air is drenched with the perfume of the orange blossom, that Mr. Capes first sounds the note of tragedy. Says Tiretta, as he hands his lady love the basil, "I have a strange feeling about it . . . that its flowering will coincide with our love's triumph; that it waits to be the symbol of our bridal." And, as we read, a shadow falls athwart the brilliance of the day, and the wind falls to moaning in the tree-tops. The lovers are betrayed by the treachery of Isabella's waiting-maid, Fanchette. She is drawn with rare skill, and is the treacherous confidante beloved of romance; we meet her type in every fairy tale. But, while preserving the traits of the popular ideal, Mr. Capes has sketched for us a living reality. The Parisienne, with her slim waist and dapper figure, impresses one with reality. She does not betray her mistress for money.

Mr. Capes introduces a fresh element. She yields to the persuasions of her lover, Charlot, who, consumed with envy of Tiretta, desires to bring about his downfall. The suspicions of Court are aroused. Tiretta is banished, and Isabella accepts the betrothal ring of Joseph. But love laughs at ceremony, and the Infanta meets again and again the man of her choice, until that last night when they plan to leave behind all obstacles to their union and set sail for the north. Fanchette agrees to help the elopement. Charlot, full of suspicion, steps in. He meets Fanchette in the presbytery of a church, and one of the most poignant and dramatic scenes of the whole book ensues. The maid, touched to some extent by Isabella's charm, and influenced by a certain admiration for Tiretta, refuses to connive at his assassination. Charlot threatens that she may pay for her refusal dearly. She grows hysterical, loses all vestige of self-control. There follows a fierce struggle, until at last he masters her. "He felt behind him for a riding-switch he had laid there, and, holding her arm with his left, applied it to her shoulders. One of them had been wrenched bare in the tussle. He did not spare the naked flesh for that, but rather lusted to see it quiver and crimson under his blows." She was beaten into submission, and the author gives us a swift glimpse into the brutality that underlay the sentiment of the time when, after all is over and Fanchette has consented to play the part of Judas, her lover gives her an unspeakable caress. "With lips like salve he touched the wounded flesh. 'Chère amie—Fanchette—no, I will not loose you.'" The assassination of Tiretta is quiet, almost placid, in contrast. The inevitable happens; tradition is satisfied, the legend of hopeless love is preserved extant. Bonbec is dead, and leaves the pot of basil as a legacy and an assurance. Isabella marries Joseph and bears him a daughter; but though she makes a docile, uncomplaining wife, the heart has gone out of her, she is but the wraith of her old joyous self. Three years after her wedding the pot of basil, that for all her care has never put forth a single bud, suddenly and mysteriously flowers, and she recognises it as a signal for the reunion with her lover. The night she makes the discovery she laughs for the first time since her wedding, and sits with her husband a while in the balcony overlooking gardens mystic and wonderful in the moonshine. Of a sudden she hears a cry, and with outstretched arms rushes out into the night. "When he reached her she lay in that drowning tide of light like a spent phantom of the mist. A smile of utter rest was on her lips."

And thus the curtain rings down on an exquisite rendering of an old legend.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

SIR ARTHUR CONAN DOYLE continues the adventures of Professor Challenger and his friends in THE POISONED BELT (Hodder and Stoughton, 3s. 6d. net). The plot is hardly so arresting as that of "The Lost World," but there are certain scenes that stand out as some of the most dramatic of the author's effects. Professor Challenger—reminiscent of the delightful egoist in the Stark Munro letters—sends cryptic messages to his three companions of the previous journey, his rival Professor Summerlee, Lord John Roxton, and Malone, the journalist who tells the story. He summons them to come to his country house forthwith, and to bring with them supplies of oxygen. Arrived upon the scene, he tells them that death is a

50 "Everyman" SCHOLARSHIPS

No Entrance Fee to "Everyman" Readers. No Specialized Knowledge Required.

THE world owes a decent living to everyone who is willing to work, but to get adequate reward for labour you must work with brain as well as muscles. Manual labour is so under-paid that you must do mental work, work that is wanted, and well paid for.

No field of effort is less crowded to-day than that of the new art of advertising. I don't mean the old catch phrases and exaggerations that disfigured the walls and periodicals of the last generation, but sane, interesting statements of fact.

Profitable Truth-telling.

Honesty is the best policy in advertising. People grew tired of being deceived by the exaggerations of the older advertisers, and when they found a merchant whose statements were dependable, they gave him their custom and repeat orders, and his business flourished accordingly. The leading modern advertisers have learned the profitableness of truth-telling.

An illustrated description of an article allows the prospective buyer to consider and compare its advantages at leisure. The press and the postal system has extended the range of commerce to spheres undreamt of by our grandfathers.

Instead of selling goods within the confines of one town or village, with advertising a man can have regular customers scattered over two Continents.

Commonsense Training.

To write advertisements needs commonsense knowledge of the use of words, and training. Finding things out for oneself is a slow and disheartening method of learning a business. With proper training a man can at once begin to turn his talents to practical account. No matter where he lives, he can earn money by writing advertisements, because most advertising work is done by post. EVERYMAN readers should know and judge for themselves the possibilities of this profession. The directors of the Practical Correspondence College herewith offer 50 scholarships in advertisement writing.

Earning While Learning.

The College is conducted by well-known British experts. It teaches by post modern professions and helps students to earn while they learn.

Scholarships are open to readers upon the following unprecedented terms:

The 50 candidates who send in the best answers to the test questions will receive the full course of postal tuition at half the regular fees, the remaining half to be paid only when you have earned £10 by advertisement writing as a result of the tuition.

Wanted Men and Women with Brains.

The tuition is planned to enable men and women with brains and enterprise to acquire in the shortest possible time a money-earning degree of proficiency in a lucrative profession—which offers unlimited scope.

The object of these scholarships is to select as students those who are best fitted to profit by the instruction, and, therefore, most likely to achieve ultimate success as advertisement writers, thereby demonstrating the efficiency of the P.C.C. system of training.

The successful students will not only earn back much more than the fees paid, and incidentally receive a first-class practical training free, but will acquire proficiency that may be worth anything from £1 to £10 a week to them.

No previous knowledge of the subject is necessary to successfully answer the test questions of the examination paper—they are set to enable the instructors to decide if you have sufficient latent talent for the work to make it worth while to teach you.

The P.C.C. directors know what splendid prospects advertising work offers, and they have confidence, based upon wide experience, in their ability to teach and help students to become successful advertisement writers.

Many P.C.C. students earn more than the amount of fees paid before completing the course.

Get Out of the Rut of Routine.

P.C.C. students include men and women in all walks of life; they are anxious to get out of the rut of routine, and every post brings grateful letters from students in all parts of the world, telling us of their success, the work they are doing, and how good it feels to be able to earn money in a new, uncrowded and interesting profession.

If you have common sense and ambition, here is your chance to find an outlet for your dormant abilities, to enhance your "market value," and enable you to rise steadily, surely, and make your way in the world.

No examination papers can be received after September 8th. Applications will be dealt with in strict rotation, and applicants will be notified immediately all the Scholarships have been awarded.

A Little Spare Time and Thought.

You must send a postcard at once for the examination form, so that you can devote a little spare time and thought to answering the test questions. There is no entrance fee—it costs a halfpenny stamp to write for gratis examination paper and a penny to return it filled up. You are under no further liability whatever.

Surely you will risk a halfpenny stamp and investigate this Scholarship offer in which the College risks hundreds of pounds.

In addition to the Examination Paper, the College will send gratis to every applicant a copy of a useful booklet, Brains and Ink, and particulars of the Course and the Scholarships.

It costs nothing to enter; you risk nothing more than three halfpence for postage. You commit yourself to nothing, and you stand a good chance of success.

Address, The Secretary, Practical Correspondence College, 77, Thanet House, Strand, W.C.

Write "Scholarship" in top left corner.

The individual training is personally conducted by an expert of International Reputation. Instruction is entirely by correspondence. You work at home in your own time, and twelve months are allowed to complete the course. If you fail to earn £10 you get your training at half price. Our interests are mutual. We only receive full fees for our teaching and help when you have earned £10. Could anything be fairer?

Reduced from the Diploma awarded to Successful Students.

"Everyman" will be sent gratis and post free for six months to every Scholarship winner.

matter of hours. The world is passing through a belt of poison, and the toxic effects will mean the death of every living thing upon the earth. Oxygen may prolong existence for a few hours, and to this end he instructed them to bring all the cylinders they could carry. One of the most impressive scenes in the book is when, after an interminable wait, they find the air in the last cylinder is becoming exhausted. "The sun had burst through the gauzy mists which veiled it, and the whole broad world was washed in golden light. Sitting in our dark and poisonous atmosphere, that glorious, clean, wind-swept countryside seemed a very dream of beauty. . . . The atmosphere was already very close. It seemed to me that the shadows of death were drawing in upon us—the last of our race. It was like an invisible curtain closing down upon every side." The strain grows too intense. Challenger and his friends decide to end it and to let the poison in.

"'Good-bye, young fellah,' said Lord John. 'The window's plastered up. You cannot open it.' Challenger stooped and raised his wife, pressing her to his breast, while she threw her arms round his neck.

"'Give me that field-glass, Malone,' said he gravely . . . 'into the hands of the Power that made us we render ourselves again!' he shouted in his voice of thunder, and at the words he hurled the field-glass through the window."

And then follows the sensation of the book. You catch your breath, thinking they will all fall dead; but "before the last tingle of falling fragments had died away there came the wholesome breath of the wind, blowing strong and sweet. . . . The world had cleared the poisoned belt!" Of the subsequent adventures of the party it is only necessary to say that the interest is sustained, and the descriptions of the dead world are picturesque and convincing.

The author of "The Adventures of John Johns" has given us a lengthy diagnosis of the mental, moral, and physical diseases from which a financier of the name of Alster is suffering. TANTALUS (Werner Laurie, 6s.) deals with a man of forty-six suffering from too much money, too much pleasure, and general plethora. The book has a nasty flavour. The author dwells unceasingly on the ill effects resultant on sexual indulgence. Alster is engaged in a number of sordid intrigues, from which he seems to derive but little joy. He bitterly upbraids the objects of his attention, and is for ever deploring the calls they make on his purse and on his time. When he is not engaged in bullying these unfortunate women he is either taking his temperature or measuring the calves of his legs. He lives in hourly dread of growing old, yet takes no reasonable precautions to retain his health. The reader is wearied by a reiteration of his symptoms, and feels at last that he is assisting at a protracted deathbed. The financier, however, does not die; he marries a young wife, loses a great deal of his money, and the author leaves him in an advanced state of decrepitude.

PENELOPE'S DOORS (Mills and Boon, 6s.) is a pleasant story of middle-class life. Miss Ridout, the middle-aged heroine, is a charming woman of unconquerable vivacity, who, like Micawber, has a firm belief in something turning up. The author, Miss Sophie Cole, has drawn a very faithful picture of life in a household of women, for Penelope is not alone; she has adopted three orphan nieces and has sacrificed money and leisure to look after them. Faustina and Madeline, the two elder girls, earn their living as typists, and the glimpse we get of the offices where they are engaged suggests the real thing. The even tenour of the story is somewhat violently disturbed by the introduction of a bold bad stockbroker with designs on Faustina's virtue. She is decoyed to an impossible flat, from which she is rescued at the psychological moment by her aunt's lodger, a comedian of the name of Tuppy. Apart from this, however, the story is set in a quiet key, and the sketches of people and things are vivid and arresting. Penelope is a lovable heroine, and the conventional happy ending is in her case the only possible one. She loses her money, starts a shop that is an ignominious failure, and then, true to her philosophy, one door having shut, another is opened, and she walks into the arms of Tuppy.

Mrs. Romilly Fedden has written an extravaganza brimful of fun and with touches of clever characterisation. The plot is old, and centres round the outworn theme of one room allotted to a number of people, all of whom claim it at the same time. The scene is laid at a villa in Italy rented by a young honeymoon couple. The accommodation is limited, and they can boast only but one spare room! They yield to a very human impulse, tell their friends they have found an earthly paradise, and, secure in the belief that no one will intrude on their seclusion, lavish invitations right and left. So delightful does the prospect sound, however, that everybody accepts the invitation, and eight or nine competitors arrive simultaneously! Complications, amusing if stereotyped, ensue, and various love affairs are adjusted. The author has a certain charm of style, and THE SPARE ROOM (Duckworth, 6s.) will serve to pass away a pleasant hour.

Mr. Booth Tarkington has written a bright and taking story called THE FLIRT (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.). Cora, the flirt in question, belongs to a very old type. There is nothing new about this particular variety of coquette, but she is human enough to be accepted without quibble, and sufficiently fascinating to justify her description. The family to which she belongs is typically American, and the local colour is cleverly applied. Laura, the sister of the flirt, is a modern Cinderella, a woman who, to quote a Yankeeism, does not "put all her goods in the shop window." Cora's final achievement is to upset her sister's engagement by attracting Laura's sweetheart and adding him to her list of scalps. Providence intervenes on behalf of Cinderella, and the flirt is married out of hand to an admirer who declines to be dismissed. One of the most delightful episodes of the book concerns Cora's small brother Hedrick, who, allured by the inducements of a small person of the age of twelve, discovers he has fascinated a pretty little imbecile, who insists on giving him demonstrations of her affection in the open street. She pursues him round the town, and he is only rescued at last by his elder sister. "They were already within a yard or two of the street; and a strange boy, passing, stopped and observed, and whistled discourteously.

"'Ain't he the spooner?' remarked this unknown with hideous admiration.

"'I will thank you,' returned Hedrick haughtily, 'to go on about your own business.'

"'Kiss me some more, darling little boy,' said Lolita.

"The strange boy screamed with laughter, howled the loving petition in a dozen keys of mockery, while Hedrick writhed and Lolita clung. Enriched by a new and great experience, the torturer trotted on, leaving viperish cachinations in his wake."

The novel has something of the élan that made Monsieur Beaucaire such a success, and is eminently readable throughout.

Mr. Squire adds to his reputation as a poet by the publication of his latest book of verse, THE THREE HILLS, AND OTHER POEMS (Howard Latimer, Ltd., 3s. 6d.). Written in varying mood and style, it is difficult to arrive at an opinion as to where he is most effective. At times we are charmed with his lyrical gifts; at others he strikes a harsh, almost repellent note, which upsets one's previous estimate of his powers. But though he perplexes, yet in his softer moments one forgets everything but the smoothness of his gracious lines:—

"There always the vernal sun,
There happy birds forever sing.
There faint perfumed breezes run
Through branches of eternal spring;
There faces browned with fruit and milk,
And blue-winged words and rose-bloomed kisses,
In galleys gowned with gold and silk,
Shake on a lake of dainty blisses."

In an age of melancholy and minor poets Mr. Squire's dainty conceits are excellent good reading.

Miss Alice Brown has a distinct talent for the short story, that much-abused branch of English literature. It has been said that there are but six plots for the magazine type of tale, and that the popular writer has only to ring the changes on half a dozen situations to suit the market. VANISHING POINTS (Constable, 6s.) is a collection of tales and sketches, neither stereotyped nor conventional. The author contrives to suggest atmosphere, and achieves a certain level of dry humour eminently refreshing. One of the most successful in the volume is "The Lantern," the study of a commonplace couple redeemed by a capacity for belief in each other, and a mutual sympathy and understanding. The tales hang on a slight thread. It is the style that tells, and the characterisation, with now and again a fragment of swift dramatic dialogue.

Miss Brown has achieved a distinct success.

ELDORADO. By the Baroness Orczy. (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.) The severest critics of this author will hardly deny that she has a way with her. It is a way that most of her readers find irresistible. "The Scarlet Pimpernel," if it did not secure for her a literary immortality, has at least placed her on the highest pinnacle of popularity. Nor is this to be wondered at. For the Scarlet Pimpernel—that gallant and great-hearted gentleman—fulfils all the essential conditions of romance. He is the man that every girl in her heart of hearts would like her lover to be. In "Eldorado" the Baroness Orczy returns to the French Revolution, and the Scarlet Pimpernel plays a very important part indeed in these pages. So, too, does the Baron de Batz, that enigma of the Revolution period, adventurer, arch-plotter, and political spy. The Baroness Orczy's presentation of de Batz is hardly a friendly one, but—and this is a matter of greater importance—she has succeeded in making him a man instead of a myth. All the great protagonists of the later stages of the Revolution are here—Robespierre and St. Just, Danton and Sauterne. The reader is hurried breathlessly along from incident to incident, and, if at times he feels that the probabilities have been slightly violated, he is ready to forgive everything to a novelist who can so successfully clothe the bones of the dead past with the gold and scarlet trappings of high romance.

This is a series designed to trace the genesis and evolution of the various departments of English literature and English thought. A second aim that has been kept in view in designing the series, is to afford those who might wish to devote themselves to one special type or form of composition the materials for accomplishing their desire. The principle adopted in the present series, in which literature is to be broken up into its component parts, and these parts studied analytically along the line of their literary evolution, has at least the quality of novelty to recommend it.

HISTORY IN THE MAKING

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

ONCE again the King has made a departure from custom as opportune as it will be welcome. The autumn Army manœuvres will derive exceptional importance from the fact that his Majesty will accompany the troops in person on the march north of the "Expeditionary Force" from the Chiltern Hills, which will last from September 22nd to 26th. There is no doubt that this action on the part of the King will do much to arouse interest, not only in the manœuvres themselves, but in the larger issue of our national defence, which has of late been thrust into the background.

It is most earnestly to be hoped that the Post Office will inquire carefully into the claims that are advanced in a London daily on behalf of the Grindell Matthews system of wireless telephony. One of the most regrettable incidents of the recent Marconi controversy was the constant reiteration of the charge that a particular company did not get adequate consideration from the officials. Now that the marvels of wireless telephony are about to materialise, it is earnestly to be hoped any suspicion of official indifference may be avoided, so that all the various systems may receive a fair field and no favour.

The proposed appointment of a "Pure Food Board"—a proposal that is pretty certain to crystallise sooner or later—is one step further in the direction of that government by experts to which it seems that the whole of our civilisation is tending. Let it be said at once that, if ever an evil called emphatically for expert consideration, it is that of impure food, for obviously it is only the expert who can detect it in some of its most insidious forms. Mentally, we have travelled far from the position which John Bright affirmed some fifty years ago, when he stated that adulteration was a legitimate form of competition. It is, of course, the poor who are the victims of this form of competition—a shorter word for which is swindling. The poor widow struggling to keep herself and her bairns from starvation, who buys doctored milk, "preserved" jam, and faked bacon is surely deserving of protection from the long arm of the law? Wisely and vigorously conducted, the Food Board could do much to save the poor from impostures like these, which really threaten the physique of the nation.

A serious defect in the working of the Insurance Act is revealed by the case of Samuel Amesbury, a Bristol labourer, who is in such an advanced state of consumption that he is not eligible for sanatorium treatment. The Insurance Committee allowed him 10s. a week for twenty-six weeks, at the end of which time the unfortunate man, being still alive, the grant abruptly stopped. The committee, however, allowed him only a quart of milk a day. Absolutely destitute, and without home or friends, he was told that if he succeeded in keeping body and soul together on his daily quart until June twelve-month, the committee would start the weekly money once again. Amesbury, however, was too friendless and ill to hope to live another year upon a daily dole of milk, and in despair he applied to the Poor-law Guardians, who have come to his assistance. This is a point of administration that calls urgently for alteration and relief.

Earl Grey's speech at the International Co-operative Congress at Glasgow was a notable, indeed, a masterly review of the progress made in these latter years by the descendants of the Rochdale pioneers. There is much that is imposing, much that is hopeful, to be said concerning that mammoth concern, the W.C.S., and the various branches into which it has sprouted, and Earl Grey said it all with great force and lucidity. And yet the fact remains that when all that can be said has been said, the present position of the co-operative movement is utterly disappointing. The lives of the great mass of the people are as untouched by its humanising influence as they were in the days before Robert Owen was born, and even in those towns where it is strong and well organised, its basic objects are lost sight of in the hunt for "ivi."

The general unrest agitating the ranks of industrialism is responsible for the present trouble in the building and kindred trades. The dispute with the painters has spread to the electricians and the engineers, who have declared a sympathetic strike until matters are adjusted. While the outlook is grave, and contains certain serious elements, there is a humorous side to the question. The Prime Minister's house is still undecorated, as the strikers are "out" against the Board of Works as well as private employers, and at the Colonial Office the clerks, deprived of electric light, have had to fall back on candles. The fountains in Trafalgar Square, however, are once more "playing," and we learn that some eighteen firms have already come to terms with their men. It is to be remembered that while the price of food has enormously increased, the rise in wages has been nothing like proportional, so that the purchasing power of a sovereign to-day may be said to correspond to that of fifteen shillings five years ago.

When will the travelling public be able to use the railways with reasonable safety? Only this week a case is reported in which a passenger in dire distress pulled the communication cord—with no results. The officials of the line stated that the cord was in perfect order, and, considered æsthetically, this may have been the case. The fact remains, however, that the cord did not act.

THE CASE FOR NATIONAL HOUSING

II.—HOUSING ON A LARGE SCALE * * BY L. G. CHIOZZA MONEY

I.

If we took housing in hand as a national question, and treated it as we treat the Navy, we could make our plans on a large and sufficient scale, and we should be in a position to call in aid in house-building, as we do in ship-building, the latest designs and the latest inventions. A ship and a house are alike in this, that they are of solid construction, capable of enduring for a long period of time. So intent are we upon getting the best ships that, although a Dreadnought may be well built enough to last for two generations, we turn it down in a very few years and replace it by a better contrivance. As things are, houses are allowed to drag on to a filthy old age. Not thousands, not hundreds of thousands, but millions of houses now stand in this country which are disgustingly dirty and actually soaked in disease. Merely to put one's head inside the front door of many of them is to encounter malodorous evidence that human beings are for many hours of the day living or sleeping under conditions which undermine health. Great towns contain miles of brickwork which it ought to be the first interest of the nation to demolish.

Let it not be thought that those condemned to live in such houses are alone concerned. It is the health of the community which is menaced. It is the whole community which is poor as long as the reproach remains. Under a policy of national housing it would be the duty of a Minister to survey and to replace and to rebuild, just as it is now the duty of the Lords of the Admiralty to survey our defences and to replace and to rebuild. Building construction is so simple, and, when properly considered, so cheap, that a modern nation should be able to rebuild its houses in whole or in part as soon as better housing methods or better domestic conveniences are discovered. At this moment, the majority of the sculleries of the country—to name only one illustration—are dirty and ill-furnished, lacking contrivances which would economise the time and the health of the poor women who work in them. As things are going, there is no reasonable prospect of improving this detail within fifty years. What is true of the scullery is true of the kitchen ranges, and of the parlour grates, and, indeed, of every detail of the house. And I speak not of the houses of the very poor alone, but of the great majority of our homes for all classes.

II.

'As to the question of space, barely one house in a thousand is provided with a decent garden. Are gardens popular? Are they needed? For answer turn to the extraordinary sale of cheap garden papers, and observe how these organs, circulating amongst people who have rarely more than a contracted backyard, have perforce to deal chiefly with the conditions of backyards, and to suggest devices and plans fitted for backyards. It is at once pathetic and magnificent what many people make of the wretched little enclosures which house-agents, whose hands are subdued to the colour they work in, dignify by the name of "gardens."

Working on an appropriately large scale, and handling space as it ought to be handled in the interests of the health of the nation, every family could be provided with ample garden space, and, it may be added, every family could purchase from State nurseries, such as they have had the sense to set up in Hungary, fruit trees and beautiful flowering shrubs and vegetable seeds for the delight and profit of the million. It is not too much to say that, by organised effort, the whole of England, in town and country, in garden and hedgerow, could be made one beautiful garden in the lifetime of the majority of those now living.

It ought to be clearly understood that we throw away space and pay heavily for its wastage under present conditions. If you build houses in sordid rows with absurd backyards, you necessarily use up, for each acre of ground employed, a large proportion of space for roads to give access to the rows of houses. Roads are costly things, and the cost of an acre so developed is consequently great. If, on the other hand, you reduce the number of houses per acre, and group them round beautiful greens, you economise space, reduce road cost per acre, and consequently are enabled to give each family housed much more space for almost the same expenditure. It is a simple business proposition, which has been worked out in detail by Mr. Raymond Unwin, the well-known architect. He has compared the effect of developing ten acres of land in two different ways, the first with 252 houses crowded on ten acres, the other with 106 houses on the same space. Here is the result:—

COMPARATIVE COST OF DEVELOPING TEN ACRES OF LAND COSTING £300 PER ACRE (1) FOR 252 HOUSES AND (2) FOR 106 HOUSES.

| | SCHEME 1. Houses in Absurd Rows. | SCHEME 2. Houses Grouped Sanely Round Open Space. |
|---|-------------------------------------|--|
| Number of Houses .. | 252 | 106 |
| Average Size of Plot .. | 98 yards | 398 yards |
| Cost of Roads | £7,942 | £2,478 |
| Cost of Land | £3,000 | £3,000 |
| Total Cost of Land and Roads per House .. | £43 8s. 6d. | £51 13s. 7d. |
| Equivalent Ground Rent per week .. | 8d. | 9½d. |
| Price of Plot per square yard | 8s. 10½d. | 2s. 7d. |

Under the second scheme road-making is economised by making one road round the ten acres. The houses border an interior open space, in which there are six full-size tennis courts, a children's playground, and a bowling green. By the other, the ordinary method, the houses are ranged in ugly rows at great and unnecessary cost. Note the result. By the sensible and beautiful plan the ground rent of each house is only three-halfpence per week more than in the other.

III.

Such are the principles which might be employed if housing were a national policy and administered as we administer the Navy. Indeed, I have not pushed the advantages far enough, for under a national policy land could be secured outside existing towns at its agricultural value, and the cost of giving healthy space to every family reduced to a negligible quantity.

Fully as important are the advantages in point of building which are naturally possessed by a nation treating housing as a public duty. At present the greater part of building is conducted by speculative builders, who have to work under conditions which handicap them at every point. They have to pay dearly for land, they have to handle space in small quantities, they have to borrow money at high rates of interest, they have to take great risks, and they often have to buy materials from hand to mouth in small quantities and not in the best market. Those who sneer at speculative builders should try their own hands at the game, and find out for themselves whether it is one that is easily played. Under present circumstances the speculative builder is a necessity, and we ought not to blame individuals when the trade is a regrettable necessity.

Let us rather contrast the position which the nation would occupy if it took the matter in hand. It would command cheap money. It would be able to deal on a large scale, and in some cases to handle materials at prices from ten to twenty-five per cent. less than is given by speculative builders. It would be to its interest to build well, with consequent great economy in the matter of up-keep and repairs. It would be able to supply houses so far complete in point of fitments (cupboards, window-seats, ingle-nooks, dressers, curbs, window fittings, etc.) that comparatively little movable furniture would be needed by the occupants, thus greatly conserving family incomes.

It could abolish the high rents which haunt so many families at this hour.

Let us see what rent the State would have to charge if it constructed a house costing £400—and for this price, working on a large scale, a beautiful little detached house standing in its own garden could be constructed—upon land, say, one-eighth of an acre, costing £30, the proportion of road-making, etc., costing another £30, total £460.

Borrowing money for the purpose at three and a quarter per cent., and repaying the loan in sixty years by equal annual instalments, including both principal and interest, the £460 of capital used in the building of the house would call for the provision of an annual sum of only £17 10s. 5d., making the State the absolute owner of the house at the end of the sixty years. The house being thoroughly well built, it should be sufficient to provide one per cent. to cover repairs, which means another £1 12s. per annum, making a total of £19 2s. 5d. Therefore, if the State thus bought the house for itself, at the expense of its tenants, it could let it for 7s. 4d. per week. That is to say, the rent which now often commands no more than a few sordid rooms would give a tenant such a home as is now enjoyed by few people even of the middle classes.

At the present time such a house—and it is rarely that one has the opportunity of renting a beautiful small detached house with a good garden—would be rented at at least £45 a year.

On the same lines a really good rural labourer's cottage on a quarter of an acre of land could be let for 3s. a week, that 3s. buying the house for the State.

IV.

But the case may be taken further. To my mind the State ought not thus to buy houses at the expense of its tenants. It should build houses as it builds battleships, with money provided out of revenue and not raised by loan. If it did that, it would be saving on account of the nation by investing in house property so much money every year, and upon its investment, in view of the vitally important nature of the case, it should be content to make a very small profit. Let us again consider our house and garden costing £460, and see what the State from this point of view might make the rental. Suppose it content to take a gross three per cent. for its money, which might mean a net two per cent. Three per cent. upon £460 is £13 16s., or a fraction under 5s. 4d. a week. That is to say, the State, treating houses as a national and vital necessity, could build and let to a town artisan such a house as few members of the middle classes can now command at a lower rent than is now paid by many town-dwellers for a perch in a slum.

Imagine the State with a yearly Housing Budget of £10,000,000, i.e., one-fifth of the present Naval Budget. This would enable it to build year by year a proportion of houses for all classes which would quickly change the aspect of life in town and country. Incidentally, the building trade would be steadied and changed from one of the most uncertain into one of the most certain of occupations.

There may be few who will go as far with me as building houses out of revenue. More will probably be found to consent to the conception of house-building out of loans to be repaid by the establishment of a sinking fund. By the latter method, to say nothing of the former, mighty things could be accomplished. The rebuilding of the nation is a simple business possibility.

PROPITIATION

THE short cut to the river is certainly through the stableyard and past the home farm. If you run all the way you can get there in five minutes—or seven, allowing for falls. Diccon usually ran, and he usually took seven minutes, because he was such a small boy. This afternoon he took fully ten minutes: you cannot even walk fast when you are carrying a large wooden engine and a full-sized Teddy bear.

He staggered along the footpath to the bridge and threw his red engine and the Teddy bear over the parapet into the water.

"There you are, God," he said. It was not a willing sacrifice; but he simply had to give God these things, so that Babs need not die. Perhaps the red engine and Teddy would take off His attention. Diccon hung over the parapet. Teddy spun wildly, with exploring arms, in the eddy below the bridge, till he sank, water-logged and drowned; the red engine rode far down the stream, wheels uppermost. They were the things Diccon loved beyond all his other toys. He comprehended suddenly the unspeakable emptiness of his life now that they were gone. But God despised half-gifts; nothing less than the best would satisfy Him; one knew that because of Cain.

Back came the small boy through the wet meadow to the house. It had been raining for days, and the nettles smelt horribly. He wondered whether Teddy had got to Heaven yet. He pictured the golden floor of Heaven, and Teddy sitting under the Tree of Life with its fruits, while angel-children played with him. Perhaps he had a small golden sailor-hat by now, and little wings growing; he had been such a good Teddy. He would be frightfully happy, of course. It was more difficult to imagine the translation of the engine.

The doctor's motor was still there. Diccon went in at the front door. There was no one about. The house was as still as still. Then he came suddenly on nurse. She was crying with great sobs. "Oh, Master Diccon!" she said. By this he knew that Babs had died, after all.

DORIS L. MACKINNON.

THE DRAMA AND SOCIAL REFORM

BY ARTHUR OWEN ORRETT

IT is unfortunate for the English drama that it has always been in the hands of a coterie. In Elizabethan times the poets cornered the stage, in Restoration times the wits, in the eighteenth century the actors, in the nineteenth the prudes. The danger now is that the social reformers will capture what is left of the theatre after the kinemas and music-halls have completed their depredations. Important indirect evidence in support of this assertion lies in the numerous letters which appear in the press, demanding a higher and more noble drama. It is a commonplace of public life that people who write to the papers are all reformers of one kind or another, and therefore it is fairly safe to assume that most of these correspondents have their eye on the drama as an engine to help them in their pet scheme of social regeneration. But direct evidence also is not wanting. There is the glut of suffragist plays (most of them, by the way, just as convincing as incendiarism, and much less dangerous), mainly written, produced, and supported by advocates of the "advanced" drama; then we have the dreary dramatic lectures of Brieux translated into English by the wife of the playwright, who is regarded as the leader of the new school; we have books written about the stage almost openly appealing, not for a theatre of ideas, but for a propagandist theatre. In fact, when we subtract from the patrons of drama the sugary romantics (a sadly depleted company, owing to the attractions of the much more heavily sugared drama of the picture-house) and the social reformers we find that the residuum is very small indeed.

It may be asked, Why should not the social reformer capture the theatre? What nobler use could the theatre be put to than to the cause of social enlightenment? In the first place, if the social reformers captured the theatre, they would only capture the dry husks. They would have to write for one another, for the people would refuse to go to the theatre to be lectured, just as they refuse to go to church. The theatre is primarily a place of entertainment. I know that this view is anathema to the zealots, who are exceedingly annoyed when their philistine friends air it for their benefit. They never think of replying: "Undoubtedly; but the musical comedy that entertains you bores me to extinction. I find Ibsen absorbing." Why do they not reply thus? Because in their heart of hearts they would dearly like to see that musical comedy, and it is Ibsen that bores them. They are between the devil and the deep sea. They have definitely refused to look on the drama as an entertainment; so they only go to plays from which they hope to get instruction. When they get instruction they feel exactly as if they had been listening to a debate: no better and no worse. When they see an Ibsen play they feel a sort of grudge against the author, because he neither instructs nor amuses them. In reality, Ibsen is the true dramatist (not because of the absence of humour in his plays, but in spite of it). He does not preach, except in the most abstract and rarefied sense—for instance, he constantly emphasises the all-importance of individuality; but he has a masterly insight into the springs of human action. He delineates character; his psychological studies are marvellously subtle. But psychology is the last thing the average social reformer thinks about.

Real drama would help social reform by stimulating thought, suggesting ideas, explaining character; the drama that shouts for reform of this or that abuse would make the stage a cockpit of contending factions (for there is always something to be said for every seeming abuse), and would eventually degrade authors into shrieking partisans. Take, for instance, Mr. Galsworthy. In "Strife," in order to avoid the appearance of partisanship, he does an egg-dance of impartiality, which is exceptionally clever, but which has the effect of making the play mechanical. In "Justice" he goes the whole hog, and indicts our prison system without mercy. We are triumphantly told by the social reformers that this play so worked upon the then Home Secretary that he at once caused various reforms to be made in the prison system. This may be so, but Mr. Winston Churchill, in spite of his exalted position, is only one man, and a mercurial, impressionable man, addicted to the coup d'état. There is no evidence that any great number of English people were moved by "Justice" to abhorrence for the punishment of solitary confinement. And genuine reforms can only be effected when they are demanded by the voice of the people, touched in heart and mind by the conviction of some great wrong. I do not say that solitary confinement, and, indeed, our whole penitentiary system, is not a great wrong. I only maintain that the nation is, as a whole, indifferent, and that the twenty-six performances of "Justice" probably touched no one who was not a convert already.

In "The Silver Box," on the other hand, Mr. Galsworthy is not so busy with his theme, which is the perfectly obvious one, that though money cannot buy justice it can buy the best legal advice. The play is certainly a social-thesis-drama, but the treatment is so general and unforced that the author has time to develop his characters. The result is that in Mrs. Jones, the patient charwoman, Mr. Galsworthy has given us a character far more pitiful and convincing than that of William Falder, the luckless victim of "Justice."

Drama should be a criticism of life, not of laws; of individuals, and only broadly of societies. Above all, a dramatist should never construct anything but character; in all else he must be a destructive force. There is an ancient parrot-cry, "Oh! anyone can destroy. It takes a genius to build!" To which I would answer, No one can destroy the abuses of society but society itself, and no one can put into society a spirit to remedy abuses save the man who lashes society with his deadly and destructive criticism. Reforms that come through the hypnotism of society by so-called constructive writers and statesmen are at best a patchwork, and at worst a running sore.

THE MAN AND HIS WORK

VII.—THE MAN IN BLUE * * BY C. SHERIDAN JONES

HE stands calm and unmoved amid the press and swirl of the traffic in the Strand, holding back with one gesture of his huge, forbidding hand half a dozen motor-buses and a score of taxis, what time he directs an old lady as to her best method of reaching Back Street, Clapham, and assures another wayfarer with his eye that he may now cross the road in perfect safety. He is supposed to know the way to everywhere; to be familiar with every dilemma of life, and every Act of Parliament and Local By-law, which he certainly is not, and to be always calm, collected, and civil, which he generally is. He will show the same steady stolidity after he has been on duty all night as when he takes up his beat, and conveys a stray child to the station with the identical measured tread that is heard when on occasions he helps home a member of the Stock Exchange who has been dining not wisely but too well. Even when, in less prosperous neighbourhoods, where domestic differences are settled in the street, he parts husband and wife with something of the same stolid impartiality, though, he may be belaboured of both. I have seen him under all sorts and conditions of circumstances: thrusting back the Suffragettes, or marching at the head of their procession; saving lives at the risk of his own, when "Fire" has got ahead of the brigade, and he has forced a door to pull a child out of a burning room; or when he has plunged headlong into the river to rescue a drowning woman. I have seen him also under less favourable conditions; when angry, and, perhaps, spiteful, he is inclined to use force where none is necessary, and to be more than a little brutal. But I have never seen him flustered or at a loss for a lead, and on the whole he is an admirable representative of a race whose quiet capacity for action is not the least valuable of their characteristics, and whose sons often lose their tempers, but generally keep their heads.

He must be at least 5 ft. 10 in. in height, must have a chest measurement—for most forces—of 37 in., and must be certified by the police surgeon to be sound in heart, wind, and limb. The strain on his physique is necessarily a severe one. Wear and tear frequently develop flat feet and varicose veins in his legs, and, despite the fact that he is too often regarded as having an easy time, the ordinary constable has a march of some twenty miles or thereabouts during his nine or ten hours of duty, day or night. His responsibilities to the public are, of course, enormous; his pay, as I shall presently show, is by no means adequate, and he is very frequently the victim—I can use no other word—of a discipline that is often harsh and capricious to a degree.

First, let us see how many men are affected by the conditions I am about to describe.

The strength of our police force in England, Wales, and Scotland, as reported in recent official returns, was as follows:—English and Welsh counties and boroughs, 29,753; Scotch counties and boroughs, 5,495; Metropolitan, 17,911; City of London, 1,001; police employed at private cost, 1,479; making a total of 55,639.

Of these, the Metropolitan Police govern an area of 447,626 statute acres, or 699 square miles, and a population approaching 8,000,000 persons. It comprises 15,047 ordinary constables, 2,275 sergeants of various grades, 552 inspectors, and 32 superintendents, in twenty-one separate divisions, which are indicated by letters A to Y, in addition to the division specially devoted to the River Thames, familiarly called the "Water Rats." These officers, from sergeants to superintendents, are all of them, it is most interesting to note, men who have been promoted from the ranks.

Under what conditions do these men, most of them of comparatively humble origin and of rudimentary education, fulfil the important duties that are entrusted to them by the community?

The pay of an ordinary policeman, on joining, ranges from 21s. a week in agricultural counties to 25s. in the largest of the great provincial towns and cities, and 25s. 6d. in the Metropolis. The maximum pay, reached by gradations extending from eight to twelve years, is from 27s. 6d. in counties and small boroughs to 35s. in a few of the largest boroughs. The Metropolitan maximum is 33s. 6d., and is therefore lower than in some provincial forces. In the Metropolis, however, a rent allowance, varying from 1s. 6d. to 2s. 6d. per week, is given in certain cases where a high rent is paid.

"The Metropolitan, in his first three years," says an authority, Mr. Kempster, the editor of that admirable publication, the Police Review, "is miserably underpaid. His rent-aid scarcely counts as pay, because he must pay a large rent to be near his beat. From his 25s. 6d. to 27s. 6d. a week his contribution of 6d. in the pound to the pension fund, and other small and almost compulsory subscriptions, are deducted. London living is very costly. Policemen's wives are forbidden to carry on any business, and if the husband gets into debt he risks dismissal, with loss of the pension for which he has already given years of service."

Contrasting these conditions with those of the artisan who, according to the Board of Trade returns, works fifty hours a week in summer and forty-eight in winter, the policeman with his six and a half days a week has distinctly the worst of it.

The pay of a skilled artisan in London averages 10½d. per hour, or £2 2s. 5d. per week of forty-eight and a half hours, and for overtime he is paid from time and a half to double time, according to the lateness of the hour. But a Metropolitan policeman—say, in his third year—only gets 27s. 6d. per week of at least fifty-eight and a half hours, making, with rent allowance, an average of 30s. a week, or less than 6¼d. an hour. Even when, after eight years' hard service, he reaches his maximum of 33s. 6d., he only receives something less than 7½d. an hour.

It must be admitted, however, that there are advantages on the side of the police which have yet to be stated. If his health and endurance will stand the strain, and if he has the good fortune not to be reported for some delinquency, he is sure of constant employment. If he falls ill, he has the advantage—sometimes reckoned as a disadvantage—of medicine and attendance from the police doctor, with wages paid, less a deduction of 1s. a day from his pay.

The policeman's chance of promotion is often a lottery, but every year he stops in the service he has put by for him, so to speak, something towards his ultimate pension, should he live to reach the end of the twenty-five years, when he is entitled to claim it on securing the certificate of "approved service" from his Chief.

This prospective or possible pension may be regarded as postponed pay. It is well earned, and it helps to keep the men in the force! Scarcely a man would stay in it but for this accumulating bait, the chances and amount of which are gradually growing larger and nearer as the years roll by.

Many young men throw it up in the first year or two. If you asked them why, some would say: "I wasn't going to be messed about"; others, "I couldn't stand the night-work"; others, "I loved a lass, and we wanted to get married, and she was too nervous to stay in a house alone at nights."

But when a man has got married and settled, with a young family coming on, and police life has spoiled his chances for something better, and when, with every passing year, he knows that there's another year of his hard-earned pay saved up for him towards his pension, then he feels tied by the leg, and resolves to endure the wear and tear, and the night hardships; he keeps his weather-eye open, takes the risk of punishment or dismissal for a fault or mistake, and presses on for the chance of coming out at last, and drawing the postponed pay in the shape of the pension.

Unless a constable is injured in the performance of his duty so that he is totally disabled from earning his living, he has to serve fifteen years before he can claim any pension. But even after fifteen years he can only be pensioned in case he has to retire through certified incapacity, caused by infirmity of mind or body. Before that time the authorities may grant him a gratuity, but that optional "may" often works very unsatisfactorily.

It is quite possible for a police surgeon to return a man as unfit for further service a few months or even weeks before he has completed his fifteen years. In such a case, the constable's gratuity, averaging something under £100, is granted only at the discretion of his employer; whereas, if the surgeon, with the co-operation of the Police authority, mercifully allows the ailing constable to continue in the Force until his fifteen years are completed, the officer is entitled to a pension, averaging from £19 to £27 per annum, as of right.

And even though his work is monotonous it has its lights and shades. Visit the station when a small child is "in custody," awaiting for his or her anxious parents, and you will be tempted to say that, after all, the policeman's lot is a happy one. Two or three sturdy constables are entertaining the little stranger; the rest are playing billiards on an admirable table, and you may hear their laughter and applause in the charge-room. Even the new duties, and they are many, that have been thrust on the London police have a silver lining to their cloud of care and anxiety. Nowadays the police are required, not only to look in on public-houses and to see that they are properly conducted, but to keep an eye on those unlicensed establishments where gingerbeer and soda water are sold, in order to be sure that these beverages are not consumed on the premises after 10 p.m. And not only the most innocuous of drinks, the most respectable of citizens need watching nowadays, in case he is going to have a "bit on." For these new duties, the policeman gets no increased pay. But there comes, of course, the sense of added power, and a wider span of that intimate knowledge of other people's business which is one of the compensations of the force.

The chief grievance of the members is, as I have said, the unreasoning and arbitrary discipline, of which they constantly complain. There is nothing so disheartening to a young and ambitious man as to find his hard work ignored because he is without influence in high quarters, and the element of nepotism is not absent from police forces. Of course, much depends upon the character of the chief officer, and his personal supervision and mastery of the details of management in all the branches of his establishment.

There are in many of the forces, including the Metropolitan, certain long service, merit, or reserve classes, carrying small extra allowances, and these favours are the cause of considerable discontent and jealousy among those men who have not become the pets of their immediate superiors, and whom it would be very difficult to persuade that they who are left in the cold are not in every way as eligible as—and sometimes more so than—those on whom fortune has smiled.

One other grievance of the police should be noted. Outside London the force are supposed to be under popular control—in counties by the Standing Joint, in boroughs by the Watch Committee. In actual fact, however, the real authority is vested in the Chief Constable, and the demand is insistent, first, that the Chief Constable should be appointed from inside, not from outside the force; and, secondly, that he should be amenable to the representatives of the local bodies, who are supposed to control Robert, but who, in actual fact, have no real authority over the Chief Constable—an official against whose decisions there is absolutely no appeal. The Police and Citizens' Association have for many years carried on a vigorous agitation against this anomaly, but so far without success. In other respects, however, the Association has been more successful. It has done admirable work in seeing that the ordinary workaday constable was enabled to purchase himself proper boots, and, above all its other triumphs, it secured for the policemen the inestimable boon of a weekly rest day.

It is often urged against the police that they persecute the poor. That I do not believe. That they display on occasions a determination to obtain a conviction at all costs is, I think, true, but that is due generally to an excess of zeal, from which we are none of us free. Also, I think it must be admitted that the habit of giving evidence blunts their sense of the sanctity of the oath, and once their esprit de corps is involved there is very little that the force will not attempt to see a comrade through. The results of this determination on no account to let each other down are at times amazing and unsatisfactory. Not only is the conduct of the Force in this respect open to question, but in many cases the magistrate who tries the case and hears the evidence shows a marked failure to appreciate the gravity of what has been sworn. In some instances a witness has been known to stretch the credulity of the Court to its utmost in his corroboration of a comrade's story. Most of us were shocked the other day that a constable swore, quite positively and deliberately, to a man being drunk and disorderly whom he had never, in fact, seen, as he subsequently admitted. He explained that it was "a mistake." To the astonishment of everyone concerned, Mr. de Grey, the magistrate, allowed this explanation to pass without comment.

But, on the whole, I think we may be proud of "the man in blue." Even now I never notice one without instinctively calling to mind the story I was taught when a boy, of how the constable whom the daring Fenian threatened with a revolver if he did not release his comrades, held doggedly on his course till death released him.

THE TRAGEDY OF THE PLIMSOLL LINE

BY OUR SPECIAL COMMISSIONER

III.

THE reasons for the undoing of the Plimsoll Line may be, nay, to a very large extent they are, "wropt in mystery." The Committee that destroyed Plimsoll's life-work was secretly appointed, and discharged its task perfunctorily and against time. Its conclusions have never been adequately discussed. No one can say precisely what guided the members in their decisions. Their deliberations were hidden from the gaze of the vulgar. But, as to their effect, there can be no manner of doubt whatever. The new rules, which they caused to be adopted by the Board of Trade, not only "ripped up" the previous decisions of the House of Commons, but they Spelt Death to Thousands of British Seamen, who assuredly deserved well of the Commonwealth.

That is not a mere ex cathedra pronouncement. It is borne out by the facts. There are, alas! innumerable cases on record of vessels that, under the old conditions, sailed safely away to sea, and back again, whose crew, once the new rules were operative, went down to Davy Jones's locker—to leave at home desolate wives, stricken daughters, sorrowing sweethearts, tragic witnesses of the Wrong That Had Been Done in the Name of Parliament, though never with its consent, to men whose only fault had been their childlike obedience, their unflinching assent to the orders given them; who, "in the faith of little children, laid them down to die."

Do not think that I exaggerate or romance. Turn from my words to those of a staid, judicial authority, the Stipendiary Magistrate of Cardiff, Mr. T. W. Lewis, to whose lot it fell to give the findings of the Board of Trade inquiry into the loss of the North Briton, off Ushant, last year. This is what he said of the drowned crew:—

"Without a murmur or a cry they perished in the sea. Their lives were sacrificed to 130 tons additional freight. . . . Personally, I have no hesitation in saying that the reduction of the freeboard—that is, of the distance between the main deck and the old salt-water load-line mark—has greatly reduced a vessel's safety at sea, and I hold with the Court when it suggests that recent disasters call for a revision of the rules."

What are Those Recent Disasters?

Their name is legion. Ever since the Secret Committee, appointed at the behest of the shipowners, "bluffed" Mr. Lloyd George into signing their new rules, death has been busy with our seamen. The North Briton carried, before Mr. Lloyd George signed the new regulations, a "freeboard" of 1 foot 4½ inches. After he had been induced to sign them,

Her Freeboard Was Ten Inches Only, and she perished with only one survivor!

The case does not stand alone. In 1911, on December 1st, the Amana left Leith. She was never seen again. Before 1906, while the Plimsoll Line was still intact, she had a summer freeboard of 5 feet 9 inches and a winter freeboard of 6 feet ½ inch. Under the new regulations she was deepened in summer by 4 inches and in winter by 3 inches—and she went down with all hands!

Is that case not enough? There are others. The Archtor, a London steamer of 2,193 register, reduced her freeboard by 7 inches and her winter freeboard by 5½ inches. Alas! none know where that vessel is. The Wingrove, another London vessel, left Plymouth on December 18th, 1911. Who has seen her?

She Changed a Summer Freeboard of 5 feet 3 inches to 4 feet 10 inches and a winter freeboard of 5 feet 3 inches to 5 feet 2½ inches. Her crew are——?

In all these cases, and in dozens of others, death followed the raising of the line—death in its grimmest, its most dreadful aspect: death, far away from home and wife and bairns, death on the pitiless ocean—to swell the profits of the owners, to save the officials of the Board of Trade from the trouble of investigation.

Again let me say that I do not exaggerate. Let the facts speak! The Stipendiary of Cardiff asserted that lives were sacrificed to extra cargo. That was in the case of the North Briton, where one of the crew, was saved.

What of Those Vessels in Which All the Crew Were Drowned?

There was the Cargo Largo. She sailed from Swansea on April 16th, 1911, loaded with coal and with a reduced freeboard. Davy Jones may have welcomed her crew. No living soul has seen them. Their homes are desolate. Their children have given up hoping that one of the long nights will bring daddy home again, and their Women Mourn, Refusing to Be Comforted, ere they turn again to the task that the loss of the breadwinner has left them. "The sweet little cherub that sits up aloft to look after the fate of poor Jack" has forgotten these poor stranded victims of official ineptitude and callous neglect. The tide has flung up their poor battered corpses long ago, and the country that they served so faithfully has taken no account of their betrayal.

Are these cases solitary instances? Alas! no. There is a list, long, eloquent, unanswerable, that tells of vessels foundered or lost at sea—every one of which has had its load line reduced and its crew sacrificed! There is the Gulf Stream, the Solway, the Bellwer, and a dozen others. All of them had their load line reduced—all of them went down with all hands. Out of sixty-two vessels foundered or missing between January 1911 and May 1912, Thirty Had Had Their Load Line Altered, and of seventeen there was recorded "no assignment." Facts like these require no comment. They had to be extracted from the official apologists much as a dentist pulls out teeth. But, once dragged out, their significance is unmistakable. They show beyond a shadow of doubt that the lives of the seamen are being sacrificed to the convenience of the owners.

There has only been one attempt, so far as I know, to resist this conclusion, and that was a feeble attempt, which miserably failed. It was sought to prove that for the six years before 1906 the foundering of ships at sea exceeded the number thus accounted for since. But as the return included vessels of 2, 4, 5, and 7 tons,

To Which the Load Line Does Not Apply, the figures were obviously valueless, and, in fact, as we shall see, the pretence that the new regulations spelt safety has since been abandoned.

If we wish to get at the bedrock facts, let us look at the following damning admission of the President of the Board of Trade, who in reply to a question in the House of Commons, agreed that "last year 3,000 seamen lost their lives in British ships, this being equal to a rate of 1 in 76, as compared with 1 in 106 and 1 in 112 for the two years preceding.

What was the cause of the increase?

BEBEL * * * BY SIDNEY WHITMAN

[MR. SIDNEY WHITMAN is one of the foremost living authorities on Germany and German politics. Educated in the Fatherland before the 'seventies, in the good old days of German plain living and high thinking, a friend of Bismarck, and on terms of familiar intercourse with the makers of the new Empire, Mr. Sidney Whitman has been for forty years in a position to study from the inside the progress of modern Germany. His recent book, "German Memories" (Heinemann), is one of the most valuable contributions to the study of our Continental rivals that has appeared in the present generation. His estimate of Bebel and of German Socialism, therefore, deserves the most careful consideration and the respectful hearing of the readers of EVERYMAN, even though they may not agree with the writer's conclusions.]

I.

THE death of this renowned Socialist leader has called forth so many exhaustive references to his wonderful career that little remains to be added under this heading, even by those who, like myself, once enjoyed the privilege of his personal acquaintance. That Bebel was a sincere and a worthy man, that as an inspirer, an organiser of the masses he was endowed with extraordinary political gifts, is admitted on all sides. But only those who have followed German history closely for the last fifty years are likely to be cognizant of the fact that he was a seer, a "far-seer" of remarkable perspicacity into the bargain. For the man who on the morrow of the great-events of '70-71 possessed the detachment of mind to foretell the disastrous results of the "Kulturkampf," who prophesied that Europe would inevitably become the armed camp which it is to-day, must indeed have been gifted with remarkable political prescience. And here it is that an opportunity presents itself to deal with certain widespread impressions regarding the sterile nature of Bebel's work as the recognised head of the greatest upheaval in the world of ideas of the nineteenth century. Some hasty conclusions are doubtless due to the apparent (but only apparent) lack of political results hitherto achieved by the German Social Democratic party, and this in spite of its growth in the course of forty years, from a single to one hundred and eleven parliamentary representatives who, it is not always remembered, represent 4,250,000 votes. This, under manhood suffrage, assuming that each voter stands for five units of the population (men, women and children), implies a representation of twenty millions of human beings, or close upon one-third of the inhabitants of the German Empire. That the significance of these stupendous figures is so little understood is capable of a natural explanation, at least as far as it applies to Englishmen. It is mainly due to the impressionist spirit of our age, which, dazzled by the histrionic, rarely recognises or appreciates results unless they are brought before it with dramatic suddenness, accompanied by the boom of cannon, the din of brass bands, the chief performer close to the footlights—the limelight of publicity full on him—roaring as loud as any cannon's mouth. For unless such be the accompaniment of events they are of little use to the "Special Correspondent," to whom the public is largely indebted for whatever knowledge it may possess of German affairs.

II.

'Alas! that it should so often be lost sight of, that Social Democracy deals not with physical forces, nor does its influence depend altogether on the parliamentary votes of what Ibsen terms "a compact majority." Its domain is that of ideas, and its efforts are directed in the first instance towards the conquest of the mind, which, as every student of history should be aware, is a very slow process, beginning as it must with the mother in the nursery. We need only revert to the history of the Reformation in Germany—then, as now, the great battle-ground of ideas—to recall that it took more than two hundred years to develop results. What Social Democracy has really accomplished in Germany during the last forty years—let us call it the first stage of its development—can hardly be estimated by anybody who is not fairly familiar with the political and economic conditions of the German working classes fifty years ago. They were without cohesion and power, at least as compared with our own. Nor were the German middle classes in much better case, either in a political or in an economic sense. This is made abundantly clear by a study of the Revolutionary movement of 1848, which as far as a participation of the masses is concerned was of a parochial, not to say a village pump character, when viewed in conjunction with the contemporary upheavals in France and Italy.

Even more significant evidence of the political passivity of the German masses is furnished by the political struggle which preceded the Unification of Germany. The initiative was taken by monarchs and statesmen, and in the most critical period (1862-66) in open defiance of the public opinion of the country. Social Democracy has already wrought such a change here that similar action of an autocratic order is most unlikely to-day, although we must not forget that the danger of an insidious manipulation of public opinion is not by any means yet eliminated from German political life. It was against the consequences of such that Bebel only two years ago uttered a strenuous warning at Jena. This we should not forget, seeing that the Socialists constitute almost the only great political party which has remained—and may be trusted to remain—at heart immune to the chimera of militarism.

III.

I have said that the essence (das Wesen) of Social Democracy lies in the domain of ideas. This naturally implies that it appeals to the passions as well as to the reason of the masses. And here it is that the greatest achievement which is identified with the personality of Bebel comes in,—in his influence on the character of the masses. He has fostered the sense of unity and loyalty to a leader; he has raised the standard of conduct and inculcated the practice of discipline and self-control. Herein, political Germany, by the lack of consecutive social and political traditions, had hitherto been somewhat behind the great nations of our time. In this direction, and in his endeavours to obtain certain rights for the German people which Rudolf von Ihering postulates in his classical treatise, "Der Kampf ums Recht," it is that Bebel's life-work will probably prove to be most lasting. For here the Germans of to-day, in spite of their great position before the world, according to Ihering, have yet much to learn and to accomplish, whilst the English are in the front, foremost of all nations.

How little the formidable and far-reaching nature of this aspect of Social Democracy is generally realised is shown by a reference to Bebel made by one of the English correspondents writing from Berlin, which I cite as typical of some prevailing misconceptions. "Bebel was possessed of as much courage and audacity as a German Parliamentary system will allow of." Some may be of opinion that political life in England no longer calls for or affords scope for that degree of personal courage and sincerity which Bebel possessed, and many others, too numerous to mention, are also doubtless endowed with. For if tested they might possibly fall little short of those of a Giordano Bruno, a Savonarola, or a Luther. That the progress of Social Democracy in Germany has hitherto been bloodless has certainly not been owing to the lack of the spirit of the martyr, but largely to the enlightened recognition that in our time, as distinguished from that of our forefathers, a struggle of ideas is more efficiently waged with the pen than with the sword. To draw therefrom the inference that Bebel—or, for the matter of that, thousands of his followers—lacked that courage which includes self-immolation, is to plead guilty to the ignorance of a tyro concerning the degree of heroism which every idea, at least among men, has always inspired in those who were sincere in their devotion to it. If the record of German Social Democracy has been one of peaceful agitation, and is likely to remain so, it is also due to the high standard of conduct which, in spite of the dross which floats on the surface of every movement, has hitherto distinguished the masses as well as the leaders of the Social Democratic party in Germany.

IV.

So much has been written concerning the futility of the parliamentary activity of the Socialists that a few concluding words in this connection may not be out of place. Anybody who has followed the course of social legislation in Germany during the last thirty years, more particularly as it has affected factory life and that of the soldier, must come to the conclusion that some of its most humane features have been due to pressure of the Socialists, or at least to the endeavour of the Government to forestall their demands, and thus to cut away the ground from their grievances.

Even the casual listener to the debates in the Reichstag, if open-minded, should be in a position to form a very different estimate from that which is commonly current. To see a Prussian Minister of War at bay, often at his wits' end, goaded on by the virulent onslaughts of the Socialist party into compromising admissions, can hardly fail to produce a strong impression that here tremendous forces are arrayed against the spirit of militarism in Germany to-day. It is as if we beheld the pen and its interpreter, the spoken word, the logos of debate, visibly pitted before our eyes against the sword, and the latter, with all the accoutrements of coloured cloth, spurs, jack-boots, and other stage properties, worsted in the fight! The fact being that more than one Prussian Minister of War has bit the dust and owed his downfall to the damage received in his jousts—his tournament feats—against his Socialist antagonists.

A minor reproach which has been levelled at German Socialists in general, and at Bebel in particular, is that they have hitherto held aloof from and refused to accept a responsible share in legislation. But proofs are not forthcoming that an acceptable part has ever been offered to the Socialist party, at least in Prussia: witness the antiquated franchise system still in force in the Prussian Diet. Besides, such an accusation is based upon the assumption that outsiders—and here must be included all the German political parties opposed to Social Democracy—are better judges of its interests and prospects than the leaders who have achieved such phenomenal results within the short space of one generation.

V.

It is both easy and cheap for the outsider, the editor in his chair, to declare that "we have small sympathy with Bebel's theories: his views, as was but natural with a man of his upbringing (how about the upbringing of Luther and Spinoza?), were narrow and doctrinaire. Wide aspects of human nature, whole chapters of human history were beyond his ken. His notorious book, 'Die Frau und der Socialismus,' is proof enough of that." Alas! for the value of such dicta, they omit a consideration of the most important of all factors, the human equation, the essence of which has varied little in centuries, but the power of which seems likely to become a more and more storm-directing influence in the near future. Bebel's book on woman may be scientifically as worthless as is asserted by the Times. But it should be patent to every dispassionate student that a treatise which deals in a fervent spirit with the welfare of the women of the working classes, inculcates self-respect, and, above all, a higher sense of the responsibilities of motherhood, must be beneficial in its effects, and can only be superseded by works which trend in the same direction, all of which must be considered as rungs in a ladder of upward human development.

VI.

What the prospects of Social Democracy may be as regards its dogmatic tenets must necessarily be beyond the ken of any living man. They aim at a gradual "Umbildung der Geister," which an individual could only participate in if he himself were able to pass through and take part in its different phases: a task which would embrace a period far beyond the span of one short human life! Even Bebel himself in recent years confessed that he was unable to foretell the direction Socialism might take. He declared: "The goal is nothing; the movement is everything," meaning thereby the "human equation," the spirit of solidarity, of collective political action, of social sympathy and affinity among the toilers and the care for the cultural interests which Social Democracy, at least in Germany, has been the means of fostering. For the moment it may even be argued that Social Democracy, by the set-back it has given to Liberalism and the impetus it has imparted to reaction in Germany through the fear it has inspired among large sections of the community, has proved anything but an unalloyed element of progress. This, however, is probably a passing phase, as signs of recovery are not wanting.

If Bebel had done nothing but declare that henceforth a man's spiritual belief is a matter which concerns himself alone, and persuaded twenty millions of human beings to accept this declaration as gospel, his days on earth would have gone far towards assuring for him that meed of immortality which Goethe foreshadowed for himself in the words of Faust:

"Es kann die Spur von meinen Erdentagen Nicht in Aeonen untergehen."*

This fundamental declaration of Bebel embodies a fuller emancipation of the human mind than centuries of clerical dogma have been able to effect. It forms part of a broad current of Pantheistic teaching and feeling which does not preclude or bar out the highest or the lowliest from appreciating the symbolic meaning contained in traditional Christianity.

*"The trace of my days on earth Shall not vanish in æons of time."

THE SECRET OF OLD CORNILLE

BY ALPHONSE DAUDET

I.

FRANCET MAMAI, an old man who plays the fife well, and who spends an evening with me occasionally over a flagon of wine, related the other night a little village drama in which my mill played a part some twenty years before. The old man's story left me deeply moved, and I will try and tell it you as I heard it.

Imagine for a moment, dear readers, that you have a flask of wine before you, with the odour of it in your nostrils, and opposite you an old fife-player who is telling the story.

Our country, mon bon Monsieur, was not always the dead and songless land it is to-day. Time was when the millers flourished here, and for ten leagues round the people of the farms brought us their corn to grind. . . . The hills on all sides of the village were dotted with windmills, and right and left sails whirled in the mistral above the firs, and strings of little asses laden with sacks passed up and down the mountain paths; it was a pleasure to hear on the heights the regular chorus throughout the week of cracking whips and clapping canvas, and the "Dia hue!" of the drivers. . . . On Sundays we met together at the mills, and up there they stood us Muscadel, and the millers' wives were as fine as queens with their lace kerchiefs and golden crosses. I, for my part, brought my fife and played to their farandoles till pitch dark. Those mills, you see, were the blessings of the countryside.

Unfortunately, some people from Paris took it into their heads to set up a steam-driven mill on the Tarascon road—a marvellous affair, you know, and quite novel! Folks began to send their corn to these new-fangled dealers, and our poor windmills sank into disuse. For a little while they put up a good fight, but steam was the stronger, and one by one, pécaire! they were forced to shut down. . . . The little asses no longer plodded up the hills. . . . Our fine millers' wives sold their golden crosses. . . . There was no more Muscadel to drink and no more farandoles to pipe to. . . . It was in vain that the mistral blew, for the sails stretched gaunt and motionless. . . . Then, one fine day, the parish had these hovels rased to the ground, and in their place planted vines and olive trees. But in the general downfall one mill held its own, and continued to turn bravely at the top of the hill, flaunting its circling arms in the faces of the fellows who used steam. It was the mill of old Cornille, this very mill, in fact, where we are talking and drinking together now.

II.

Cornille was an old miller who had dealt in flour for sixty years, and was fiercely proud of his position. The erection of the steam-mill had driven him almost crazy. For a whole week he went through the village gathering the folks round him, and giving out that the people at the new mill aimed at infecting Provence with their flour. "Don't go yonder to them," he would cry; "those ruffians there use steam to make their bread, and steam is an invention of the devil, whilst I work with the mistral and the tramontane, which are the breath of the good God. . . ." and a lot more eloquence in praise of windmills, but nobody would listen to him.

Old Cornille was furious. He shut himself up in his mill, and lived alone like a wild beast. He went so far as to send away his little granddaughter Vivette, a child of fifteen, who, since the death of her parents, was alone in the world save for her grandpa. The poor little thing was obliged to earn her own living by hiring herself out at the farms, working in the harvest fields or the silk nurseries or the olive plantations. And yet the old man seemed still very fond of the child. Often, when the sun was at its hottest, he would trudge the four leagues that separated him from the farm where she was working, and with her by his side he would pass whole hours looking at her and weeping. . . .

We countrypeople were of the opinion that the old miller had sent Vivette away out of pure stinginess, and that it certainly did him little credit to let his granddaughter drag herself thus from farm to farm, exposed to the roughness of the masters, and to all the miseries of young folks out at service. Neither did we approve of the manner in which a man of Cornille's reputation went about the streets—Cornille, who was once so full of self-respect, and who now had the appearance of a veritable gipsy, with bare feet and tattered cap, and smock all ragged. . . . To tell you the truth, we other old men were ashamed of him when we saw him come into Mass on Sundays; and Cornille knew it quite well, for he no longer had the courage to sit in the wardens' pew, but was always there at the bottom of the church, near the font, amongst the poor.

There was something of a mystery in the life of old Cornille. It was now some time since any of the villagers had taken him a sack of corn to grind, but the sails of his mill continued to whirl as merrily as ever, and in the evening you would meet the old miller on the road driving his donkey before him, saddled with huge sacks of flour.

"Good evening, maître Cornille!" the peasants would cry; "you are just as busy as ever?"

"Just as busy, mes enfants," the old man would reply, blithely; "by the grace of God, it's not work that I'm wanting."

And then, if you were to ask him where on earth so much work came from, he would lay a finger on his lips and answer gravely: "Not a word! I'm working for export . . .," and more than that no one could get from him.

As to setting a foot inside the mill—such a thing was not to be thought of; it was denied even to little Vivette. . . .

Whenever you passed by you saw the door closed, the great sails swinging round, the old donkey cropping the grass on the platform, and a big, gaunt cat taking advantage of the sun on the window-sill, and glaring at you with a forbidding air.

All this was very mysterious, and gave rise to much wagging of tongues. Everyone explained old Cornille's secret after his own fashion, but the general rumour was that there were more bags of crown-pieces than sacks of flour in that mill.

III.

At length everything came out, and in this way:

One fine day, as I played my fife for the dancing children, I noticed that the eldest of my boys and young Vivette were in love. At bottom I was not displeased, for, after all, the name of Cornille was held in honour amongst us, and I should have been glad to see this little chick of a Vivette running about my house. But, as our pair of sweethearts had occasion to see much of one another, I thought I would settle the matter at once, for fear of accidents; so I climbed up to the mill to say a few words to the grandfather. . . . Ah! you can't imagine how the old rascal received me! I could not make him open the door; I explained my mission as well as possible through the keyhole, and all the while there was that lean wretch of a cat blowing like a goblin above my head.

The old man did not give me time to finish, but shouted in a surly voice that I should go back to my piping, and that, if I was anxious to get a wife for my boy, I could not do better than go to the steam-mills. . . . You can imagine how my blood rose at this ill-mannered treatment, but I had enough good sense to keep my temper, and, leaving the old idiot to his mill, I went back to tell the youngsters of my disappointment. . . . The poor lambs could not believe it, and asked me as a favour to let them go up together to speak to grandpa. . . . I had not the heart to refuse, and prrrt! off the young lovers went.

When they reached the mill old Cornille had that moment gone out. The door was double-locked, but the worthy old man had left his ladder outside, and immediately the pair were struck with the idea of getting through the window, just to see what there was in this wonderful mill. . . .

It was very strange, but the grinding-room was empty. . . . There was not a single sack, nor a grain of corn, nor the slightest wisp of flour on the walls or the spiders' webs. . . . There was not even that good warm smell of crushed corn that is the perfume of mills. . . . The driving-shaft was thick with dust, and the big, lean cat lay on it, asleep.

The lower room had the same air of desolation and neglect—a wretched bed, a few rags, a crust of bread on the stairway, and, in a corner, three or four burst sacks, spilling on the floor their contents of rubbish and earth.

That was the secret of old Cornille! It was this rubbish he drove along the roads in the evening to save the name of his mill, to make men believe that he still had his trade in flour. . . . Poor old mill! Poor Cornille! For years now the people at the steam-mills had filched away his business. The sails were always turning, but there was nothing for the stone to grind.

The children came back and told me tearfully of what they had seen. I was struck to the heart as I listened to them. . . . Without losing a minute, I ran round to all the neighbours' houses and briefly told them the whole affair. We agreed that the only thing to do was to take all the corn there was in the village up to old Cornille. . . . No sooner said than done. The whole village set out for the mill, and we reached the top of the hill with a procession of asses struggling under the weight of the sacks of corn—and real corn this time!

The mill door was wide open. . . . By it sat old Cornille on a sack of rubbish, his head bowed on his hands, weeping. He had just come back to find that during his absence the mill had been entered and his sad secret surprised.

"Pauvre de moi!" he was saying. "There is nothing left for me to do now but to die. . . . The mill is disgraced," and he sobbed as though his heart would break, addressing his mill in all sorts of endearing terms, speaking to it as though it were a living creature.

At this moment the asses climbed on to the platform, and we all started to cry at the top of our voices, as in the good old times:

"Ohé! you at the mill! . . . Ohé! maître Cornille!"

'And with that we piled the sacks up before the mill-door, and the rich, red-brown grain trickled on the ground to left and right. . . .

Old Cornille opened his eyes wide. He reached down and took some corn in the hollow of his wrinkled hand, and cried, smiling through his tears:

"'Tis corn! . . . Seigneur Dieu! . . . Fine, rich corn! . . . Let me look at it."

And then, turning to us:

"Ah! I knew well that you would come back to me. . . . Those fellows at the steam-mills are robbers."

We made a movement to carry him in triumph to the village, but he stopped us.

"No, no, mes enfants; before anything else I must give my mill something to eat. . . . Just think! it is so long since it has had anything between its teeth!"

And tears started to the eyes of all of us to see the poor old man bustling to left and right, ripping open the sacks, giving an eye to the mill, whilst the grain crunched beneath the stone, and the fine dust of the ground corn flew up to the rafters above.

We have this to our credit: from that day forward the old miller never wanted work. And then one morning old Cornille died, and the sails of the last of our windmills came to a standstill, this time for ever. . . . Cornille died, and nobody took his place. What else could you expect, monsieur! . . . everything in this world must come to an end, and we must take it for granted that the days of windmills were passed, just like those of the barges on the Rhône, and Parliaments, and flowered jackets. . . .

THUS SPAKE ZARATHUSTRA— ON THE LINKS

BEHOLD, Zarathustra walked upon the links, and beheld the tees, the bunkers, and the greens. And it was a great Festival Day, called the Day of the Cup.

And Zarathustra perceived men in bunkers, dealing mighty blows. And some were dim figures amid clouds of sand. And these men were athirst. But the Cup was not for them.

And Zarathustra said: Ye are of the Mob, ye men who smite in bunkers. Behold, ye are men of the third and fourth class. Verily a scourge is Zarathustra to men with great Handicaps. It is in the desert ye must wander.

And to the Mob Zarathustra said: Away, ye Rabble. Behold, I proclaim unto you Super-Man, Plus-Man. Ye have an itch, ye Handicap men, an itch for Scratch. But behold, Scratch is the bridge that leadeth unto Plus-Four. Verily for Super-Man, for Plus-Four Man, is the Cup. Lo! I am tired of your miserable wisdom, your "Slow back" and your "Keep your eye on the Ball." Lo! for too many years have ye uttered these incantations. Behold, the time has come to shout "Fore."—Where is the lightning to lick you with its tongue? Where is that insanity with which ye ought to be inoculated? Behold, I teach you Super-Man (Plus-Man): he is that lightning, he is that insanity.

Verily, have ye not heard that Bogey is dead, and that only the Plus-Four Man liveth? For the Plus-Man shineth the light on the eighteenth green.

And Zarathustra came to the putting greens, and beheld men putting. And he wondered greatly.

And Zarathustra spake to the men. Behold, brothers, I proclaim unto you the new wisdom. Putting is a spiritual thing. Verily, no longer do I speak to you of the "Will to Live" or of the "Will to Power," but of the Will to Putt. Brothers, be up. Three things lie heavy upon the spirit—a topped drive, a short putt, and a bunkered ball. Over all these will the Super-Man, the Plus-Man triumph. W. R. T.

L'AVÈNEMENT DE LA DÉMOCRATIE.

AUX approches du dix-neuvième siècle commence en Europe la grande révolution moderne. Le public pensant et l'esprit humain changent, et sous ces deux chocs une littérature nouvelle jaillit.

L'âge précédent a fait son œuvre. La prose parfaite et le style classique ont mis à la portée des esprits les plus arriérés et les plus lourds les opinions de la littérature et les découvertes de la science. Les monarchies tempérées et les administrations régulières ont laissé la classe moyenne se développer sous la pompeuse noblesse de cour, comme on voit les plantes utiles pousser sous les arbres de parade et d'ornement. Elles multiplient, elles grandissent, elles montent au niveau de leurs rivales, elles les enveloppent dans leur végétation florissante et les confondent dans leur massif. Un monde nouveau, bourgeois, plébéien, occupe désormais la place, attire les yeux, impose sa forme dans les mœurs, imprime son image dans les esprits. Vers la fin du siècle, un concours subit de circonstances extraordinaires l'étale tout d'un coup à la lumière et le dresse à une hauteur que nul âge n'avait connue. Avec les grandes applications des sciences, la démocratie paraît. La machine à vapeur et la mull-jenny élèvent en Angleterre des villes de trois cent, de cinq cent mille âmes. En cinquante ans, la population double, et l'agriculture devient si parfaite que, malgré cet accroissement énorme de bouches qu'il faut nourrir, un sixième des habitants avec le même sol fournit des aliments au reste; l'importation triple et au delà, le tonnage des navires sextuple, l'exportation sextuple et au delà. Le bien être, le loisir, l'instruction, la lecture, les voyages, tout ce qui était le privilège de quelques-uns devient le bien commun du grand nombre. Le flot montant de la richesse soulève l'élite des pauvres jusqu'à l'aisance, et l'élite des gens aisés jusqu'à l'opulence. Le flot montant de la civilisation soulève la masse du peuple jusqu'aux rudiments de l'éducation, et la masse de la bourgeoisie jusqu'à l'éducation complète. En 1709 avait paru le premier journal quotidien, grand comme la main, que l'éditeur ne savait comment remplir, et qui, joint à tous les autres, ne fournissait pas chaque année trois mille exemplaires. En 1844, le timbre marquait soixante et onze millions de numéros, plusieurs grands et pleins comme des volumes. Ouvriers et bourgeois, affranchis, enrichis, parvenus, ils sortent des bas-fonds où ils gisaient enfouis dans l'épargne étroite, l'ignorance et la routine; ils arrivent sur la scène, ils quittent l'habit de manœuvres et de comparses, ils s'emparent des premiers rôles par une irruption subite ou par un progrès continu, à coups de révolutions, avec une prodigalité de travail et de génie, à travers des guerres gigantesques, tour à tour ou en même temps en Amérique, en France, dans toute l'Europe, fondateurs ou destructeurs d'États, inventeurs ou rénovateurs de sciences, conquérants ou acquéreurs de droits politiques. Ils s'ennoblissent par leurs grandes œuvres, ils deviennent les rivaux, les égaux, les vainqueurs de leurs maîtres; ils n'ont plus besoin de les imiter, ils ont des héros à leur tour, ils peuvent montrer comme eux leurs croisades, ils ont gagné comme eux le droit d'avoir une poésie, et vont avoir une poésie comme eux.

THE RISE OF DEMOCRACY.

ON the eve of the nineteenth century began in Europe the great modern revolution. The thinking public and the human mind changed, and as a result of these two collisions a new literature sprung up.

The preceding age had done its work. Perfect prose and classical style put within reach of the most backward and the dullest minds the notions of literature and the discoveries of science. Moderate monarchies and regular administrations had permitted the middle class to develop itself under the pompous aristocracy of the court, as useful plants may be seen shooting up under trees which serve for show and ornament. They multiply, grow, rise to the height of their rivals, envelop them in their luxuriant growth, and obscure them by their density. A new world, commonplace and plebeian, thenceforth occupies the ground, attracts the gaze, makes itself visible in manners, and stamps its image on the mind. Towards the close of the century a sudden concourse of extraordinary events all at once brings it to light, and sets it on an eminence unknown in previous ages. With the grand applications of science, democracy appears. The steam-engine and spinning-jenny raise in England towns of three hundred and fifty thousand to five hundred thousand souls. The population is doubled in fifty years, and agriculture becomes so perfect that, in spite of this enormous increase of mouths to be fed, one-sixth of the inhabitants provide, from the same soil, food for the rest; importations increase threefold, and even more; the tonnage of vessels increases sixfold, the exportations sixfold and more. Prosperity, leisure, instruction, reading, travel, whatever was the privilege of a few, have become the common property of the majority. The rising tide of wealth raised the best of the poor to comfort and the best of the well-to-do to opulence. The rising tide of civilisation raised the mass of the people to the rudiments of education, and the mass of citizens to complete education. The first daily newspaper appeared in 1709. It was as big as a man's hand, and the editor did not know how to fill it. Combined with all the other papers, it did not produce three thousand numbers yearly. In 1844 the Stamp Office showed 71,000,000 numbers, many as large and as full as volumes. Artisans and townsmen, enfranchised, enriched, and having gained a competence, left the low depths where they had been buried in their narrow parsimony, ignorance, and routine. They came on the scene, and forsook their workmanlike and super-numerary dress. They assumed the leading parts by a sudden irruption, by continuous progress, or by dint of revolutions, with a prodigality of labour and genius, in the midst of extensive wars, which were taking place successively or simultaneously, in America, France, and the whole of Europe, and which were founding or destroying states, inventing or restoring sciences, conquering or acquiring political rights. They grew noble, through their great deeds, and became the rivals, equals, and conquerors of their masters; they no longer required to imitate them, being themselves heroes. They also could point to their crusades. They, too, have gained the right of having a poetry; and, like them, they will have a poetry.

LITERARY NOTES

THE summer book-drought is all but over. Publishers' catalogues, which promise an autumn downpour, are gathering fast, and soon the deluge of new volumes will be upon us. Already, like the infrequent, substantial drops which solemnly herald the coming thunder-plump, a few weighty books have alighted upon our writing-desk.

Perhaps the most notable publication of the present week is M. Raymond Poincaré's "How France is Governed." This translation of the French President's work—executed by Mr. Bernard Miall—has been issued simultaneously with the original. The publisher is Mr. T. Fisher Unwin, and the price 7s. 6d. M. Poincaré has divided his subject-matter into thirteen chapters, dealing in turn with Civic Rights and Duties, the Commune, the Department, the State, National Sovereignty, the Constitution, the President of the Republic, the Ministers, the Chambers, Justice, Public Education, the Budget and Taxation, Military Service. As a distinguished Doctor of Law, a former Minister of Public Instruction and of Finance, and an ex-Prime Minister, the President brings exceptional knowledge and experience to bear upon his task; his previous works and his membership of the Académie Française guarantee a scholarly presentation of a fascinating subject.

On September 1 Mr. Fisher Unwin will publish two remarkable biographies of veteran scientists, of whom one is still alive, and the other died a little more than a year ago—Jean Henri Fabre and Lord Lister. Dr. C. V. Legros, whose life of Fabre ("Fabre, Poet of Science," 10s. 6d.) has also been translated by Mr. Bernard Miall, writes as an intimate friend of "The Insect's Homer," and for the preparation of this volume much valuable material has been put at his disposal by M. Fabre and his relatives. Dr. Legros offers this Life to the public as "at once an admiring commentary upon his work and an act of pious homage, such as ought to be offered while he lives, to the great naturalist who is even to-day so little known"; and M. Fabre himself, in a short preface, states that his "devoted disciple" has to some extent been able to replace "those 'Memoirs' which he suggested I should write, and which only my bad health"—M. Fabre will be ninety years of age on December 22 of this year—"has prevented me from undertaking."

"Lord Lister: His Life and Work" (15s.) is by G. T. Wrench, M.D. (Lond.), who, in his Introduction, insists that Lister was "emphatically far more than a great surgeon; he was far more the founder of modern surgery. He was a great philosopher whose thought never deviated from the central problem of life, the mystery and quality of vitality." Dr. Wrench's biography runs to nearly 400 pages—an allowance which cannot be considered over-liberal for a life so long (Lister was born in 1827 and died in 1912) and work so great.

Another outstanding biography which will appear shortly is a life of Mr. W. T. Stead. Mr. Stead left a large quantity of autobiographical material, and this has been embodied by his daughter, Miss Estelle W. Stead, in her volume, "My Father: Personal and Spiritual Reminiscences," which Mr. William Heinemann has in preparation. Mr. Stead occupied such a unique place in English journalism, and his death aboard the Titanic was so tragic in its setting, that there should be a large demand for a biography by one who knew him so well.

Thanks to the inspiring influence of teachers like Professor Legouis and the late Professors Beljame and Angellier, France is happy in the possession of an enthusiastic body of students of English literature. These students wisely make no attempt to follow the example of Taine by preparing general histories of English literature. They pick out, instead, individual authors and write monographs, some of which are recognised, even in this country, as standard works upon the subject. Recognising this, English publishers are now giving English readers the benefit of these studies of English poets and prose-writers by French pens, and there is a steadily growing collection of translations of French works of this kind. One of the most brilliant French students of English life and literature is M. André Chevrillon, whose "The Philosophy of Ruskin" (translated by Mr. Andrew Boyle, 5s.) is being published by J. M. Dent and Sons.

Among the many novelists who lay their scenes in India, Mrs. Frank Penny has few equals. Next week Messrs. Chatto and Windus publish her new story, "Love in the Hills," which depicts life in Southern India among the Nilgiris. By the way, Mrs. Penny's "A Mixed Marriage" is among the latest additions to Messrs. Methuen's series of Sevenpenny Novels. Few writers can describe so subtly and so vividly the gulf which separates the white man and woman from the brown, and her treatment of the colour problem is always masterly.

South Africa, a rich field long neglected by the novelist, has of late figured prominently in fiction. The war, now that its grim reality is more remote, provides an endless store of romance. "The Dop Doctor," for instance, made skilful use of the siege of Mafeking, and other less noteworthy novels have dealt with other features of the same campaign. The latest novelist to realise the potentialities of South Africa is Sir Gilbert Parker, whose new novel, "The Judgment House" (Methuen and Co., 6s.), will transport its characters and its readers to the scene of the Boer War.

That clever writer of historical novels, Miss Marjorie Bowen, has turned her attention to the English Civil War, and in "The Governor of England" (Methuen, 6s.) tells the story of Cromwell from his rise to fame until his death.

It is proposed to erect in Foston Church a bas-relief portrait of Sydney Smith, and otherwise commemorate the life and labours of the rector who ministered there for nearly seventeen years (1811-1828). Last week a circular was issued outlining the proposals and inviting subscriptions. It is only seemly that there should be some memorial to the great writer and preacher at Foston, where he spent the best years of his life, and such is England's debt to Sydney Smith, in gravity and gaiety alike, that subscriptions should flow in like the Atlantic upon the Committee—who will certainly not copy Mrs. Partington. Subscriptions may be sent to William H. Carr, the Rectory, Thornton-le-Clay, Yorks; Ernest E. Taylor, Bannisdale, Malton, Yorks; the Sydney Smith Memorial Fund, the London Joint Stock Bank, York; or Messrs. Barclay and Co., Malton.

THE MEDICAL CONGRESS AND THE CURE OF CONSUMPTION.

Dr. H. W. G. Maekenzie, consulting physician to the Brompton Hospital for Consumption, in his speech at the Congress, in which he gave a general survey of the history and results of the tuberculin treatment, discredited its reliability in the treatment of phthisis in the following words: "It is for those who have strong faith in tuberculin as a cure for tuberculosis to make out their case. I speak as one not without experience. For a number of years I have used tuberculin in a large number of cases. I have used extract and endoplasm. I have given it orally and subcutaneously. I have given it at longer and shorter intervals. I have given it in repeated small doses. I have given it in gradually increasing doses. I have used it because I felt it ought to have a full trial. Among those who have expressed their belief in its usefulness are men of high standing in the profession, both in this country and abroad. With similar testimony as to the effects of any other remedy I should feel it my duty to use it. But after all the trials I have made I still feel uncertain as to the value of tuberculin. I do not feel that confidence in the power of tuberculin which would justify me in saying to every patient that comes to me with tuberculosis without secondary infection that I have a remedy in tuberculin which will surely benefit him. Tuberculin treatment is still on its trial. When all is said and done, we have to acknowledge that the results so far are not brilliant, certainly not convincing."

It is very remarkable that the speaker concluded his remarks by saying: "I hear of cures said to have been effected in private practice. I want to see them reproduced in our hospitals. There have been much theorising and talk. What is needed are practical proofs, deeds not words." He surely must be aware that practical proof was the very one thing Dr. E. W. Alabone asked for when he made application to the Brompton Hospital, offering to attend the patients, supply his inhaler, and inhalants, free of cost, and let a committee of medical men judge the results. Not only was this offer made, but Colonel Le Poer Trench, whose wife was cured of consumption by Dr. Alabone's treatment after having been pronounced absolutely incurable by the late Sir W. Broadbent, promised the Brompton Hospital £1,000 if the offer was accepted. The Times opened its columns to a long correspondence in connection with this generous offer.

Space does not permit us to give more than the following brief extracts from this lengthy correspondence, but any medical man or layman desiring fully to acquaint himself with practical proof, not words only, should obtain from the author the following books: "How the Cure of Consumption is Suppressed" (price 1s.), and "Facts Regarding the Open-Air Treatment" (price 1s.)—these can be obtained, post free, from Dr. E. W. Alabone, Lynton House, Highbury Quadrant, London.

Colonel Le Poer Trench writes as follows:—

"When my wife was undergoing the 'Treatment,' I heard that a Mr. Theobald—the brother of the Countess of Stamford—had some years since benefited very much by the 'Treatment,' so, when I met that lady, I asked her how her family came to place her brother under it. She told me that in their village in Hampshire there was a family consisting of father, mother, and three sons—fine young men! That the father died of consumption, and each of the brothers, on attaining the age of 20, was attacked in turn; that with the two eldest it ended fatally, but when it came to the turn of the third, her family—who in the meantime had heard of the Alabone cures—wrote to that gentleman and asked if he could do anything for the sufferer; that Mr. Alabone undertook the case and cured it; and that it was this incident which gave her family the confidence to place her brother under the treatment. She added that this occurred some ten years ago, and that he is still in the enjoyment of good health."

This is confirmed by another correspondent's letter, in which the writer states:—

"To mention the subject of the 'Alabone Cure' to members of the profession is generally sufficient for it to be dismissed with the remark that 'the so-called cures are well known to have no existence in fact,' or 'they are only cases which would otherwise have been cured under ordinary conditions, or cases in which no disease could have originally been present.'

"Is it not pertinent in this connection to ask Sir William Broadbent for his explanation of the indubitable fact that in the case of a lady referred to in the letter of Colonel Le Poer Trench to you of August 31st, who, after careful diagnosis, Sir William himself practically condemned to die, stating that 'her lungs were so bad that nothing could be done for her,' the treatment which he now attacks with such virulence and contempt did, under Providence, bring about a complete cure, her lungs becoming 'perfectly well,' to use the exact words of her generous-hearted husband, who subsequently, with the noble desire of bringing similar benefits to others, offered £1,000 to cover the expenses of an official investigation of the treatment which must have brought such happiness to him—an offer unfortunately sneered at and ignored by those who alone were in the position to carry it out? A direct answer to this would be much to the point."

It seems that, however much facts may be needed, they are the last thing accepted when opposed to long-standing theories, but when the claims made by Dr. Alabone are supported by an array of facts substantiated by medical men, nurses, and cured patients in all professions and classes, it is impossible to ignore their claim to our most earnest consideration, the more so in view of the failure, admitted at the Medical Congress, of the many "treatments" which have fallen so lamentably short in arresting the ravages of consumption.

The testimony from medical men is perhaps the more convincing, especially if they themselves have been the victims of phthisis. A most remarkable case is that of J. Christian, M.D., M.R.C.S., R.N., who was dismissed the service, being in consumption. After trying other treatments from well-known specialists, he came to Dr. Alabone, when his condition was apparently hopeless with cavities in the lungs. He was perfectly restored to health, and started to practise his profession.

A well-known medical officer of health, whose son had previously been treated by two specialists, but got rapidly worse, decided to place him under Dr. Alabone's inhalation treatment, which he did with the happiest results; he perfectly regained his health, and after being cured for five years married, and is still as well as ever he was. An immense number of such cases could be quoted, but these will suffice.

The same satisfactory reports come from nurses who have been at sanatoria and seen the results of open-air treatment as contrasted with that of Dr. Alabone's.

In addition to the works previously mentioned, readers desirous of obtaining the best information on this subject are advised to read "The Cure of Consumption, Asthma, Bronchitis, and other Diseases of the Chest," by Edwin W. Alabone, M.D., Phil., D.Sc., ex-M.R.C.S. Eng., Lynton House, Highbury Quadrant, London, N. Illustrated by numerous cases pronounced incurable by the most eminent physicians. 47th Edition. 171st Thousand. Price 2s. 6d., post free, of the Author.

MASTERPIECE FOR THE WEEK

WAGNER'S "MASTERSINGERS OF NUREMBERG." BY FLORENCE G. FIDLER

THOSE unfortunate people who regard Wagnerian opera as "regulated noise," and ignore it accordingly, miss a good deal from the sum of their literary knowledge. For Wagner was not only a musician, but a scholar and a poet; the libretto of each of his operas is a dramatic work complete in itself, and was, in several instances, printed and published some years before the music was produced.

"The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" stands out from the rest of Wagner's great dramas for two reasons: it is his only comedy, and the only work in which he gets away from legendary myth. Here he takes a definite historic period, places his scene in a real town, and fills his stage with delightfully human folk, some of whom actually existed.

In the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries there existed in Western Europe, as is well known, guilds, brotherhoods, scuole, and the like, some religious, some social, others mere crafts associations. In certain German cities there arose the S \ddot{a} ngerz \ddot{u} nfte, or Singers' Guilds, which musically were the survival of the Minnesingers and Troubadours of two centuries before, but socially were part of the general guild system of the period, and confined exclusively to the burgher class. In the rich and art-loving city of Nuremberg, which lay right on the high road from Bruges to Venice, there was a very vigorous Guild of Mastersinging, the records of which are still extant. Its constitution was on the lines of the trades guilds of the time. Candidates were apprenticed to be taught, free of cost, by the elder members, and rose in rank by degrees from scholars to journeymen and so forth, the highest rank of all being that of Master. The rules of Mastersinging were numerous and dogmatic, both as regarded words and music, and were written out on a Tabulatur, which was the despair of all beginners. The whole jargon is pedantry of the most narrow-minded description, the effect of which must have been inevitably to crush out the best in any young genius; but only by fulfilling all the absurd conditions, and at the same time inventing a new tune, could a member attain the rank of Master. The most important member of the guild was the Marker, whose duty was to "mark" the faults of the candidates at the examinations. The usual meetings were held on Sunday afternoons, and on St. John's Day each year there was a great public competition.

Wagner, himself a victim of the pedantry that is always ready to sacrifice matter to manner, has seized on these quaint mediæval conditions to make merry over the conservative burghers and their absurd Tabulatur. For his central figure he has taken Hans Sachs, the celebrated cobbler-poet and mastersinger of the sixteenth century. It is impossible to be long in Nuremberg, that most delightful and picturesque old town, without being impressed with the vast importance of Hans Sachs, who shares the historic honours of the place with Albrecht Dürer. His house is close to the Frauenkirche, his monument is in the Spitalplatz, his harp is in the Museum, his poetry is in the Record Office, his grave is in St. John's Churchyard, and his portrait is everywhere.

This extraordinary man took an active part in the bold doings of brave little Nuremberg during the storm and stress of the Reformation. Many of his poems are full of bitter and ruthless patriotism; some are keen satires against the immoralities of the convents and monasteries; while in others he tries to popularise the new religion by versifying passages and stories from the Reformation Bible. His great "Wach auf!" which Wagner introduces in his opera, must have been a topical song of the time, a veritable war-cry of the new faith. Later he wrote prose dialogues on such subjects as freedom and liberty of conscience, until at last he became so violent in his denunciations that the peaceful council ordered him to desist from religious subjects altogether. Thereupon he turned his attention to lyrical poetry, fables, plays, and books of proverbs, and in all produced, it is stated, the astonishing total of 6,205 works. It is recorded that some of his plays were acted in the Rathaus and the Marthe-kirche during his lifetime, and that he sometimes took part in them. But Wagner claims his poet's licence and gives us little of all this. His Hans Sachs is a kindly and wholly lovable prince of diplomatists, who is continually engaged in straightening out the tangled skeins in the lives of other people; there is no forcing, no bluster, but just that consummate management of the situation by sheer strength of character, tact, and far-sightedness.

The drama opens with one of the Sunday afternoon meetings of the guild in the Church of St. Catherine, on the Eve of St. John's Day. Pogner, the rich goldsmith and senior mastersinger, announces that for the principal prize in the next day's annual competition he will give Eva, his only daughter and heiress, as a bride, the only conditions being that the successful candidate shall be a mastersinger, and that the girl herself shall have a voice in the matter. The Masters, all sound business men, see at once the weak points in Pogner's grandiose proposition. "Why," asks the furrier, "should all married men be excluded thus?" "And why," asks the baker, "should the whim of a capricious damsel have any weight in so tremendous an affair as the election of a mastersinger?" The Town Clerk suggests reasonably that the maiden's choice and the mastersinger's election shall be kept separate. Hans Sachs suggests that the people shall have a voice in the decision, and raises a storm of disapproval. What! the people be allowed to judge! Then indeed would be an end to all true art! But Pogner and Sachs have a certain man in their thoughts all the time. The young noble, Walther von Stolzing, poor and proud, but a poet and musician, is the secret lover of Eva, and is liked by both the elder men. Eva loves him, and her father is not blind to the brilliance of so aristocratic a connection; Sachs admires and values him as an artist. But conservative exclusiveness was the very essence of the guild system, and there were many difficulties to be smoothed from the young lovers' path. The Masters consent to give the knight a first trial at once, and Walther is summoned. The Marker, who himself means to compete the following day, with a view to the daughter and the ducats (particularly the ducats), retires behind his curtains, and the trial begins. Needless to say, the competitor fails to comply with all the complications of the Tabulatur, and comes to grief hopelessly. That night, in despair, he seeks to entice Eva to elope with him. The ever-ready Sachs prevents this by the simple method of opening his window and letting a flood of light pour across the path of the young couple, and then getting up a street riot, under cover of which he gets Eva home and drags Walther to his own house. The next morning he instructs the knight in the rules of the competition, and writes down the poem, which the young man extemporises on the spot. The paper is left lying on the desk, and falls into the hands of the unscrupulous Marker. The last act is the great trial of St. John's Day, held in the fields outside the city. The various guilds arrive with banners flying and trumpets blowing, and at last the Singers' Guild comes, with the banner of their patron saint, King David the Harpist, and the Masters in all their holiday finery. The trial is opened by the Marker, who uses Walther's song, but sings it so badly that the crowd howls him down. Sachs rises, and says that the song is good if properly sung, and suggests that the author of the poem shall show how it should be performed. Walther comes forward, sings the song successfully, is acclaimed the hero, and all ends happily with the crowning of Sachs himself by the happy young couple.

This, very briefly put, is the chief plot; there is a subsidiary love-story of Maddelena, Eva's maid, and David, the apprentice of Sachs, which is simply and sympathetically treated. But the drama is full of magnificent characterisation and rich comedy, which can only be adequately enjoyed in the original German. The various Masters are superbly done. The incomparable Sachs; Pogner, muddle-headed, always divided between his dignity and his love for his daughter; Beckmesser, the Marker and Town Clerk, malicious, vulgar, cruel and cowardly, yet showing himself always as a better educated man than the others; the buckle-maker, the grocer, the coppersmith, and the rest, all weighted with the pompous self-complacency of the substantial burgher, form altogether a gallery of portraits which may be studied side by side with those of Albrecht Dürer.

Above all there is the "great idea" which must exist in every work if it is to live—the idea of the struggle of genius with the ordinary conditions of life; the battle of the true and the pure against that conservatism and prejudice which tramples on everything it cannot understand; a battle which has always raged and which will always rage around the thing that happens to be newest in the stream of constant change which we call progress.

CLEOPATRA'S NEEDLE.

PILLAR that through the hour of Egypt's glory
Saw earth crouch in the shadow of those kings
Of whom the dotting Nile babbles and sings,
Mocked by the pyramids and ruins hoary—
Hast thou forgot the pomp, the transitory
Triumphs? Amid the world's concretest things
Thou standest now and hearest murmurings
More potent than the Nile's loud oratory.

Ascends the voice of Labour, mutè no more,
And through the city's multitudinous roar
Speaketh the universal Voice, time-taught:
"Weighed is the worth of Egypt; this grey stone,
Yon desert tombs, slave-wrought, endure alone;
The blazoned might of kings is come to naught."

THOMAS SHARP.

MARY II., QUEEN OF ENGLAND.*

THE history of the house of Stuart has always exercised a unique and powerful fascination over all minds interested in the interplay of character and circumstance. The force of personality on the fortunes of a nation's life has never in the history of any family received a greater vindication. Mary, Queen of Scots, with all the disadvantages of her French and Catholic education, yet was able for five long years to keep in check the turbulence of an uncivilised Scotland. In a somewhat different spirit, and with utterly opposite aims, Charles II. kept himself on the English throne, and this largely by his extraordinary versatility of principle and practice coupled with the firm determination "not to go on his travels again." And finally the Young Pretender roused Scotland to a burning loyalty and devotion, not by any appeal to religion, or by the compelling power of any great principle, but entirely by the romance and wonder of his exploits and the charm of his own personality.

It is with great interest, then, that we turn to the life of another Stuart, of whom hitherto little has been known—Mary II. of England, daughter of James II. and Anne Hyde, and wife to William of Orange. In her we find the Stuart strain mingling with a strongly Protestant and bourgeois tendency. From her mother Mary seems to have inherited a strict adherence to principle, both in religion and in politics. Her mind was able, in a manner wholly alien to Stuart tradition, to grasp the abstract ideals of government. To take but one instance: "If princes do ill things," she writes, "they must expect that the world will take revenges on their memory, since they cannot reach their persons; that was but a small suffering, far short of what others suffered at their hands." "When she penned these words Mary had travelled far from the doctrine of divine right of kings to which her father was at this time acknowledging allegiance."

Yet with it all the Queen had still the charm and grace, both of person and of character, which place her in the true Stuart succession. Burnet says of her that "she carried that air of Life and Joy about with her that animated all who saw her." Her popularity among the Dutch was phenomenal, and it is doubtful whether William could have accomplished as much as he did in England without the influence which Mary exercised over the common people. "William ruled ably, and on the whole wisely, but with an air of patronising aloofness which courted opposition." It was the Queen who acted, to some extent, as intermediary between King and people. She supplied the figurehead, the centre of interest and affection without which no constitutional monarchy is safe."

The pages dealing with Mary's religious opinions are of great and permanent interest. Miss Sandars has given us a number of quotations from the Queen's letters to her father, and perhaps they reveal better than anything else the strength and beauty of Mary's mind. It was no easy task to write in the spirit of a respectful daughter and yet to convey her unalterable conviction of the truth of the Protestant faith. She argues at great length the value of reason and experience in religion, and claims that she is a Protestant "not because she has been brought up one, but because she was convinced by her own judgment that she was in the right path." She sums up her attitude towards Roman Catholicism by saying, "The Reformers did not leave the true Catholic Church, but only the errors that had crept into it."

REFORMS IN OUR PUBLIC SCHOOLS*

By EMERITUS PROFESSOR H. A. STRONG

(Concluded)

I.

WHAT is called a classical education is not fitted to develop either the intelligence or the taste for learning of every boy, and this fact should be looked boldly in the face. Far be it from me to under-rate the charm and inspiration which the great masters of style and thought must ever offer to those fortunate students who have the power and the leisure to peruse them with understanding. I most sincerely hope that Britain will always be the nursing home of a generation of classic scholars whose thoughts and whose style may be mightily influenced by the stately utterances of the philosophers, poets, and historians of classic times. But it is hard to believe that a mere smattering of any language or literature can prove of much intellectual value to those who acquire it; and it has always seemed to me that the scanty knowledge obtained by passmen at our universities would, in most cases, have been greater in extent and of more value to their after careers had they been free from the outset of their university life to apply themselves to some other branch of learning. In a word, the standard of entrance to universities should be raised, and more avenues to the degree granted. It is admitted on all sides that passmen and, generally speaking, those who are intent on "having a good time" at the university, must be accepted as inmates of such of the colleges at the older universities as are unable to attract a sufficient number of Honours men. It is a mere pious wish to improve this state of things until we shall, by some stroke of fate, be forced to become a more intellectual nation. But if the authorities at the universities would assume as a working hypothesis that every young man committed to their charge has a talent for some kind of learning, and that the attempt to drill all their pupils in the same way results in disaster, it would be possible to raise the standard in all subjects taught.

II.

It has been necessary to refer to the courses prescribed by the universities on account of the influence exercised by these on those prescribed at our public schools. The universities possess a very large number of scholarships and prizes, most of which are awarded on the ground of proficiency in classics. The public schools must perforce prepare their most promising pupils to gain their coveted distinctions, and they have to do this even although the bulk of their scholars may not intend to proceed to the universities. The private schools, again, have to follow in the wake of the public schools, mainly because these again offer large rewards in the way of foundation scholarships, which are chiefly awarded as the result of tests in classical knowledge. And it may be remarked with respect to these foundation scholarships, no less than with respect to those tenable at the older universities, that it seems in the highest degree unjust that the sons of rich men should be allowed to profit by funds intended to secure a good education for "poor scholars." I do not think that opulent parents should be permitted to allow their sons to accept such charity, even if they refuse to accept the actual pecuniary benefit.

* The first part of this article appeared in EVERYMAN of August 22nd.

It is quite possible to institute an enquiry into the circumstances of any parents who may propose their children as candidates for such scholarships, without any kind of loss of self-respect on the part of the parents. Whether or not it be advisable for any boys at the tender age of fourteen to undergo the strain and stress of competition is another matter, but it cannot be too often repeated that those who have most authority to speak on the matter are of the unanimous opinion that it is most unwise.

III.

The present writer, like Dr. Gray, was at Winchester, but some years before his time. When I was there our teaching consisted almost exclusively in the Classics. No English literature of any kind was taught, practically no history; there was one mathematical master for the whole school; the French class was a bear garden, and science was taught for one hour a week during one term by a lecture given to the whole school by a gentleman who amused us boys by the singular way in which he pronounced his words. In spite of this peculiar education I am glad to say that most of us succeeded tolerably well in after-life, but most of us, I imagine, felt on leaving school that they might have done better had they learnt more of different subjects. I fancy that some of the feeling which undoubtedly prevailed in the late fifties at Winchester still prevails at most of our public schools, viz., that it is more respectable to learn classics than any other subject; to study mathematics is permissible; to study French or science in my time would have been thought derogatory, even had it been possible. I feel sure then that before enthusiasm can be awakened in the pupils of our public schools for other subjects than the classics, a healthy and enlightened opinion must set in as to the value of every kind of learning. It is no easy task to eradicate old prejudices from our nation: it is, perhaps, more difficult to eradicate them from our public schoolboys, and from their teachers, than from any other class of the community. But it has to be done, and it is for the parents of boys to make them see the true perspective of knowledge in all its branches.

IV.

There is one reform in the system of the promotion of our public school masters which needs adoption. According to the present system, after a master has been for a certain number of years in his post, he is rewarded not by a rise of salary, but by the permission to keep a boarding-house, from which he is enabled to draw a very large income. Of course, before according him permission to open such an hotel, the headmaster has to satisfy himself that the master in question possesses the capacity for doing so. He has, besides his ordinary school work, to devote time to the duties of catering for his boys, amusing them, coaching them, doctoring them, and generally supervising them. He is responsible for their physical and moral well-being. It may well be imagined that the manifold calls on the time of a hard-worked housemaster cannot permit him much leisure for self-culture. But the worst part of this arrangement is that young and studious masters who may be profound scholars, and

A WONDERFUL LITTLE MACHINE:

REMARKABLE POPULARITY OF THE BLICK.

AS SPEEDY AND MORE DURABLE THAN ANY OTHER TYPEWRITER AT DOUBLE THE PRICE.

The Blick Typewriter Co., Ltd., of 9 and 10, Cheapside, London, and 369, Oxford Street, W., will lend applicants one of the machines for a free home trial, and will pay the carriage. You can learn to operate the Blick in half an hour. Ask for Booklet No. 10.

It may be asked, What is it that has made the wonderful little feather-weight Blick typewriter so very popular? What is it that has steadily created such a demand for these machines?

The answer is simply this: The machine itself—its wonderful value, its compactness, soundness, and durability, its portability, and, most of all, the perfect work it is capable of doing even in the hands of the novice, for without doubt it is the easiest typewriter to learn to operate.

Now this Blick typewriter—feather-weight Blick, as it is generally called, for it only weighs 5 lb.—is entirely different from any other typewriting machine you have ever seen.

With the introduction of the Blick typewriter some twenty years ago, it was at once found to be so very perfect, neat, and handy for the general use of everybody, that it soon got recommended from one to the other, until to-day over 100,000 are in use amongst the clergy, doctors, literary men, and private individuals, men and women, for use in library and boudoir.

The new Feather-weight Blick may be described as a marvel in aluminium. It shines like silver, has no ribbon to tear, tangle, and mess your fingers. The type is all on a little drum or cylinder that can be changed in an instant from Roman to script, large or small; from English characters to French, German, or Hebrew; or, if you are acquainted with any of the Oriental languages, you can change the type according to the language required, using them all on the same machine, changing from one to the other at will and in an instant.

A REVOLUTION IN CORRESPONDENCE.

The popularity of the Blick typewriter raises the question, "Are we getting away from the antiquated idea that it is not 'just the thing' to write private letters on a typewriter?"

We are, for we are progressing.

As was said in an editorial in a recent issue of the London Budget:

"The trouble with us is that we hang on to our prejudices more desperately than to the most important truths given us by science."

Now, would you not prefer to receive a letter clearly and neatly typed, which you could read, rather than an undecipherable scribble that keeps you hours trying to puzzle out, perhaps misinterpreting a sentence here and there?

STYLE, HASTE, IMPATIENCE.

Affectation is the cause of a great deal of the bad handwriting which is forced upon us from time to time by young men and women over-bubbling with affected individuality. These would-be stylists, if put to it, could undoubtedly write a plain, firm, and dignified hand, that would really show character; but they mostly prefer the style which shows neither character, dignity, individuality, nor consideration for the time or patience of others.

To such writers let us commend the new aluminium Blick typewriter, for custom has decreed it both proper and common-sense to type our private correspondence rather than scribble it so undecipherably.

To the hasty, impatient, and impulsive writer, who scribbles over his correspondence, not taking time to complete the writing of a word—writing his thoughts as though by cipher, so to speak. To such an individual let us commend the Feather-weight Blick, for he can write three times as fast with a Blick as with a pen.

The New Aluminium Blick, showing its Leather Case with Compartments for Stationery.

THE CLERGYMAN, AUTHOR, DOCTOR AND EVERYONE.

Yes, to all, and especially those with much writing to do, with ideas, and desire and ability to register them, we commend them to investigate the Blick—the new Aluminium Blick—the machine for the home and traveller—the machine that has made possible the general and universal adoption of the typewriter in the home on account of its low price, its durability, simplicity, portability, compactness, clear, rapid, and visible writing, and, most of all, its cosmopolitan writing possibilities, and last, but not least, because wherever you may be going you can take your Blick with you, all packed in its little leather case, with compartments for your stationery.

SO EASY TO OPERATE.

To learn to operate the Blick is really very simple. Half an hour is all that is necessary, and with a very little practice you will be able to write with the speed of an expert.

In fact, to prove to anyone what a wonderful machine the Blick really is, and how simple it is to operate it, the company will send any reader one of the machines on approval for a free trial, paying carriage both ways, accepting all responsibility and risk of damage while in transit. They will also send you a booklet (No. 10) free, which tells you all about the machine. The address is The Blick Typewriter Co., Ltd., 9 and 10, Cheapside, London, E.C. There is also a West End Branch at 369, Oxford Street, where the machine can be seen, tried, and borrowed for a free home trial.

The Blick has certainly revolutionised our ideas of typewriting machines. It is always handy, always ready to do our bidding when ink is not there and pen cannot be found. We must all closely investigate the Blick—very closely.

of an unbusinesslike nature, cannot hope, under present circumstances, for any substantial reward for their services, and they may remain on their totally inadequate teaching salaries for years, and afterwards may be, and commonly are, discharged with either no pension, or at best a mere pittance. Dr. Gray's* remedy for the necessary reforms in education generally is to place our whole system under Government control, a drastic enough remedy. Personally, I should mistrust such a proceeding until our nation has followed in the steps of the nations of the Continent by choosing as Minister of Education a really well-educated man, of wide grasp and real enthusiasm. It seems to me that an educational council might well be called into being, on which the Government might be represented, but on which should be found as well our chief representatives of every department of knowledge.

CORRESPONDENCE

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Owing to the large number of letters received it is necessary for correspondents to write briefly if their letters are to appear.

AN OPEN LETTER TO MR. JOSEPH FELS.

DEAR MR. FELS,—Like your countryman, Benjamin Franklin, one hundred and thirty years ago, you have left Philadelphia to convert our benighted British Islanders to the true political faith. I admire your philanthropic efforts. I am in entire concurrence with your diagnosis of the social evil. I am convinced, like yourself, that the Land Question is at the root of every political disorder, that it is responsible for the pauper as well as for the millionaire, for the reactionary as well as for the militarist. For all I know, the Single Tax may be the single remedy for every disease.

At the same time, I am amazed to find how little trouble either you yourself or your fellow-workers are taking to answer even the most obvious objections of the man in the street. For instance, you do not even stop to consider the following plain question, which most naturally occurs to the most superficial student: even assuming the Single Tax to be absolutely just, how are you going to make it efficacious? Henry George, in Book 8, chap 4 of his "Progress and Poverty," tells us that "the Tax on Land falls upon the owners of land. There is no way in which they can shift the burden upon any one else." Henry George takes this as an obvious assumption, but does not stop to prove it. I confess I do not understand why a tax on land, any more than any other tax, should necessarily and finally fall on the land owner. If the State imposes a tax on the land owner, he will shift it on to the farmer, who will deduct it from the wages of the farm-labourer. If the State imposes a tax on the land, on which my house is built, the landlord will simply add the amount of the tax to the rent. Unless you do away with the Capitalist, will not your Land Tax ultimately fall, not on the Capitalist but on the Labourer?—I am, yours very truly,

LAND REFORMER.

THE LAND HUNGER.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—If ever a class of labourers should pray to be saved from their friends it is the peasantry of Great Britain. No crueller panacea for the depopulation of rural districts can be devised than the proposal to put men on small holdings of comparatively sterile soil in our very uncertain climate, with produce selling at present values and labour and capital so expensive.

Mr. Chiozza Money never said anything truer than that back to the land is back to starvation. There must be some economics in the project, and if the smallholder is to pay even 3 per cent. on the cost of land and buildings he will not make a ploughman's wage. The Times recently had one of the most reliable and well-informed articles which has appeared in its columns on any particular industry, and it reluctantly admitted that agriculture is sick almost unto death. There is a strong demand for land, not that it is profitable, but because there are more would-be farmers than farms, and not ten out of a hundred are making 5 per cent. on their capital.

There is not an avocation in the world that yields so little on its capital. But it requires no prolonged apprenticeship, no examinations to pass, and young men appreciate the sporting, outdoor, independent life. At present land is unmercifully taxed compared with movable property, and while prices wane, outlays of all kinds increase. There is not a living wage in cultivating cereals and potatoes on a small scale. Where there is a near demand for milk and butter, a reasonable return can be got if one works like a galley-slave; but if he pays for the labour, the yield is not commensurate with outlays. It would be far easier to restore the country hand loom than to resuscitate small holdings in the northern portion of the King's dominions.

Horticulture with intense cultivation in the southern counties may be different, but "Back to the land!" will only do as an election cry.—I am, sir, etc.,

MR. HYNDMAN ON INDIA.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Mr. Hyndman's article on India in your issue of June 6th is such a gross caricature of the actual facts and condition of affairs in this country that it is difficult to take him seriously. It is evident from the very first that he does not know what he is writing about, and is only concerned to string together a few sentences, repeating, parrot fashion, the shibboleths of his creed—"Disastrous influence," "Bleeding of India," "Frightful impoverishment," and so on.

To take his own points seriatim: (1) Mr. Hyndman must be a more unsophisticated individual than he gives himself out to be if he imagined the Indian students would not "cheer to the echo" when Bepin (not Begim, Mr. Hyndman!) Pal delivered his lecture in Caxton Hall; but that did not make what Bepin Pal said of any more value as a contribution to the question of the government of India than Mr. Hyndman's. And if Mr. Hyndman believes that Bepin Pal or the students represent Bengal, or Tilak the Maharrattas, then he is very, very far wrong. The so-called "educated natives" claim these gentlemen as leaders when they are not fighting among themselves; but the three hundred and forty odd millions of other natives infinitely prefer our rule, and know that there is not such a thing as "Britain's disastrous influence." If Mr. Hyndman had lived a few years in this country he would know that he is talking rubbish when he writes about the "greatest pauper warren," when he says we have done all in our power to "crush Indian initiative," etc., etc. What, asks Mr. Hyndman, goaded the Bengalis into assassination? Our abominable mis-rule." This is arrant nonsense. We here understood it was the "Partition of Bengal"; but we know better now that Mr. Hyndman has spoken.

Mr. Hyndman should read up the military history of India, and he would then know that there was a very considerable difference between the Bengal Sepoys who fought at Bhurtpore and, to use his own words, the "most contemptible of cowards and meanest of men" who are represented by the assassins he refers to. The Bengal Sepoy would soon put Mr. Hyndman right if he attempted to class the two together. But that is the mistake always made by one in the position of Mr. Hyndman, who knows nothing whatever of the country or its inhabitants, except what he has imbibed from the Bepin Pals who go home and pose as patriots.

(2) Bleeding of India. I am afraid Mr. Hyndman has divorced Lord Salisbury's words from their context; but whether that is the case or not, the following report on the Customs House Returns is a complete refutation of the cry about the "drain" or "bleeding of India." I have no doubt your Chancellor of the Exchequer would rub his hands and look round for more hen-roosts to rob if he had a balance sheet like this:

"The return of the exports and imports of India for 1911-12 are recommended to those who still have doubts as to the absurdity of 'the drain' theory.

"The total exports from British India in 1911-12 were of the value of £158,908,091 and the imports of £131,684,190.

"In other words, after paying for everything, India had £27,223,901 or Rs.40,83,58,515 left out of what it got for its exports, to spend as it liked.

"The people of India were nearly 50 crores of rupees to the good in the exchange of imports and exports.

"Few other countries can show a balance sheet like that of India."

(3) Government by State Capitalists. I do not know if I understand this phrase. It is high sounding, but means little. Does Mr. Hyndman have very much control over the spending of the national revenue? I'm afraid not, so he is just in the same box as the native of India. I agree with him in protesting against the spending of millions on an unnecessary capital, but for different reasons. Says Mr. Hyndman, "I regard our present rule in India as one of the greatest crimes ever committed," etc. My word, that is strong! but then who is Mr. Hyndman that his opinion should be voiced so loudly, and what does he know about it?

By means of canals we have brought millions of acres which were desert into rich and fertile land; we have spread a network of railways over the country, so that food can be quickly sent to any district threatened with famine; and, above all, we have brought peace and security to the millions of people never known previously in the country's history.

Mr. Hyndman may be correct when he says in his paper that the wisacres at home are living in a fool's paradise, but that is not the case here. We are fully alive to what is going on, and were it not for the Mr. Hyndmans at home, steps would soon be taken to put matters straight. But our hands are tied in the meantime.

In conclusion, let me assure Mr. Hyndman and your readers that India was taken by the sword, and will only be kept by the sword.—I am, sir, etc.,

Calcutta, July 16th, 1913. ANGLO-INDIAN.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—The uncertainty of posts in this part of the world has deprived me of the pleasure of reading Mr. Hyndman and the first part of Mr. Lilly on "India for the Indians"; but perhaps I shall not be too late to offer a comment on Mr. Lilly's second instalment. If any contributor of yours sees fit to abuse the Welsh, Scots, or Irish, there is no great harm done; but circumstances make the wholesale abuse of the educated Indian peculiarly objectionable, especially in a paper which must be read by a great number of them.

Mr. Lilly objects to English education and to representative institutions in India; but, like all critics on these lines, he offers no alternatives. The old-fashioned style, supposed by critics of Mr. Lilly's type to be suited to the genius of the people, was for tyranny to be limited by revolt. We do not now allow the petty despot to be knifed, so we introduce tentatively the more gentle method of keeping him in check by giving the people the power to remove him by less sanguinary methods.

Now, with regard to anglicisation, there is more nonsense talked in disparagement of this than on any other Indian question. While the Japanese receives unstinted praise for his wonderful grasp of European language, thought, and civilisation, the Indian, who has grasped them to much better effect, is abused for his pains. Besides, the Indian's teachers being English, what else could they teach him? And if they had taught him nothing (Mr. Lilly's only alternative), in what way would he be the better for his ignorance? The Indian is abused for forgetting his own literature. What is the truth? The truth is that Sanskrit is studied more to-day than in any modern time, and that vernacular literature has improved precisely where English has been best studied. The great modern Bengali literature would not have existed but for the study of English, which people assume must have displaced the vernaculars, and proceed from assumption to assertion.

Mr. Lilly finds much learning by rote and little character-training in India. Does he not find the same thing in England? He finds education turning out young sceptics in India. Is there any country where he would not find the same thing? Mr. Lilly objects to the lawyers grabbing places at the Councils. Do not our Labourites make exactly the same complaint of the British Parliament? (That Mr. Hyndman and his tribe admire the Indian lawyer while they detest the British is only one of their little peculiarities.)

Finally, though tradition is powerful, there is nothing congenital in representative institutions. There must be struggles and disappointments in acquiring them, but the struggle will be over the peculiarly local details, not over the general principles, which can be learnt and accepted. To speak of educated India as "the Babus" is grossly inaccurate, and to dub educated Indians "unspeakable" is a slander. Give them unchecked authority, and they will be oppressive, like most people; but they are the most enlightened and liberal people of India to-day, though they so often find themselves abused in a Lillyan strain.

Mr. Lilly is slipshod even in his facts. The native princes do not rule two-thirds of India, and the Nizam is not "one of the most considerable"—he is the first.—I am, sir, etc.,

IS BALZAC A CLASSIC?

A COMPLETE AND UNEXPURGATED EDITION.

It will be good news to those who are only just beginning to realise the merits of the great French Author, Balzac, that the Caxton Publishing Company is offering a complete and unexpurgated edition on remarkable terms.

For this is the first opportunity that the British public has had of reading Balzac as he meant to be read, and without his work being subjected to a quite unnecessary and gratuitous expurgation.

The Napoleon of Literature.

For Balzac was to literature what Napoleon was to arms—a man of giant brain who saw all life, all character, and all events as material to be turned into stories, and who did not believe that there were any events that could not be told with advantage—and so his novels make their appeal to all.

And all those who realise this will hasten to take advantage of the offer of his Best Novels in 14 volumes, specially selected by that famous Balzacian, Mr. Clement Shorter, editor of the Sphere.

What CLEMENT SHORTER says—

"Something has been said of the fact that the publishers advertise that their Balzac is 'unexpurgated.' This is of the utmost importance. The charge that a translator 'betrays' is justified where there is a prurient attempt to modify and alter phrases in the interest of Mrs. Grundy. Nothing can justify that. When face to face with a great classic we want the book as near as possible as the author presented it.

"Altogether it would be impossible to speak too highly of the excellence of translation of this edition of Balzac's novels. There are those who say that Balzac should be read in the original, as only thus can you secure his peculiar charm. It is possible to lay too much stress on this point. At least half of Balzac's work relies not so much upon quality of style as upon strength of intellect, and that intellectual power can be captured in a translation, particularly in a translation so good as this."

But as some of these selected stories of Balzac are but short stories, or comparatively short stories, and as, moreover, their charm and interest are greatly accentuated when they are read in conjunction with other stories—the designs of which have direct reference to them—the publishers, while they have kept this series a small and compact one, have not confined it strictly to the above list.

Magnificent Illustrations.

These fourteen volumes are beautifully illustrated by great French artists, who have embodied the very spirit of the author. The frontispieces are etchings printed from the copper-plates.

"The Best Novels of Balzac" are issued on the same advantageous terms which the Caxton Publishing Company has already made so deservedly popular. This is to say, the set of fourteen volumes is delivered for a first payment of 2s. 6d., the balance being paid by a few small monthly payments.

A FREE BOOKLET.

We have prepared a charming detailed prospectus containing interesting information about Balzac, his life, and his work, which will be sent post free to those who apply for it. And it will tell you how the fourteen volumes are delivered for a first payment of 2s. 6d., the balance being paid by a few small monthly payments.

CHARLOTTE BRONTË'S LETTERS.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Your correspondent, "An Admirer of Charlotte Brontë," does not seem to me to have the penetration of Margaret Hamilton, who has written so clearly and sympathetically on these letters of Charlotte Brontë and M. Héger.

M. Héger was unmanly and unworthy of her letters; like most self-satisfied, all-important people, he cherished the glow these letters created in and around him by the impassioned tenderness of her spirit bowed with the pain of a finite heart that yearned.

M. Héger appears to me to be the portrait of the person Rochester in "Jane Eyre." From their first meeting she became a necessity to him; he felt and lived in her presence, but his mean, unmanly spirit kept her behind the scenes in his life; whatever goodness or greatness he achieved depended on her. He appealed to her pity, drew out all that was most womanly by the strange, sad undercurrent she felt in him; she could have mothered him. She could not reveal herself to him, but in the loneliness of her spirit he fascinated her, and the charm of her being welled up within her, and she found vent in either seeking his presence or in writing letters to him. How natural for a soul of Charlotte Brontë's cast!

Charlotte invested Héger with what was within her, and loved it in the person of Héger, but like the mighty deep, unconscious that he was only the mirror that held her spirit, as the sea, the sky. She loved in him only her own soul.

"I looked at my love; that feeling that was my master's—which he had created; it shivered in my heart, like a suffering child in a cold cradle; sickness and anguish had seized it; it could not seek Mr. Rochester—it could not derive warmth from his breast. Oh, never more could it turn to him, for faith was blighted—confidence destroyed!"

These words reveal the true thoughts and feelings Charlotte Brontë had for M. Héger. Héger, be he what he may, was what Margaret Hamilton says, "a spur to Charlotte's imagination," and if the letters have served any purpose, more than reawakening an interest in so sensitive and delicate a soul clothed with a body known as Charlotte Brontë, then we have to thank the friends of M. Héger for giving them to the publisher; but I am convinced Héger was incapable of reciprocating the spirit of Charlotte Brontë, and that he selfishly lived in the glow of the warmth that came to him through the letters from her presence. I may be wrong.—I am, sir, etc.,

JAMES MACBRIDE.

Glasgow, August 19th, 1913.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Among the mass of correspondence on this subject there is much that reveals an utter lack of appreciation of M. Héger. Hence my pleasure to read such an unbiased estimate as that from "An Admirer of Charlotte Brontë" in your latest number.

The writer says there are many reasons which may account for his not destroying the letters. May I suggest one, which, so far as I know, has not been mentioned? Does not the mere fact of his keeping the letters indicate that, though he did not reply (save once), he cared for them?—I am, sir, etc.,

EVOLUTION AND SCRIPTURAL DOCTRINE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Christianity, I think, means a belief in Christ, and personally I cannot see what Evolution has to do with Christianity or why it should menace a belief in Christ.

Had "Un Chercheur" put his question thus, "Do you think the average man's knowledge of Evolution would compel him to suppose that belief in the creation of man was menaced?" it would have been a different thing entirely, and in my experience I find that the Creation story is considered only a myth by not only ordinary men, but in the minds of quite a lot of clever Christian clergy.

Nowadays one rarely hears a parson preach on the subject at all, for, after all, true Christians only attempt to live up to the standard of Jesus Christ, and the various stories in the beginning of the Bible only interest them in the same manner as reading other ancient classics which contain stories of the creation and life of the various Roman gods. Apart from that, some of our cleverest men have attempted to prove Evolution, and have given some remarkable proofs too; but I have never heard of anyone attempting to prove the Creation or Ark story. If you ask the average local preacher if he believes it, he invariably tells you that "it's part of our religion to believe in it." Well, why believe the Creation story any more than some of the other mythical stories?—I am, sir, etc., Birmingham. C. D.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—"Un Chercheur" has evidently not considered how marvellously the hypothesis of Evolution as a whole—apart from the evolution of man and the stages through which he has passed as fish, reptile, and mammal—coincides with the more familiar Biblical account of Creation.

But as regards the difficulty of squaring the theory of Evolution with Scriptural doctrine, I too have asked, How are we to reconcile the thought with that of a divine origin, or with Pascal's words, "I created man holy, innocent, perfect"? The last two words one can understand better than the first where Evolution is concerned. "He was not then in the darkness which blinds him, nor subject to mortality and the woes which afflict him." "Such is the state in which men now are; there remains to them some feeble instinct of their former state."

How are we to consider a "former state" of such a nature in the same instant with a jelly speck, an amoeba, which extemporises its organs or pseudopodia?

Can it be that the Holy Spirit entered into man even as the germ of life entered into matter—a spiritual amoeba, minute yet perfect, because containing all the potentialities of a perfected spiritual being—of God Himself?

For if God is Home and we have a divine origin, surely it was in that great psychological moment during the course of Evolution, when God breathed into man's nostrils, that man, in becoming "a living soul" and partaking of the Divine Nature, knew Home, and was given the chance (those two words contain all the suggestion of the separate doctrines of Free Will, The Fall, and the Atonement) of ultimate perfection.

And he knew Home not through experience—an experience, yes—but through a divine perception, through a ghostly inheritance.—I am, sir, etc.,
Birmingham. FLORENCE A. MARRIOTT.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—While here on a holiday I have been reading your issue of 1st inst., which contains a letter under the heading "Evolution and Scriptural Doctrine."

The writer of the letter suggests that Christianity is menaced by the teaching of Evolution. As is so often the case, it is necessary to define the terms we use. There is, first of all, Christianity as Christ left it, and which is found chiefly in the Sermon on the Mount and in the 15th chapter of Luke's Gospel. Then there is what to many people is Christianity, namely, the dogmatic theology of Paul containing the dogmas of the Fall, the Redemption, and the Atonement.

The theory of Evolution is now, I assume, accepted by all fairly educated persons, and with them the Pauline theology is simply untenable. But Christianity as taught by Christ Himself is not in the least degree menaced by Evolution. On the contrary, when once it is freed from the accretions of the theology of Paul, with which it has so long been overlaid and obscured, it will at last have a chance of showing what great things it can do for humanity.—I am, sir, etc., Kippford-on-Solway. VERITAS.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Your correspondent "Un Chercheur" propounds what to many may appear a somewhat difficult question. Nevertheless, as a student of Evolution I have not felt my Christianity seriously assailed; rather the other way. When Evolution became established as nature's law, sin, on the other hand, according to divine law, was not disestablished; not even the trite truism that "there has been no fall, but a rise," need trouble the mind. Instead of looking for Eden "south of the Euphrates," man locates that within his own breast, the tragedy of discerning "both good and evil" being the daily outcome of his own experience; and so the Fall, in the Biblical sense, remains a fact, i.e., the consciousness of sin. Now, to come to God's remedy for sin we shall at once be up against the mind theologic. In this direction, however, Evolution has no discouraging message. There is no need to be pessimistic, "life being an ascent"; let us accept the aphorism. All through this ascending life man has received hints and premonitions of a helping hand, the developing and ever-expanding revelation of God Himself, culminating in Christ, His Incarnate Son; and so it comes about that in the light of Evolution man is called upon to act, so to speak, as co-worker with the Eternal, weaving out his own destiny in the terms of that Redeeming Love as presented to him in the sacrificial aspect of the life and death of Jesus Christ.

No; Evolution, rightly interpreted, need be no menace to Christianity. In the weighty words of Lord Acton, "If Evolution (Darwinism) be true, the religion that cannot accept it must be false."—I am, sir, etc., South Ayrshire. T. N.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—In comparing the evolution of man with Christianity, "Un Chercheur," together with a great number of people, makes a very serious mistake in thinking Evolution is contrary to Christian Ideals. Evolution deals only with the actual physical growth of man, whilst the Scriptures deal with the soul or spirit of man.

Surely Evolution strengthens Christianity by showing that God does everything in perfect law and order.—I am, sir, etc., Lewisham. DONALD LATIMER.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Is Mr. Holby's question as serious as he thinks? "Has the Evolution of the Body anything to do with the Redemption of the Soul?" Can you conceive a degenerate blessed with the soul of a man who has lived a clean and healthy life? I say "No!" Even as environment affects humans generally, so, I consider, does the clay receptacle affect the ego. I grant that the body "is merely a tool with which the ego works," but that divine spark can be smothered by physical misuse. The body becomes the tool only when the soul has been raised above the gross inclinations. This apparent evolution of the soul compels me to ask, From what state of perfection did the soul fall? if, as Mr. Holby concedes, the body did evolve from matter.

Mr. Marsden's letter appears to me somewhat contradictory. He contends that "thinking Christian people do not presume to deny the theory of Evolution," yet believe "that the Creator made man perfect, and that man fell." He suggests the theory that Evolution dates from the fall of man; hence, at the fall, man became purely and simply an animal?

(1) I agree with D. F. B.-L. that Evolution is, at present, "scarcely more than a convenient basis for classification and analysis," but I think there is a good deal in favour of it becoming more than that. This, of course, takes one away from the question in hand, and might, if D. F. B.-L. would honour a young but earnest seeker, form a subject for private correspondence between us.

(2) If anything is to progress it is natural to expect many failures. One would not condemn a progressive church gathering because of the presence of one or two hypocrites.

(3) D. F. B.-L. forgets that man is capable now of taking the law into his own hands, and, in the words of Swedenborg, "God casts no one into Hell, but Evil Spirits cast themselves in."

(4) My answer to (2) constitutes an answer to the latter portion of this paragraph. "The survival of the fittest" does not necessarily mean the survival of "maimed wrecks."

Thanking you for allowing this debate to take place.—I am, sir, etc.,
Newcastle-on-Tyne, August 9th, 1913. UN CHERCHEUR.

CHINA AND OPIUM.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—In his article on "Private and Public Morality" Dr. Sarolea, in speaking of Great Britain and the opium trade, asserts that "she insists on compelling China to buy the poisonous drug. Millions of Chinese must, forsooth, be poisoned and stupefied in order that a few millionaire gentlemen from Bombay may further add to their ill-gotten shekels." If opium were not imported at the seaports of China, thousands of the older men, including many of high position, would die through privation of the drug, which they had been used to all their lives. The majority of opium smokers in China die at a good old age, with no visible effects of "the curse." But, I should like to add, the young Chinaman does not contract the opium habit, for there is a stigma attached to his doing so, an example that public opinion is far more effectual than much legislation. I understand that it is proposed that only the present supply of opium in India shall be imported into China.—I am, sir, etc.,

The extent of the satisfaction may be gauged by the fact that we are already contemplating a visit to Switzerland next summer under the "Everyman" auspices. J. G. August 18th. Northampton. I feel I must write a few lines to thank you for the very pleasant holiday I enjoyed in Normandy this month. Though very diffident about joining the party alone I never regretted it, and enjoyed each day thoroughly. This happy result was chiefly due to the conductor's unfailing courtesy and kindness, and in great measure to the friendliness of the very agreeable people who formed the party. D. R. W. P. August 11th, 1913. London, E.C. We have much pleasure in stating that our Tour in Bruges and Knocke was everything that one could desire considering the low cost. With many thanks for your kind attention. C. R. P. August 7th. Lancs. It gives me much pleasrre to say that Miss C. and myself thoroughly enjoyed our "Everyman" Tour to Belgium and the Ardennes. Nobody could possbly have been more solicitous for our comfort and pleasure than our very capable and tactful guide, and we hereby thank him most cordially for his unsparing efforts to do all in his power for us. We shall hope to have the pleasure of being "guided" by him on some future occasion. A. R. August 11th, 1913. Co. Antrim. I have pleasure in stating that my sister and brother and myself enjoyed our Tour in Belgium very much. We found the arrangements made by you very satisfactory, and the accommodation provided was excellent, quite superior, in fact, to what we expected for the very reasonable sum charged. Wishing you all success in your efforts to bring the enjoyment of foreign travel within the reach of "Everyman." S. R. McC. *****

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

The author of GRACECHURCH, John Ayscough (Longmans, Green, 6s.), has given us a delightful series of sketches of village life. Many of them have the old-world charm and delicate humour of Cranford. But that is not all. In the later chapters of the book a deeper note is struck. It is first heard in "Lessons," when the small boy endeavours to go to Confession, and has to own to the priest that he is not a Catholic. "According to all Protestant theories, he ought then and there to have made me a Catholic: it did not seem to occur to him. . . . He was an elderly theologian and I was a little ignorant boy of eleven: it would not, I'm sure he thought, have been fair." Again it sounds in the conversation with Sextus. But it is in the last chapter, headed "A Farewell Party," that the author's love for Catholicism can no longer be kept silent. "The Gracechurch Papers," he says, "were never intended to embody the story of a boy's conversion to the Catholic Church." Intentionally or unintentionally, the later chapters certainly have that conversion as their chief interest, and I, for one, am glad of it. Mrs. Malone is too good a character to have missed. Her comment on the Confession incident is well worth quoting:

"Wormin' and oilin' to confess your sins, when the glory of the Protestants is that they kape their sins to themselves, and rot 'em. A quare Prodestant, and good luck to you."

"It is bad to be hungry and homeless in England; it is worse to be hungry and homeless in Paris, as well I know—but what is it for a white man to be hungry and homeless in a land where every white man should be a model, an example, a standard-bearer—where every white man represents an Empire and stands for the ruling race, for the governing class, for the West?" The problem of the Englishman who has failed and gone under in India is not much written of or discussed. In his latest book, FATHER GREGORY (Longmans, Green, 6s.), Mr. Wren has shown some of the lures and failures of Indian life. His sympathies are on the side of the unsuccessful, who have broken the great commandment, "Thou shalt not be found out."

The first chapter is undoubtedly the most dramatic in the book. The horror of the situation when Joan Rayben comes in search of Durham, and is "answered by the sound of a horrible crowing bark—that was not the barking of a dog," can only be equalled in Kipling's "Bark of the Beast." We shall look forward to a consecutive novel from the pen of Mr. Wren. Perhaps in the interval his style may have become a little more concise.

The fertility of Mr. Phillips Oppenheim is amazing. At times we are tempted to wish he would restrict his output and devote more attention to his style. He has talents of a certain distinction in the direction of characterisation and dramatic effect, and if he would spend a little more time on the turn of a phrase, or devote more care to the polishing of a paragraph, the result would be more in consonance with his ability. THE MISCHIEF MAKER (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.) is likely to be a popular success; but the author should not rest content with this easy triumph. Brim full of sensations, bright and chatty dialogue, with occasional love episodes, the reading public are sure to ask for the latest novel from his pen. But the author should not remain content to be simply "a best seller." He has talents and capacities that, were he to take pains, should place him well out of the ordinary serialist. Frankly, the present volume is mainly machine-made. Mr. Oppenheim is a clever craftsman, and his olla podrida of plot and counter-plot, beautiful adventuresses, and bold, bad scoundrels is a seasonable dish for the lover of fiction that does not call for thought or criticism. But the fact remains that he could do, and has done, better work, and the pity of it is that, as each succeeding volume issues from the press, we find the traces of fine style and clever characterisation grow more blurred and indistinct; and while the adventures of Sir Julian Portel and the tragedy of a consumptive girl makes good reading for a railway journey, fictional fare of this calibre is not likely to attract the notice of a real lover of literature.

Mary Lavender married a man much older than herself, and of a dominant disposition, when she was twenty. The fact that her husband was a very wealthy man did not, we are told, weigh with her in the selection, but the fact remains that, despite her lack of experience and gentle ingenuousness, she was not attracted by a suitor of smaller income or more insignificant position. A WILFUL WIDOW (Constable and Co., 6s.) opens with the death of the wealthy and tyrannical husband, and Mary is presented to us as free, unattached, and possessed of the means gratifying all her whims and fancies. She is, however, a widow with a mission, and, not content with spending her money on her own and other people's pleasures, helping those who need assistance at a critical moment in their career, she desires to reorganise the world and found a curious sort of Utopia. To do her justice, left to herself she would have been content to lead the life of a woman whose sympathies are as responsive as her purse; it is the advent of the inevitable Social Reformer, who happens to be inspired by love of her as well as devotion to his ideals, that makes the trouble. This trying person insists that it is her duty and his to inaugurate a system by means of which poverty and suffering, slums and sin, will be blotted out from the present scheme of the universe. The fashion he proposes they should bring this about is not original nor alluring. He suggests they should "set up a college or institution—call it what you will; but a place where men and women who wish to take up Socialism can be sure of obtaining a thorough good grounding in the subject, with maintenance during the period of study and positions in the movement afterwards. From there we can send out lieutenants to fight for our cause to all parts of the country, educated men and women, who have made Socialistic Research their special study." Miss Edith Moore would do better were she to write about the commonplace characters in her novel from an ordinary and domestic point of view. Then she might have something quite interesting to tell us. Social Reform, as she depicts it, reads more like a tract than a novel.

Mr. Thomas Nelson Page, in a volume of short stories, THE LAND OF THE SPIRIT (Werner Laurie, 6s.), has written a series of clever and arrestive sketches. He is most successful when he confines himself to American studies. "The Old Planters" is a story told with a commendable simplicity of style of the fortunes of Colonel Garnett and his wife and a boarding-house they ran in the town of Liberty. The colonel is a convincing study. Tinged with sentiment that yet retains a certain simple dignity, one can visualise the gentleman of the Southern States, with his rooted con-

NATURE'S PERFECT PROCESS (Copyright).

Evolved by G. H. COX, late Music Master, Tettenhall College.

An Eminent Anatomist, J. J. MAY, Esq., 43, Russell Square, W.C., writes:—"Has given me intense pleasure. The ONE CORRECT PLAN to work to for memory training. COMPELS CONCENTRATION in three, or perhaps more, distinct ways. Will strengthen nerve tissues used for storing Impressions. Will develop brain tissues. Quite sure will assist in maintaining and restoring the health of physical tissues. Will do much towards the development of the race." In each of us is the power of memory, but it is atrophied by lack of exercise. Nature's system supplies the needed exercise. E. W. BARLOW, Esq., F.R.A.S., Ditton Lodge, Stourwood, Bournemouth, a student of Mental Hygiene, writes: "I regret I have not written to you before, but wanted to study your work very carefully previous to doing so. This I have now done, and find it VERY VALUABLE and UNDOUBTEDLY CORRECT. Furthermore, it is VERY IMPORTANT to me at the present time on ACCOUNT OF MY EXAM." Strongly recommended by eminent Doctors, Clergy, Teachers, Musicians, Speakers, and Business Men. Results are—"Power to Compel Memory," and "General Strengthening for all Brain Work," of great service to Aviators and Motorists, needing the utmost quickness in thought and action.

viction that the ruin of society was the emancipation of the slave following on the war between the North and South, in which he had played a distinctive part. Fallen on evil days, he and his wife run the "Planters" for the benefit of Yankee drummers—the American term for commercial travellers. With a few swift touches the author shows us the gentle, well-bred, somewhat shrinking lady faced by the crowd of self-assertive young men, full of swank and ready to break out into derisive laughter at the old house and its pitiful lack of accommodation. "I was struck with the change the last quarter of an hour had made in the young men. In the interval all had brushed their hair and nearly all had put on clean collars. The Jew's crinkly curls glistened with the water that was still on them, while the heads of most of the others were brushed as smooth as energy and care could make them." The colonel gradually loses grip, and degenerates into what the drummers call "a dead man." Once, however, he wakes up, galvanised into the old fighting man who went through a battle with two shots in his side. A drunken nigger suddenly runs amuck, wounds a policeman, swears he will shoot anyone who attempts his capture, and barricades in a house at the end of a cul-de-sac. The colonel dodders on to the scene, a tottery old figure, half asleep, and, when he awakes sufficiently to speak, unduly garrulous. He insists on marching down the alley. "We heard the old fellow banging on the door, rap, rap, rap, with his cane, and caught his voice in a tone of command, 'Open the door instantly.' . . . The next minute the door opened, and we heard the old man's voice berating someone. A few minutes later two dark objects appeared at the end of the alley, and as they drew near the colonel's voice once more was heard, 'Mr. Constable, disperse that crowd and come forward and receive your prisoner.' I scarcely knew the voice, it had changed so. It had in it an unexpected ring." The crowd, full of the desire to lynch, rushed forward to seize on the nigger. But the colonel stopped them with a warning, sharp and high-pitched, "Stand back, every one of you! I'll shoot the first man that comes forward." The crowd fell back, awed by an indefinable something in the voice; the figure that kept them at bay, revolver in hand, was a very long way from the garrulous Garnett of everyday life, and men who hitherto had shrugged their shoulders, convinced he was at best more than three-parts a liar when he told them of his adventures in the war, suddenly fell back, credulous and ashamed. We wish Mr. Page had confined himself to sketches localised and made realistic by the atmosphere which he has a talent for creating, and by those swift touches, vivid and real, that make the characters alive and bring the setting of their lives vividly home to one. He has, however, gone far astray from American types. "The Stable of the Inn" is the story of Mary and Joseph, their journeying to Bethlehem, and the nativity of Christ. It is but rarely that an artist is able to recreate the atmosphere of centuries ago, and the author's talents do not lie in this direction. This, however, is but one blemish on a very clever book. The "Bigot," another story of an American type, is written with insight and imagination and a sense of style rare in a day when the art of the short story is neglected to an incredible extent. We shall look with interest for future work from the author of this suggestive volume.

Mr. George A. Birmingham is a perennial joy to reviewers. The problem novel, with its insistence on the nasty side of things, the machine-made romance, with its watertight compartments, each containing a separate and distinct sensation, become a weariness equalled by that of the Biblical writer who complained that to the making of books there is no end. From the first page to the last GENERAL JOHN REGAN (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.) is brim full of humour, and its reading brings solace and relief to a mind jaded by innumerable volumes full of discourses about nothing. Ballymoy, the delightful village which forms the setting of the story, is characterised by Horace P. Billing as a "dead-alive, God-forsaken one-horse settlement." He is on the hunt for objects of interest, and mentions "General John Regan," the Saviour of Bolivia, and waits to be astonished and pained at the abysmal ignorance of the inhabitants. Ballymoy is quite equal to him, however; what they do not know he does not guess, and a game of spoof goes on between them with immense hilarity. Dr. Lucius O'Grady, the village doctor, plays a prominent part in the drama; he starts a committee for the proper celebration of the General's memory, and finally arranges for the erection of a statue to record the services of the great man to Bolivia, in the market-place of Ballymoy. The statue is paid for by Billing, who, on the occasion of its unveiling, makes a recantation and a speech. He commences by telling them what he thought of the village and its inhabitants when he arrived. "I got bitten with the notion of speeding you up a bit," he said, "because I felt plumb sure that there was not a live man in the place, nothing but a crowd of doddering hop-toads. . . . Well, gentlemen," said Mr. Billing, "I was mistaken, and I own up. There is one live man in Ballymoy, anyway. We haven't got a medical gentleman on our side of the Atlantic equal to Dr. Lucius O'Grady. He has run this show in a way that has surprised me considerable. He has erected a statue that will be an ornament to this town, and it is a pleasure to me to pay for it . . . and when I tell you that General John Regan never existed in Bolivia or anywhere else, you will be in a position to appreciate your doctor."

A delightful book, brim full of fun, lit up with swift touches of characterisation, it should be read by everyone who longs for a pleasant sojourn with a leisured and literary author.

Holeproof Hose.

To save uncongenial labour, to make life happier and sweeter for every human being, to increase the leisure time of the overworked—these things are the objects which inventors have striven to attain. Bell, the inventor of the telephone, placed all the world on chatting terms over the wires. He showed us how to laugh at space. Edison applied electricity and enables us to brighten the darkest night. Airmen have mastered the art of flying so what is there left

WHY OUR GARMENTS STILL WEAR OUT.

But your Hosiery need not if you will keep pace with the times, for there is now Hosiery that is Holeproof.

WHY THIS HOSIERY IS HOLEPROOF.

The explanation of the durability of "V. & H." Holeproof Hosiery is made here, so that every person can see for himself, or herself, the genuineness of it. Your own brain will show you the truth of it. This "V. & H." Holeproof Hosiery is made in a new way from a specially privately manufactured yarn. This yarn is lighter in weight and at the same time tougher and stronger than any other brand. It is so pliable that it gives to continued pressure and wear, just as a sponge may be depressed by gripping in the hand, but still have no damage done to its fabric. There is hardly any spring or elastic stretch in ordinary hose, even of the most expensive kind, and this accounts for the rapid appearance of holes and thin places. Luxuriously comfortable, shapely and well-made, "V. & H." Holeproof Hosiery is a revelation to all.

Look at our "GUARANTEE" Ticket which is sent with every pair we sell

TRY THEM FOR TWO MONTHS.

Then, if within that time a hole should appear, send them back to us at once with ticket, and we will present you with new hose without extra cost.

No such guarantee could be given with hose made in the ordinary way. But with "V. & H." Holeproof Hose you can be free from the fear of a hole suddenly showing—not only just at that point at the heel where the eyes of everyone can see, but at no part of "V. & H." Holeproof Hose will there be a hole. That we guaranteed for two whole months.

The comfort and pleasure of good wearing hose to men conveys a sense of well-being and satisfaction all day long, while to business girls and busy house-wives, to whom the weekly darning is a long and tiresome task, the benefit is incalculable.

Everyone in the country will be wearing "V. & H." Holeproof Hosiery after we can get them just to TRY it once. Orders are now pouring in from the friends of those who already are wearing the new "V. & H." Holeproof Hose. The price is—

HISTORY IN THE MAKING

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THERE has come a tragic termination to the horrors of the Dublin riots, with their sickening scenes of carnage, uproar, and disorder. Thirteen families have been discovered injured among the débris of some falling houses, and seven of their number are reported dead. Dreadful as the episode truly is, it almost tempts us to use the old theological phrase, "a blessing in disguise." For a time, at all events, the feud that has rent the city will be stilled and hushed in the sympathy which the warm-hearted Irish are sure to extend to these poor sufferers, and it is not a little touching to read that in the very streets where but lately riot raged, "anxious watchers were seen kneeling in prayer." It is, however, devoutly to be desired that the incident will not close without a searching inquiry. For thirteen houses to collapse suddenly, argues surely, that there is something rotten in their condition. Either they were jerry-built, or age has made them unfit for human habitation. It is of the utmost importance that the matter should be cleared up.

No little interest attaches to the report of the new model cottages which we learn from a contemporary are being built to the order of Mr. Rowntree, of York. Their importance lies in the fact that it has been found possible to complete them for £90. Hitherto it has been found impracticable to erect a suitable cottage for less than £150, which figure has, with the cost of the land, local rates, and other charges, often proved prohibitive. The new concrete cottages mark a very important step forward in that movement towards rural regeneration which is one of the most hopeful signs of the times.

The disaster on the railway at Aisgill raises several important questions. First and foremost, there is the disquieting circumstance that the engine of the first express failed to take its load up the gradient, thus directly causing the accident. Why was this? The matter calls for the closest investigation. Scarcely less important is the fact that the driver and fireman of the second train, although they knew that another express was immediately in front of them, did not make sure that the signal had been seen. Then, again, there is the haunting fact that the victims were burnt to death, and at once the question arises, why cannot steps be taken to avoid these awful fires that so frequently follow these disasters? Cannot the companies be induced to build steel carriages, and make the woodwork and upholstery of their compartments non-inflammable? There is a tendency on the part of the railway directors to sacrifice everything to speed, and this is resulting in an appalling increase in the number of accidents. It is essential, therefore, that this particular tragedy on the line should be sifted with more than usual thoroughness.

The situation in Mexico remains unchanged. Opinion appears to be divided in the States as to the action of the President in refusing to recognise Huerta. The critics of the Wilsonian policy declare that the instructions issued to American citizens in Mexico to quit the country is in itself an insult that the southern Republic will not lightly overlook, and that a cardinal error was made in that a message was not sent requesting Mexico to protect the life and property of the American residents. A contemporary expresses this point of view in an interview with a New York barrister, who adds his opinion of President Wilson as follows: "There is no iron in the blood of his policy. There is nothing militant in telling your children to pick up their doll rags and go home. It does not satisfy the Anglo-Saxon blood. It may win everything else but the plaudits of this particular race."

The week has been a great one for aviation—probably the most momentous that has occurred in its history since that memorable day when Blériot flew the Channel, and when the unhappy Latham only fell short of repeating the feat by a couple of miles. In addition to the remarkable flight over the Irish Sea, which took place early this week, we have M. Pegoud's extraordinary performances on the new Blériot monoplane, on which, so we read, he "began leaping and curvetting and playing a whirligig in the air." It was recently claimed for another heavier than air machine that it solved the problem of lateral stability, but if many pilots like Pegoud are vouchsafed us, this will be supererogatory. Even more remarkable is the report that reaches us from Paris of an aero 'bus, which seems to have proved quite successful. After this Mr. Hawker's wonderful feat looks quite tame, and it really does seem that we have advanced within measurable distance of victory over nature's most formidable element.

The report that there may shortly be upon the market a substitute for radium that, while possessing its curative qualities, can be obtained at a lower rate opens up a wide field of suggestion. The cures effected by the use of radium have been numerous and assured, and the relief its action has procured to hundreds of sufferers is one of the most remarkable phenomena of medical science to-day. Mesothorium, the substance in question, can be obtained by a secret process from monacite sand, found in large quantities in South America, each ton of sand yielding a grain of the element. If rumour prove correct, and the substitute is found to be as valuable as it is thought, the importance of the discovery cannot be exaggerated.

THE MAN AND HIS WORK

VIII.—THE CIVIL SERVANT PRIZE ESSAY BY H. A. POSTLETHWAITE

I.

"SUCH a steady young fellow! He is going in for the Civil Service."

Everyone knows the air of finality with which the maiden aunt, of legend and of life, sums up everything and everybody that come within her line of observation. In a word or a phrase she crystallises character, capability, and destiny; and the queer part of it is that her summing up, having regard to the limitations of language, is often admirably apt.

For generations maiden aunts have dubbed Civil Servants and would-be Civil Servants "steady," and for generations obedient nephews have lived up to the designation. No other word epitomises so neatly the capabilities and limitations of the Government clerk; no other word praises him so cautiously or damns him so gently.

II.

A single word may appear, at first sight, a trifle inadequate to sum up a vast body of individuals; and to venture on a survey of the characteristics of an imaginary "average" Civil Servant might seem to be about as profitable as to attempt to describe the size and weight of an "average" piece of coal. The frock-coated secretary, the tweed-clad junior, and the uniformed messenger are such essentially different types, drawn from points on the social scale so diverse, that generalisation cries its own warning. Each class and each grade, one would imagine, must be examined apart and judged on its own merits. The chiefs must be described as discreet, gentlemanly, and cautious; the juniors as methodical, courteous, and careful; the messengers as obedient, respectful, and attentive; and so on. But, no matter how minutely the analysis is conducted, the net result tends to show that, whether there be an "average" Civil Servant or not, the traits of all Civil Servants are remarkably constant. To be discreet, methodical, or obedient is to be but one thing, called by a different name according to one's place in society; to be gentlemanly is to be courteous, and to be courteous is no more than to be respectful; and one may not be cautious except by being careful and attentive. There is not one of the nine adjectives that is not included in the word "steady," and there is no class of Civil Servant that escapes that word's praise and condemnation.

III.

But although almost any description of a Civil Servant may be shown to resolve itself, by astute manipulation, into a mere elaboration of the word "steady," it can hardly be claimed that that word is in itself a full and sufficient description of the genus. The word does not identify; one may say that a man is little, and that everything about him is part of his littleness, but these particulars would not suffice to pick him out of a crowd.

Perhaps the most obvious outward characteristic of the Civil Servant is the shabbiness of his attire. The failing is, of course, part of his habitual steadiness. The Civil Servant, above all people, has a passion for the status quo, whether it be in respect to the hour of his luncheon or to the particular coat he wears in the performance of his official duties. He is perfectly satisfied with things as they are; to change entails bother; there is no absolute necessity for it; therefore why do it?

It is all essentially logical; that is the pity of it. The Civil Servant is not under the obligation of the merchant or the tradesman to "keep up appearances" for the sake of his business. His annual increment is in no way related to the smartness of his appearance. He has no incentive to beautify his person. All around him are colleagues just as delinquent as himself; the arguments of example and tradition are part of the atmosphere of his life; the blame is only partly his that he is the "worst dressed feller round town." But that makes it none the less deplorable.

IV.

Aspersions on the ability of the Civil Servant, his acumen and his energy, have been part of the stock-in-trade of the humorous journals ever since there have been humorous journals. They are not intended maliciously. Their authors realise, perhaps, how impossible it is to judge of the industry of the units in a Department from their output in blue-books and statistics.

Nevertheless, it must be admitted by those "in the know" that there is a basis for this humour. It is sad to relate, but it is true, that there are many Civil Servants who could use much more ink than they draw in official rations, and much more brain. But it is infinitely more sad (and no less true) that there are many who would be glad to do so. It is not necessary to try to apportion the blame in order to observe that in the Civil Service there is less incentive to exercise ability, and more temptation to "slack" through sheer boredom, than in any other profession.

But what a man does in particular circumstances is no criterion of what he can do. There have been, and there are, Departments where an official seven-hours' day is a thing to dream of and to smile at; where weeks are made to hold seven days, each of many hours' solid industry, and where the staff might be held up as an example by the most tyrannous of commercial slave-drivers. Yet there is no grumbling; chiefs and juniors bend their backs with a will. And not infrequently in such Departments men are heard to mutter, sotto voce, that "this is a jolly sight better than the old — Branch, where we had nothing to do but laze."

By other means, too, the Civil Servant vindicates his character as a worker. In the world of Literature he holds a place of which he may rightly be proud. There are many names entitled to respect that, once appearing daily in the official attendance book, now adorn the pages of publishers' catalogues. There are dramatic critics who still spend the hours of daylight at their desks in Whitehall (and King Edward VII. Street). There are hosts of minor lights living a double life: John Smith from ten to five; Algernon Snooks in the monthly magazines. It is confidentially asserted that a certain London Review (the boldness of whose opinions entitles it, perhaps, to a wider circulation than it has yet attained) perseveres in its existence only by reason of the gratuitous contributions of gentlemen who live on salaries provided in the Parliamentary Estimates.

In many lesser ways, also, the Civil Servant often finds an outlet for energies that are imperfectly exhausted in his official capacity. He is an office-holder in the Church or the Fabian Society; he spends his annual leave on Salisbury Plain with the dignity of a stripe or two on a khaki tunic, and talks to rookies in words he wouldn't for the life of him use before his staff-officer at any other time; he is secretary of a tennis club, wins medals when he swims, or has a taste for boxing; he may paint a bit, or sing a bit, or have something to do with Toynbee Hall; or he may merely have a passion for rose-culture. But he is a glaring exception who has not some occupation outside his ordinary duties—some nice, interesting, steady occupation.

V.

As far as the purely personal virtues are concerned, the Civil Servant is, on the whole, very much the same as the rest of humanity. In one or two ways his environment affects him favourably, but not to any extraordinary extent. As a cog in an enormous, slow-moving machine, his life runs smoothly, and that cannot fail to have a soothing effect on his temper. He is far removed from the hurry and rush and petty bickering of commercial life; his salary is assured, and it is not essential that each shilling he can call his own should have been culled from the pocket of someone else by his own fingers. If he is of a frugal mind, he can frequently live within his income; his official worries stay inside when he closes the office door behind him in the evening; his colleagues are, as a rule, men with tastes similar to his own, and any annoyances that come his way are trivial. Granted that he is married (and that is no wild assumption), there is no serious hindrance to the cultivation of a mild and genial disposition and the acquisition of a pleasing degree of obesity.

It is a frequent cry that the chiefs delight to adopt an attitude of snobbishness toward their official inferiors. There is an element of truth in the allegation, but the vice is not so prevalent as the outcry it evokes. Some ultra-sensitive junior observes that his chief, engaged in conversation with a friend, fails to return his salute or neglects to bid him (and some twenty-nine others) good-morning as he passes them in a corridor. "Snob!" is the comment; and the twenty-nine, confident that if he is not a snob he ought to be, echo the libel. Sometimes it is true; even the best universities occasionally turn out men who cannot get over their amazing superiority to the rest of mankind. But all the snobbishness in the Civil Service is but a drop in the ocean of general good-fellowship.

A few years ago the peace of mind of the Civil Servant was seriously threatened; the introduction into official life of his sisters, his cousins, and his aunts was undoubtedly a revolution. But he has survived it. The ladies have not interfered with the even tenor of his way. They keep to themselves (perhaps one should say "are kept") and leave him to himself.

The Civil Servant is a steady young fellow when he starts, and, as a rule, he does not run off the tracks to any serious extent right up to pension age. He might dress better, and he might work harder on occasions—notably in August. He has ability, and he is even capable of "push." But he is quite a good sort as he is.

Next week will be published the result of Competition No. 3, "The Foreign Missionary," and in following weeks Competitions 5, 4 and 2 ("The Composer," "The Male Teacher," and "The Anglican Clergyman") will be decided.

RESULT OF "EVERYMAN" ESSAY COMPETITION

THE Prize of THREE GUINEAS offered by EVERYMAN for the best essay on THE CIVIL SERVANT has been won by

Mr. H. A. POSTLETHWAITE,
26, Elm Road,
East Sheen, London, S.W.,

whose paper is here reproduced. As in the case of THE MINER, competition was very keen, and the task of adjudication was rendered difficult, not only by the abundance of essays sent in, but by the remarkably uniform quality of the entries.

Most of the essays received are confessedly or presumably the work of actual Civil Servants. They reveal to us the Civil Servant as he appears to himself and to his own colleagues. It is typical of the Service to which the writers belong that studied moderation is the prevailing note of all these essays. Self-praise and self-blame are alike restrained. We are given no rhapsodies, no diatribes. The Civil Servant is too consciously cautious to give rein to his pen, to write in a fit of temper or of enthusiasm. His whole training forbids it. It is characteristic, too, of the Civil Servant that the regulations as to length, etc., laid down for EVERYMAN'S Essay Competitions have been far more strictly observed in Competition No. 1. than in any of the others.

The subject title, on the other hand, was not as closely adhered to as might have been expected, and many competitors dealt, more or less thoroughly, with "THE CIVIL SERVICE" instead of "THE CIVIL SERVANT." The chief difficulty, however, experienced by the essay-writers would appear to have been that of finding and depicting an average Civil Servant. As one competitor (Mr. Harold Skelton) remarks:

"In the appellation 'Civil Service' is comprised a diversity of occupations—their name Legion, and their characteristics differing as an archangel differs from a troglodyte. The Prime Minister who steers the ship of State, the messenger who delivers our telegrams, the girl who asks 'Number, please?' for eight hours a day, each plays his or her part as a Civil Servant. The official who watches the interests of his country abroad, from Mexico to Madagascar, and the officer who stands on guard at our insular gates to frustrate the smuggler, both rejoice in the name of Civil Servant. The clerk in a comfortable crib in the War Office, the postman on his daily round, the boy clerk who 'devils' away thirteen to the dozen, the lady typist in the London Custom House, the Chairman of a Royal Commission—these and a hundred others make up that much-envied class known as Civil Servants."

The essay of Mr. Herbert A. Jenkins, 5, Henshall Street, Chester, ranks next to the prize-winner's, and particularly able papers were also written by the following: Mr. Lewis R. Bunn, Birmingham; Mr. J. J. Cater, Dunoon; "D. J. C.," Dublin; Mr. John Scott, Leeds; Mr. Harold Skelton, Edinburgh; "The Civil Servant," Forest Gate, E.; and Mr. Charles L. de Wolff, War Office, London. A number of interesting essays were sent in by women Civil Servants. Almost every branch and grade of the Civil Service was represented, officers of Customs and Excise giving an especially good account of themselves. Considering the multiplicity and diversity of duties discharged by those who took part in the competition, the views expressed were remarkably unanimous. Indeed, the essays themselves go far to confirm the contention of nearly every competitor that the Civil Service, while demanding ability and stability, has little or no use for originality.

THE DEPOPULATION OF FRANCE

By W. S. LILLY

I.

THE prospect presented just now by France cannot be contemplated with satisfaction by lovers of that fair country, of whom I am emphatically one. First, her financial condition must be confessed to be deplorable. There is a huge deficit to be faced—a deficit of not less than £43,000,000—for the year 1913. The expenditure amounts to £240,000,000, the normal revenue to £197,680,000. More, there looms ominously, in the immediate future, the extra burden entailed by the new system of three years' army service—a burden which, in order to appease the Socialists, the Government last June declared should be placed upon the shoulders of the rich. It is not easy to see how effect can be given to that declaration. And if we come to the army itself, there can be no question that its morale has been gravely impaired by the anti-patriotic and anti-militaire propagandism of the anarchists. The doctrine of the Confédération Générale de Travail was clearly formulated at the Congress of Amsterdam by M. de Marmande, one of the French delegates. He emphatically insisted: "Anarchists are the declared enemies of all armed force in the hands of the State: army, gendarmes, police—yes, and the magistracy too—are abhorred by them. They invite their comrades to combat these tyrants by all means: by individual revolt, by refusal, isolated and collective, to serve, by disobedience, active and passive, and by a military strike." To inculcate their views among the troops, the International Anti-militant Association has disseminated, in the chief military centres, a large number of publications, the nature of which is indicated by their titles, such as l'Idole Patrie, l'Enfer Militaire, l'Outil de Meurtre. Stage plays, inculcating similar sentiments, have been composed, and also songs, some of which—for example, A bas Biribi, Ne tire pas, petit soldat, l'Hymne à l'Anarchie—have become very popular. Nor must we lose sight of the society called Le Sou du Soldat, which, posing as a work of fellowship, mutuality, and philanthropy, is really an effective instrument of disaffection and mutiny. It is not possible to know accurately how far this movement has as yet infected the French army, but it is a striking fact that in the year 1911—I have not been able to get later statistics—there were 2,548 desertions, and 9,786 soldiers were convicted of insubordination.

II.

But there is another and even worse sign of rottenness in the state of France. More important to any nation than even the fiscal system, or the army, is the family. For long years the depopulation of France has been progressing. We may say, indeed, that during the whole of the nineteenth century this process continued, with the regularity of a phenomenon governed by mathematical laws. If we take the ten decades of that century, the births for every 10,000 inhabitants exhibit a decreasing series. Thus in the first decade there were 323 births, in the second 316, in the third 308, in the fourth 299, in the fifth 274, in the sixth 262, in the seventh 261, in the eighth 255, in the ninth 232, in the tenth 222. And since 1900 the same graduation has continued. In 1910 the number of births for every 10,000 inhabitants sank to 197, in 1911 to 187. Nor is there any reason for supposing that the process will stop; quite the contrary. M. Lavassour, in his book, La Population Française, tells us: "We must expect a further diminution." Dr. Bertillon goes further. In his precise and magisterial treatise, La Dépopulation de la France, we read the gloomy vaticination, "The decreasing progression will continue until the complete extinction of the race." And now, by way of comparison, let us look at the German Empire. There we find three births for every one in France. At the present moment France has 39,000,000 inhabitants, Germany 67,000,000. Even if the birth-rate continues as it is now in the two countries—and we have just seen that the tendency is for it to sink lower and lower in France—in twelve years' time, that is to say, in 1925, there will be two Germans for every one Frenchman, and forty years hence there will be five Germans for every two Frenchmen. By way of extending the comparison, let me add the total number of births in 1908—I have not been able to procure later figures—for the principal European countries was as follows:—

|---------------------------|-----------|
| Germany | 2,015,000 |
| Austria-Hungary | 1,913,000 |
| Italy | 1,139,000 |
| The United Kingdom | 1,145,000 |
| France | 792,000 |

I leave out of the question the prolific Russian Empire on account of its vast size. But it is significant that in Italy, with about half the area of France, the number of births is fifty per cent. greater.

III.

I take the figures which I have just put before my readers from a work recently published by M. Georges Rossignol under the significant title of Un Pays de Célibitaires et de Fils Uniques. M. Rossignol was a member of the Extraparliamentary Commission on Depopulation appointed in November, 1912, under the presidency of M. Klotz, the Minister of Finance, and his work is dedicated to his colleagues on that body. I cannot say that it possesses any considerable literary merit. Its claim upon our attention is of another—and indeed a higher—kind. It is a weighty collection of facts and arguments, stated with an energy of conviction that leads the author to apologise—quite unnecessarily, I think—for the occasional violence of his tone. I may add, to obviate misconception, that M. Rossignol is not open to suspicion as what is vaguely called a "clerical." On the contrary, he appears to be an admirer of the existing régime in France. He accounts "Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity," "a sublime formula," as "summing up the sacred rights of the individual, the no less sacred rights of society, social amelioration, and the peace of nations"—a view upon which history supplies a curious comment. He venerates the canaille of 1793 as "great men," and is of opinion that Gambetta ought to be placed almost as high in the annals of his country as Joan of Arc. He is an admirer of l'école laïque. His testimony, therefore, as to the condition of France with regard to the important matter which he discusses, is not to be met with the insinuation that he is an enemy of the Third Republic. Indeed the ex-Minister Klotz, in an inaugural speech to the Commission above mentioned, expressly recognised the chief facts on which M. Rossignol insists, and bewailed them as "a pressing peril, a state of things involving the life or death of France." Assuredly, these words are not too strong to describe the danger accruing to that country from her ever-progressing depopulation. I quoted just now some figures to indicate the extent of it. Let me exhibit it more succinctly by stating that in the twenty-two years from 1890 to 1911 the total increase of the population was 613, and that in eight of those years there was no increase at all but a decrease. The result of this depopulation is, as M. Rossignol easily shows, the decadence of France. To the establishment of this thesis he devotes the thirty-eight pages of a painfully interesting chapter. He quotes a sentence from Dr. Rommel's book, Au Pays de la Reconche, published at Geneva a quarter of a century ago: "France has gone back all along the line: everything in her is falling to pieces: everything is diminishing: she has no longer the courage to speed the plough, to maintain foreign commerce, or to breed children." This is the testimony of an enemy; but M. Rossignol acknowledges that it is true: truer even than when the words were written. The figure which France makes in the world, he says, is due to her past history and traditions—as it was with Holland in the eighteenth century. Her revenues are squandered by professional politicians, and perhaps there is something grand, Dr. Rommel grimly observes, when a nation on the brink of sinking (sombrier) throws its riches out of the window. Her commerce has largely passed into the hands of foreigners. And so has no inconsiderable portion of her soil—M. Rossignol estimates it at 45,000 square kilometres, a quantity equal to eight departments, and larger than the whole of Switzerland. In Marseilles there is a colony of 120,000 Italians: they fill the void made by French depopulation there.

IV.

Such, then, is the position of France with regard to this grave matter. A vast number of men do not marry, and of those who do, many decline to be burdened—that is the word used—with more than one child. It is rapidly becoming a country of bachelors and of only sons. But—and here M. Rossignol is on firm ground—it is not merely the quantity of Frenchmen which has declined: it is also the quality. "The bachelor," he writes—"I mean the hardened bachelor, he who will die in final impenitence—is not merely an egoist who makes himself his final end: he is often—too often—a debauched person: an agent of corruption." "A society composed of bachelors cannot be a moral society," he continues; "their presence, when they are numerous, lowers the moral tone of a country." And he adds, quite truly, that most of these confirmed bachelors manifest a contempt for women, engendered, no doubt, by the character of those with whom they consort: and that this contempt is a very sure sign of the decadence which they have diffused around them. And they lead French society as public officials, journalists, writers of fiction, or simply men of the world (mondains). They, with only sons, are the keystone of the social order, and they give the tone to public opinion.

"Only sons." M. Rossignol holds that they are quite as bad as confirmed bachelors, or even worse. They too are responsible for the slight esteem in which women are held. A married couple who so restrict their family will seldom find the only son a product of whom they should be proud. He is almost always spoilt as a child, and grows up sceptical, blasé, and blagueur. Sceptical? Yes; he believes in nothing, not even in the family. He is averse from work, prone to self-indulgence, to which, indeed, he is from the first habituated. He wishes to make the most, for himself, of his patrimony as an only son. Is not that the future which his parents have prepared for him? Have they not taught him the lesson that enjoyment is the one end of life? Such is the outcome of what is called—with some injustice to Malthus—the neo-Malthusianism of to-day, as exhibited in the system of only sons. M. Rossignol stigmatises it as a dupery and an imbecility, and as an act of treason against the country.

V.

This article has already reached a normal length, but I must not end it without noticing the conclusion to which M. Rossignol points. He quotes with assent a dictum—perfectly true it is—from M. Bourda's book, Le Patriote: "A nation has no right to live longer than it has the force to live." The force of a nation is in a numerous, a vigorous population, sound physically and morally. M. Rossignol brushes aside contemptuously the dreams of doctrinaires concerning the fraternity of peoples. He knows too well human nature to doubt that the nations will follow in the years to come, as they have followed in the years past,

" . . . the simple rule, the good old plan,
That they should take who have the power,
And they should keep who can."

Dipping into the future, far as mortal eye can see—and, indeed, further—he considers the dismemberment of France in a few decades quite possible, and draws a vivid picture of it in one of his chapters. How far his forebodings will be realised "only the event will teach us in its hour"; that is to say, will teach some of us, of whom I shall not be one. But M. Rossignol does not despair of his country. He thinks that though grievously sick, the sickness may be not unto death: that there are still remedies, if only they are applied in time. What they are, we will consider next week.

(To be continued.)

THE MUSIC OF THE HEART

GIPSY-BOY with the eyes of fire,

What do you sing to-day?

Who is the god who tuned your lyre?

Where did you learn your lay?

Songs of the broad highway I sing,

Of hills and valleys fair,

For you must know I am a king—

My realm, the open air.

The gods? Good sir, I know of none,

I know not what they be;

No blessings do I ask, save one—

To know that I am free.

My songs are as the songs of birds,

Unlearned, untaught by art,

Nor even feels the need of words

The music of the heart.

JOHN CARLTON.

THE LONDON TERMINI * * BY G. ALEXANDER

PERHAPS there is nothing more characteristic of the piecemeal and almost fortuitous way in which our extensive railway system has grown up than the position and arrangement of the London terminus stations. It is not so much that they are so aggressively non-artistic, forming in this respect, with but few exceptions, a strong contrast to those of most Continental cities. But it is rather that at some points, by their redundancy, they recall the days of competition gone mad, while at others they are planted on sites that support the principle of the public for the railways, and not the railways for the public. But in these days competition has been greatly sobered by the pressure of heavier expenses, larger wages bills, and such like persuasive remedies; while, on the other hand, the nation sees clearly that, whether the railways are to be in the hands of great companies or other ways of administering them have to be tried, they are a concern of national importance, and must exist mainly for the advantage of the public. Hence it may be worth while to consider whether we cannot improve the arrangement and lessen the number of these great collecting and distributing centres.

The very oldest London stations have almost passed out of sight. Bricklayers' Arms, Nine Elms, and Bishopsgate, the old Eastern Counties terminus, have become goods depôts, and nothing else. Fenchurch Street, it is true, still survives, with its narrow proportions and crowded surroundings. London Bridge terminus has grown in such a way as to be still most useful and not inconspicuous. Again, on the other side of the Thames, Euston, the important starting-point of our premier line, still faces the world outside with the imposing Doric portal it had when the L.N.W.R. was young, and the old legend "London and Birmingham Railway" is still to be read affixed to the wall. Of course, it has long ago outgrown its original dimensions, yet, with some sixteen platforms and well-organised traffic, it remains no unworthy headquarters of the company. And the only real difficulty is that it stands back rather far from the main road instead of abutting upon it. King's Cross bears upon it the stamp of a bygone age, and withal a sort of meanness and commonness that ill accord with the eminently respectable and remarkably efficient expresses of the Great Northern. St. Pancras is a really handsome and nobly conceived building. Marylebone probably meets to the full the purposes which it was designed to serve, and when we come to Liverpool Street we are introduced to a terminus unrivalled in extent, at least in London, and admirably organised. It has an immense traffic to provide for, and it does provide for it, if not with perfection, at any rate in a manner both intelligent and helpful.

The question must often have struck the mind of those interested in the subject whether something could not be done to make the terminus of the Great Western more central than it is. But, in default of any feasible plan before the public for carrying the station further in towards the centre of London, other attempts have been made to get over the difficulty in other ways, such as tube connections, railway omnibuses, and starting trains from Victoria to come in upon the main line at some distance from London. But it remains true that Paddington is the most out of the way of all the London termini, and the more the Great Western develops the more this is felt. There is one solution which presents, indeed, considerable difficulties, but which, if these can be overcome, would effect a mighty improvement in all the west-bound traffic of the Metropolis. This solution would be to cross Hyde Park by a tunnel driven in the direction of the present Paddington Station, placing the new terminus somewhere near Hyde Park Corner, perhaps on and near the present site of St. George's Hospital, which in any case is now to be relinquished. If it be said that an hotel is to be built on the hospital site, it may be remembered that a large terminal hotel seems to be looked on nowadays as a necessary part of the equipment of an important railway station. And there is one company which has already pushed its terminus inward to a more central situation, and that is the Great Eastern, with its extension from Bishopsgate to Liverpool Street. What the Great Eastern has accomplished with such excellent results might not be beyond the skill and enterprise of the Great Western.

When we come to consider the companies running southward from London we are faced with a quite different state of things. The South-Western, indeed, is patiently transforming Waterloo from a labyrinth of disjointed passages into an organised centre for its vast passenger traffic. But the South-Eastern has no fewer than six London termini, to some extent competitive, which can only be regarded as survivals of the old days when South-Eastern and Chatham and Dover contended for the lion's share of the Kent and Continental work. Surely this is an "embarras de richesses"; and, as a matter of fact, looked at from a broad standpoint, we should be all the better without half of these six stations. Victoria, Charing Cross, St. Paul's, Holborn Viaduct, Cannon Street, and London Bridge, all take passengers to the sea-coast and to the sea ports for the Continent; all take up precious space, and all combine to confuse the average traveller, who is not acquainted with the intricate system they subserve.

And if the London citizen who is anxious for the good order and comely appearance of his Metropolis has an opinion, it can hardly be that in these six buildings he has six architectural monuments which help to decorate the banks of the Thames. Far from it. Charing Cross, both bridge and station, stands like a black blot among its modern surroundings, and little better can be said of Cannon Street; while the other stations within the city escape a like condemnation, not on account of superior comeliness, but because they do not occupy quite such conspicuous sites.

It seems incredible that something cannot be done to bring about a simplification and better organisation of this confused scattering of the forces. If the South-Western, not to speak of other companies, manage so well with one terminus, the South-Eastern cannot surely require six. The traffic is less, the revenue is less; nothing save the outlay on salaries and upkeep can well be greater. In fact, it is quite likely that more than one feasible scheme could be worked out, evolving order from chaos, and saving time, space, and money. The few suggestions that follow are by no means exhaustive.

In the first place, London would gain largely, both in appearance and otherwise, if Charing Cross Station, with its unsightly bridge barring the Embankment, could be utterly abolished. The valuable and conspicuous site could be sold and devoted to handsome buildings in harmony with the surroundings. Mr. John Burns is supposed to have suggested a terminus in place of it on the south side of the river. And no doubt, if Victoria cannot be sufficiently enlarged and improved, the proposal for a terminus facing Waterloo holds the field. But if the South-Eastern Victoria were treated with the broad liberality which the Brighton Victoria has received, it might well be that it would become an all-sufficient West-End terminus for the South-Eastern system.

And then we come to the City stations. If the Cannon Street terminus can be made to share the destruction invoked above upon the head of Charing Cross, so much the better. Another ugly railway bridge would then go, and we should be forced to have one large City station absorbing St. Paul's and Holborn Viaduct. But if this is not possible, then would it not be best to make short work of both these last-named mean and confusing stations? If Cannon Street is to be tolerated, it ought to survive as the chief City station for Continental and all southward-bound traffic. It is too great an eyesore to find acceptance on any smaller terms.

Of course, a great city like London can hardly be made or marred to any vital degree by its railway stations. Important as they are, they are but one department out of many. Still less does such a city exist mainly for them. We have got beyond the time when we will have them inflicted on us, when they do not justify themselves either by their utility or their magnificence. And each one has to be judged on its own merits. If we cannot say, "One company, one terminus," in all cases, we can cast off useless ones, and see to it that those which remain are well placed, orderly, and spacious.

Granting that for London one vast central station is, in spite of its manifest advantages, an impossible ideal, let us make for a safe but boldly conceived middle course between that ideal and the present reality of useless subdivision, dire confusion, and purposeless waste.

LITERARY NOTES

ENOUGH volumes have been written about the Boy Scout and Cadet movements to fill a good-sized book-case, and never have the various duties of citizenship been put before the rising generation so insistently and at the same time so attractively. Messrs. Longmans, Green and Co. have just issued "A Primer of English Citizenship" (1s. 6d.), for use in schools, by Mr. Frederick Swann, B.A., B.Sc.(Lond.), a publication with which teachers and educational authorities would do well to make themselves acquainted. Citizenship, urges Mr. Swann, is not for a moment to be "confused or identified with the gospel of the drum and the trumpet, or with the glorification of one's flag and country. Rather is it a reasoned exposition—not too complicated for young minds to grasp—of the system of Government under which we live, and of those institutions which are part of our national life." The chapter headings give a rough idea of the scope of the little volume:—His Majesty the King, Parliament, The Town Council, County and Other Councils, Rates and Taxes, Courts and Judges, Soldiers and Sailors, Schools and Scholars, The State and the Child, Masters and Men, England and the Empire, The Complete Citizen. Lest the perfervid Scot take exception to the title, we hasten to add that, owing to differences in their legal, ecclesiastical, and educational systems, separate editions adapted to Scotland and to Ireland are under consideration.

On September 11th Messrs. T. C. and E. C. Jack will add a seventh dozen to their People's Books (6d.). The subjects covered are as varied as they are inviting. The new volumes will be:—"Biology," by Prof. W. D.

Henderson, M.A.; "Sir William Huggins and Spectroscopic Astronomy," by E. W. Maunder, F.R.A.S.; "Kant's Philosophy," by A. D. Lindsay, M.A.; "England in the Making" (before 1066), by Prof. F. J. C. Hearnshaw, M.A., LL.D.; "The Monarchy and the People," by W. T. Waugh, M.A.; "The Experimental Psychology of Beauty," by C. W. Valentine, B.A.; "Goethe," by Prof. C. H. Herford, Litt.D.; "Spiritualism," by J. Arthur Hill; "Kindergarten Teaching at Home," by Two Members of the National Froebel Union; "The Stock Exchange," by J. F. Wheeler; "Coleridge," by S. L. Bensusan; and "The Crusaders," by M. M. C. Calthrop.

Next week Mr. Heinemann will bring out an English translation (by Mr. Paul V. Cohn) of Gobineau's "The Renaissance"—a sequence of five dramas or "historical scenes," as their author called them. Nietzsche once said of Count Gobineau: "He is the only European spirit I should care to converse with." And this translation should help English readers to understand why the German philosopher thus distinguished the French writer from his contemporaries.

Among newly published and forthcoming novels which, by reason of their authorship or their subject, or both, are certain to create widespread interest may be mentioned Arnold Bennett's "The Regent" (published yesterday by Messrs. Methuen, 6s.), in which Machin, the "Card" of the Five Towns, reappears and runs a theatre in London; John Trevena's "No Place Like Home," a novel in satirical vein, which reveals the wretched housing conditions of labourers and touches on Home Rule—the publishers are Messrs. Constable; W. L. George's "The Making of an Englishman" (also by Constable; ready in January), in which a Frenchman keenly, but not unkindly, criticises English character and customs; and H. G. Wells's "The Passionate Friends" (Messrs. Macmillan; September 12th), in which Stephen Stratton relates his love affairs, in order that his son may not fall into the same errors.

At a time when Mexico is attracting world-wide attention by its diplomatic duel with the United States, more than ordinary interest attaches to the publication by Messrs. J. M. Dent and Sons (10s. 6d.) of "The Republics of Central and South America." The author, Mr. C. Reginald Enock, discusses the resources, industries, sociology, and future of the Latin American Republics in a remarkably compact and comprehensive volume of some 500 pages.

Messrs. Howard Latimer, Ltd., have published an authorised translation (by Ellie Schleussner) of August Strindberg's "The Red Room" (6s.), a collection of some thirty short stories, whose daring and fascination caused such a stir in Sweden when they first came out.

"God's Future" is the striking title of a book on the "religious relation of Man to the Universe," by G. H. Harrop (published by Arthur H. Stockwell).

Several correspondents have written to point out that the last two lines of Shelley's "Love's Philosophy," reproduced in EVERYMAN of August 15th, (p. 561), should have read—

"What are all these kissings worth,
If thou kiss not me?"

HENRY JAMES * * * BY J. STEPHEN

A CERTAIN Mr. Jones, army tailor and art collector—to whom, by the way, we owe the Jones Collection in the South Kensington Museum—was, in appearance, like to the victor of Waterloo. His dress, gesture, manner of wearing his hair, and so forth, were possibly not intended to diminish the effect of the natural likeness. Reported to the Duke of Wellington how often Mr. Jones was mistaken for his Grace, the reply came: "Odd thing is that nobody ever seems to take me for Mr. Jones."

Mr. Henry James is one to whom many writers may be likened. He is not in the least danger of being likened to any other writer.

To one who, not so very long ago, was accustomed to see Mr. James' name always with the "Jnr." after it, and to one who had even contracted the habit of speaking of "Henry James, Junior," it comes almost with a shock to recall that the young novelist of the seventies and earlier eighties has already spent his sabbatical years, and, for the matter of that, that Stevenson, Henry James' friend and great admirer, had, if still he were here, at all events well entered on his. But shock or no shock, it is so. Henry James was born in the earlier half of 1843, twin brother of William, whose "Psychology," "Will to Believe," and "Varieties of Religious Experience" were at one time, and may still be, as popular reading as ever were Henry's novels. They were the sons of a father who had genius of a kind that keeps his name alive. One of a well-known English family declared of his father that he was a "Transcendental Quaker, with leanings towards ritualism," and it has been said of Henry James, Senr., that his form of religion was "a sort of Ishmaelitic Swedenborgianism." If that help anyone better to understand the sons, or, for the matter of that, better to understand the father, the dictum will not have been set down in vain.

Henry James is, by birth at all events, an American, and for all the long years spent in England, and for all that he is so much an exile from his native land, and so much in a hundred ways a European, he is still an American in England, as Stevenson in Samoa was still a Scotchman.

It cannot precisely be said that Mr. Henry James was other than a well-known, and, indeed, very well known, novelist in the later seventies. In 1875 he had already secured success with "Roderick Hudson"; and "The Americans," "The Europeans," "Daisy Miller," "A Bundle of Letters," "Washington Square," and "The Portrait of a Lady" were all written, and even published, before the eighties of last century were fully entered upon—that is to say, all of them considerably more than thirty years ago. And yet it seems as though Mr. James obtained his recognition as a man of letters—which is something much more than recognition as a novelist—only about the year 1884. The manner of that recognition's obtainment was thus: Mr. (afterwards to be Sir) Walter Besant had been lecturing at the Royal Institution, with characteristic breeziness, on his trade of literature and on its rewards. Incidentally, too, he had spoken of what might be called the technique of the novelist, though he seemed to think that this was a good deal mixed up with questions of fiddlesticks. Mr. James, in an article on "The Art of Fiction," written for Longman's Magazine of 1884, referred to Mr. Besant's interesting pronouncements, and said that it had been made apparent that many persons were interested in the art of fiction, and not indifferent to such remarks as those who practise it might attempt to make. "I am therefore anxious," he said, "not to lose the benefit of this favourable association, and to edge in a few words under cover of the attention which Mr. Besant is sure to have excited."

Then, in an article, memorable for its own sake and memorable too because it produced "A Humble Remonstrance" from his friend Stevenson, Henry James set forth his beliefs about his art: his beliefs about his own art and the art of some of his brother craftsmen. One recollects, as though it were yesterday, some laughter that was as the crackling of thorns under a pot when Mr. James' statement about the novels of Dickens and Thackeray was quoted, or more likely misquoted. Here is the passage, "Only a short time ago it might have been supposed that the English novel was not what the French call discutable. It had no air of having a theory, a conviction, a consciousness of itself behind it—of being the expression of an artistic faith, the result of choice and comparison. I do not say it was necessarily the worse for that; it would take much more courage than I possess to intimate that the form of the novel, as Dickens and Thackeray (for instance) saw it, had any taint of incompleteness. It was, however, naïf (if I may help myself out with another French word); and evidently, if it is destined to suffer in any way for having lost its naïveté, it has now an idea of making sure of the corresponding advantages. During the period I have alluded to there was a comfortable, good-humoured feeling abroad that a novel is a novel, as a pudding is a pudding, and this was the end of it. But within a year or two, for some reason or other, there have been signs of returning animation—the era of discussion would appear to have been to a certain extent opened. Art lives upon discussion, upon experiment, upon curiosity, upon variety of attempt, upon the exchange of views and the comparison of standpoints; and there is a presumption that those times, when no one has anything particular to say about it, and has no reason to give for practice or preference, though they may be times of genius, are not times of development—are times, possibly even, a little, of dulness. The successful application of any art is a delightful spectacle, but the theory, too, is interesting; and though there is a great deal of the latter without the former, I suspect there has never been a genuine success without a core of conviction. Discussion, suggestion, formulation, these things are fertilizing when they are sincere."

Then Mr. James went on to say the thought that was in him: went on to liberate his soul. And from that day he has stood supreme as the exponent of the whole science of novel-writing, and very high as the exponent of the whole art. "I cannot," Mr. James said, "imagine composition existing in a series of blocks, nor conceive, in any novel worth discussing at all, of a passage of description that is not in its intention narrative, a passage of dialogue that is not in its intention descriptive, a touch of truth of any sort that does not partake of the nature of incident, and an incident that derives its interest from any other source than the general and only source of the success of a work of art—that of being illustrative. A novel is a living thing, all one and continuous, like every other organism; and in proportion as it lives will it be found, I think, that in each of the parts will be some of the other parts." Thus Henry James has thought, thus he has taught, and thus he has wrought.

MASTERPIECE FOR THE WEEK

MALORY'S "MORTE D'ARTHUR" * * * BY VIDA D. SCUDDER

I.

THIS "noble and joyous book" has a curious history. Finished in 1469 by an old knight who had fought in the French wars under that mirror of chivalry, the Earl of Warwick, it was printed by Caxton in 1485—the new art which was to help destroy the Middle Ages thus preserving for the future the record of their best delights. The book proved popular, but, after the last black-letter edition, in 1634, it dropped from sight and thought for nearly two centuries. Then reprints began, and slowly it made its way back into the general heart. Its best lovers at first took an apologetic tone: Sir Edward Strachey, in his preface to the Globe edition, said that few people could be expected to read it except boys. Tennyson handled its material with a cavalier freedom on which he would hardly venture to-day. The Pre-Raphaelites loved it and drew from its deep fountains, but it remained through the last century a book for the very few.

To-day interest in the rich treasures of mediæval literature, stimulated by excellent reprints and translations, is everywhere rising. We are learning to value the mystical writings of the ages of faith; to enjoy poets long forgotten, like Chrétien de Troyes and Wolfram von Eschenbach. And a considerable part of the English world, as more than one popular edition attests, is coming to love its Malory.

II.

Malory is in one way not original. In his day the older a story was known to be, the better it was liked, and there is a sense in which all the Middle Ages wrote this book. His material had mostly been thrown into literary form three centuries before his time, and the sources of it were more remote still. Nor does he always choose the best from these sources. Much that is charming in Arthurian romance he omits. He uses an inferior version of the Beguiling of Merlin, he degrades the Tristram story, and he fails to give any of those pleasant tales concerning the "enfances" of his heroes which prove the folly of saying that modern literature discovered childhood.

But Malory's glory is that he reduced by nine-tenths a chaotic mass of romances, and shaped it into one organic and unified work of art, noble in balance and proportion.

It may seem strange so to describe him. The impression this book makes on a casual reader is that of a wilderness full of agreeable trails leading nowhere in particular. But this is where the casual reader makes a mistake. He is misled by the enormous scale of the work, which causes him to lose himself in detail. Malory, either with unconscious instinct or conscious art, so selected and arranged his material as to give a centralised action, in which few episodes could be omitted without loss. The story he tells of the establishment of that fraternal symbol, the Table Round, of its central glories, of its tragic disruption, is possibly the nearest approach to an epic that England possesses; it is the tale in miniature of the rise and downfall of a civilisation; it presents with unmatched vividness the interplay of the forces that created the chivalric ideal by their harmony, and destroyed it by their discord.

III.

This ideal centred in loyalty, which Professor Royce calls the mother of all virtues; and loyalty to the Middle Ages took three directions—political, personal, and religious. A knight was bound to be loyal to his overlord, his lady, and his God. Historically, if not logically, political loyalty came first—the binding force of feudalism, superbly shown in the Song of Roland, for instance, by the adoring devotion to Karl the Great. "L'Amour Courtois," loyalty to the Lady, entered later, from the South: it presents an odd blend of gay non-morality, illustrated, for example, in the little Lais of Marie de France, with such mysticism as transfigures the Divine Comedy. Loyalty to God or to the Church—the times did not discriminate—was always present, as a vast religious literature attests. But it had to enter the interior life of secular romance before it could produce the stories of the Holy Grail.

These fiery and vital loyalties were all essential to the perfect knight. When harmonised, they produced that fine "measure" which recalls the Hellenic attitude more than any other mediæval quality. But they harmonised seldom. Too often, they conflicted fiercely, each seeking to win control of the whole man. This conflict Malory depicts with epic sweep and dramatic fervour. It is the secret of his tragedy.

IV.

As prelude, he has to show the establishment of the chivalric ideal and its victory over external foes. This occupies seven books. He gets his characters in position—Arthur, Gawain, Lancelot, Guinevere. Romans and Saxons are subdued. Arthur founds the Round Table, and binds his knights at the solemn Feast of the Spirit by the great oath which they are to renew every year. Before this oath is taken Malory vividly suggests the disorder of a realm where no codes or standards of honour exist, by the dismal story of Balin; later, when chivalry is well established, the charming tale of Gareth gives us our starting-point—an unshadowed picture of knighthood in its gay early prime, unrent as yet by earthly passion or by spiritual anguish.

He then proceeds to present his three great types of loyalty, through the successive Pageants, as we may call them, of three figures: Tristram, Galahad, Gawain. Lancelot, to be sure, is the protagonist, but Lancelot, albeit his central position is clearly defined from the outset, is kept with subtle art in the background, while first Tristram and then Galahad fill the stage.

V.

Books VIII. to XI. are chiefly concerned with the prince of lovers and his lady, fair Iseult. Many another lover also wanders through these pages: Sir Lamorak, sighing after Queen Margawse; Alisander le Orphelin, wooing, according to strict mediæval propriety, Alice la Beale Pilgrim; and the entertaining, spirited Paynim knight, Palomides, who, in his hopeless passion for Iseult, illustrates the finest points of the courtly code. And always in the background, Lancelot and Guinevere, their relation touched by hints now sympathetic, now sinister.

But the time comes when we cannot stand any more love-making, however lavishly mingled with good tournaments. Restiveness invades the court. We crave we know not what; it is time for Galahad and the Grail. In sudden reaction from earthly and sensuous passion, we follow through the ensuing books, XI.-XVII., the quest for a light behind the fleshly veil. It is an astounding transition; but the Middle Ages were familiar with just these extremes, these violent contrasts. How charged with sacramental mystery is the rarefied air, how full of strange and haunting imagery are the pages in which we pursue, "o'er moor and fen, o'er crag and torrent," the rosy, ever-vanishing star which is the armour of Galahad! With him, we begin "to tremble right sore when the deadly flesh perceives the spiritual things." The quest leads far from earthly life, far from the court of Arthur, into complete subjection to that ascetic and contemplative ideal which forever lured the Middle Ages away from human passion.

VI.

But the reaction, in romance as in real life, is too absolute, too abrupt. The knights return; and we have to learn how Lancelot—who in the Grail books has developed from a conventional figure into a living man—"fell to his old love again." Revenge and lust now ravage the realm. In these last books, the great tragic books, XVIII.-XXI., Gawain emerges into a new importance, as the chief instrument of the tragedy. He is in origin the oldest of the knights, and his Paganism clings to him. Malory allows him no lady-love, and when he enters the Grail quest he is sadly bored. Tenacious devotion to king and kindred is his one star; and against Lancelot, unwitting murderer of his brothers Gareth and Gaheris and betrayer of his king, he swears implacable vengeance. Holding his reluctant uncle Arthur to that pre-Christian code which identified honour with retaliation—a code fought by chivalry in vain—he forces the disastrous war with Lancelot which opens the way for the treason of Modred (in whom no loyalty of any kind is to be found), and so far the catastrophe.

VII.

Thus has loyalty destroyed loyalty; thus is the fair Order of Knighthood overthrown through the inward clash of the very life-giving powers that had created it. The tragic evolution of these last books is superb; yet they need behind them the full picture of the rise of chivalry and of its ruling passions presented by the earlier. For after the joyous externality of Book VII. we become gradually aware of deep inward moral confusion. We can hardly blame Tristram for his disloyalty to the contemptible Mark, and love, to the mediæval mind, is its own excuse for being; yet the tone of these books is low, and we feel that something is wrong. Our hearts follow Galahad; yet we realise that his type of religion avails curiously little in a world full of evil customs. Gawain is an interesting figure, and in some ways a fine one; yet his intent, so fiercely centred on avenging the wrongs of his king and his tribe, is the final cause of disaster. Lancelot, the greatest character-study in mediæval prose, is alone open on all three sides of his nature: Arthur's "best knight," lover of Guinevere, precluded by that love only from passing all except his son in the quest of holiness. But, alas! his heart is the real battle-ground of these fighting loyalties. "His honour rooted in dishonour stood, And faith unfaithful kept him falsely true." Broken in the contest, there is nothing left him except to "dry and dwine away," a remorseful hermit in a devastated realm.

VIII.

The imagination has pictured few catastrophes more absolute and drear. Yet through the pitiful story shines an ever-brightening light. Reading Malory with open vision, we gaze down receding vistas of civilisation. Many traces can be found in him of pre-Christian barbarism. Hints abound of the primitive, blood-thirsty manners of the early Middle Ages. Reckless non-morality is common enough to justify certain harsh lines of Tennyson. None the less, there gradually emerges, through the controlling influence of the vow of knighthood, a lofty standard of merciful and courteous conduct, a delicate ideal of sentiment, and a fine sense of moral and spiritual values. We rise from level to level; through this one book, more perhaps than through any other English book, we are privileged "To see the race fulfil

The spiral of its steep ascent, predestined of the Will."

IX.

And how wonderfully it is all told! With what wealth of delightful detail, what quaint charm of style, what phrases that through mere cadence "startle and waylay"! "Ye shall not find this day nor night, but to-morn ye shall find harbour good, and ease of that ye be in doubt of." Malory's external pictures are less bright than those in earlier romances; yet the brave mediæval world that he depicts is still full of enchantments, from the magic of Merlin and Morgan to the pure mysticism of the quest. The informing soul of romantic art, the spirit of adventure rules these pages. Now seeking rare possibilities of excitement and stir within the natural order, now pressing far beyond barriers of flesh and sense, it moves to all seeming at its own sweet will in wildest liberty. Yet through its wandering impulses, the great tragic action, illuminating in its development the fundamental life of the Middle Ages, advances steadily to its goal, obedient to that inexorable law which preserves the stars from wrong and imparts august reality to all deep books of the world.

"I HAVE, after the simple conning that God hath sent to me, emprinted to imprint a book of the noble histories of King Arthur, and of certain of his knights, after a copy unto me delivered, which copy Sir Thomas Malory did take out of certain books of French, and reduced it into English. And I, according to my copy, have done set it in imprint to the intent that noble men may see and learn the noble acts of chivalry, the gentle and virtuous deeds that some knights used in those days, by which they came to honour; and how they that were vicious were punished and oft put to shame and rebuke; humbly beseeching all noble lords and ladies, with all other estates, of what estate or degree they be of, that shall see and read in this said book and work, that they take the good and honest acts in their remembrance, and to follow the same. Wherein they shall find many joyous and pleasant histories, and noble and renowned acts of humanity, gentleness and chivalries. For herein may be seen noble chivalry, courtesy, humanity, friendliness, hardiness, love, friendship, cowardice, murder, hate, virtue, and sin."—Caxton's Preface to "Le Morte d'Arthur."

THE TRAGEDY OF THE PLIMSOLL LINE

BY OUR SPECIAL COMMISSIONER

IV.

IT used to be said about the Bourbons that they learnt nothing and forgot nothing! Experience, which, as somebody remarked, is a matter of capacity, not of dates, did not exist for them. There was nothing new to be learnt in the whole world. Hence they continued stereotyping their old blunders, until the conscience of mankind destroyed them.

This inability to reason from facts is not, alas, confined to royal houses. In our own day it has become characteristic of Government departments. None have shown it with more distressing clearness than the Board of Trade in this matter, this tragic matter, of the Plimsoll Load Line. The abandonment of the line has meant, as we have seen, the death of thousands of poor seamen, "the sacrifice," to quote Mr. Lewis, the Cardiff stipendiary, "of lives to cargo." That is a dreadful, a haunting fact.

But "Worse Remains Behind."

It is shocking to think of sailors being drowned like rats merely to save trouble for dilatory officials, or to bring more grist to the mills of greedy profiteers; dreadful to reflect that the lives of brave men are thrown away, merely because the heads of departments at Whitehall will not go into facts for themselves, and yield to the insistent pressure of influential ship-owners. That, I say, is reproach enough. But, bad as it is, one might feel almost reconciled to the loss of these men if one could feel that their sacrifice had not been in vain; that their tragic fate had at least the merit of ensuring their fellows reasonable safety at sea; that the department which had authorised the destruction of Plimsoll's life work had seen the error of its ways, and had taken to heart the fearful lesson that their fate made plain.

Alas! that is not the case. "As it was in the beginning, so it is now." The Board of Trade in this matter, and the complacent officials, unmoved by the disasters that have followed their mistakes, are hard at it repeating them!

Are Blind to all Experience

Let me explain. When, after 1906, the appalling increase in the deaths of sailors at sea first became evident, Mr. Buxton's department refused all information. It was too costly a matter, questioners in the Commons were told, to find out how many seamen had perished after the new rules as to freeboard had been adopted. Then, as disaster followed disaster, and wreck succeeded wreck, the complacency of the department became a little less unruffled. Some inquiry did seem necessary, they admitted. Investigation was really desirable. There followed Mr. Wilkie's return, with its dreadful record of shipwrecked vessels and drowned seamen. The demand for inquiry became insistent. Even the dry bones of the Board of Trade were stirred. Mr. Buxton was impelled to action. He appointed a committee to inquire and report.

Now it is of the most supreme importance that the public should grasp firmly the fact that the Committee so appointed is for all practical intents and purposes valueless; it is indeed a hindrance, not a help, for it perpetuates all the worst defects of the Committee who inspired

The Undoing of Samuel Plimsoll's Life Work

For, as my readers will readily remember, when the Committee appointed by Mr. Joseph Chamberlain reported, after two years' anxious consideration of the facts, they made at least one very striking recommendation. They said that whoever else fixed for the future the depth of the freeboard—i.e., whoever decided where the load line was to be drawn—the judges must not be they must be representative of the various interests involved, the owners, the underwriters, the ship-builders, and last, but not least—the seamen!

It was exactly that representative character which the Committee appointed in 1905—the Committee which did all the mischief—so obviously lacked. It is exactly that absence of representative status which the Committee of Inquiry recently appointed by Mr. Sydney Buxton perpetuates. The 1905 Committee failed because, in defiance of their predecessor's findings, they were not, they could not pretend to be a representative body. The Committee of 1913 must suffer from the same handicap. If Mr. Chamberlain's Commissioners were right in 1885, then the Committee ought to have representatives of the seamen upon it. The Committee of 1905 blundered egregiously because of the absence of the seamen's representatives. The latest Committee will suffer from the same defect.

The Case for the Seaman will not be put in the course of its deliberations. The arguments of the man before the mast will not be heard. The arguments that passed muster in 1905 will go unchallenged before this new tribunal, who will enact the part of Satan approving sin.

"Ah, but," it is said, "if the seamen are not to be represented on the Committee, they can at least give evidence before it. There is nothing to close their mouths. All that they want to say before the Committee they can say fairly, freely and frankly, and the members can listen and take heed."

Thus says Mr. Buxton. But he forgets one fact.

The Committee is a Secret Committee, its meetings will not be open to the Press, and, rightly or wrongly, the seamen will not give evidence before it.

They assert—with what truth I do not know—that they would be marked men if they did; that the more important their evidence was, the worse it would be for them. It would be heard in secret, and would excite no public backing. But the shipowners would hear, and—they would suffer.

In 1906 the Manning of Merchant Ships Committee—another child of the Board of Trade—complained of some cardinal omission. They said they had been called on to play Hamlet without the Prince of Denmark. No seaman, they said, could be got to give evidence before them, because no seaman who had anything worth saying felt safe in his job afterwards. And the Committee was stultified.

But the Board of Trade, like the Bourbons, repeats its mistakes. No seaman will serve on this new Committee, and its conclusions will be as valueless as the Committees of 1905 and 1906.

If the inquiry is to be effective, let it be public, and let a seaman sit upon it!

But a secret committee that listens only to the owners' case, what chance is there that it will undo the work—the dreadful work—of its predecessors of 1905?

Alas! the chance is small. The 3,000 seamen drowned last year in the ocean will find no champion at the board table of the inquiry. Their case will not be heard. They are dead, and dead men tell no tales!

“EVERYMAN” INTERVIEWS

LORD ROBERT CECIL ON THE DECAY OF PARLIAMENT

“THE House of Commons is losing, and rapidly, its self-respect. Something like creeping paralysis has set in at St. Stephen’s, and a sense of the decadence of Parliament oppresses almost everyone taking part in its proceedings.”

The speaker was Lord Robert Cecil, whose views on a subject that he has largely made his own I had been commissioned to obtain for the readers of EVERYMAN. Admittedly, Lord Robert is one of the most striking discoveries of this Parliament, and his speech on the amendment to the Address, dealing with this very question, profoundly impressed members, so that I was not altogether surprised at the vigour and directness with which this uncompromising Conservative—himself a keen constitutional lawyer and the last of a long line of distinguished Parliamentarians—assailed this ancient estate of the realm.

Lord Robert continued, “I am not talking now as a party man. This question of the impotence of Parliament cuts across all parties, and is sincerely regretted by many members on the Government side of the House. But, until certain fundamental reforms are carried out, they are as powerless as we are to change things. Let me give you a case in point, one that shows how seriously Parliament has deteriorated. In the old days, as is well known, the speeches of members produced direct results on the division. Wilberforce, for instance, changed some forty votes by his speech on the motion to impeach Melville. Later on, if we take the records of the Parliaments from 1875 to 1885, we find that the Government was defeated on an average some three or four times in a Session. Now, of course, a defeat never happens. It is not allowed to; the whips see to that. Of course, a snap division may go against the Government, but that is only a nine days’ wonder, and the Government soon reverses the decision. The truth is that a debate in the House of Commons has become the merest sham. The object of all discussions, of course, is to convince, and, while there was a possibility of this happening, a speech in the House meant something. Now it is not even listened to. Go into the Commons, and what do you find? Empty benches, with a few weary legislators scattered about in various attitudes of indifference and dejection. Presently the rest of the members will come in to vote—without having heard a word of the debate! All decisions on Government measures, in fact, are of the Cabinet, not of the House, which has ceased on such questions to be a deliberative assembly at all.”

“How does this state of things affect the members themselves?”

“They are getting very tired of it. And necessarily so. Can you imagine a contrast more ludicrous than that between the forms of the House and the actual facts as members know them? Members stand up and solemnly address and reason with each other, appealing for impartial consideration, for a vote on the merits of the question. Of course, they know that all that is on Government Bills an empty form! They nearly always know, almost exactly beforehand, what the division list will show, for they are perfectly well aware that the members they are appealing to will vote as they are directed by the party whips. Our debates have, in fact, lost all reality and sincerity, and we should vote just as well if we divided without going through the formality of discussion at all.”

“And you think that this is killing popular interest in Parliament?”

“Beyond doubt. It is a very remarkable fact that, with the disappearance of the private member as a force, especially since the guillotine and the kangaroo closure have reduced the proceedings in the House to a farce, less and less space is given in the popular Press to Parliamentary proceedings. Speeches of prominent men are more widely reported outside than inside the House. The platform is becoming more important than Parliament. The common attitude of the man in the street is infinitely less respectful than thirty or forty years ago. The unreality of the whole thing is becoming apparent to everybody. People are getting sick of the sham of it all, and are following our proceedings with less and less interest.”

“One may see the effects of this change of attitude in the extraordinary and quite spontaneous rise of Syndicalism in this country?”

“No doubt. And it will have even more serious and depressing consequences unless certain structural alterations are effected in the Constitution, with a view to restoring to Parliament something of its old authority which the Cabinet has usurped. The fact is that Parliament no longer represents the people. Apart altogether from the impotence of the individual member, we have to remember that opinion outside the House changes, and often rapidly, while inside St. Stephen’s it is fixed and stationary. Often the strength of parties in the House of Commons differs absolutely from the balance of opinion in the country, which may have shifted its ground since the election, or may be against some unauthorised addition that the Government have chosen to make to the programme on which they were elected. What is the result? Merely this: members are utterly out of touch with the opinion of the country, which they are supposed to represent, and are, of course, inclined more and more to rely on the party whips, on the strength and resources of the caucus; in a word, on the machine rather than on their own constituents. Now, the first step in any scheme of reform designed to save Parliament from the insidious decay that is now eating out its vitals is to restore that direct relationship between the members of the House and their constituents that ought never to have been lost.”

“And how can that be done?”

“Only by the referendum. If the House is really to represent the electorate there must be the power of referring its decisions to the electorate itself. It is futile to say that the referendum would destroy the responsibility of members of Parliament. On the contrary, it would restore it, for, if each member knew he would have to defend his vote on a great question before his constituents, he would take care that the vote would be defensible. He would not, in a word, vote under the crack of the party whip, thinking only of the convenience of the Cabinet, for he would know that, behind the Cabinet and the caucus and the rest of it, there would be the possibility of that final appeal to Cæsar. Of course, the appeal would be made but rarely, but its very possibility would make Ministers amenable to reason. Legislation would have to be watertight and defensible, not devised to suit some particular section of a chance majority, but so as to secure the approval of the whole people of the country. It would be more cautious and more conciliatory, and, above all, it would contain only such provisions as were really acceptable to the common sense of members of Parliament. This would go far to restore to the House its old reality of discussion. Obviously, if a Ministry knew that there might be a referendum on their Bill, with a possibly adverse result, they would take very good care to see that it was thoroughly discussed, and that all reasonable objections to it were met and answered, and the whole tendency would be, instead of burking discussion, to encourage it."

"That is not the only alteration that you would favour?"

"By no means, though it is very important. Another very serious step that requires to be taken at once is to enlarge the scope and character of Grand Committees. I believe that all Bills should be discussed in Grand Committee, since a defeat there cannot involve the existence of the Government, who, if they find their proposals rejected, cannot pretend that they have lost the confidence of the House. Accordingly, members have some chance of really voting on the merits of the question, and speeches may thus prove of value. Again, the actual procedure in a Grand Committee—which precludes the employment of Government whips and the physical division into two bodies in the lobbies—adds to the freedom from party pressure. Finally, and most important, by the procedure of the Grand Committee, only those members who have heard the discussion actually vote, and so we are spared the spectacle of members trooping in who know nothing about the debate to vote "Aye" or "No," according as they are directed. I hold, therefore, that, at a fixed period, say two months after the commencement of a Session, the House should not sit, as a House, on Tuesdays and Wednesdays after questions. Members would be allotted to six Grand Committees, not less than eighty each, to which all Bills of every kind would be referred so soon as they had got through their second reading. Of course, in the case of very long Bills, like the Finance Act of 1909 or the Insurance Act of 1911, it would be necessary to divide them into two or more measures, each of which would go to a separate Grand Committee, which would have the power to retain, by special resolution, either the whole or any part of the Bill. The report stage, of course, would be retained in order to give Ministers a final control over the essential parts of the Bill, and for this stage there would, as a rule, be a special allocation of time.

"This reform would reintroduce into Committee that discussion of details which is so important a part of the work of Parliament, while, as I have explained, so far as second and third reading debates are concerned, members would have to think and to remember the great masses of the people outside the House who might be polled on the measure if it were inadequately discussed."

C. SHERIDAN JONES.

AN OUTCAST

SHE glided noiselessly past my table in the little café, and dropped with a low sigh of weariness into a chair in the corner where the gnarled boughs of an old chestnut tree swept down almost to the ground. The sound of her own sigh seemed to startle her, and she looked up apprehensively, as if ashamed of having so far betrayed her feelings. With uncertain, jerky movements she took off her gloves and laid them on her lap. Then she played nervously with the strap of her handbag till the waiter came to take her order. Her voice was husky and almost inaudible, and she did not venture for a while to raise her eyes. Every gesture, every line of her body, betrayed that painful uneasiness in the presence of their fellows which afflicts those who always live alone.

Insignificant was the only word which would describe her long, thin face. It did not possess one distinctive feature, ugly or beautiful. The grinding forces of life had succeeded in effacing all trace of individuality, if she had ever had any. Her skin, in colour and texture, reminded one of a withered white rose, and the fine lines with which it was seamed deepened round the eyes and accentuated the weak droop of the mouth. Her eyebrows were high-arched, not proudly, but questioningly, sadly, as if she halted in pained surprise before the riddle of her life, and the deep-drawn lines that crossed her brow just under the temples emphasised the puzzled helplessness of her expression. Of her eyes I caught only fleeting glimpses. They were watery grey, dull and expressionless, but not unkindly.

I fell to wondering what lay behind that drab mask. It did not bear the stamp of any great sorrow, of one of those cataclysms which either crush a life completely or bring to light its hidden, unsuspected reserves of power. She could never have known that content which crowns the life in which pleasures and pains, ecstasies and tears, blend in one vibrant whole. She had held out her hands for the gifts of Life, and Life had passed her by unheeding, and she lived on between the grey waste of the past and the grey mist of the future, apathetic, resigned, save for that vague suggestion of a question in the lifting of her brows. . . . At least, so I thought.

The café had gradually become more animated while I sat watching her. As she sipped her coffee she looked shyly round the tables from time to time, but without betraying a gleam of interest. Her first agitation over, she seemed totally indifferent to her surroundings. For one second, however, I noticed her eyes kindle as she glanced rapidly at something or someone behind me. She quickly dropped them, as though conscious of a fault, but her eyelids fluttered restlessly, and she looked once more in the same direction, as if drawn by some attraction stronger than her will. With an effort she turned away again, but her gaze moved back and remained:

At the table next to mine sat a couple, apparently bride and bridegroom. They were not handsome or interesting beyond the ordinary run of mortals, but they fairly glowed with life and joy. I could only see the young wife's profile. She was a slightly built little thing, with a trick of casting appealing, roguish glances at her husband, who gazed down on her with a mingling of passion and reverence that lent a real nobility to his honest, good-natured face.

And there she lingered on the fringe of that happiness, watching, watching, till from the dark corner where it slept her shrivelled, hungry soul crept into her eyes, and she, too, forgot all but the man and woman before her. A tremulous, tender smile played about her lips, slightly parted by her quickened breathing, and as the minutes slipped by the ghosts of her dead hopes rose again and passed before her—visions of a full life, of love, of a home that might have been hers, of children's clinging hands. So she dreamed, and the lines of her tired face seemed to smooth themselves away, and in her eyes there kindled a faint glow of youth.

Chairs clattered. The young people rose and tripped away, the little wife clinging close to her husband's arm. The hungry eyes followed them to the last, and then the veil descended once more as she mechanically lifted her glass to her lips, which vainly sought to master their trembling. R. FRASER.

"The right eloquence needs no bell to call the people together, and no constable to keep them. It draws the children from their play, the old from their armchairs, the invalid from his warm chamber; it holds the hearer and steals away his feet that he may not depart."

What Emerson said of eloquence, men to-day say of the writings of Dr. John Lord. What Sir Walter Scott, in his inimitable novels, did for the history of his native land, Dr. Lord, in BEACON LIGHTS OF HISTORY, has done for the old world's story. He has infused it with life, and has re-told it with the eloquence which "holds the hearer, and steals away his feet that he may not depart."

The Story of Civilisation

"Beacon Lights of History" is the story of civilisation. The story has been told over and over again, but never before in such a captivating manner. As one purchaser has said: "It will keep girls and boys by your fireside, and if more such reading matter was spread broadcast in our land, the problem of bringing up boys and girls to be useful men and women would be solved." Dr. Lord did more than satisfy the young. He satisfied the critics and students of history. His work reads like a romance, but it is a romance of fact and not of fiction, and so he appeals alike to the learned and the unlettered, the old and the young. The author of "Beacon Lights" has departed entirely from the stereotyped ways of presenting history. Where former historians gave us the History of Rome with Cæsar in it, he gives us Cæsar with Rome around him, and so we have a living, thrilling narrative, instead of a dry, unattractive record. As Sir James Yoxall says in his Introduction to the first English edition: "He was no charlatan of the footlights; his reading was eclectic as well as wide, and he showed the artist's conscience which cannot satisfy itself with scamped work. His biographic method resulted in history so humanised that ordinary human beings can feed upon it with delight."

What it means to you

You cannot afford to regard this great work with indifference.

MR. HÖLBROOK JACKSON, reviewing the work, says: "Whilst you pass easily from page to page, maybe with nothing more than a feeling of intense interest as though you were reading a novel, you are all the time absorbing historic knowledge. You are gaining a valuable store of information about the achievements of mankind . . . which will ever be a source of strength to you in the formation of your own personal judgment of the events of to-day."

"It will ever be a source of strength to you."

That is why "Beacon Lights of History" has a special claim upon you. Strength of mind and clearness of judgment are essential to success. Why, then, neglect the means for perfecting them?

EVERYMAN'S FRENCH PAGE

LE MEURTRE DE THOMAS BEKET

LE roi fut saisi d'un de ces accès de colère violente auxquels il était sujet ; "Quoi!" s'écria-t'il, "un homme qui a mangé mon pain, un homme qui est venu à ma cour sur un cheval boiteux. Il insulte son roi, la famille royale et tout le royaume, et pas un de ces lâches serviteurs, que je nourris à ma table, n'ira me venger de celui qui me fait un pareil affront!" Ces paroles ne sortirent point en vain de la bouche du roi, et quatre chevaliers du palais, qui les entendirent, se conjurant ensemble à la vie et à la mort, partirent subitement pour l'Angleterre le jour de Noël.

Thomas Beket salua les Normands à leur entrée, et demanda le sujet de leur visite. Ceux-ci ne lui firent aucune réponse intelligible, s'assirent, et le regardèrent fixement pendant quelques minutes. Renault, fils d'Ours, prit ensuite la parole. "Nous venons," dit-il, "de la part du roi, pour que les excommuniés soient absous, que les évêques suspendus soient rétablis, et que vous-même rendiez raison de vos desseins contre le roi." "Ce n'est pas moi," répondit Thomas, "c'est le souverain pontife qui a excommunié l'archevêque d'York, et qui seul, par conséquent, a droit de l'absoudre. Quant aux autres, je les rétablirai, s'ils veulent me faire leur soumission." "Mais de qui donc," demanda Renault, "tenez-vous votre archevêché? est-ce du roi ou du pape?" "J'en tiens les droits spirituels de Dieu et du pape, et les droits temporels du roi." "Quoi! ce n'est pas le roi qui vous a tout donné?" "Nullement," répondit Beket. "Vous me menacez, à ce que je crois," dit le primat: "mais c'est inutilement; quand toutes les épées de l'Angleterre seraient tirées contre ma tête, vous ne gagneriez rien sur moi." "Aussi ferons-nous mieux que menacer," répliqua le fils d'Ours, se levant tout à coup; et les autres le suivirent vers la porte, en criant aux armes!

Les gens de la maison supplièrent le primat de se réfugier dans l'église. "Puisque c'est l'heure de mon devoir, j'irai à l'église," dit l'archevêque.

Pendant ce temps les hommes armés s'avançaient; une voix cria: "Où est le traître?" Personne ne répondit—"Où est l'archevêque?" "Le voici," répondit Beket, "mais il n'y a pas de traître ici; que venez-vous faire dans la maison de Dieu avec un pareil vêtement? quel est votre dessein?" "Que tu meures." "Je m'y résigne; vous ne me verrez point fuir devant vos épées; mais au nom de Dieu tout-puissant, je vous défends de toucher à aucun de mes compagnons, clerc ou laïque, grand ou petit." Les hommes d'armes entreprirent de le tirer hors de l'église, se faisant scrupule de l'y tuer. Il se débattit contre eux, et déclara fermement qu'il ne sortirait point et les contraindrait à exécuter sur la place leurs intentions ou leurs ordres.

Guillaume de Traci leva son épée pour frapper l'archevêque à la tête; mais le fidèle et courageux Saxon, le porte-croix, Edward Gryn, étendit aussitôt son bras droit afin de parer le coup; il eut le bras coupé, et Thomas ne reçut qu'une légère blessure. Un second coup renversa l'archevêque la face contre terre; un troisième coup lui fendit le crâne, et il fut asséné avec une telle violence que l'épée se brisa sur le pavé. Un homme d'armes appelé Guillaume Maltret poussa du pied le cadavre immobile, en disant: "Qu'ainsi meure le traître qui a troublé le royaume et fait insurger les Anglais." AUGUSTIN THIERRY.

THE MURDER OF THOMAS BECKET

THE king was seized with one of those fits of frantic rage to which he was subject. "What!" exclaimed he, "a man who has eaten my bread—a beggar who came to my court on a limping pack-horse—shall trample upon his king, upon the royal race, upon the whole kingdom—and not one of those cowards whom I feed at my table will rise up and deliver me from one who insults me!" These words did not fall from the king's lips in vain. Four men-at-arms of the palace heard and were struck by them. They conspired together by oath in life and death, and suddenly departed for England on Christmas Day.

Thomas Becket saluted the Normans at their entrance, and asked the purport of their visit. They made him no intelligible answer, but sat down and fixed their eyes upon him for some minutes. At length Renault, son of Ours, broke silence. "We come," said he, "from the king—that the excommunicated may be absolved, that the suspended bishops may be restored, and that you yourself may give an account of your designs against the king." "It was not I," answered Thomas, "but the sovereign pontiff himself, who excommunicated the Archbishop of York—and who, consequently, has alone the right of absolving him; as for the others, I will restore them if they will make their submission to me." "From whom, then, do you hold your archbishopric?" asked Renault; "from the king or from the pope?" "Its spiritual rights I hold from God and the pope, and its temporal from the king." "What! Then the king alone did not give you all?" "By no means," answered Becket. "You threaten me, I believe," said the archbishop, "but it is useless; were all the swords of England drawn against me you would get nothing from me." "And we will do more than threaten," returned the son of Ours, suddenly rising; the others followed him to the door, crying, "To arms!"

The people of the household entreated the primate to take refuge in the church. "Since it is the hour of my duty, I will go to the church," said the archbishop.

Meanwhile the armed men were advancing, and a voice cried out, "Where is the traitor?" Becket made no answer. "Where is the archbishop?" "Here he is," answered Becket; "but there is no traitor here. What are you come to do in the house of God in such a dress? What is your design?" "That thou die." "I resign myself. You will not see me fly before the edge of your swords; but I forbid you, in the name of Almighty God, to touch any of those who are with me, clerk or layman, great or little." The men-at-arms were then proceeding to drag him out of the church, scrupling to kill him there; but he struggled against them resolutely, declaring that he would not quit the place, and should compel them to execute their intentions or their orders on the spot.

William de Tracy lifted his sword in order to strike the archbishop on the head, but the brave Saxon monk, Edward Gryn, had his arm, which he had interposed to parry the blow, cut off, while Becket only received a slight wound. A second blow brought him with his face to the ground; a third clove his skull, and was struck with such violence that the sword broke against the pavement. One man-at-arms, named William Maltret, pushed the lifeless body with his foot, saying, "So perish the traitor who makes insurgents of the English!" AUGUSTIN THIERRY.

WHERE GERMANY LEADS

UNIVERSITY EDUCATION * * * * * By G. WATERHOUSE

I.

So much has been written in recent years about Germany's superiority over England in almost every walk of life that there is some danger of the British public closing its eyes and ears in disgust, and refusing to learn at all. Yet those who know Germany well are satisfied that this superiority is an indisputable fact, and nowhere more so than in education. It may be unpleasant for a country to discover its inferiority to another in so vital a matter, but it would be rank folly not to remedy the defect, and the quickest and surest way of finding this remedy is to study the methods of the fortunate rival, and seek to improve on them. The proud position Germany occupies in commerce to-day is due principally to what she has learnt from England during the last fifty years (and, of course, to a sane policy of protection). Let us realise that it is now our turn to go a-borrowing.

II.

Germany's system of university education is, by reason of the number of her universities, the strength of their staffs and the quality of the instruction given, a model to the world. The University of Berlin is second only to that of Paris with regard to the number of students (10,000) in residence, and second to none with regard to the reputation of its staff. There are, for example, ten ordinary professors of Theology, including Harnack, Deissmann, and Weiss, besides twelve extraordinary professors and lecturers. And yet the theological faculty is the smallest of the four. The legal faculty boasts twenty-four ordinary and extraordinary professors and eight lecturers, the medical faculty seventy professors and one hundred and twenty-six lecturers, and the philosophical faculty one hundred and eighteen professors and one hundred and eighty-seven lecturers. What economist has not heard of Wagner and Schmoller? What student of modern languages can afford to be ignorant of Brandl, Morf, Ebeling, Erich Schmidt, and R. M. Meyer? Are not the names of Eduard Meyer and Brückner synonymous with Greek History and Slavonic Philology? Wilamovitz-Moellendorff says, . . . What other European university provides twelve courses of lectures on Chinese, six on Japanese, thirteen on Modern Arabic, and seven on Turkish, in addition to such trifles as English, French, Italian, Spanish, Russian, Swedish, Danish, Polish, Sanskrit, Hebrew, Syriac, Assyrian, Aramaic, Egyptian, Finnish, Tibetan, Amharic, Ethiopian, Persian, Swahili, Hindustani, Guzerati, Haussa, Modern Greek, etc.? And yet Germany possesses twenty other universities, and Berlin by no means claims all the great men. Leipzig, for instance, has such well-known names as Wundt, Lamprecht, Brugmann, Sievers, and Windisch, to mention only a few.

III.

The object of the present article, however, is principally to detail the more material advantages enjoyed by the German student. I wish only to remark in passing that if the time has come for the British Government—and most of us think it has—to pay more lively attention than hitherto to university education in this country, the first, the most easy and directly beneficial step would be the gradual establishment at all the British universities of well-paid professorships in all subjects.

As all German universities are State institutions they are managed on the same system, although those of one State sometimes differ from those of another in unimportant details. The academical year is divided into two Semesters, or half-years, the winter Semester lasting nominally from October 15th to March 15th, actually from the end of October to the end of February. Similarly, the summer Semester lasts nominally from April 15th to August 15th, actually from the end of April to the end of July. There is a break of about a fortnight at Christmas, and another of a week at Whitsuntide. There is no entrance examination, but a candidate for matriculation is required to furnish proof that his education has been of a sufficiently high standard to enable him to take the university courses. This usually means that he must have passed his Abitur, or school leaving examination. Foreign students must bring whatever certificates they happen to possess. The matriculation fee varies, from 13s. 9d. at Münster to 24s. at Erlangen, the usual amount, as at Berlin, being 18s. (cf. Cambridge £5 to £15 10s., Manchester £2). For a further compulsory payment of usually 1s. 6d. per half-year the student is entitled to medical advice from members of the staff, medicine and hospital treatment. Why is not this system in existence at all our British universities? Even if the payment were three times as high, the establishment of such a sick fund at Oxford or Cambridge, or even within a single college, would justify itself in one term. A payment of 15s., or less, per head per annum would easily cover the total amount of the bills received by undergraduates for medical attendance. For a further payment (optional) of four or five shillings a year the German student can use the University Reading-room, which, though on a much more modest scale than our Unions, is an eminently useful institution. The one at Berlin, for example, provides 250 newspapers, 200 magazines, and a library of 3,000 volumes. The Berlin student is, indeed, well supplied with libraries of all sorts. For half a crown per half-year he has the right to use the University Library (600,000 vols.) and the Royal Prussian Library (1,300,000 vols.), from both of which books may be borrowed in practically unlimited quantities. In addition, the German, French, English, and other institutes connected with the university each have their own departmental library. Professor Brandl's students, for example, have access to no less than 10,000 volumes on the language and literature of England, and the other modern language departments are equally well off. If we turn to another university, Leipzig, we find that the University Library (600,000 vols.) may be used for a payment of threepence per term, and similar conditions obtain elsewhere. The system of Seminars, or institutes with libraries devoted to a particular language or group of languages, is common to all German universities, and has been introduced with success at Cambridge by Professor Breul.

IV.

So much for the preliminary expenses. The charges for actual instruction will come as a shock to those familiar with the cost of education at Oxford and Cambridge. For a course of one hour per week for the Semester (about fifteen weeks) the usual fee is five shillings, for two hours a week ten shillings, and so on in proportion. The cost of two lectures a week for the whole year (about twenty-nine weeks) is therefore £1, whereas the Oxford or Cambridge student would pay for a similar course (twenty-two weeks, owing to the three-term system) £3 3s., in addition to the various tutorial and college education fees. Of course, the fees for medical and scientific courses, which require the use of costly apparatus, are higher.

Ridiculously small as the above charges may seem, the sum required by the German student for subsistence is relatively more so. The college system is, of course, unknown, and of supervision by the university authorities there is none. The students live either with their parents or in ordinary lodgings. The price of a room, including light breakfast and attendance, varies from seventeen to thirty-five shillings a month, the average price being about twenty-five shillings. Food is equally cheap. In towns like Berlin and Leipzig a five-course dinner usually costs a shilling, or one and threepence, including a pint of beer and the waiter's tip. Indeed, barely a stone's throw from the Royal Palace, Berlin, the present writer regularly received five courses for sevenpence, and in the automatic restaurants in Friedrichstrasse he has supped sumptuously on a hot cutlet, two vegetables, bread, and a glass of beer for the same price. In the smaller university towns, e.g., Göttingen, meals are not so cheap, five courses costing as much as eightpence. In Leipzig a similar dinner can be had for a shilling, as in Berlin, and those bachelor members of the English colony who assemble every day at noon in Zeitzerstrasse never cease wondering, as they feast on salmon and wild boar, how any sane person with even twenty-four hours' experience of a large German town could venture to spin yarns about black bread and horse-flesh. But that is another story.

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Owing to the large number of letters received it is necessary for correspondents to write briefly if their letters are to appear.

NEW ZEALAND AND DEFENCE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—The Hon. Thomas Mackenzie, High Commissioner for New Zealand, sent a letter which appeared in EVERYMAN on August 22nd. He complains that this country is being "flooded with literature headed 'Warnings to Emigrants.'" One regrets his indignant tone. He has failed to realise that there exists a preponderating opinion among workers at home against conscription or compulsory military training, which became law in 1909 in New Zealand, so far as little boys and youths in their teens are concerned. Emigrants have a right to this information, which until April of this year has not appeared in the Emigrants' Handbook. I agree with the High Commissioner, "it is well to make it quite clear that New Zealand has a Defence Scheme in operation," and I would go further, and let it be known what this scheme is, how it is being administered, and the rigorous penalties again and again inflicted on voteless boys. On these points the High Commissioner is discreetly and intentionally silent. "It is well to make it quite clear." Surely there is a little inconsistency in complaining if, as he says, these "'Warnings to Emigrants' are really rendering a most valuable service"? To write with contumely of those who resolutely refuse to be compelled to submit to military authority and control as "a few stormy petrels" is undignified, even if it were correct. It is not, however, with the High Commissioner's opinions that I am concerned, but his statements. (1)

That the scheme meets with the "almost unanimous" support of Parliament and the Press is not, to those who know New Zealand and something of its politics, very convincing. It does not follow that this Act has the approval of the electors. For instance, three times over since 1902 there have been large and increasing majorities in support of prohibition, but the legislators ignore the decision of the people. All New Zealand knows that just before the Ward Ministry's return, in 1908, Sir Joseph was approached on compulsory service, and emphatically declared that he had no intention of introducing it into New Zealand. His words were, "I am convinced that New Zealand will never submit to conscription"; and at Fielding, shortly before he left for the Imperial Conference, he said, "A system of compulsory training in arms would mean the creation of the nucleus of a system of militarism which the country ought not to tolerate." This is exactly what the parents and the boys are rebelling against. It is a significant fact, which the High Commissioner is well aware of, that after twenty-three years of a Labour Government, under Seddon and Ward, Sir Joseph, the author of this Act, was defeated in 1911, and that Mr. McNab, the chief advocate of conscription, lost his seat. The present Massey Ministry only exists on sufferance, and represents about one-third of the voters. It will be eighteen months yet before the electors will have an opportunity to show whether they are for or against this law. The Act was passed without any mandate from the people, who are just finding out what it means. The High Commissioner knows that his statement that "it has been before the people at three elections" creates an utterly erroneous impression. His next point (2), the coming war—the proximity of New Zealand to Asia—reveals the spirit of fear, the taproot from which this law has sprung. Is it defence, or is it defiance? If defence, Mr. Mackenzie, why did you not, when Prime Minister, venture further, and enrol the adults, the voters, and aim at securing a tolerably effective force? To enrol the mere boys of the Dominion, many of whom have registered most unwillingly, some not at all, hundreds of whom are defying the law, and thousands abstaining from drills, is evidence of the unpopularity of this conscript law. The fiat has gone forth in this blatant letter of the High Commissioner's to both emigrants and Colonials alike who hate conscription and will have none of it, "New Zealand does not want you." (3) What of the emigrants who have returned to England? Those who know Peter Thomson, the second boy to be imprisoned in 1911 for conscience' sake—he has returned to Glasgow; or the Sellars, father and sons, are amazed that the High Commissioner should say, "New Zealand is heartily glad to be rid of them." They are the very type of emigrants the colony needs, and Mr. Mackenzie knows that they are. In making such an assertion, he is himself guilty of warning emigrants not to go. I wish he would be more explicit, and give "a few instances of those who quarrelled with Church, School, and Council." My friend, Mr. Alfred Brown, a member of the Society of Friends, writing from Christchurch, New Zealand, in February of this year, says, "I have seen about sixty-five to seventy boys who have been imprisoned. They are a good average lot of ordinary British boys, hating injustice and loving freedom: the sort of boys any nation may be proud of. Before their imprisonment many were church members, some in Sunday-schools, and some Sunday-school teachers." Will Mr. Mackenzie dare to say that Reg. Williams, Beary, Warrall, Nuttall, and others sent into military detention on Ripa Island, in Lyttelton Harbour, on June 12th, under a military escort with fixed bayonets, are not decent, law-abiding fellows? These lads, rather than do what they believe to be wrong, have been repeatedly fined, their wages attached, have suffered imprisonment, some of them twice and three times over, are deprived of their civil rights when they become of age, and are ineligible for Government employment.

This forcing of conscience, frankly admitted, though defended with much reluctance by the Hon. Jas. Allen, the Defence Minister, is sure to fail. The Lyttelton Times, June 17th, tells the Government "it must face the facts." Its leading article, entitled "A Matter of Conscience," argues that "the genuine conscientious objector is every bit as much entitled to consideration as the genuine religious objector is; they stand on the same plane. Adhesion to some accepted form of religion before conscience can be taken into account is atrocious."

Mr. Mackenzie evidently thinks not. He cannot conceive of conscientious objectors; the New Zealand Defence law does not recognise them. "Get rid of them" is the indignant High Commissioner's sole solution.

(4) In the Daily News, on May 22nd, Mr. Mackenzie stated that the Sellars "were undoubtedly treated in the same way as other emigrants, and supplied with a book containing a statement that they were liable for military service." He again makes the same assertion.

I have had the actual copy of the New Zealand Handbook, No. 8, issued April, 1910, which was given to Mr. Sellars at the New Zealand Government Office, 13, Victoria Street. I do not say that the High Commissioner has any wish to deliberately mislead the British public; but if not, he is ignorant of what the book contained, which he certainly ought to have known. In the Handbook, page 35, under "Militia, Volunteers and Police," it states, "Besides a small permanent militia, there are several thousand volunteers. The ages between which males in New Zealand are liable to serve in the militia, if required, are seventeen and fifty-five years." The book contains no reference to the Defence Act, 1909, with its "universal obligation to be trained," beginning at age twelve (since altered to age fourteen in the amended Act of last year). No mention whatever is made of compulsory military training and service, or of the penalties, the rigorous penalties, which these lads had to endure. So eager were the authorities to punish these boys, they actually prosecuted the youngest before he was fourteen, and the summons had to be withdrawn. The High Commissioner's statement in this matter is, I regret, incorrect and unreliable. He will correct me if I am wrong. The High Commissioner charges the family with "taking upon themselves certain obligations which they have not fulfilled." The British public would like to know what justification there is for this charge. It does not appear in the evidence I have before me. (See the Patea County Press, February 7th, 1912, and September 6th, 1912.)

This whole Act and its results are deplorable in the extreme, as the statistics published by the Defence Department in the New Zealand Press, May 30th, 1913, clearly prove: "There have been 2,480 prosecutions for breaches of the law against territorials (conscripts eighteen years and over), and 959 against senior cadets, a total of 3,439." According to the previous return, the number during the seventeen months ending November 30th, 1912, was 1,577. It follows that from that date to the end of April there were 1,862 prosecutions. Thus the record for the last five months exceeded those of the preceding seventeen months by nearly 300, and yielded an average of eighty-five prosecutions a week. The population being only a little over one million, it follows that if conscription on the same lines were in force in the United Kingdom, and were as unpopular here as it is there, an average of 3,825 boys would be prosecuted every week, or an equivalent for the British Isles of 3,510 boys imprisoned and about 154,000 prosecutions for the twenty-two months. Even these figures, terrible as they appear to some lovers of liberty, are not complete. They do not include the number of boys who have evaded the law, or who have been imprisoned for speaking against the Defence Acts in public.

Your contemporary, the Times, asserts these figures are "most misleading," but is unable to show in what way. They are the New Zealand Government's statistics. To all of these defaulters there is but one remedy. An officer in Christchurch told one of the lads, "When we get you there (the detention barracks) we will make you drill, break your hearts, or drive you out of the country." The High Commissioner in London echoes, "Get rid of them."

History repeatedly shows that conscience cannot be forced, and the fact remains that in Australia and New Zealand militarism is driving its wedge into the living flesh of free institutions, and that civil and religious liberty are at stake.—I am, sir, etc.,

HERBERT CORDER,

Hon. Secretary, Defence Acts Committee of the Society of Friends.

THE LAND QUESTION.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I am not in the least conversant with any of the intricacies, nor even of the simplicities, of the "Single Tax" question. Therefore I have no intention of unduly endeavouring to intervene in the challenge thrown out (in an open letter) by "Land Reformer" to Mr. Joseph Fels when I ask to be allowed to take an exception to an assertion, and be permitted to endeavour to nullify an implication conveyed in the letter.

The assertion that "if the State imposes a tax on the landowner, he will shift it on to the farmer, who will deduct it from the wages of the farm labourer," is not only an aspersion on the moral obligation of the farmer, but is an attribute more gross than callousness itself on the general principles of his character. May I therefore refute the assertion and eradicate the stigma by asking "Land Reformer" to prove that the imposition of the insurance tax has reduced the wages (generally, not specifically) of the farm labourers by threepence per week? Does the farm labourer now receive 17s. 5d. against the hitherto 18s.?

The sentence, "If the State imposes a tax on the land on which my house is built, the landlord will simply add the amount of the tax to the rent," seems to imply that it is almost impossible for the State to impose a tax on land which could not be transferred on to the shoulders of the tenant. The assertion is a mere truism of the general principle of commercialism. There are, nevertheless, enactments in present-day force, having reference to land, which act as a barrier to such principles.

Let me illustrate. The Inclosure Acts, 1845 to 1868, which made provision for the inclosure of commons, enacted that the land should be divided into parcels and conveyed as freeholds to certain persons. Nevertheless, one parcel had to be retained and held in trust for division into allotments for the labouring poor. The land retained was subject to a clear rent-charge not exceeding in the whole the net annual value of the allotment in its actual condition at the time of making the same, and the rent-charge was awarded to some person or persons in lieu of land.

Now the nullification of the implication is illustrated in the comparison of the payment of the poor rate. For explanation's sake, we will divide the common into four parcels, three of which have private ownership and the fourth is held in trust for the labouring poor. The first three plots are let at £20 per annum, with tenants paying rates. The fourth is also let at an accumulative rental of £20 (for it is enacted that the allotments shall not be let for a less rental than the average rent of land in the same parish or neighbourhood), but the poor rate is paid out of the rents.

The assessment of each plot is twenty pounds gross; but in making the net assessment the amount of the fourth plot is reduced not only by the percentage allowed for repairs, etc., but by the amount of the rent-charge, and the rent-charge is assessed to the owner as though it were land. It is consequently impossible for the owner of the rent-charge to transfer his obligation to any second person.

May I not, therefore, conclude that (after the completion of the land valuation under the Finance Act, 1909-1910) it would not be unreasonable for the State to fix a maximum rental based on the valuation, and the rentals be assessed for poor law or other purposes?—I am, sir, etc.,

SATANISM AND CARDUCCI.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Whilst abroad, your issue of August 22nd chanced to fall into my hands, and I was interested to read the letters which my contribution appears to have provoked. I am wrong, your correspondents assert, in labelling Carducci a Satanist, and in support of this I am told that his "Inno a Satana" was not really a hymn to Satan. What is it, then? Again, they argue, even if it was, Carducci was undoubtedly a great poet, so why not erect a statue to him in Rome? At that rate, why not erect a statue to the late Mr. Oscar Wilde, shall we say, under the Admiralty Arch?—I am, sir, etc.,

BERNARD HAMILTON.

Jermyn Street, S.W., August 28th, 1913.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—After Mr. Bernard Hamilton comes Mr. Arthur Ebbels. To the one Carducci is a preacher of Satanism; to the other, he lived "on the borders of insanity." What will be the next wild statement? And does it not all show the necessity for some attempt to be made to bring the man and the poet Carducci before English people in some adequate form? Might not some of those who write trite books about Italy and the Italians turn their attention to this neglected task? Perhaps you, sir, will at least give us a portrait and a character sketch.

Shakespeare classes together "the lunatic, the lover and the poet," as being "of imagination all compact," but each with a difference. I venture to suggest that Carducci had no more affinity with the lunatics than Shakespeare recognised, and is no more to be written down as bordering on the insane than other great poets.

What are the relevant facts? After a youth in no way more wild or more disordered than that of other poets whom no one in their senses dreams of calling insane, Carducci held for about forty years the post of professor of Italian Literature in the University of Bologna, and became one of the most honoured figures in Italy. In the year 1890 he was nominated a senator; in 1906 he was awarded the Nobel prize for literature. Are these the distinctions that fall to one who "lives on the borders of insanity"?

Baron de Bildt, the Swedish Minister in Rome, in making the presentation, referred to the "moral severity" of Carducci's lyrics, "the austere simplicity" of his life. In truth, no poet had a genius more virile, concentrated, disciplined and controlled.

It is difficult to conceive what Mr. Ebbels had in mind. If he refers to the cerebral congestion with which the poet was stricken in his last few years, which at the end made his life a torment, without, however, dimming the lucidity of his spirit, then one can only recommend greater accuracy and greater generosity of statement.—I am, sir, etc.,

H. W. W. McANALLY.

Woldingham, Surrey.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Owing to absence from home, I only read this day Mr. B. Hamilton's article on "Satanism" which appeared in EVERYMAN on August 8th. Italians will be grateful to F. N., Mr. E. J. Watson (who recently gave us a very effective translation of "Alle Fonti del Clitunno"), and Prof. Bosanquet for their magnificent defence of Carducci, the great poet of Italy. As F. N. aptly says, "In the 'Inno a Satana,' Satan is merely the symbol of rebellion against the restraints of freedom." At any rate, Carducci, in later years, made ample amends for that youthful outburst. Mr. Hamilton will, I am sure, be pleased to know that Carducci on various occasions sang the glories of the Catholic Church—to wit, St. Francis, in "Santa Maria degli Angeli," a finely chiselled sonnet, which to the reader will indeed appear as the outcome of a mystic mind. That magnificent poem, "La Chiesa di Polenta," ends with an Ave Maria which there is no exaggeration in saying that for classical purity it is far superior to the "Laude" of Petrarch and Politian on the same theme. The lines breathe a solemn peace throughout. I quote the last two strophes:—

"Un oblio lene de la faticosa vita, un pensoso sospirar quiete, una soave volontà di pianto
l'anime invade.

"Taccion le fiere, e gli nòmini e le cose;
ròseo il tramonto ne l'azzurro sfuma, mòrmoran gli alti vèrtici ondeggianti Ave Maria."

As to Satanic rites being performed in Italy and elsewhere, I have great doubts. If Mr. Hamilton wishes to infer that people in different countries propitiate, in the abstract, to Satan, we will believe him, for diabolical deeds are very frequently perpetrated in our midst. Lucifer has indeed been let loose in the world, "seeking whom he may devour." An Italian saying has it: "Il diavolo fa bôni affari" ("The devil is doing a large trade"), and it is too sadly true! But . . . de hoc satis. Wishing EVERYMAN all success, I am, sir, etc., lived well on for half a century in China, and have had every opportunity of seeing the effects of opium smoking. These effects are plainly visible to those who know what they are, and I know from my acquaintance with hundreds of these smokers that no man can be a confirmed smoker of opium without its affecting him in a more or less serious degree, and, in the majority of cases, shortening his life.

Of course, naturally enough, different factors come into action and have to be accounted for in judging individual cases. For example, the drug has a more speedy effect on a poor man than a rich one, for the former has to take from his wages, which are barely sufficient to keep soul and body together, more and more money to buy his opium as the craving grows on him, while the rich man need not stint himself in food or clothing to buy his with, at first at all events. Again, a man of strong physique is able to resist the ravages of the drug longer than one who is weak. Yet again, there are men who determine to keep within certain limits in their smoking of opium, though, as in nearly all those addicted to vices, the will-power is much weakened in opium smokers. A man of this stamp, if rich and physically strong as well, may, and sometimes does, live for many years, but, notwithstanding, all opium exerts a seriously deleterious effect on him, and, finally, he often dies from some disease brought on by his indulgence in the vice. His death will then be attributed by those who do not know the facts of the case to the disease simply, whereas his long-continued habitual opium smoking has caused the disease.

There would not be holocausts of thousands of thousands of opium pipes in Chinese cities, and China would not be doing her best to suppress opium smoking, were the effects not most harmful to her people.—

THE MAN BEFORE THE MAST.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I fear that Mr. Howes in his sidelights on the above article has missed the purport of my letter. My contention was, not that the Board of Trade regulations were too exacting per se, but that they were not relevant and to the point. Instead of refuting my statements and amplifying his assertions, your correspondent proceeds to describe the harrowing trials and grave responsibilities of the seafaring man, and to inform us that a man at sea has a soul—truisms that are well known and admitted by all. What is required is a more practical examination than that at present in vogue. Mr. Howes probably remembers the controversy aroused by the "Trattles" test case, instigated by the Merchants' Service Guild some five years ago. Here was a case of a seafarer who had failed to pass the eye-test, but who quelled all doubts as to the perfectness of his vision when put through a more practical test on the River Thames. 'All the colours really required to differentiate between at sea are red and green, and those without any shade of colouration. In the present tests candidates are asked to match different shades of woollen yarns. If the uninitiated stand near the jumbled mass it appears as one blurred whole, whereas if he stand a few yards away discrimination is appreciably simplified.

Finally, I should like to bear testimony to the continued excellence of your paper, which, by the wide range of its articles, makes an appeal to all classes and insures its mellowed longevity.—I am, sir, etc.,

SOUTH AFRICAN FARMERS.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I have read with interest the article which appeared in EVERYMAN for August 22nd, by Mr. Liddell Geddie, on "The Union of South Africa." Mr. Geddie's information as to the conditions obtaining in South Africa is, no doubt, excellent in many respects, but his statement that "in 1912 articles of food and drink valued at £6,359,000 were imported into the Union, a total which reflects little credit on South African farmers," demands an explanation; and, no doubt, if Mr. Geddie had been made aware of the circumstances which compelled the country to import such a total of food supplies during the period named, he would have mentioned same, or, at all events, would not have written this paragraph, imputing a character to the South African farmer the reverse of which would be nearer the actual fact.

If I state that a shipment of maize destined for a German port, and shipped from South Africa, had to be recalled while on the water owing to the continuance of a fierce drought, which held the country in its grip from north to south almost, and through which not alone did the farming community lose the season's crops, but hundreds of thousands of cattle, sheep, goats, and ostriches as well, the explanation necessary to Mr. Geddie's statement will be sufficiently obvious, while at the same time the character of South Africa's farming population fighting against drought, disease, and pestilence, and yet bringing about the measure of success acknowledged by Mr. Geddie, will be understood in its true light.

Further, Mr. Geddie's statement, showing a population of a million and a quarter, with half a million square miles of land at its disposal and only 2.3 per cent. of same under cultivation, might induce readers with agricultural leanings or knowledge to consider a country such as he describes virtually a paradise for the employment of their capital and energy.

Many years' work and residence in South Africa compel me to state that a bald statistical statement of this kind is manifestly unfair to the country concerned, as well as to readers of your paper. Even the apology for this condition of affairs contained in the statement that there are large tracts of land where the plough will never enter (this might mean the Kalahari desert) is not sufficient. An analysis of the actual facts obtaining in the very best farming districts of the country, where men with both knowledge and capital necessary to alter the conditions named by Mr. Geddie are to be found, would prove how futile his generalisations are when brought in touch with the actual practice of farming in South Africa.

In the eastern districts of Cape Colony, inhabited, for the most part, by English farmers (descendants of the 1820 settlers), there is sufficient evidence to be found proving how impossible it is, owing to conditions over which men have no control, to establish cultivation on a scale sufficiently extensive and secure as to mean independence from outside sources of food supplies even.

Take the year 1912 as proving this statement, when the Government of the country had to be called upon to prevent actual starvation amongst the black population in Pondoland owing to the failure of the country's food supplies through drought, and that after the lapse of almost a century's development of the Eastern Province of the Cape.

Finally, South Africa is a great country, but the most difficult country known to one whose agricultural work

MARVELS OF THE MIND.

Initiation FREE to Our Readers.

There are hundreds, nay, thousands, of capable men and women to-day needlessly living a life of mediocrity, obscurity, and failure, whose very existence constitute an "apparently intended" succession of endless toil, trouble, and misery. Fatalists, no doubt, exclaim that all such things must be, but just ask yourself this question: Is there one single sound reason why every being should not attain success and happiness? No—most emphatically there is not.

Every human soul is heir to a rich and glorious possession—the sacred, cherished gifts of inborn capacities and talents. Everyone is born suitably equipped to play his or her rôle in the game of life, and given opportunities which, when grasped, lead to unbounded success and perfect happiness.

Mr. Frank Hartley, the greatest psychomenticulturist, positively denies that failure in any sense of the term necessarily exists. He maintains that the power to succeed lies within the reach of all; it is, in fact, inherent, a potent dormant force, requiring but a certain amount of scientific development to manifest itself in every individual. Hundreds upon hundreds of people in every walk of life who have followed his method testify to the wonderful results which this truly remarkable man has enabled them to accomplish.

£1,000 GUARANTEE.

Just read the following remarkable letter. Mr. Frank Hartley possesses thousands of similar ones, and he will hand a cheque for £1,000 to any London Hospital, fund, or charity, if anyone can prove that these are not absolutely genuine.

Professor Le D—, Fellow of the British Institute of Mental Science and Graduate of the American College of Sciences (Diploma and Honours), writes, March 3rd, 1913:—

"I have carefully examined your system on Personal Magnetism, etc., and find it far superior to any I have ever read. As a Psychologist I may say you have given the very secrets away to the world.—Yours very faithfully,
"LE D—."

No matter your age or position in life, whether you are engaged in artistic pursuits, in commerce, in finance, you may be either employer, employee, or independent, Mr. Frank Hartley will help you attain your most cherished secret ambitions. Every word you speak, every emanating thought, every moment you live is either right or wrong, and the secret of success in every phase of life lies in bringing your every wish, thought, and action into perfect harmony with your immediate surroundings and the hidden forces of nature.

A GENEROUS OFFER.

So absolutely convinced is Mr. Hartley of the infallibility of his system that he offers to send a free copy of his wonderful book, entitled "The Temple of the Mind," to any of our readers interested, and, further, to initiate them free of charge into his wonderful secret success method.

There is no age limit, no question of position, or obstacle of any kind. All you have to do is to write to Mr. Frank Hartley, Room 106a, London Institute of Mental Culture, 9, John Street, Adelphi, London, W.C. (mention you are a reader of EVERYMAN), and he will send you a free copy of his wonderful book, full particulars of his method, and show you what you must do in order to attain Success, Power, Personal Influence, and Perfect Happiness.

Those who wish to may enclose two penny stamps for postage, etc., but in any case a mere request will bring his book and information.

has brought him in touch with the farming interests of most European countries, and whose advice to possible English settlers there (no matter how brilliant figures or statistics may prove South African conditions to be) would be somewhat the nature of Mr. Punch's, until, at all events, personal experience shows the road towards securely investing one's capital in South African farming. It is almost an axiom in South Africa that a man cannot live decently on a farm of less than 4,000 to 5,000 acres, and this as the result of experience the writer can maintain as being true in essence.—I am, sir, etc.,

EVOLUTION AND SCRIPTURAL DOCTRINE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—From one statement in his letter on the above I think your correspondent H. Heighton has not correctly grasped the "orthodox" doctrine of the Atonement. As set forth in the Bible, the Atonement reveals both the love and the justice of God. As I understand it, God is manifest in the flesh in the person of Christ, the Son of God, who bears in some inscrutable way, it may be, and in some sufficient measure, the penal results of sin. He may be said "by the grace of God" to "taste death for every man" (Heb. ii. 9). It is a perfectly voluntary arrangement on the part of Deity, and in a sense exalts the righteousness of God. Further, I think the idea of personal self-atonement for sin is impracticable.—I am, sir, etc.,
W. H. W.

A GREAT SURGEON*

JOSEPH LORD LISTER was born in the Purple Chamber of Science. His father had been a short-sighted child, and, that he might see the landscape from his nursery window the better, was accustomed to glue his eye to an air-bubble which had become imprisoned in the glass. The air-bubble acted as a lens. This led him on to interest in lenses and their defects. In his time microscopes of high power always presented an image with blurred and prismatic outlines. These defects were by him overcome, and the law of aplanatic foci which he evolved enabled him to make the first perfect English achromatic microscope. For his scientific work he was elected a Fellow of the Royal Society, the society of which his distinguished son was to become President.

The younger Lister studied medicine at University College, London, and came under the influence of Sharpey, the distinguished physiology lecturer there of those days. To his friendship with Sharpey he owed his introduction to James Syme, the great Edinburgh surgeon, whom all men who read books know, if it were but that he is the Minto House Surgeon described by a famous pupil, Dr. John Brown, in the classic "Rab and his Friends."

Young Lister became James Syme's house surgeon in the old Edinburgh Infirmary—incidentally, too, his son-in-law. Dr. Wrench's book contains an engraving of a photograph of the old building, or rather of a part of it. That part is not, however, the surgical part, where Syme worked, and where, later, his son-in-law and successor in the Clinical Surgery Chair was to be the idol of students and patients alike. Those who wish to have a poet's picture of Lister as he was in the days of his greatest might and popularity may read of him—the Chief, as he was always affectionately called—in W. E. Henley's "Hospital." It is by the way, but Dr. Wrench is not right in his dates. Henley was not "Lister's patient in the first weeks of his Edinburgh professorship." It was not till 1873 that Henley came to be under the great surgeon. It was in February, 1885, that Leslie Stephen called on Robert Louis Stevenson at Edinburgh, "and took me," writes Stevenson, "up to see a poor fellow, a sort of poet, who writes for him, and who has been eighteen months in our infirmary and may be, for all I know, eighteen months more." Here is the description Henley wrote of "The Chief":

"His brow spreads large and placid, and his eye
Is deep and bright with steady looks that still.
Soft lines of tranquil thought his face fulfil—
His face at once benign and proud and shy.
If envy scout, if ignorance deny
His faultless patience, his unyielding skill,
Innumerable gratuities reply.
His wise, rare smile is sweet with certainties,
And seems in all his patients to compel
Such love and faith as failures cannot quell.
We hold him for another Hercules,
Battling with custom, prejudice, disease,
As once the son of Zeus with Death and Hell."

All who remember Lister as he was in those days will bear witness to the fidelity of the portrait. It was a partisan's part, of course, to speak of Lister battling with prejudice and being scouted by envy. The defect of Dr. Wrench's book, over and above the many inaccuracies in dates and in statement of facts, is, indeed, that it is that of a partisan. Lister was right and wrong, as most men are who attempt to force a new theory and a new consequent practice upon others. And the opposition he had to endure was not all that of prejudice. Much of it was the opposition which succeeding brought about saner theory and simpler practice. It is not for the advantage of any that there should be claimed for any what is not justly claimable. Some of Dr. Wrench's passages—as where, for instance, he claims Dr. Thomas Keith's successes in surgery as being due to Listerian methods—are quite absurd. Dr. Matthews Duncan did not succeed Sir James Simpson in the Chair of Midwifery, and the statement, the circumstances being what they were, shows a singular lack of knowledge of the Edinburgh with which Dr. Wrench deals.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

MR. LOUIS BECKE takes us once again to the South Sea Islands. His latest book, BY REEF AND PALM AND THE EBBING OF THE TIDE (Fisher Unwin, 6s.), lacks nothing of the virility and force that have made the author notable. Mr. Becke has mastered the art of condensing a whole drama within the limits of a few thousand words. There is sufficient material in some of the more forceful of his short stories to form the theme for a three-volume novel. One of the most arresting of the numbers is the study of a native woman who has white blood in her veins, and is moved to take terrible vengeance on her husband, himself an Englishman, for the slight he puts upon her. "The Revenge of Macy O'Shea" paints a conflict between the brutalised Englishman, an escaped convict, who has found a refuge in the land of the Tropics, and this daughter of a half-breed, who has grasped the fact that, as his legal wife, she is entitled to his respect, a respect unknown in those more languorous latitudes. She insists that if Macy carries out his threat and brings home to their hut another woman, that woman will pay for the insult with her life. "Macy of the bloodshot eyes and drink-distorted face gripped her wrists. 'Ristow's girl will be here to-morrow, and if you don't knuckle down to her it'll be a case of vamos for you: you can go and get a husband among the natives'; and he flung her aside and went to the god that ran him closest for his soul next to women—his rum bottle." O'Shea kept his word and brought home a native woman, for whom he paid a tum of oil, a bag of Chilian dollars, and much feminine finery. Sera welcomed her with a smile, and, holding out her left hand, said in the native language 'welcome.'

"'Why,' said O'Shea with mocking jocularly, 'that is a left-handed welcome, Sera.'

"'Aye,' said the girl with the White Man's blood, 'my right hand is for this,' and the knife sank home into Malia's yellow bosom."

There follows a terrible scene in which Sera is strapped to an upturned boat and, held firmly by the soft brown hands of the native women, is beaten with the lash used by the South Sea Islanders. Macy is made the arbiter of her fate, and he declares in favour of flogging rather than execution, as, if he killed her, he would lose her value as a slave. He watches "the white back turn black and then into bloody red," until a native trader shrieks out in pity and implores him to stop the torture. O'Shea responds that he does not mean her to die—"she shall live with one hand to plant Taro. He walked between the two brown women who held her hands. They moved aside and let her go. Then O'Shea swung his arm and the blade of the hatchet struck into the plank, and the right hand of Sera fell on the sand." And then, just at the breaking point, when the emotional stress has grown painfully tense, the author snaps the strain and rings the curtain down—Sera is dead. This sketch is one of others almost as vividly intense and poignantly dramatic. Mr. Becke has done nothing better than his present work.

Mrs. Bailey Saunders has written some charming books, notably "Saints in Society" and "A Shepherd of Kensington." Her latest departure strikes a fresh note. THE PRINCE'S SHADOW (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.) is the story of an uncrowned king, the rightful heir to Krongaria. Castel-Istra is the name this amiable gentleman adopts in his wanderings through Europe, and among other adventures, sensational and romantic, he falls in love with Clara Mullins. It is to be regretted that the author did not choose a more euphonious patronymic for her heroine. Mullins is a fatal word—fatal, that is, to the imagination. One visualises a somewhat phlegmatic and strong-minded female, whom the name "Clara" fits like a glove, and despite the author's attempts to invest her heroine with the attributes of charm and beauty, the image conjured up by "Mullins" is too firmly stamped upon the mind for the picture to change. Castel-Istra falls in love with this lady, and she proceeds to infuse him with something of her determination and resource. She creates in him some of the qualities she thinks he possesses, and in the end he is offered the throne of Krongaria by an enthusiastic and admiring people. Before this happens he has contracted a marriage with Mullins, and at first the reader imagines that, in defiance of Royal tradition, he will insist on the lady sharing his throne. Castel-Istra, however, is too practical for anything so wildly romantic; he dismisses the marriage asmorganatic, and takes as consort the daughter of a royal house. This marks the climax of his success. The discarding of Mullins proves his undoing: he loses his throne, is reviled by his people, and finds a belated refuge in a monastery. Clara, meanwhile, has consoled herself with her son, who is an infant phenomenon, and, despite his lameness, achieves in a miraculously short space of time, a European reputation as a musician. There is an atmosphere of unreality about the book that the author's skill in devising dramatic situations and her undoubted capacity for characterisation cannot dispel. The theme of the faithless prince and the sorrowing lady is outworn, and for the sake of the reputation that Mrs. Bailey Saunders has deservedly earned as a novelist of some distinction, we sincerely hope she will not again choose a princelet as a hero or wander into Krongaria for the motive of a romance.

It is rarely that a reviewer meets with a book of the calibre of THE LODGER (Methuen, 6s.). Mrs. Belloc Lowndes writes with a style at once distinguished and dramatic. Her phrasing has qualities of strength and freshness that lend themselves admirably to the treatment of the theme of her latest novel. The opening chapters are handled with consummate skill. She takes us at once into that atmosphere tinged with the hatred of debt and the determination at all costs to preserve external decencies that is so characteristic of a certain type of English people. Mr. and Mrs. Bunting were at one time servants in a big house as butler and lady's maid respectively. After long years of waiting, they married, started a lodging-house, and for a time did well. And then the tide of adversity set in, and we find them when the story begins within measurable distance of utter destitution. The house is still exquisitely clean, well kept, and furnished in the solid style affected by their class; but the fire burns low in the grate, there is but a glimmer of gas in the parlour, and the monetary resources of Mr. Bunting amount to 4½d. The stress of the situation is relieved by the appearance of an applicant for lodgings, one Mr. Sleuth, a man of the most refined appearance, and suggestive of an ascetic self-denial. He is none other than "The Avenger," the name bestowed on the perpetrator of a series of crimes similar to those perpetrated by "The Ripper" years ago. Mrs. Bunting realises that her lodger is indeed the man who perpetrates these ghastly outrages, but though her flesh creeps at the tales of horror in the newspapers, she is no sooner brought into contact with him than she feels a curious sort of sympathy and a certain awed respect at the length to which his convictions carry him. For "The Avenger" is a religious maniac, and murders his wretched victims in the belief that he is destroying sin by their extinction. Added to this is the knowledge that the money the lodger pays is the sole plank between them and penury. He rents all their available rooms, and Mrs. Bunting feels a curious gratitude towards the man who has saved her from the humiliation of the pawnbroker and the disgrace of debt, that even the knowledge of his atrocities cannot expunge. The psychology of this couple is admirably portrayed. One acquires an intimate acquaintance with the woman "in her neat black stuff dress and in her scrupulously clean plain collar and cuffs"; one can understand the indignation and self-reproach that engulf her narrow and upright soul when Bunting perpetrates the extravagance of purchasing a penny paper, leaving him with but 3½d. We leave it to the reader to discover how the story ends, and we will not dim the edge of the thrill awaiting them by disclosing the climax. Mrs. Lowndes has achieved a very notable success. She has written a book at once sensational and literary, a novel of plot accompanied by vivid characterisation.

GOD'S CLAY (Fisher Unwin, 6s.) is a story of one Geoffrey Vance, married to a woman who, shortly after she becomes his wife, develops into a confirmed invalid. He contracts a platonic affection for Angela Clifford, and the lady returns his sentiment. Mr. and Mrs. Claude Askew do not suggest that their latest novel is intended to be amusing; but the interview between Geoffrey and Angela, when they discuss and analyse their mutual regard, is really quite humorous. "What we have got to renounce is any material manifestation of our love," says he; "and we must be stricter than an engaged couple, for I must not kiss you—not one kiss even. Our love must always be kept in strict subjection; we must never forget that God has put a flaming sword between us." While making due allowance for Geoffrey's irritation at an invalid wife, it seems hardly in accordance with his Galahad-like nature to refer to the unfortunate lady as a "flaming sword." As always happens in novels of this type, though life does not as a rule follow the example of fiction, the invalid dies, and Geoffrey marries Angela. Their relations after the ceremony are well in keeping with the interview before the "flaming sword" had been removed. "We are only going to have a fortnight's honeymoon, Geoffrey and I"—she blushed rosy red as she referred to her husband—"for we are so keen to start working together. . . . I want to extend the Shoppirls' Club, to start ever so many new branches, and Geoffrey hopes to enter Parliament at the next General Election, so that he must begin to nurse a constituency almost at once. . . . We shall dwell under our own vine and fig-trees; we shall live to declare the works of the Lord." After this it is a little baffling to discover that Angela has hit a man on the head with a poker, causing his death, and that the circumstance has entirely escaped her memory, she having acted under the influence of a blaze of wrath so righteous that for a time it blotted out her consciousness. These things are above the comprehension of a mere reviewer, but the authors of this astonishing book seem to be quite pleased with the heroine, and speak of the poker episode in the warmest terms. The story was written, we should say, for a serial, and doubtless will suit the taste of that portion of the public to whom this kind of literary fare appeals.

THE KINGDOM (Heinemann, 6s.). This novel is written with a sympathy and understanding that should appeal to the student of human nature. Father Bernardo is a Monk of the Order of St. Francis d'Assisi, and, having put away all earthly things by reason of an unreciprocated passion for his cousin Vittoria, he finds rest in a monastery. He is not long to be left in peace, for after seven years he is awakened from a false sense of security by the advent of his old friend Orlando Berardesca. He again meets Vittoria, but after much tribulation of soul renounces her, and she becomes the wife of his friend. The character of the old Guardian of the Monastery is finely portrayed, and his attitude, when Father Bernardo flees from the brotherhood, shows a keen knowledge of the complexity of the human heart. Mr. Harold Goad gives a clever reading of priestly psychology, and his sketches of peasant life have a notably poignant touch. The study of Linda, the cripple girl, who begs alms, and by the plea of her infirmity is the means of bringing money to her home, is tinged with a certain tragic simplicity. Linda hears there is to be a great procession on the occasion of a special festival, and with the simple faith of a child she determines to ask the Lord Jesus to heal her infirmity when the Host passes her. Her old mother knows of this intention, and is determined to stop it, for how, asks she, is she to live if her child gets well? If she becomes healthy they will all starve. Wherefore she throws a shawl over the head of the girl just as she is about to voice her entreaty on the day of the festival.

AN INDIAN MYSTERY (Lynwood and Co., 6s.). Those of our readers who hunger after unadulterated melodrama in its crudest form will doubtless be no-wise disappointed in this volume from the pen of Mr. M. Henniker Andrews. There is very much to be desired in the way of style and treatment in the book. As the title indicates, the scene is laid in India, and concerns the strange disappearance of Frank Avenel and his wife Adela, and the abduction of his beautiful sister-in-law, Shirley. According to Mr. Andrews it would appear that the entire native population of India is comprised either of villains or fools, with the exception of one Mohammed Kahn, a faithful servant. And, on second thoughts, we are not so sure that the faithful Mohammed is not a fool, if a well intentioned one. The characters are wooden and unconvincing, the incidents badly strung together, and there is much padding. The book suggests that the author has attempted to depict life in a country and amidst surroundings of which he has no first-hand experience, but which lack of knowledge he has made strenuous efforts to supplement with the aid of an encyclopædia. Mr. Andrews is no more successful in his love scenes. "I wonder why he changed like that," she was asking herself. "He is like he used to be, and I fancied he liked me. Ah, perhaps he thought—" Her hands suddenly went up to her face to cover the rich blushes that swept from throat to brow. . . . "Yes, he surely thinks that I am beginning to care too much for him, and— Oh, how dare he."

WRITE FOR TEST-LESSONS OF

LATIN, ENGLISH, LOGIC, Etc.

NEW "SIMPLIFIED" SYSTEM OF LEARNING.

10,000 Free Lessons in Latin, English and Logic are to be presented to readers of EVERYMAN.

This course has been decided upon by the Directors of the SCHOOL OF SIMPLIFIED STUDY as a test-demonstration of the new "SIMPLIFIED" system of acquiring a scholarly knowledge of Logic and Languages, which are the very keystones of our present-day thought and speech.

To-day there are surprisingly few who have this knowledge. WHY? Because of the difficulties of the older systems of teaching and acquiring these languages. Instead of the path of the student being made dull or monotonous by the obstacles that hitherto rendered his progress almost impossible, there is now a sheer delight in the very speed with which a knowledge of Latin, English or Logic may be acquired.

Every lesson is a step on the path of progress to efficiency. It is impossible for a student to sit down to a "SIMPLIFIED" lesson, even for five minutes, without feeling that he has literally absorbed into the machinery of his brain that which will be for ever after a useful part of his mental equipment.

A PLEASURE, NOT A TASK.

The method originated by the Rev. J. C. Wilcox, M.A. (of St. John's College, Cambridge) is changing the study of Languages and Logic from a task into a rare pleasure. Numerous students under the system have written to say that they are quite sorry when the course of study has been completed, for the lessons had become one of the most enjoyable features of their daily life.

Students who are looking forward with anxiety to future examinations in these difficult subjects will find the burden of

Never mind if you have been disappointed after trying other methods. Others have been the same, and only as a very forlorn hope have many decided to try the "SIMPLIFIED" system of the Rev. J. C. Wilcox. The "SIMPLIFIED" System is a science in itself, at once the essence of simplicity, yet an absolutely thorough and scholarly system. It smoothes away all those difficulties which are so perplexing to the often disheartened student.

HOW TO LEARN TO SPEAK, WRITE, AND DEBATE SUCCESSFULLY.

You can take up any one, more, or all of the courses if you desire. If you are at all ambitious, and wish to speak well or write well, you should not fail to equip yourself by means of these delightful courses of instruction.

The fee for the whole course in any of these subjects is quite moderate, but if you do not wish to pay the whole fee in one sum, special arrangements will be made for you to pay it by easy subscriptions.

WRITE OR CALL FOR FREE LESSONS.

A full description of each subject has been given in a special book. With each book other valuable information and evidences of the success of the System will also be sent. These you can obtain absolutely free by calling or writing to Below in the FREE COUPON is given also a list of the titles of the various Lessons.

When sending in your FREE COUPON mark X opposite the names of the particular subjects in which you are especially interested. Needless to say, the expense of a FREE distribution of 10,000 copies of these interesting works is very heavy, and the Directors are naturally anxious that the Lessons should reach the proper hands. Those who prefer to make a personal call upon the Secretary are cordially invited to do so.

Write, then, or call at once for your Lessons. They cost you nothing, but they will prove how you can acquire a knowledge of all or any of the above subjects without tedious effort or heavy expense.

Many readers of this offer may be interested to know that the School also teaches Hebrew and N.T. Greek, and the Secretary will be pleased to send to them, free of cost, full particulars and the first four lessons of these interesting courses of study.

worry fall from their shoulders the moment they become acquainted with this delightfully easy "SIMPLIFIED" system of mastering all their intricacies.

WHAT 20 MINUTES A DAY WILL DO.

An additional pleasure attached to this system is that it can be acquired in those odd moments which fall even to the busiest of men. You can study it in your own home. You can learn it on a railway journey. You can make all the slack minutes of your life of value to you. You are not asked to devote hours of study daily to the subject. By studying for twenty minutes each day you will make surprising progress. You may study at your own convenience. It is not necessary to complete a course within a definite period.

HISTORY IN THE MAKING

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

MR. BALFOUR'S speech has led to much lively comment, and is not unlikely to be followed by a discussion of the highest political importance. The interest in the Home Rule question was largely on the wane, and it is a tribute to the personality and skill of the ex-Unionist leader that he has succeeded in forcing the topic to the front. Recently we directed attention to the speech of Lord Ashby St. Ledgers, who, on behalf of the Government, foreshadowed a general election after the Home Rule Bill had received the Royal Assent, but before it became operative. This course, would have the advantage of placing the claims of Ulster before the electorate, and of at least postponing that Provisional Government of the North-East corner with which we are sometimes threatened.

The most notable public event since Parliament adjourned was the publication this week by a leading news agency of a "forecast" of the report of the famous "Land Committee" appointed by the Chancellor. Mr. Lloyd George has denied that the "forecast" is either authentic or inspired, but he virtually admits that some of its prognostications are at least approximately correct. It is obvious from these that in his coming Land Campaign the Chancellor will devote special attention to the question of low wages in agricultural districts, and their levelling up by Act of Parliament, which, with the more liberal provision of small holdings, are evidently to be important features of his propaganda. "The Single Tax" finds no echo in the "forecast," and it is more than doubtful if the taxation of land values will figure very conspicuously in the approaching struggle.

Once again the vexed question of the censorship of the libraries over contemporary fiction has been raised in an acute form by the action of the Libraries Association in regard to two new novels from the pens of Mr. W. B. Maxwell and Mr. Compton MacKenzie. The matter has been warmly and widely discussed from many points of view, but it may be as well to point out that the action of the Association does not amount to refusing to supply the books to readers, who can still obtain copies by asking for them. All that is done is that the works in question are withdrawn from the regular lists. It may be doubted, however, whether the publicity that follows on this ban is not an adequate compensation by way of the gratuitous advertisement it affords the author. This discussion of the problem has elicited an interesting suggestion from the Authors' Society, to the effect that "a permanent committee, formed of publishers, authors, and representatives of the libraries, should sit twice a year, or oftener, to consider the desirability of publishing books laid before them. The decision of such a committee," the Secretary opines, "would be final and satisfactory to all parties."

We are threatened, it seems, with the possibility of yet another strike—and one of the most serious that could be attempted. The Report of the Holt Committee has given grave dissatisfaction to postal servants, who declare that its concessions are entirely inadequate. It is, of course, improbable that the men will readily adopt an extreme policy, especially as the last attempt to organise a postal strike proved a disastrous failure. On the other hand, it is significant that at a meeting of the London District Council Postmen's Federation, the Executive were instructed to "educate the members up to a strike policy." Should that be achieved, the prospect, from a business point of view, is too depressing to bear contemplation.

Clearly we are on the eve of the oil age. Oil fuel for the Navy is now a certainty for the immediate future, and for some time past the industrial world has been listening with interest to the accounts of the success achieved by the Diesel stationary oil engine. Now, it seems, we are to have a Diesel engine locomotive, which, built at Winterthur, in Switzerland, has, in a recent trial, achieved a speed of over sixty miles an hour. The adoption of oil locomotives on our railways would, of course, almost revolutionise the system, and though this may be looking a little ahead, there can be no question that the success achieved under the test is likely to have momentous results.

The criticisms to which the Olympic Fund has been subjected have had the welcome result of largely widening the scope of the committee's aims and objects, and the facilities for athletic training that it is intended to provide are no longer to be limited to the competitors at Berlin in 1916. It is clear, indeed, from the statement issued to the Press by Mr. J. E. K. Studd that the work of the committee will be national in character, and facilities for training will be offered to all classes. The committee have a rare chance of reviving that interest in healthy sports which has of late been largely vitiated by the entry into the realm of athletics of money-making considerations. Mr. Studd's association with its work is the best guarantee that the revival will be free from all undesirable elements. No man has done more than he to popularise sport at its best and to preserve its purity.

The passing of the Underwood Tariff Bill in the Senate of the U.S.A. by a majority of seven votes is an event of great importance, especially as, despite the slender Democratic majority, the measure was actually widened and the free list enlarged by the Upper Chamber. Wool, sugar, wheat, cattle, swine, and sheep are placed on the free list, and the duties in many schedules were reduced. The change of policy indicated is undeniably significant.

THE MAN AND HIS WORK

IX.—THE FOREIGN MISSIONARY PRIZE ESSAY BY FRANK D. JONES

I.

IT is well known that the foreign missionary has been pitied, despised and ridiculed. Such abuse is largely due to the fact that he has been misunderstood for lack of definite knowledge of his circumstances; hence a survey of his life and work may help to remove popular misconceptions.

The life of a foreign missionary to-day is very different from what it was only thirty years ago. Means of communication by steamship, railway, telegraph and post have reduced his sense of isolation. Whereas it once took months to reach his station, now it takes weeks or days, and he may regularly exchange letters with home. He is kept in touch with modern thought by the best weekly and monthly publications, generously posted to him by friends or by societies whose aim is to supply him with news.

In the old days he had to make shift and live in native huts or tents. Now he usually has a comfortable bungalow or well-built house, specially constructed and adapted to meet the requirements of the climate. He no longer has bare floors and wooden stools, but boasts the simple luxuries of carpets, easy chairs, and pictures. He has all the indispensables in the way of pots, pans, and cooking stove, and modern methods of packing tinned foods enable him to enjoy an English or Continental meal, either in Central Africa or the South Sea Islands. This inestimable blessing has made him to a certain degree independent of his surroundings, and, by preserving his health, has prolonged his life. The new method also of packing drugs in tabloid form has enabled him to carry a larger range of necessary medicines in a smaller compass.

II.

As the times have changed and the hardships are not so great, so the foreign missionary of the day is quite a different being from the veteran whose place he is taking. The veteran went out with more zeal than knowledge; he had virgin soil to break, unknown peoples to discover. The modern missionary goes with a good general education, with some idea of the great formative religions of the world, and a particular knowledge of the special district to which he is being sent—e.g., if to Africa he usually receives a course of lectures at the Livingstone College, Leyton.* Chosen for linguistic ability, his sympathetic understanding of human nature, and his all-round common sense, he is rarely bigoted or fanatical. As a handy man, he exercises his skill through the whole range of arts, scientific and domestic. He pays attention to his general health by taking regular exercise, the vital importance of which is drilled into him on arrival upon the "foreign field." Shooting, boating, tennis and croquet are some of his recreations.

Turning to his work in its four sections—the pioneering, the pastoral, the medical, and the educational—we have a glimpse of his qualities of heart and mind.

Each section overlaps the other, and the worker may have to do with all four.

III.

The greatest days of pioneering are over. Before Livingstone penetrated Africa, or Martyn journeyed into Persia, or Morrison landed in China, little mission work had been done in those almost unknown countries. But there is still scope for such work. The pioneer usually spends his early days on the "field" in getting accustomed to the climate of the district, in acquainting himself with the characteristics of the known peoples, in studying outfits, in making plans for his journey, and in apportioning out his baggage. Climate and district determine his mode of travel. Passing up navigable rivers, he notes the depths, the currents, the cataracts, the turnings, the general landmarks. Or, penetrating inland in Africa, he observes the hills, the nature of the jungle, the marshes, the open country, the rivers and springs where good water can be procured, and collects specimens of rocks, plants, flowers and insects. Following up a river in subtropical China, he takes along with him native bearers to carry his baggage, provisions, and mountain chair. Having reached the extent of the river, he hires a native guide and marches on to the next village. As he arrives, curious natives with furtive eyes gather round the strange procession, asking what it means. They are told that it is a new teacher, come with a new teaching. The pioneer pitches his camp, for no one dares to offer the hospitality of a home. As he rigs his tents, table, and chairs, crowds of men and women watch, with ever-widening eyes, until they are convulsed with laughter as he uses his knife and fork.

* Principal, Dr. C. F. Harford.

Pioneering makes a man cosmopolitan, tactful, and firm, able to deal with servants. It develops courage and staying power. He gets accustomed to all sorts of experiences. He sleeps in native huts, partakes of native food, conforms in some cases to native dress, endures drenching rain, is suffocated with dust storms, is scorched with tropical suns, and frozen with arctic winds. He is undaunted by difficulties, ready to take the bull by the horns—e.g., in a hostile village, where the chief forbids anyone to take him in, or sell him food, he politely informs the chief that he will stay with him the night. The next morning the chief sends him away with a courteous invitation to return quickly. As he is borne along in his mountain-chair, he dreams of an awakened people emancipated from the bonds of superstition, contributing of their unfolding genius to the general knowledge of the world, and testifying of their experience with the Maker of all.

IV.

The new ground broken, he has yet to commence the real work. The dialect or language has to be learned, friendliness cultivated, and confidence established. Maybe the language has to be reduced to writing and a phonetic system adopted. Then follow the attempts at preaching and teaching, leading on to pastoral work.

Quite another type of work now opens out. This is a sphere in which there is room for the greatest abilities, but of a different order from those required in a pioneer. To live and be successful among a people demands constant study of their ways of thinking and their modes of life. If in the East the missionary seeks to understand the spirit of the Oriental, to appreciate and sympathise with his outlook, he has to forget his own forms of thought and learn to express himself in the figurative and courteous speech of his people. Similarly, if in Africa, he sympathises with and enters into the spirit of tribal taboos and tribal relationships,

Without pouring contempt upon them he tries to express his new teaching, linked on with and in relationship to the lore and traditions of the tribe. In his preaching he endeavours to appeal to the past experience of his hearers; hence he is wide awake for any knowledge of his people. Always he seeks to understand the moulding influences at work about him. Then he has to organise and educate his helpers, to arrange for new preaching places, to receive, examine, and, in some instances, baptise natives, to settle their disputes, advise them about their everyday affairs, and to appeal for them before a magistrate in times of trouble. He also carries his civilisation into their midst by building churches on sanitary lines, and advising the formation of small reservoirs and swimming baths in dry districts.

He takes photographs, makes slides, gives lantern lectures, exhibits films before the astonished eyes of the native, mystifying him the while with a gramophone. Yet amidst it all he has to fight against trickery and roguery, bear disappointments, and brave his abusers with a stout heart. He is also expected to send home articles for magazines, and sometimes finds the leisure to write books or become an authority on native languages. In isolated districts he plays the part of amateur doctor, attending to cuts and ulcers.

V.

As a rule, regular medical work is only done on mission stations of some years' standing, where a hospital has been built to secure thorough treatment. It is work demanding the greatest patience and determination. Any doctor knows the difficulty of getting patients to obey his orders. Much more difficult is it on the foreign field. Natives expect to be cured at once, and soon lose faith if recovery is not immediate. They will take too much medicine or refuse it altogether, undo bandages to see if a wound is healing, and ruin weeks of treatment by overfeeding. The doctor has also to fight the local prejudices and superstitions; e.g., natives come for treatment where amputation alone will effect a cure, and refuse it, fearing disablement in the future spirit world. Fearlessly he plods on, attacking dysentery, cholera, lupus, small-pox, and consumption, gaining knowledge and experience day by day, and meeting the craft of the native with a higher craft. He sets up electrical treatment, X-ray apparatus, introduces anti-toxins, builds sanatoria, insists on cleanliness, and ever remembers the soul as well as the body.

VI.

In our last section we find the foreign missionary thoroughly alive to the value of constructive educational work and the advantages gained in training the young. Both Sunday and day schools are being established, and well-trained teachers of both sexes are taking up these special duties.

The work is governed largely by the needs of the locality and the amount of money the "society" is prepared to spend. The educational missionary has to arrange small preparatory schools for both sexes, engage native teachers, equip the schools, devise regulations, determine curriculums, give lectures, and generally take control. In the case of the more civilised races, education is carried beyond the secondary school stage, and large colleges are established. China and India are notable instances of this. In such a Chinese college promising students are received from the day schools, pass through five years' training, and receive diplomas on reaching a definite standard of efficiency. The course embraces Chinese history and literature, mathematics, chemistry, physics, principles of magnetism and electricity, Latin, French, English, logic, and art. The Principal organises the recreations of the students, and thoroughly enjoys their attempts at tennis and cricket. From such colleges students are going out into the provinces of China, taking up important positions in Post and Customs Offices, carrying with them the life-changing influences of the Christian schools. The greatest opportunities await the educational missionary.

VII.

Our survey will not be quite complete without a word about salaries. The figures vary in the different sections and under the different societies, ranging from £90 to £400, the average being about £200. According to district and circumstance, this may mean abject poverty or comparative luxury. In large cities missionaries are expected to entertain and join in the social life, whereas on up-country stations a visitor is an event of a lifetime, and, owing to the simple mode of life, expenses are correspondingly low.

Again, in the case of a married man on a tropical station, he may have to support a home in England for his wife and family or pay for his children's education among friends. As a rule, salaries on African stations are lower than on Indian or Chinese. There are a few workers on the field receiving no salary, who pay their way out of their private income. The integrity of such is beyond doubt.

It is sometimes asked why the missionary does not tell us more about his life. There is eloquence in his silence. Reticent about his work, he is the last man in the world to brag. Quiet and unassuming, he continues his chosen labours, having no consciousness of martyrdom. In all his work he remembers the spirit of his Master, and of him, as of his Master, it can truly be said, "He saved others; himself he cannot save." These words epitomise his life.

RESULT OF "EVERYMAN" ESSAY COMPETITION

THE Prize of THREE GUINEAS offered by EVERYMAN for the best Essay on THE FOREIGN MISSIONARY has been awarded to the writer of the above paper,

Mr. FRANK D. JONES,
14, Conduit Road,
Sheffield,

who speaks from personal experience, having been engaged for some time in the mission field in China.

The majority of the Essays sent in deal with missionaries in India and in China. Only one competitor, a South African, ventures to attack the missionary. As might have been expected, many ladies at home and abroad took part in this Competition. Much interesting material is contained in the Essays received, but those who did justice to their subject were not very numerous.

The Essays of the Rev. C. Ryder Smith, Leeds, and H. Arthur Johnson, Sheffield, rank next in merit to the prize-winner's. We would also specially commend the work of the following:—

"A. B."; James O. Dobson, Durrington, Wilts.; Rev. James M. Macphail, Hillhead, Glasgow; John Naish, Kendal; Laurance E. Newell, Heaton Moor, near Stockport; G. L. Richardson, New Romney, Kent; M. Smith, Transvaal; Rev. John Torrance, Dailly, Ayrshire.

For announcement of New Competition, see p. 681.

THE DEPOPULATION OF FRANCE

By W. S. LILLY

(Concluded)

I.

AND now, resuming the study of M. Rossignol's book, upon which we entered last week, let us see what remedies he proposes for the depopulation of France. The one cause of it, he holds, is to be found in the will. Frenchmen either do not wish to have children, or they wish strictly to limit the number of them. Hence they remain bachelors, or become "neo-Malthusian" parents. Let us consider what he has to say about these two classes of—as he considers—traitors to their country.

And first of voluntary bachelors, by which he does not mean, of course, those who have good reasons—for instance, of health—for not marrying. "Le vieux garçonisme" which he has in view is a deliberately chosen state. The bachelors with whom he is concerned have, for the most part, determined, on starting in life, not to marry. The Baron Desforges, in Bourget's powerful novel, Mensonges is an excellent type of them. The lines

"I'm not a marrying man, my dear :
I go on another plan, my dear," sufficiently explain them. And their number is constantly increasing. "Paris," observes M. Georges Clement somewhat oddly, in a recent article, "is paved with bachelors, or at least certain quarters of Paris. You cannot take a step without meeting two or three." M. Klotz, in his inaugural address to the Commission on Depopulation, estimated the number of these celibates, over thirty years of age, throughout France, at 1,350,000; but M. Rossignol thinks that if you draw the line at twenty-five years, they amount to 3,000,000. He tells us of a public official, a friend of his, who on going to take up an appointment in the provinces, was embarrassed to find that he was almost the only married man in the official world of the department. And he gives us to understand that the case is by no means exceptional—quite the reverse, indeed. Hence France has been described as "a country in course of depopulation, governed by a committee of bachelors."

II.

Then, as to the smallness of French families, M. Rossignol admits that the title of his book, "A Country of Bachelors and of Only Sons," must not be taken too literally. If it were true au pied de la lettre, he observes, the population of France would be reduced in a century to two or three millions. The average number of children in each family is about three. And he urges that this is too little, when we consider the amount of infant mortality and the fact that 300 births yield but 192 adults. Nor is the reason of these small families open to doubt. There is a proverb which points to the explanation: "En fait d'enfants mieux vaut le couple que la douzaine"—two children are better than a dozen. A man, even in easy circumstances, with a large family is an object of ridicule. A poor man, similarly situated, is an object of blame. Zola, in his striking book, Germinal, tells us of the wife of a needy miner, who makes her appearance, accompanied by a little girl, before rich Madame Grégoire. "Is that your only child?" asks the lady. "Oh, no, madame," the poor woman replies; "I have seven." M. Grégoire drops the newspaper which he was reading and, rising in indignation, exclaims: "Seven! Why? Good Heavens!" "Yes, it is imprudent," murmurs his wife. "I can't understand," observed a wealthy woman to our author, "why workmen earning five francs a day want to marry and have four or five children. I really have no compassion for people of that sort. They should be reasonable." Their betters set them an example of this reasonableness, and the example is ever more and more followed by the lower middles, the operative classes, the peasants. But we should always remember that in limiting the number of their offspring, French parents are not influenced wholly by egotism. They allege the interests of the children themselves. The fewer the children, it is argued, the better will be their outlook on life. And if, as we are taught by a well-known school greatly in vogue just now, "agreeable feeling" is the great object of our existence and the test of right and wrong, is not the excuse valid?

III.

The will of the individual, then, according to M. Rossignol, is the cause of the evil which he deplures: and to cure it, he justly observes, we must act upon the will. "Yes," he continues, "to act on the will, to push (pousser) French citizens to marry, and to have at least three or four children—that is what we ought to aim at." But what force can we bring to influence the will? M. Rossignol admits that the most compelling force which could be brought to bear would be the force of religion—nay more, that religious beliefs alone, perhaps, are capable of solving the problem. But he excuses himself from discussing this remedy on the ground that he does not possess such beliefs, that he is "étranger à toute croyance confessionnelle." He leaves, therefore, the employment of the religious argument to the ministers of the various cults. For himself, he is obliged to fall back on the argument from self-interest, which he considers "the most efficacious force for those who do not admit revealed religion." He goes on then to maintain that the family is, and always must be, the foundation of society, and he cites Colonel Roosevelt, M. Ferdinand Buisson, and Taine in support of that—to me self-evident—proposition. More, he preaches patriotism as a religion, or a substitute for religion—la religion de la patrie—and he preaches very well. He pleads for the purification of the lubricious literature of his country which exhibits "agreeable feeling" in its lowest form as the summum bonum, and vehemently denounces journals which subsist on vice and crime, and novels that revel in glowing descriptions of things which St. Paul thought it a shame even to speak of. If this popular literature is the expression of society, he asks, what must French society now be? He would make an end of alcoholism, which he describes—and rightly—as one of the great curses of his country, perhaps the greatest. He would levy on bachelors, after a certain age, a tax equal to the cost of maintaining three children in their state of life. He would give a vote to the mother of a family, and an extra vote to the father. He would assign an annuity to a mother after the birth of a fourth child, and would bestow further assistance, if necessary, on the family. He would grant pensions to widows with children. He would give increased salaries to married public servants. He would levy a heavy succession duty on the estates of those who have less than three children. He desires "une bonne loi établissant que toute femme se livrant à la prostitution, en dehors des maisons tolérées, ou vivant en concubinage, serait condamnée à quelques mois de prison."

IV.

Now, what are we to say of these suggestions of M. Rossignol? For myself, knowing France pretty well, I must own that I strongly doubt the feasibility of any of them, and the efficacy of all of them combined, if, by a sort of miracle, they should be adopted. They seem to me to belong to the class of what Lord Bacon called "Atlantic and Utopian politics, which cannot be drawn into use." M. Rossignol rightly attributes the depopulation which he deplures to the will. I do not think his proposed laws, if he could get them passed, would act upon the will. There is a pregnant saying of Burke: "Manners and customs are of more importance than laws."

I am afraid that the conception of marriage expounded by Guy de Maupassant, in one of the least decorous of his novels, is deeply rooted in the mind of France: that "it is only an association of interests, a social bond, not a moral bond." So to regard marriage, is to debase it unspeakably, and to render it of small value to the commonwealth. I do not think you can compel people to produce children against their will.

"My dear Toby," said Mr. Shandy, touched by his brother's unbounded possession of 'the milk of human kindness,' 'my dear Toby, was I an Asian monarch, I would oblige thee, nolens volens, to beget for me one subject every month.' 'Now, I would not,' quoth my Uncle Toby, 'get a child, nolens volens, whether I would or not, to please the greatest prince upon earth.' I think the vast majority of Frenchmen will be of the opinion of "my Uncle Toby," especially as their country is by no means governed by the greatest prince upon earth, but by politicians who, I will content myself with saying—I wish to be courteous—excite no enthusiastic admiration among many of their countrymen.

V.

I am not, then, very hopeful about M. Rossignol's remedies for the mischief which he rightly deplures. It is a very deeply seated mischief. The truth of the matter is that life in France is dominated by a spurious individualism. This is the issue of her first Revolution, which was a gigantic effort to translate into fact the speculations of Rousseau. The true foundation for the State is not the individual, as Rousseau and his disciples thought, but the family. The result of their great mistake is to exalt selfishness into the place which ought to be occupied by self-sacrifice. The egoistic instinct has triumphed in France at the expense of the social instinct. This fact M. Rossignol, indeed, discerns, and he has expressed himself about it in weighty words, which may serve to end what I have to say about him and his book. "If there is one point upon which everyone is agreed, it is the necessity of opposing some dyke to the hideous individualism of our times." "Chacun pour soi"—everyone for himself—is a false doctrine, fatal to national as to individual soundness. The true doctrine is that a man exists for something beyond and above himself: for the family, for civil society, for his country.

"EVERYMAN" READING CIRCLES

THEIR FUNCTION AND ORGANISATION

AGAIN and again it has been suggested to us that the usefulness of EVERYMAN would be largely increased by establishing in every important centre of the kingdom an EVERYMAN Reading Circle. Again and again readers keenly interested in our journal have volunteered their kind services. From the beginning we have realised the value of those suggestions, and early last winter we had a competition on the "Best Methods of Organising Reading Circles." Now that EVERYMAN is about to enter upon the second year of its existence, and has become, we are proud to say, a recognised literary institution, the time has come to act on the lines suggested by our readers, to accept services which have been so generously offered, and to enlist them in the good cause of democratic education. We therefore propose at the earliest possible moment to establish EVERYMAN Reading Circles in as large a number of towns as possible, for the purpose of interpreting the masterpieces of literature and of discussing the burning public questions of the day.

It is, of course, understood that each club shall be autonomous, self-governing and self-supporting, with its own rules, its own programme, its own committee, its own lecturers. At the same time it will be the function of EVERYMAN to give guidance, both inside and outside its columns, and especially to act as a centre, focussing all the efforts, establishing efficient co-operation, recording the work which is being done, submitting and discussing suitable topics for debate, and, wherever possible, organising lectures, opening competitions and offering prizes, and eventually publishing the best papers which have been read before the EVERYMAN Reading Circles. In addition to the special page which will be devoted to the work of those Circles, we shall publish every week a column giving practical advice and direction on books and topics suitable for discussion, and suggesting on which lines those books and questions can best be treated.

When the local committees of the Reading Circles are constituted, we shall be very pleased if their secretaries will communicate their names and addresses, together with a provisional programme for next winter's work. And whilst the Circles are being organised we shall gladly welcome any suggestions which may interest local centres, and shall be more than pleased to aid the organisers in their work by all means in our power. It is obvious that those Reading Circles can only be the practical success which we expect them to be through the hearty co-operation of our regular readers. With their assistance, we shall, before long, have established all over the country a network of intellectual associations, communing in the appreciation and love of whatever is best in literature, and of whatever is most vital in politics and religion.

BERNARD SHAW'S "LION"

I.

MR. BERNARD SHAW'S new play, "Androcles and the Lion," at the St. James's Theatre shows him at the top of his bent. He dons with tremendous gusto the suit of motley that of all his disguises fits him best, and then, without any effort at all, begins to make us merry. And it is a very merry (if at times rather bewildered and at other times pleasantly shocked) audience at the St. James's. He uses all the tricks of professional humorists, but mainly (being Shaw) he relies upon the first thing that comes into his head. Like most jesters, he presumes upon his position, but, like all jesters, he is privileged, so that we are willing to take from him what we should never take from anyone else. The badge of folly that he wears labels all his folly for what it is, and whatever he says or does is excused. And that is well, for the aim of his wit is at those who listen to him. He has the audience in his eye whenever he speaks. It is an old tale now to say that he is a good shot. He is too practised a hand at discovering the weaknesses of men not to get a good hit. He makes us all feel a little bit foolish. He touches our cherished pretences, he shows up our inconsistencies, he assumes to have no reverence for our gods. But he is not always grinning. He is serious and wise, and, like the fools of Shakespeare, has many half sad, even half mad, things to say, so that he sets us wondering why he should be a jester at all.

II.

In his latest play, produced for the first time last week, Mr. Shaw takes for a plot the old fable of the slave who encounters a lion with a wounded paw, from which he extracts a thorn. Some time after, the slave is thrown to the lions, when the lion he had befriended recognises him, and, instead of eating him, caresses him. The fable gives Mr. Shaw a plot and a title; he makes the slave a Christian tailor, introduces Cæsar and the Christian martyrs, and makes the whole thing, like the subjects of his own lectures, a starting-point for a series of remarks upon the ideas and social and religious practices of our own time. By introducing the lion he makes the play definitely a burlesque. Unless, as I have said, we are ready to accept Mr. Shaw in his character of jester, we shall not know what to make of the burlesque. We shall perhaps think the fun elementary and stale when it is not rude, the serious things we shall be in danger of thinking to be rather bad jokes, and, like some of the critics, we may be stupid enough to feel some of the remarks to be blasphemous. You can see what a splendid opportunity a subject like the Christian martyrs gives Mr. Shaw for turning the exercise of his considerable gifts of satire and irony upon modern Christians, and you can be sure that he is not the man to miss such an opportunity. But, preserving your sense of humour and not being scared at plain speaking, you will find nothing objectionable in the use Mr. Shaw makes of his opportunity. He says some straight things and some provocative things, all of which he covers up in the explanatory note in the programme: "The twentieth-century Christian need not regard the Christianity of the early Christian martyrs as having much to do with his safe and eminently respectable Sunday profession of faith." As a matter of fact, Mr. Shaw gibes at us, not at the early Christians. He sees reality in their religion, and wherever Shaw finds reality in religion he does it justice and treats it with reverence. You get this trait in Shaw's character in this play, in "Fanny's First Play," and, indeed, in every play that he has written. Religion fascinates him when it is real. When it is merely conventional or fashionable, then he gets wild. The Christians in Mr. Shaw's play are admirable, with the exception of Spintho, who gets eaten by the lion by mistake, and even he is an old acquaintance. None of them are caricatures. For the first time on the stage we get martyrs who are convincing, simple and fine. Certainly there is not one of them of whom the modern Christian need feel ashamed.

III.

But it is not the Christians, but the lion that is the chief character. The "liny-piny" makes the play. From the time that his first yells are heard in the jungle at the opening of the play to the cheerful dance at the fall of the curtain, the lion keeps us happy and amused. He is a magnificent animal that must make Drury Lane envious. Never has a pantomime seen such a natural and human beast. His groans and roaring and innocent gambols, his smile, his damp nose, make him friendly and fearful at the same time; like Cæsar, we are not afraid of him, and yet would not have Androcles leave us alone. It is the lion that is the key to the play; when he chases Cæsar up the stairs to his imperial box at the arena, we are warned not to be too serious. It is merely a play. It is merely folly. It is the lion's skin that Mr. Shaw himself wears. His aspect is terrible, but his actions are kind. He roars until the Christian trembles, but he will not eat him. He makes Cæsar run for his life, but he does him no harm. Mr. Shaw has put himself into many plays, but never so well as in this one.

IV.

The production of the play by Mr. Granville Barker is another triumph for that excellent artist. With the aid of Mr. Albert Rothenstein, who was responsible for the decoration (as in the "Winter's Tale" at the Savoy), he has produced a thing of beauty that all who care for originality in the theatre will enjoy. The play is worth seeing for the staging and decoration alone. Nowhere in the English theatre will you find anything approaching it for interest and for genuine art. The acting, as in everything Mr. Barker is concerned with, was perfect. I do not know that I have ever seen any of the players to better advantage, though none of them had very much to do. One of the strange things about the play was the easiness and rapidity with which it played. It was over before we knew where we were, and yet we were not out of the theatre early. That at least is a testimony to the way in which it holds the attention.

I cannot say as much for the play that preceded it, "The Harlequinade," by Dion Clayton Calthrop and Granville Barker. This is a charming sentimental fancy, just a little too long-winded not to bore the audience very slightly. How the gods came down to earth in the long past and went back the day after to-morrow is what "The Harlequinade" relates. And it is all very good and pleasing, and if there were time one could write a good deal upon it. It hardly has the spontaneity of Mr. Shaw's play; it is, indeed, frankly self-conscious, and, as such, will doubtless appeal mainly to self-conscious people. Anyone could see Mr. Shaw's play and enjoy it, even children; but I am not sure what children would make of this play, though the Clown and Columbine and Harlequin should be old friends of theirs.

If you go to the St. James's ready to be surprised and charmed by things that the ordinary theatre knows nothing of you will have a delightful evening. I envy you; I want to go again. But don't go looking for a play like the one you saw last, for you will be disappointed.

C. B. PURDOM.

THE POETRY OF MRS. MEYNELL

BY ERNEST RHYS

I.

IN the single leaf of what must be the briefest autobiography on record, which Mrs. Meynell wrote for an importunate editor some years ago, she said laconically, "Spent a great part of my youth in Italy." The sequel to this is to be found in one of her later poems, "The Watershed," written between Munich and Verona on a journey south when the north and the northward rivers seemed to be striving to hold the traveller back. The last stave runs:—

"But oh the unfolding South! the hurst
Of summer! Oh to see
Of all the southward brooks the first!
The travelling heart went free
With endless streams; that strife was stopped;
And down a thousand vales I dropped,
I flowed to Italy."

The inter-play of the spirits of England and Italy upon the minds of the English poets has always been, since the days of Chaucer, or of Wyatt and Surrey, a stimulating one. Mrs. Meynell's first book, "Preludes," which appeared in 1875 with drawings by her sister (who became famous afterwards as the painter of "The Roll Call"—Lady Butler), has a sonnet, "Spring on the Alban Hills," which again is characteristic. In it the spring is pictured coming over the Campagna "with a full heart silently," and we shall find this phrase a clue to much that is distinctive in her lyric style.

II.

Ruskin, a critic whom any poet would be glad to evoke, paid good tribute to two poems of this early volume; one of them, "San Lorenzo's Mother":—

"I had not seen my son's dear face
(He chose the cloister by God's grace)
Since it had come to full flower-time.
I hardly guessed at its perfect prime,
That folded flower of his dear face.

There is one alone who cannot change;
Dreams are we, shadows, visions strange;
And all I give is given to one.
I might mistake my dearest son,
But never the Son who cannot change."

When we turn from these lines to their successors in her recently collected "Poems" (Burns and Oates, third edition, 1913) we see that it is not a large achievement, counted in pages or weighed in ounces, that appears in the whole book. We might suppose its contents the final residue of many leaves never published and deliberately rejected and put aside; and even as it is, some of them have the air of an almost unwilling utterance. Not one is the product of idle occasion or of the desire to write because there is a subject anxious to be published and a public eager to read:—

"I shall be silent in those days desired Before a world inspired."

These lines, too, are predictive, and have proved to be so surely so that they may be fairly looked upon as the key to a self-confession.

III.

We may count it as part of the religious inspiration of her poetry that there is an air as of something held back, a spirit and an element in reserve, about this writer. It adds to our pleasure in reading any verse to know that, with all its savour of rare viands and uncommon vintages, there is a rarer feast that has not been broached. On another score one might test the economy of her art by watching its use of one favourite symbol—the SEA. She has a love for sea-imagery, which has often led her to work out most musically the old analogy between the sea-tides and the human under-tides that they seem to imitate or to govern. This may be seen in the two poems from the earlier volume reprinted in the complete edition, "Regrets" and "The Visiting Sea." Another, and a very sympathetic sea-piece, in a different interpretation, may be seen in a later page, where the lyric picture called "A Poet's Wife" occurs. But what is notable in this, as in all her verse, is that, while her writing is never exuberant, it is full of emotion. It is the impulsive naturalness of the confession in "A Letter from a Girl to her own Old Age" that makes it, with its passage from a girl's feelings to the swift intuition of old age, so wondrous affecting. It was Ruskin, again, who was moved by it to call its last verse "perfectly heavenly"; and the two last stanzas ought perhaps to be given, for the sake of those who do not possess the book, and in order to explain his superlatives:—

"Pardon the girl; such strange desires beset her,
Poor woman, lay aside the mournful letter
That breaks thy heart; the one that wrote, forget her.

The one that now thy faded features guesses,
With filial fingers thy grey hair caresses,
With morning tears thy mournful twilight blesses."

IV.

Mrs. Meynell's sonnet, "Renouncement," won the praise, we may add, both of the elect, and the simple lovers of poetry, and a connoisseur in sonnets, the late William Sharp, added it long ago to his anthology, "A Century of Sonnets." There, again, the lines are as idiomatically right as the poetic reality of the ideas they convey is sure:—

"I must not think of thee; and, tired yet strong,
I shun the love that lurks in all delight—
The love of thee—and in the blue Heaven's height,
And in the dearest passage of a song.
Oh, just beyond the sweetest thoughts that throng
This breast, the thought of thee waits hidden yet bright;
But it must never, never come in sight;
I must stop short of thee the whole day long.
But when sleep comes to close each difficult day,
When night gives pause to the long watch I keep,
And all my bonds I needs must loose apart,
Must doff my will as raiment laid away,—
With the first dream that comes with the first sleep
I run, I run, I am gathered to thy heart."

But to understand in full the measure of Mrs. Meynell's faculty, and her play of ideas, we must turn to her essays. There indeed lies matter for another tale.

LITERARY NOTES

Boys' books, we all know, are generally devoured with equal gusto by girls if they are of the right sort—both the books and the girls we mean. And the best boys' books of all are capable of being read with thorough enjoyment by the boys' parents as well. Such is the underlying principle of a new series launched by Messrs. Wells Gardner, Darton and Co., the "Fathers and Sons Library." These enterprising publishers "believe the time has come when older boys no longer want to be treated as children and furnished with books got up in the very decorative fashion of the nursery, and we believe also that men enjoy a good boys' book just as much as boys enjoy a good novel of adventure." Mr. John Barnett's latest story, "The New Guv'nor," was issued last week in this series, which will include stories by Mr. Masfield and other writers of mark.

Messrs. Chapman and Hall will publish at an early date "Jean and Louise," by Antonin Dussère, a peasant of Auvergne, who has been "discovered" by Marguerite Audoux, herself an obscure seamstress until not long ago, when her remarkable story, "Marie Claire," made her name known on both sides of the Channel. Antonin Dussère, a true son of the soil, has, we are told, received no education beyond what he has been able to cull from books bought cheaply on market days, and read during his hour of afternoon rest in the fields, when, for a brief interval, the sound of his threshing machine was silenced. Yet upon this slight foundation he has built up a literary style which is able to reflect, in terms of the most vivid and haunting realism, the simple life around him, with all its hitherto unvoiced joys and sorrow, its dumb humours and tragedies.

A new translation of Heine's "Atta Troll" has been made by Mr. Herman Scheffauer, who needs no introduction to readers of EVERYMAN. The book, which will be published by Messrs. Sidgwick and Jackson, will be illustrated by Willy Pogany and Horace Taylor, and will contain an introduction and notes by Dr. Oscar Levy.

Mr. W. R. Lawson, who, as chairman of the Railway Shareholders' Association, writes with no small experience and authority, has prepared a volume on "British Railways," in which he discusses such questions as State control, nationalisation, Board of Trade supervision, obstructive legislation, labour unrest, recognition of trades unions, traders' grievances, electrification, etc. The book will be published by Messrs. Constable and Co., who have in preparation another work of interest to political economists—"Good and Bad Trade," by G. R. Hawtrey. Mr. Hawtrey sets out to explain those elements in the modern economic organisation of the world which cause the great and almost rhythmical fluctuations in trade, and argues that these wave-motions are due to disturbances in the available stock of money—"money" including every species of purchasing power available for immediate use, whether in the form of legal tender or credit.

Victor Hugo must have received not a few love-letters in his long life. A little bundle of 15,000 letters addressed to the poet by his devoted friend, Juliette Drouet, has just been brought to light. These are being sifted and selected by a committee of French scholars, and will be published simultaneously in Paris, London, and other capitals of Europe. The copyright for the English version has been secured by Mr. Stanley Paul. The discoverer of the letters will supply a monograph on Victor Hugo, as reflected in these fascinating love-letters.

Cecil Rhodes has no lack of biographers. The latest addition to the ranks is Mr. Gordon le Sueur, who was for many years intimately associated with Rhodes. "Cecil Rhodes: the Man and his Work," will be published by Mr. Murray.

The Kaiser's jubilee year has naturally witnessed a crop of biographical studies and appreciations—or depreciations. Messrs. Methuen this week add to their number "William of Germany," by Stanley Shaw, LL.D. (7s. 6d.), who has spent the last twelve years in Berlin as a close observer of the Emperor and his Empire. Dr. Shaw brings his study right up to the present day, and even glances into the future when he says, "if his spring was boisterous and his summer gusty and uncertain, a mellow autumn gives promise of a hale and kindly winter."

Another jubilee publication of the week is "The Story of the C.W.S.," being the jubilee history of the Co-operative Wholesale Society, Ltd., 1863-1913, by Percy Redfern, editor of the Wheatshaf. The volume, which is issued by the Co-operative Wholesale Society, Ltd., is a bulky one of well over 400 pages, and its historical survey will appeal to all interested in the co-operative movement.

NEW ESSAY COMPETITION

"EVERYMAN" AND THE CHANNEL TUNNEL

TIME and again the project of a Channel Tunnel has been mooted, but hitherto no British Government has seen its way to endorse such an undertaking. The scheme is now once more under official consideration, and many arguments, old and new, pro and con, are being adduced by soldiers, sailors, and civilians. In the light of recent international developments—the Entente Cordiale and the European Race of Armaments—the probable rôle, in peace and in war, of an English Channel Tunnel is being discussed afresh; and it is of supreme importance to this country that no argument on the one side or on the other should be overlooked.

EVERYMAN accordingly offers a Prize of TWO GUINEAS for the best Essay, constituting

A Plea For or Against the Channel Tunnel

Papers must not exceed 2,000 words in length (exclusive of a brief synopsis), and must reach the

COMPETITION EDITOR, "EVERYMAN,"

21, Royal Terrace, Edinburgh,

not later than October 17th. "Channel Tunnel" should be marked in the corner of envelopes. Essays sent in should be carefully paragraphed, and must be clearly written, preferably typewritten, on one side of the paper only. All entries shall become the exclusive property of the Editor, who cannot undertake to return any MS.

Next week will be published the result of EVERYMAN Competition No. 5, The Composer, and in subsequent issues Competitions 4 and 2 ("The Male Teacher" and "The Anglican Clergyman") will be decided. The result of the "Robespierre" Competition will also be announced in next week's issue.

MASTERPIECE FOR THE WEEK

WHITE'S "NATURAL HISTORY OF SELBORNE" * * BY LIDDELL GEDDIE

I.

In 1789 there appeared in London the first edition of "The Natural History and Antiquities of Selborne, in the County of Southampton," by Gilbert White, who stated in his preface that he wished to lay before the public "his idea of a parochial history, which, he thinks, ought to consist of natural productions and occurrences as well as antiquities." At the first blush it may seem incongruous that a book so detached, so full of peace and repose, should have been published in the year of the French Revolution, "in a most eventful and portentous period"—to quote Gilbert White himself (who abhorred "the dangerous doctrines of levellers and republicans")—"when wars, devastations, revolutions, and insurrections crowd so fast upon the back of one another that a thinking mind cannot but suppose that providence has some great work in hand!" On second thoughts, however, we must recognise in "The Natural History of Selborne" a leading text-book of that revolution which, at the close of the eighteenth century, swept not France alone, but all Europe. Who, indeed, preached the "Return to Nature" more sanely, more impellingly, than the curate of Selborne? Who rebelled against the self-sufficiency of the eighteenth century more effectively than Gilbert White the naturalist, Gilbert White the antiquarian?

In him the Romantic Movement had one of its most distinguished pioneers. His whole life was encompassed in the eighteenth century—he was born in 1720 and died in 1793—but his work belongs rather to the nineteenth century in matter and in spirit. Only the form is of the eighteenth century, and there is no reason to deplore it. Letter-writing was a fine art in these days. And Gilbert White was a born letter-writer as well as a born naturalist. The epistolary form of his "Natural History" has nowadays a pleasing piquancy. There is nothing stilted about these letters; notwithstanding the "nicety" of their expression, they are, almost without exception, genuine letters, actually sent to correspondents, and only collected in after times when at last their writer screwed his courage to the publishing point.

II.

"It has been my misfortune," writes Gilbert White early in his book, "never to have had any neighbours whose studies have led them towards the pursuit of natural knowledge; so that, for want of a companion to quicken my industry and sharpen my attention, I have made but slender progress in a kind of information to which I have been attached from my childhood." This absence of a neighbour of kindred tastes was certainly unfortunate for Gilbert White, but for posterity it was perhaps the reverse. Had he found at his own door some fellow-naturalist to share his walks and observations he might not have felt the necessity of conducting the correspondence afterwards edited as "The Natural History of Selborne." As it was, he had to rely upon his own unbounded enthusiasm and the intermittent favours of the post.

No matter where Gilbert White had resided, he would have found something worth observing and reporting. By good luck he was located, well-nigh throughout his life, in a region full of interest for the antiquarian and the naturalist. For the zoologist, the botanist, the geologist, the meteorologist, Selborne had peculiar charms; and our only cause for regret is that it lies inland, for, as Gilbert White remarks, "if fortune had settled me near the seaside, or near some great river, my natural propensity would soon have urged me to have made myself acquainted with their productions."

Since White's day the number of parish monographs has been legion, but Selborne remains in a class by itself. Read but the opening chapters of "The Natural History," in which the parish of Selborne is described in detail, and, even though nature study has no appeal for you, you will understand why this corner of Hampshire is world-famed. White loved his fellow-men as well as birds and trees, and nothing escaped his vigilant eye and painstaking pen. How simple, yet how quaintly impressive is the following picture:—

"The village of Selborne, and large hamlet of Oak-hanger, with the single farms, and many scattered houses along the verge of the forest, contain upwards of six hundred and seventy inhabitants.

"We abound with poor; many of whom are sober and industrious, and live comfortably, in good stone or brick cottages which are glazed, and have chambers above stairs; mud buildings we have none. Besides the employment from husbandry, the men work in hop gardens, of which we have many; and fell and bark timber. In the spring and summer the women weed the corn; and enjoy a second harvest in September by hop picking. Formerly in the dead months, they availed themselves greatly by spinning wool, for making of barragons, a genteel corded stuff, much in vogue at that time for summer wear; and chiefly manufactured at Alton, a neighbouring town, by some of the people called Quakers. The inhabitants enjoy a good share of health and longevity, and the parish swarms with children."

III.

We have no portrait of Gilbert White, but with "The Natural History of Selborne" before us, what need have we of one? In his book he painted his own portrait. Not that it is egotistical. On the contrary, Gilbert was painfully shy and modest. Directly, he tells us next to nothing about himself. Practically the only personal allusion is when he confesses:—

"Frequent returns of deafness incommode me sadly, and half disqualify me for a naturalist; for, when those fits are upon me, I lose all the pleasing notices and little intimations arising from rural sounds; and May is to me as silent and mute, with respect to the notes of birds, etc., as August. My eyesight is, thank God, quick and good; but with respect to the other sense I am at times disabled, 'And Wisdom at one entrance quite shut out.'"

Indirectly, however, he tells us enough about himself to make us love him as a true and trusted friend. On every page we can clearly trace his water-mark, the image of a man ever kindly, ideal, poetical, retiring, observant, shrewd withal, methodical and precise.

IV.

Gilbert White was no trained scientist. He was an outdoor naturalist, a naturalist by instinct, an observer and recorder rather than a student and investigator. And so his place in Literature is far higher than his place in Science. Yet his contribution to Science was no insignificant one, and by its inspiration of others—Darwin, to mention only one—"The Natural History of Selborne" transcends itself as a scientific treatise. Had it ranked higher in the realm of Science, his book might very well have ranked lower in the domain of Letters. It would certainly have been less popular, and would not improbably have fallen into the abstruseness, prolixity and "dryasdustness" which Gilbert White was so careful to avoid.

V.

The secret of White's success is easily read. He had the gift—vouchsafed to how few!—of holding a faithful mirror up to Nature. He found all sorts of trivial things fascinating, and he had the invaluable art of interesting others in what he himself found captivating. Thus the random jottings of this "venerable vegetable," as White once playfully called himself, have a universal appeal and a perennial charm. What a relief it is to leave this hustling twentieth century of ours and wander into the secluded garden of "The Wakes," there to watch the laborious peregrinations of Timothy, the tortoise; or, under the gentle Gilbert's guidance, stroll through Wolmer Forest, observe the migration of birds, or note the rainfall day by day. Open the "Natural History" where you will, and the Selborne scribe will straightway persuade you that the world, our everyday world,

"is so full of a number of things,
I'm sure we should all be as happy as kings."

Take, for instance, the half-dozen letters dated 1775. In March Gilbert White writes to Pennant, expressing the hope that "some future faunist, a man of fortune, will extend his visits to the kingdom of Ireland, a new field and a country little known to the naturalist." "The manners of the wild natives," he adds, "their superstitions, their prejudices, their sordid way of life, will extort from him many useful reflections." In June he sends to his other correspondent, the Hon. Daines Barrington, an exquisite little dissertation on gossamer, beginning, with characteristic precision:—

"On September the 21st, 1741, being then on a visit, and intent on field diversions, I rose before daybreak: when I came into the enclosures, I found the stubbles and clover grounds matted all over with a thick coat of cobweb, in the meshes of which a copious and heavy dew hung so plentifully, that the whole face of the country seemed, as it were, covered with two or three setting nets, drawn one over another. When the dogs attempted to hunt, their eyes were so blinded and hoodwinked that they could not proceed, but were obliged to lie down and scrape the incumbrances from their faces with their forefeet; so that, finding my sport interrupted, I returned home, musing in my mind on the oddness of the occurrence."

Then, in August, he writes to the same correspondent on "the wonderful spirit of sociality in the brute creation"—a perfect essayette on Gregariousness. In October his theme is gipsies; in November he finds a congenial topic—rush candles, a subject he had "considered with some degree of exactness"; and in December he discourses in most engaging fashion on an idiot boy who had lived in Selborne twenty years before, and who, "from a child, showed a strong propensity to bees; they were his food, his amusement, his sole object."

These are but samples, picked haphazard, but they give some indication of the variety and type of subjects on which Gilbert White loves to muse, to borrow his own expression. His favourite themes, of course, were the migration of birds, martins, swallows and swifts, and that most English of topics—the weather. But, no matter which of his hobby-horses he mounts, we may always count on a delightful outing in Gilbert White's company, for, as his good friend Mulso wrote to him, with prophetic insight, in 1776, long before his book was published: "No man communicates the pleasure of his excursions or makes the world partake of them in a more useful manner than you do. . . . Your work, upon the whole, will immortalize your place of abode as well as yourself." What other man in the whole range of English literature has inscribed his name on the roll of the immortals by virtue of a single book, published in his seventieth year?

THE ENGLISH NOVEL*

IN the preface to his book on "The English Novel,"* which has just been added to the Channels of English Literature Series, Professor Saintsbury remarks that it is "somewhat curious that there is, so far as I know, no complete handling in English of the subject of this volume, popular and important though that subject has been." Now, it is undoubtedly the case that those who, for whatever reason, wished to trace the genesis and evolution of the novel, as a form of English literature, have hitherto found no satisfactory textbook to serve as a guide. The works on a large scale bearing on the subject were out of date or too general; those on a small scale were inadequate and scrappy.

But is this absence of a complete and authoritative monograph on the English novel so "curious" as Professor Saintsbury would make out? The very popularity of the novel makes the task of describing its growth and narrating its history particularly difficult and uninviting for the literary critic of standing who is prone to consider anything "popular" beneath his notice; and only the boldest of bibliophages could sit down to read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest the whole Gargantuan feast of novels which, for the past century and a half, publishers have been laying before successive generations of insatiable customers. Professor Saintsbury, however, far from being daunted by such an arduous undertaking, simply revels in it, and there can be no question that his long experience as a book reviewer and his scholarship as a professor make him exceptionally fitted for the task.

Not that the volume is everything that could be desired. The restrictions (in point of size, scope, etc.) of the series to which it belongs no doubt account for many omissions in the book, and the author himself admits that he "would have liked to deal with so large a matter in a larger space." It is no use turning to Professor Saintsbury's volume for a comparison of the English novel with the novel of other lands. He makes no mention of the contribution to the English novel—that is, the novel in the English language—made by American writers; and of living novelists (save Mr. Thomas Hardy) he has nothing to say, on the score that their work can never be satisfactorily treated in such a book, "first, because they are living, and, secondly, because it is not done."

But, this apart, Professor Saintsbury does ample justice to his subject. He lays bare the foundation of the novel in Romance, between which and the novel he refuses to draw a hard-and-fast line. One chapter suffices to survey the Old and Middle English periods. The second carries us from Lyly to Swift, and prepares us for the novel proper of Richardson, Fielding, Smollett, and Sterne. The work of these pioneers he ably analyses, showing how "in almost exactly the course of a technical generation—from the appearance of 'Pamela' in 1740 to that of 'Humphrey Clinker' in 1771—the wain of the novel was solidly built, furnished with four main wheels to move it, and set agoing to travel through the centuries." The minor and later eighteenth-century novel is next discussed. Scott and Miss Austen, appropriately enough, get a chapter to themselves. To their successors as far as Thackeray the same space is allotted. The term "Victorian" in our superior days is so frequently used as an epithet of contempt, that it is refreshing to read Professor Saintsbury's high praise of the mid-Victorian novel. The concluding chapter covers the "Fiction of Yesterday," and takes us to Meredith and Stevenson and the close of the nineteenth century.

EVERYMAN'S FRENCH PAGE

LE PÉLÉRINAGE DU CHRÉTIEN

COMME je voyageais par le désert de ce monde, j'arrivai dans un lieu où il y avait une caverne. Je m'y couchai pour prendre un peu de repos, et, m'étant endormi, je vis en songe un homme vêtu d'habits sales et déchirés. Il était debout, tournant le dos à sa propre maison. Il avait un livre à la main, et il était chargé d'un pesant fardeau. Je vis ensuite qu'il ouvrit le livre et qu'il y lisait. Bientôt il se mit à pleurer et à trembler, de sorte qu'étant tout effrayé, il s'écria d'un ton triste et plaintif: "Que faut-il que je fasse?" Dans cet état, il retourna chez lui, et se contraignit, aussi longtemps qu'il lui fut possible. Mais comme sa tristesse augmentait de plus en plus, il ne put se contenir longtemps; ainsi il leur découvrit bientôt ce qu'il avait sur le cœur, et il leur dit: "Ma chère femme, et vous, mes chers enfants, que je suis misérable, et que je suis à plaindre! Je suis perdu, et le pesant fardeau qui m'accable est la cause de ma perte. J'ai d'ailleurs un avertissement certain que cette ville où nous habitons va être embrasée par le feu du ciel, et que les uns et les autres, moi, et vous ma chère femme, et vous mes chers enfants nous serons misérablement enveloppés tous ensemble dans cet épouvantable embrasement, si nous ne trouvons pas un asile pour nous mettre à couvert; or, jusqu'ici je n'en vois aucun."

Il arrivait aussi qu'en allant par la campagne les yeux fixés, selon sa coutume, sur son livre, il était extrêmement en peine, et j'entendis qu'en lisant il s'écria tout haut comme auparavant, "Que faut-il que je fasse pour être sauvé?" Je remarquai d'ailleurs qu'il tournait les yeux, tantôt d'un côté, tantôt de l'autre, comme un homme qui cherche à s'enfuir; cependant il ne quittait point la place, parcequ'apparemment il ne savait où aller. Sur cela je vis un homme, dont le nom était Évangéliste, qui s'approcha de lui, et qui lui demanda pourquoi il poussait des cris si lamentables. "Monsieur, lui répondit-il," je vois par le livre que j'ai entre les mains que je suis condamné à la mort, et qu'ensuite je dois comparaître en jugement. Je ne saurais me résoudre à la première, et je ne suis nullement préparé au dernier." L'Évangéliste: "Comment ne pouvez-vous pas vous résoudre à la mort, puisque cette vie est mêlée de tant de maux." Le Chrétien: "C'est que je crains que le fardeau que je porte ne me fasse enfoncer plus bas que le sépulcre, et ne me précipite jusqu'au fond des enfers. Or, monsieur, si je ne suis pas seulement en état de souffrir la prison, combien moins pourrais-je soutenir le jugement et en subir l'exécution? Voilà ce qui me fait pousser tant de gémissements." L'Évangéliste: "Si tel est votre état, pourquoi en demeurez-vous là?" "Hélas!" répondit le Chrétien, "je ne sais où aller." Là-dessus l'Évangéliste lui donna un mémoire en parchemin, où étaient écrites ces paroles: "Fuyez arrière de la colère à venir."

Le Chrétien lut ce mémoire, et aussitôt il demanda à l'Évangéliste, en le regardant tristement, "Où est-ce donc qu'il faut fuir?" Alors l'Évangéliste lui dit, "Voyez-vous bien, de ce côté-là, une petite porte étroite?" Cet homme lui répondit, "Non." L'Évangéliste lui dit, "Ne voyez-vous pas, du moins, une lumière, brillante au milieu de l'obscurité?" "Il me semble," répliqua-t-il, "que je la vois." "Eh bien," dit l'Évangéliste, "attachez uniquement les yeux sur cette lumière, marchez droit à elle, et alors vous verrez bientôt la porte étroite. Quand vous y heurterez, on vous dira ce que vous aurez à faire."

PROEM OF "THE PILGRIM'S PROGRESS"

As I walked through the wilderness of this world, I lighted on a certain place where was a den, and I laid me down in that place to sleep; and as I slept, I dreamed, and, behold, I saw a man clothed with rags, standing in a certain place, with his face from his own house, a book in his hand, and a great burden upon his back. I looked, and saw him open the book, and read therein, and as he read he wept and trembled; and, not being able longer to contain, he brake out with a lamentable cry, saying, "What shall I do?"

In this plight, therefore, he went home, and refrained himself as long as he could, but he could not be silent long, because that his trouble increased; wherefore, at length, he brake his mind to his wife and children, and thus he began to talk to them: "Oh, my dear wife," said he, "and you, the children of my bowels, I, your dear friend, am in myself undone by reason of a burden that lieth hard upon me: moreover, I am for certain informed that this our city will be burnt with fire from heaven; in which fearful overthrow both myself, with thee, my wife, and you, my sweet babes, shall miserably come to ruin, except (the which yet I see not) some way of escape may be found whereby we may be delivered."

Now I saw, upon a time, when he was walking in the fields, that he was (as he was wont) reading his book, and greatly distressed in his mind; and, as he read, he burst out as he had done before, crying, "What shall I do to be saved?" I saw, also, that he looked this way and that way, as if he would run; yet he stood still, because (as I perceived) he could not tell which way to go. I looked then, and saw a man named Evangelist, coming to him, and he asked, "Wherefore dost thou cry?" He answered, "Sir, I perceive, by the book in my hand, that I am condemned to die, and after that to come to judgment; and I find that I am not willing to do the first nor able to do the second." Then said Evangelist, "Why not willing to die, since this life is attended with so many evils?" The man answered, "Because I fear that this burden that is upon my back will sink me lower than the grave, and I shall fall into Topet. And, sir, if I be not fit to go to prison, I am not fit to go to judgment, and from thence to execution; and the thoughts of these things make me cry." "Then," said Evangelist, "if this be thy condition, why standest thou still?" He answered, "Because I know not whither to go." Then he gave him a parchment-roll, and there was written within, "Fly from the wrath to come!" The man therefore read it, and, looking upon Evangelist very carefully, said, "Whither must I fly?" Then said Evangelist, "Do you see yonder wicket-gate?" The man said, "No." Then said the other, "Do you see yonder shining light?" He said, "I think I do." Then said Evangelist, "Keep that light in your eye, and go up directly thereto, so shalt thou see the Gate; at which, when thou knockest, it shall be told thee what thou shalt do."

THE GROWTH OF THE SINGLE-TAX PRINCIPLE IN WESTERN CANADA

"THE most striking feature in a study of tax reform in Western Canada is the strong trend throughout the entire country in the direction of the single-tax principle. That so far it is working satisfactorily wherever tried is generally admitted, even by opponents of the principle. In no district in which the principle has been applied is there any noticeable desire to return to the old system. From present indications it is safe to predict that within the next ten or twenty years the single-tax principle will be adopted by every taxing district in Western Canada."

The above extract from the 1912 report of the Minnesota Tax Commission (U.S.A.) is an unbiased summary of the situation here.

For the past twenty years the policy of decreasing taxation on improvements, and increasing it on land values, has been gaining in popularity and practice, and each year sees some further development along this line.

There are no taxes upon farm improvements, stock, grain, buildings, machinery, etc., for municipal purposes in the whole of Western Canada, comprised of the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, and British Columbia.

In the whole of this vast district farm land of equal value pays equal taxes, whether it is improved or unimproved.

The practice of exempting improvements from taxation is also spreading to the towns and cities. In British Columbia the municipalities have local option in taxation, and the majority of them raise their revenue by a tax on land values only.

Land Taxation In British Columbia.

Vancouver, the metropolis of British Columbia, is the largest city in Canada which exempts buildings and improvements on land from taxation. The first step toward exemption was taken in 1895, when the assessment on improvements was reduced to 50 per cent. of their full value. This was followed in 1906 by an additional decrease of 25 per cent., and in 1910 entire exemption was brought about. The result was magical. There was an immediate advance in local prosperity, splendid buildings at once began to take the place of shacks, and the city grew in population by leaps and bounds. Ten years ago it had a population of less than 27,000; to-day it exceeds 150,000. In 1901 the assessed value of the land was less than 23,000,000 dollars; to-day it exceeds 100,000,000 dollars. That the marvellous growth of the city is entirely due to its taxing system is not claimed, but that it has stimulated and aided such growth is generally admitted.

After watching the operation of land value taxation in Vancouver for one year, the neighbouring city of New Westminster adopted the same system. This is how the movement grows. The greatest argument in favour of the municipal single tax is the thing itself. It is a case of the survival of the fittest. In Western Canada the practice of taxing land values only has grown because it has demonstrated its efficiency. Those towns and cities which have adopted this system have reaped their reward in more and better buildings, more business, and increased population.

Evidence of this fact can be secured from building records, which show that those municipalities which exempt buildings from taxation record a greater increase in the number and value of the buildings erected than those municipalities which tax buildings.

So satisfactory has the system proved in municipal affairs in British Columbia that it is now proposed to extend it into provincial affairs. The Hon. Price Ellison, Finance Minister, in his Budget speech for this year, said it was the aim of the Government "to reach a point where our revenues will be derived from the natural resources of this province."

Taxation In Alberta.

Travelling eastward, we reach the province of Alberta, in which land value taxation is compulsory both in rural and urban municipalities, with the exception of one or two cities operating under special charters. Edmonton, the capital city, operates under a special charter, but had adopted land value taxation before the compulsory legislation was passed. One of the most striking examples of the way in which the municipal single tax brings land into use occurred in Edmonton. Prior to its adoption by that city the Hudson's Bay Company held a large tract of land near the centre of the city idle. When taxation was placed on land values only, the company found it unprofitable to keep this land, and consequently sold a large quantity of it in small parcels.

In Saskatchewan.

Travelling eastward again, we reach Saskatchewan, in which province the single-tax principle is far advanced. As before stated, farm improvements are exempt from taxation, but, in order to discourage land speculation, the legislators of this province have gone a step farther. At the last session of the Legislature an amendment was made to the Rural Municipalities Act, by which each Rural Municipal Council will levy a surtax of ten dollars per quarter section on the following lands, beginning in 1914:—

"1. The land of any owner or occupant not exceeding 320 acres which has less than one-quarter of its area under cultivation, unless such owner or occupant is an actual resident upon the said land;

"2. The land of any owner or occupant exceeding 320 acres, but not greater than 640 acres, which has less than one-quarter of its area under cultivation;

"3. The land of any owner or occupant exceeding 640 acres, but not greater than 1,280 acres, which has less than one-half its area under cultivation;

"4. The land of any owner or occupant exceeding 1,280 acres, but not greater than 1,920 acres, which has less than one-half of its area under cultivation;

"5. The land of any owner or occupant exceeding 1,920 acres."

The aim of this Bill is to tax the non-resident land speculator, and also to tax owners of large estates. It is heartily approved by the farmers of Saskatchewan, who passed the following resolution at their last annual Convention:—

"That this Convention heartily approves of the recent provincial legislation, rendering it obligatory that all rural school and municipal revenues of the province be raised by a tax on unimproved land values;

"And, further, that we recognise that land speculation is one of the worst evils to-day existent in Saskatchewan, and we are therefore in accord with the recent 'surtax' provision, by which the speculator will be more heavily taxed than the bona-fide farmer;

"And, further, that we consider that the most equitable method of raising all public revenues is by a tax upon unimproved land values."

These farmers evidently do not think that "the single tax will hurt the farmer." The towns and cities of Saskatchewan have power to adopt the municipal single tax by easy stages. The Assessment Act stipulates that buildings must be assessed at 60 per cent. of their value, and land at its full value. Any city or town may reduce the assessment on improvements 15 per cent. each year until improvements are totally exempt from taxation. Regina, the capital city, has this year reached the stage where buildings are only taxed on 15 per cent. of their value. Practically all of the towns and cities in Saskatchewan are following the same policy.

In Manitoba.

In the province of Manitoba we find that although, as usual, farm improvements are exempt from taxation, little progress has been made in the urban districts.

Winnipeg, the capital city, with a population of 200,000, did secure a change in its charter in 1909, by which improvements are assessed at two-thirds of their value, and land at its full value. There is a steady demand for a change in the Assessment Act which will give the towns and cities local option in taxation, but no action in this direction has been taken by the powers that be.

In Eastern Canada an active campaign for local option in taxation is being carried on by the Tax Reform Association of Ontario. On January 1st, 1913, the association succeeded in getting the following question submitted to the ratepayers of Toronto:—"Are you in favour of applying for legislation to assess buildings, business tax, and incomes on a lower basis than land?" This was carried by a vote of about 4 to 1.

I have a number of resolutions passed by organisations representing labour unions, manufacturers, farmers, and others, showing a widespread demand for the extension of the single-tax principle, but, as I have already exceeded the space limit of this article, I must leave what is recorded here to stand or fall on its own merit.

F. J. DIXON

(Secretary of the Canadian Land Values Taxation League).

A GERMAN STUDENT

HE was a budding philologist. His head was crammed with roots and prefixes, with learned terms, and learned arguments. He could convince the Englishman that he possessed but a superficial knowledge of his own language. He could trace back the pedigree of a word till it became unrecognisable—in fact, he could have convinced the Sphinx itself of ignorance. His appearance was youthful, but his talk was profound. I wondered, was he young, or was he merely a machine for an unlimited reception of strange and obsolete languages?

Among the subjects on which he was prone to enlarge, he showed quite an informed ignorance on the habits of English undergraduates and English schoolboys. "They don't know what hard study means," he said, a smile of ineffable superiority scornfully flitting over his face. "Sport is what they learn—cricket and football they do take seriously—but they don't spend hours over the proper construction of a Greek line, as we do at our gymnasiums. I have heard"—and he laughed—"a tutor from an English public school sends his pupil up to college with the report: He has an excellent place in his cricket eleven, and he also knows a little Latin."

It was impossible not to join in the laugh over the national inferiority of the British schoolboy. Here stood 5 ft. 8 in. of learning without sport; the deduction seemed conclusive. Where we, in our islands, write sport in capitals, they write Greek and Latin and a hundred other sciences in equally big letters.

I began to feel quite ashamed of the inferiority of our English system of training the young, till my student became confidential; and by and bye something, which was not bound up within the limits of a grammar or a lexicon, began to show itself. The real individual peeped out in all its unvarnished nakedness. It was rather a ferocious and surprising youth who put his eager question:

"Have you heard anything about our duelling?"

"Heard!" I echoed. "I have seen with my eyes more than enough of it. Why, Munich is a study in scars and bound-up heads and ugly gashes! One has only to walk once through the streets to jot it down on one's mental tablets as a characteristic feature of your university town. You, at least, have no scars," I added, looking critically at his fresh young face.

"I have one coming off in a fortnight."

"A duel?" I cried.

"Yes! Such fun! Would you like to see it?"

It was an offer to be declined with measured thanks; and, as a matter of fact, it was but a joking proposal, for outsiders are not admitted to the "sport." Only the committees "d'honneur" are present. These decide the merits of the case, and determine whether the cause is grave enough to warrant a duel.

"This is to be a serious affair," pronounced my student gaily.

"But it wouldn't go so far as killing your opponent?"

"That does happen sometimes, but not often; we shall, one of us, be pretty badly wounded before we yield. Oh! it is such fun, such glorious exercise!" said this contemptuous derider of sport. "Perhaps one of us will get a broken nose or a cheek laid open. Have you seen the student who has lost his nose?" he asked eagerly. "He looks rather odd."

I was happy to be able to say that my acquaintance with university students was limited to the possessors of noses; and then I tried to find out the reason for this particular fight in prospect, or at least the ostensible reason. It was, indeed, trivial, without the shadow of any very deeply, darkly mysterious ground behind. The real cause was love of "sport."

The challenger had pushed my student's chair in a public restaurant. Whether intentional or not, it was taken as a deliberate insult, and requited by the bellicose philologist with a blow, which, of course, became at once a grave "casus belli."

"Were you bound to strike him?" I asked.

"No, if he had not been a student, for we only fight with students or officers. But he did it on purpose; he made an excuse for a duel, which I accepted."

I wished him well out of the affair as I said good-bye to my warlike friend, and I looked at him with pitying eyes. Perhaps before we met again my Adonis would have lost his beauty; and the clear-skinned blooming face, which was now so charming in its youthful insolence, would no longer be the face that I knew.

"Bravo!" I murmured to myself, as he went gaily on his way. "Bravo for the English lad who has a good place in his school 'eleven,' and bravo for the good old English 'sport.' Long may it live!"

THE CURE OF CONSUMPTION.

DR. EDWIN W. ALABONE'S TREATMENT.

WE feel that the public at large do not fully realise the importance of the fact that the problem of the curability of consumption has been solved. In the past it was everywhere accepted as a truth that tuberculosis was a disease which resisted all medical efforts. Numerous attempts were made from time to time to gain a mastery over this terrible malady, but they proved failures. All is changed since then, and a successful treatment for consumption now exists; the honour of the discovery belongs, as leading authorities gladly admit, to Dr. Edwin W. Alabone, of Lynton House, Highbury Quadrant, London, N.

His system of inhalation has proved to be of priceless worth, and, because of its especially meritorious nature, it has compelled an amount of attention from those of the medical profession who have put it to the test, and they are unanimous in acknowledging it to be the only method of permanent cure for phthisis.

In marked contrast to the success achieved by Dr. Alabone's method, there stands the established fact that the so-called "open-air cure" for consumption as carried on in our sanatoria, has ignominiously failed to accomplish the wonderful results that were first claimed for it. Notwithstanding what may be said to the contrary, patients from these institutions who are sent out as cured invariably relapse into their former condition; the strongest evidence in support of this assertion is to be found in the statements made by those who have sought in vain for a restoration to health by entering a sanatorium. It must be admitted by anyone that such persons are able to form definite and unbiassed judgments in regard to the measures adopted there, seeing that they have had first-hand experience of what life inside a sanatorium really means to consumptives.

Below is an extract from a letter—picked out at random from the very great number which have been received on this subject.

The most noticeable point, however, in regard to all the letters to hand, including those from physicians and nurses, is the reference to the specific inhalation treatment (the only one which actually attacks the seat of the disease) promulgated by Dr. Edwin W. Alabone, who has for many years indefatigably followed up the extraordinary success which has accrued from its adoption. After all, there is no real reason for surprise that the outstanding feature of the letters should be the reference in them to his treatment, seeing that by its employment in their own cases they were completely cured after they had undergone the sanatoria treatment with no permanent good result, for in the majority of cases the patients were in a far more advanced stage of the disease than when they first entered a sanatorium.

H. S—, of Great Grimsby, who was, as numbers of others have been, completely cured of consumption by Dr. Alabone's treatment, says, in writing of his experience of open-air measures for dealing with consumptive patients: "For a time I seemed to benefit by the fresh-air treatment, but my trouble returned, and both my lungs were so seriously involved that the doctor said they were too bad for the open-air treatment to do me any good." H. S—'s lungs were not so bad that the treatment under consideration could not effect a cure. What they could not do for this patient at the sanatorium was done thoroughly by Dr. Alabone's treatment.

As before pointed out, the chief desideratum in a sanatorium would seem to be that patients should gain in weight. As must be obvious, much more than mere gain in weight should be borne in mind when dealing with cases of consumption. The supreme aim of the persons in charge at our sanatoria should be to try by all possible means to cure their patients, and if one kind of treatment was not suitable to any particular case, then they should resort to all other known treatments, rather than allow the patient to die. It is therefore to be regretted that Dr. Alabone's treatment is not adopted in all sanatoria and hospitals, and so enable the sufferers to receive the benefit of his discovery.

The extract quoted above, which is identical with statements that could be given from the letters which have been received from many other persons if space permitted, constitutes conclusive evidence in proof of the fact that the open-air cure treatment alone is not a remedy for consumption.

It is pleasing to note that Dr. Alabone's system of inhalation is now being used in all parts of the world, and is practised with the best results by a very great number of medical men; a long article, showing how successful this treatment is was recently published in The Parsi, the leading Indian paper, written by an Indian physician who came to England to qualify, but who was attacked with phthisis, and in spite of sanatoria and other treatments he got worse, till his life was despaired of. In this condition he placed himself under Dr. Alabone's immediate care, with the result that in a few months a vast improvement was manifest, which continued till he was perfectly cured. He finished his medical studies here, and is now in perfect health, practising in India. The article referred to should be read by any who might be sceptical as to the results of the treatment he underwent at Dr. Alabone's hands.

Any of our readers desiring further information regarding this specific treatment of phthisis and other diseases of the chest should obtain copies of the books mentioned below.

HOW LONDON DINES

By JOHN K. PROTHERO

A GENERATION back the middle-class Londoner regarded his daily dinner as a function inseparably connected with domesticity and the family circle. On high days and holidays he might feast at the Café Royale, the Holborn, the Criterion, take a trip to Greenwich for whitebait at "The Ship," or drive out to "The Star and Garter"; but, as a general rule, the work of the day over, hungry citizens, from six o'clock onwards, trooped from the City and the West End to their homes, in confident expectation of a solid and satisfying meal. Nowadays the home is by no means regarded as a necessary environment. The Englishman, to a large extent, has overcome his attachment to the ceremonial repast of soup and joint, pudding and cheese, served with a certain solemnity and great gaps of silence, and has acquired the habit of eating in public, enjoying a varied menu to the accompaniment of music and laughter and softly shaded lights and dainty flowers. Pretty women in charming gowns smoke their cigarettes over the wine, and the Londoner appreciates the picture and has long ago forgotten to be shocked.

We have become

Continentalised in the Art of Dining, and innumerable cafés and restaurants have sprung up to meet the demand.

Some of the most popular of these are old-established in the affections of their clients, and, while they cater for present-day requirements, still conserve intact that feature of bygone days which has helped to make the house famous—some special dish, perhaps, in which the chef is known to have surpassed himself, and whose glory increaseth from year to year and from decade to decade; or, it may be, some rare beverage, the preparation of which defies imitation. Of recent years, since the Londoner has got into the way of "feeding out," and the regular habitués of smart dining-places have found themselves swamped by an eager and rejoicing host of invaders, who, sybarites all, reckon little of the nice distinctions of epicures, the lustre of these superb achievements has got itself a wee bit blurred. Yet the glory abideth. Who that has tasted that mystic decoction "No. 1" at "Pym's" can ever forget its mellifluous charm? Or, lives there a man with palate so dead that he has not rejoiced in the toasted cheese for which the City "Simpson's" is famous—as famous almost as its great parent establishment in the Strand for its edition de luxe of

The Roast Beef of Old England!

"Pym's," like most City places, is notably a luncheon house, and from twelve to two you will find the rooms thronged with well-to-do City men—solicitors, warehousemen, buyers in big houses, company promoters, accountants meet at the tables sacred, by long association, to their use.

"The Cheshire Cheese," most famous of Fleet Street houses, is notable for its wonderful pudding, of which the chief excellencies are steak, kidney, and larks marvellously compounded. On "pudding day" an inexhaustible supply is procurable for half a crown. The rooms are homely and low-ceilinged, the tables narrow, with long wooden settles on each side, the food well cooked and savoury. Of a winter's evening, when the darkness closes in upon the courts and alleys of the City, "The Cheese" is at its best. A huge fire blazes in the grate, candles in tall sconces shed a soft yet cheery light on the tables set with blue china, two-pronged forks, and rudimentary sugar basins.

"The real old style, sir," as a waiter explained to an American who complained it was not "high-toned" to eat your food from a dish, and demanded a plate. At this time of year, Yankee pilgrims to the shrine of Doctor Johnson are greatly in evidence, and the work-a-day pressman finds himself somewhat crowded out.

From "The Cheese" to "Simpson's," in the Strand, is a little more than a stone's-throw. There also we find old English fare the chief attraction on the menu. The rooms, however, like the service, smack of the baronial hall of feudal times. Huge joints on silver dishes are wheeled from table to table, with a carver in attendance, who "cuts" to please your individual taste, and by custom immemorial receives twopence a head for his trouble. Fish and poultry succeed the joints in a never-ending procession, and your meal is served with a precision and dispatch unequalled.

But restaurants have become famous for their diners as well as their dinners. Years ago Carlo Pellegrini made "Pagani's" illustrious what time he used to haunt the shades now thronged with the princes of the "rag trade"—then crowded with celebrities whom he subsequently immortalised in his famous series of "Vanity Fair" cartoons. In our own time, the "Restaurant du Mont Blanc," that temple of Soho Bohemianism, where good fare and good company meet, has added similarly to its fame. For was it not here that Messrs. Belloc and Chesterton planned their memorable book on "The Party System," and launched campaigns that left the arm-chair politician prostrate? I suppose, however, that it is at "The Savoy" that most of the great men of the newspaper world are to be seen—if not at dinner, then during the luncheon "hour," which extends from soon after twelve till long past three. Here, looking down on editors forget the cares of the times as they listen to the voice of the latest journalistic arrival. Here the Napoleons of the advertising world discuss campaigns that a decade ago would have seemed impossible. Here are to be seen, four days out of five, most of the notabilities of Fleet Street, who have found sufficient time to pass the allurements of "Sweeting's" and taxi up to the palace on the Embankment. The theatrical world is in evidence at supper; the leading lights of musical comedy, with optimistic actor-managers and ambitious young playwrights, novelists, and artists, look in at times; Joe Simpson, the greatest black-and-white man of the day, may occasionally be seen.

"The Cecil" has a different clientèle. It is a great house for Masonic dinners, public dances, and colossal banquets, one of the most important functions being the Irish Ball on St. Patrick's night, when the leaders of the Home Rule party and their enthusiastic followers may be seen dancing till the small hours of the morning.

"Romano's," the other side of the Strand, is a favourite with City magnates, theatrical folk, journalists, and Bohemians generally, including the students from King's College over the way. The opulent ones of the earth dine on the first floor, where they pay huge sums for food that, served in the grill-room downstairs, can be obtained at a twentieth of the cost. First-rate food it is, too, with plenty of good talk.

But you must go to Soho to find a paradise of cheap dinners and bon mots.

There is a delicate intimacy, a suggestion of camaraderie, in the very atmosphere of these smiling places, oases of welcome in a desert of streets. From their hospitable doors, tucked away in a maze of winding ways and wondrous alleys and courts, bright lights flash a greeting, pleasant and well-ordered rooms offer a refuge to the weary of spirit, the light of purse, hungry for food, aching for companionship. The padrone, genial and urbane, smiles you a welcome, be you ever so shabby or forlorn; his wife gives a greeting from her seat at the desk; the waiter finds a place at your favourite table, orders your special dish, showers on you the courteous attentions that are the salt of dining out. A babel of foreign tongues is round you. A pretty actress, known to you by picture-postcard fame, is talking to a German eating red cabbage with his knife, that by a miracle does not cut him. A shabby-looking man in black, whom you know as a "ghost" in the museum, sits facing a fair-haired typist and a bank clerk. Five shillings will cover the cost of the young couple's dinner, including the light claret they are drinking, the coffee and the cigarettes. I have known an impecunious journalist sit for three hours in a Soho café, writing his "copy" the while, at a cost of fourpence—threepence a plate of soup and a penny the waiter. The padrone made no objection; when the journalist chanced on a bit of luck he would surely return

And Order a Sumptuous Spread.

"The Boulogne," larger, more opulent, is as friendly as the smaller cafés, and a marvellous "table d'hôte" of four courses is served at an amazing price. Here was held the dinner celebrating the first night of a fairy play that afterwards took London by storm; while at "The Gourmets," at the corner of the next street, there used to meet each evening a little coterie of literary men, including Edgar Jepson and Bart Kennedy, long since grown famous.

"Pinoli's," in Wardour Street, owes its fame largely to the tomato soup that is its speciality, and to the welcome given by the house to commemoration dinners and suppers generally. Football and cricket clubs here hold their annual beanfeast, and New Year's Eve is celebrated with less elaboration and expense than characterise the preparations at "The Ritz" and "The Carlton," but with a geniality and a festal atmosphere lacking in the more opulent of London's dining places.

The grill-room at "The Trocadero," dear to the heart of music-lovers by the magic of and his violin, is a favourite place of the young man about town.

The half-crown "Fill you up," as the table d'hôte is called, is satisfactory in all respects, and the huge crowds of "diners out," recruited from every phase of London life, make a never-ending kaleidoscope of movement and colour. Here also comes our country cousin up for the day, who entertains fond memories of former trips to town, save when "The Holborn" proves the superior attraction.

It is with a little shock of surprise that one turns from these Soho restaurants, cheap indeed, but so bright, so neat, so well ordered, and each with that curious mark of distinction that makes all of them an institution—one gets a little shock, I say, if one turns to the establishments where the workman has his dinner. The prices are not so very different. In Soho you can do yourself really well for 2s. or even less. The workman will pay nearly half that upon occasions for his dinner and drinks, the former including a plate of meat, say beef and mutton, for 6d., with two "veg." or some special greens for another 2d. or 3d., and a pastry, usually a fruit tart with cream, for another 2d., standing him in all from 8d. to about 1s. The food, as a rule, is good; the cooking not so good, and the service and accessories depressing to a degree. The tablecloths are dirty; the knives and forks dull and blunt. One is crowded, crabbed, confined. The harsh voice of the waitress grates on the ear; the habits of one's vis-à-vis are far from nice. Even in the eating-house chiefly patronised by those aristocrats of labour, the compositors, one gets a little jarred at the haste with which the food, excellent and palatable, is devoured.

G. B. S.'s description of a certain famous vegetarian restaurant leaps to one's mind. "At most vegetarian places," the great man once averred, "you get Ninepennyworth of Food to Three of Tablecloth.

Here," naming a certain famous vegetarian house, "you get ninepennyworth of cloth to three of food—which is really all you want." I think something like this happens where the workman dines out. At those of his establishments which I have visited I found the food admirable, but in many cases I could not eat it. Perhaps it is a pity that the workman does not contrive to take his womenfolk out to dinner with him on occasions. Perhaps it is a pity also that we have nothing in London like "The Maison du Peuple" in Brussels, where the workman gets admirable food, quite nicely served and at a moderate charge.

Quite one of the most interesting attempts that has yet been made to supplement some of these deficiencies in working-class catering was made some years ago under the inspiration of Queen Alexandra, which has since materialised in the Alexandra Trust. The Trust is a distinct success, and supplies excellent meals to its patrons at a charge of only a few pence. For 4d. a factory girl can obtain a well-cooked, cleanly served hot meal, with vegetables. At the premises of the Trust you may see in the spacious dining-rooms hundreds of good-tempered, smiling workers, all joyous, if a little noisy. The rush at mid-day is overwhelming, but it is a striking proof of the popularity of the institution that order and discipline are well maintained. This is an indication of what could be done by organised effort throughout London to meet the ever-increasing demand for good food,

Well Cooked, Cleanly Served, at Reasonable Rates.

Talking of vegetarian restaurants reminds me that, although more than one vast fortune has been spent in endeavouring to popularise them in London, they have never, so to speak, caught on, and I can remember quite a number of establishments, where three-course dinners were supplied for 6d., which have gone into the Ewigkeit. But "The St. George's," St. Martin's Lane, where in his bachelor days G. B. S. was to be found nearly every afternoon, and where you can still get the best coffee in London, is one of the few vegetarian houses that flourish, though Mr. Eustace Miles has proved incontestably that there are a vast number of people quite prepared to dispense with the succulent steak and the glutinous soup. At his unique establishment, surely the most remarkable that even London can boast, one may digest one's dinner listening to a lecture on the Greek Trilogy, or a disquisition by the host himself on health and beauty.

The restaurant is Much More than a Mere Eating-house.

It has become a great social centre, a rallying-ground for all those who call and confess themselves by the generic title of "advanced"; and whatever views one may take of the sufficiency of its clientèle, there can be no question of the excellent organisation that its management displays.

Dining at the House of Commons used, when that institution was still "the smartest club in London," to be great fun, but a certain well-known Irish member, who made it a rule to dine early, had a happy knack, when roused against the Saxon, of spoiling one's dinner. He would wait till the soup had been served and a spoonful or two tasted. Then he would saunter away into the Chamber, and, finding it deserted, would demand "a count," with the result that the members would have perforce to leave their tables and their guests—to come back some ten minutes later to cold plates and impatient friends, with their own tempers spoiled for the evening. Mr. Gladstone, it is on record, dined but once at the House during his Parliamentary career.

Sometimes dinners and their after-celebrations last far into the night. They still tell the story at "The Cecil" of Barney Barnato's record order, which, accepted close upon midnight, took nearly all night to consume. But, perhaps, these long-drawn-out feasts are becoming rather more things of the past even among the jeunesse dorée. It is no longer fashionable to go home with the milk in the morning. There is still one victim of the dining-late habit left in our midst, however. It is not until the lights are out at "The Ritz," not until everybody has gone home from "The Carlton," that he may even think of food. All the evening has seen him passing hither and thither up and down town. Often he is for hours at a stretch without food or stimulant, as, with strained face and tense nerves, he negotiates the traffic. But at last the morning comes, and in the shelter on the way home the taxi-driver sits down to one of the hardest-earned dinners served in London.

CORRESPONDENCE

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Owing to the large number of letters received it is necessary for correspondents to write briefly if their letters are to appear.

SOUTH AFRICAN FARMERS.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—“M. J. R.” takes me to task for the assertion that “in 1912 articles of food and drink valued at £6,359,000 were imported into the Union, a total which reflects little credit on South African farmers,” and reminds me that 1912 was a year of drought in South Africa. Granted. I took the figure for 1912 as the latest available annual total. I am quite willing to substitute for it the corresponding figure for 1911 (when there was no drought), viz., £6,336,000. In 1910 the total was £5,934,000, and in 1909 £5,552,000, so that, instead of diminishing, the Union's importations of articles of food and drink have been increasing during the last few years, although there has been no very substantial addition to the population. Of course, a certain proportion of these imports consists of articles which cannot be produced in South Africa, but the fact remains that the Union is importing to-day many eatables and drinkables which could be and ought to be supplied by South African farmers.

May I quote the following from the report (issued in 1912) of the Commission appointed by the Union Government to inquire into the conditions of trade and industries in South Africa—a body which cannot be suspected of being prejudiced or ill-informed:—

“This country cannot be said to be in a thoroughly sound condition when it imports the following products in large quantities:—Corn and grain, £880,000; flour and meal, £705,000; fruit (dried or preserved), £71,000; sugar and sugar products, £495,000; vegetables, fresh, £17,000; preserved, £30,000; butter and butter substitutes, £227,000; cheese, £133,000; milk, £351,000; eggs, £49,000; hams and bacon, £234,000; lard, £45,000; meat and poultry, £68,000; meat (preserved), £88,000; total, £3,401,000. Only when the great bulk of these products is produced in this country can we be said to be progressing.” The Commission goes on to explain that these figures represent only the cost in the country of purchase, and that the South African public actually pay far more for these imported articles.

That South African farmers have great difficulties to contend with I need no telling; that, despite these difficulties, considerable headway has been made in recent years, I stated plainly. But when every allowance is made there can be no question that agriculture is still very backward on the whole in South Africa. Nor can there be any doubt that a much greater percentage than 2.3 of the Union's area is capable of cultivation. South Africa, owing to its deserts, its mountains, and its native population, will never be able to absorb vast numbers of agricultural settlers like Canada and other parts of the Empire. I am not conscious of having written anything which would tend to represent the country as a paradise for would-be farmers among EVERYMAN'S readers. But I do believe there is room—if not need—on the South African soil for a goodly number of suitable agriculturists from the Mother-country.—I am, sir, etc.,

SATANISM AND CARDUCCI.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—After Mr. Bernard Hamilton and Mr. Arthur Ebbels comes Mr. H. W. W. McAnally. But he, of course, makes no wild statements. He merely admits that Carducci suffered towards the end of his life from cerebral congestion. He has evidently never read the description of the poet by his own countryman, Mantegazza. Mantegazza wrote that “at times his face is a veritable hurricane; lightnings dart from his eyes, and his muscles tremble.” This is, of course, quite compatible with sanity, though it may not unfittingly be said to “border” on another condition, and may also help to explain the title of Carducci's hymn. That title, to my mind, does not betoken a balanced judgment.

However, it was no part of my design to discuss the life or work of Carducci. I wrote to draw your readers' attention pointedly to the kind of evidence Mr. Bernard Hamilton relied on for Satanism in London. His letter of the 28th ulto. does not discuss this matter, which I think eminently prudent, and we are entitled, therefore, to dismiss the whole accusation as unfounded. That I am sure all readers of EVERYMAN will agree is the right conclusion to draw.—I am, sir, etc.,

ARTHUR EBBELS.

Epsom, September 6th, 1913.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—My good friend E. J. Watson—first English translator of the poet's finest Ode—is well able to meet the absurd charge of Satanism brought against Carducci on the sole strength of the “Inno a Satana,” and indeed your correspondent A. Valgimigli provides ample refutation of the calumny. But surely the last sentence in Mr. Bernard Hamilton's letter of September 5th is as irrelevant as it is (no doubt unintentionally) a trifle "priggish," to say the least. It is in poor taste, and seems "dragged in" to create prejudice in the minds of the unthinking. Englishmen have been ever slow to raise up memorials in marble in honour of great literary genius, partly perhaps because they have been too prone to confuse genius with its possessor, art with the artist's morality. Hence statesmen in statuary are more conspicuous than poets or prose-writers on the pedestals near the Admiralty Arch. An immoral statesman is nothing, of course! Indeed, some say they are quite common. We judge them by and honour them for their achievements. Yet we demand of the great artist, in verse or prose or pigment, that he shall not only have accomplished a great work, but that he shall have lived a blameless private life as well. The contest is unequal. It is not so in all countries. "Salomé" was being acted in Paris while its author lay languishing in a sorrowful English prison. It seems as if genius, apart from respectability, could not be recognised in England. But what of our charity? If I am wrong, perhaps Mr. Hamilton will explain his allusion? For myself, I know no reason, other than the one suggested above, why Carducci in Rome, or Wilde in London, should not be honoured in our national memory by permanent tributes to the beauties of their special creation.—

REFORMS IN OUR PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Although the question of the present education of boys is constantly being discussed, the very able article by Emeritus Professor H. A. Strong must specially arrest the attention of all parents who read EVERYMAN. The extraordinary lack of practical knowledge acquired after years of study in public schools and universities has been brought most vividly before me these holidays. I am of French birth, but have always spoken English, and can hold a fairly correct conversation in German. At the seaside place where I am staying with my family there are several schoolmasters, one the head of a well-known preparatory school, the other the head of a large boys' school with 250 pupils, and several others. Not one of them is able to join in the conversation we hold with our sons or their friend, a young French student, who spends the holidays with them for the sake of improving their French. This fact does not seem to trouble these scholastic gentlemen at all. On the contrary, they spend several hours a day instructing their own sons in Greek and Latin, and when I suggest they should entertain a young Frenchman in the same way they say it would be "such a nuisance, and, besides, modern languages are not much use in exams." Of course they are not, and as long as the present system exists they will never be. Why should our boys spend more than half their school life learning Greek and Latin, which few of them ever use, when they would thoroughly enjoy reading the classics in a good translation, in which way they could become familiar with them in a short time? Will no one ever start a practical modern school where "les langues vivantes" will replace the dead ones? Can one imagine anything more incongruous than the sight of these pedagogues standing quite dumb among a dozen practically educated children under seventeen years of age, who can, several of them, speak three languages, and whose reports from an English public school bear this phrase: "Latin weak; is frankly bored with the subject"? And no wonder!—I am, sir, etc.,

PASSING OPPORTUNITIES!

Dear Friend,

Summer is quickly passing. With it the opportunity of giving others a holiday at the seaside or in the country. I am spending part of my holidays on the river, and already the boatmen are beginning to put away some of their boats for the winter. Going over Messrs. Huntley & Palmer's Biscuit Factory I found one department busy preparing orders for Christmas! Just signs that summer is passing, and with it the opportunity of giving a Summer Holiday to the needy.

There are not a few old people in London who years ago came up from the country. The possibility of visiting their old home and birthplace is out of the question unless the railway fares are paid. In not a few instances this has been done, and has brought genuine pleasure to the old folk.

On my return to Holloway I am arranging to take a large party of aged ones for a long day's drive into the country. This was done last year, and many who were too old and infirm to go away enjoyed a comfortable drive to the woods, and did full justice to the good things provided.

All this means expenditure. We therefore appeal for funds to enable us to continue this charity. £5 will send five adults for a fortnight; £1 5s. will give one a couple of weeks; 12s. 6d. send a needy one away for a week. Cost of day's drive and entertaining for one old person, 3s.

Donations may be sent direct to me at above address.

Yours in His Happy Service,

FRANK SWAINSON.

NEW ZEALAND AND NATIONAL DEFENCE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—As one who has spent some time in Australia and New Zealand with the express object of studying the system of national training in arms enforced by law in those countries, and of studying how far this training can be considered to be an asset, morally, physically and mentally, to the citizens of those countries, and as one who has studied the physical and moral training carried out by L.C.C. elementary schools, boys' clubs, Cadet and Boy Scout troops, in these islands, I feel that Mr. Herbert Corder has unconsciously evaded, and at the same time misrepresented, the real question of National Defence in New Zealand. I would therefore wish to give, as briefly as possible, the conclusions which I have formed from my studies and to qualify some of Mr. Corder's remarks. The system has its abuses; it has also, which Mr. Corder does not admit, its very solid advantages.

To me, the root of discontent in those areas where insubordination and cases of non-attendance were most flagrant was this—the officers and those appointed to carry out the scheme were quite unsuitable. It is of the utmost importance that the officers in charge of the lads should be men chosen, not only for such skill at their work as will command respect, but also for such a character as will radiate a constant and strong influence. Very few areas are officered by such men. They are, however, not lacking, as is instanced by the many Scoutmasters who have by their own sympathy and strength of character drawn together and have held bands of boys who voluntarily submit to discipline.

Up to the age of fourteen (as Junior Cadets) the training given to the boys does not involve that in the use of arms. It is "national physical training," in such manly, health-giving, and disciplinary exercises as drill, gymnasium, swimming, boxing, running, etc., much on the same lines as exists in our Boy Scout troops. Schools are subsidised by the State for the performance of these exercises. Nothing of the kind prevails in our schools. In rare instances masters arrange teams and matches for a few selected boys, whilst the physical training meted out by the State is as inadequate as it is inappropriate.

From fourteen up to eighteen years of age the boy becomes a Senior Cadet. He is then instructed in the use of arms. The time seems premature, but since most boys of our breed have, thank Heaven! a craving for adventure, the carbine in his hand is a veritable pleasure. But, more important, the boys have a new interest in life, other than loafing in the streets or "looking on." In many "areas" the Cadet Corps have become the club, and a few keen and unselfish officers of the right stamp have given their time to arranging "inter-area" matches of every description. Membership therefore gives to them a morale and an esprit de corps enhanced by friendly rivalry in sport, of which our boys, unless they happen to be members of a Boy Scout troop, mission, or some other semi-charitable organisation, know nothing.

With regard to prosecutions under the Defence Acts, parents know that it does no boys harm from the ages of fourteen up to eighteen—the most impressionable age of youth—to be subject to discipline. In this country they have unfortunately far too much time at which they are entirely independent of any form of control. Boys do not rejoice in disciplinary measures, hence the prosecutions under the Defence Acts. They are in most instances simply cases of "shirking," backed up by parents who are either unable, or who refuse, to exercise their parental authority.

There are cases of "conscience," I admit; but few boys have their characters so far developed, or have judgment sufficiently right or wrong, to be able to decide whether military exercises are religiously justifiable or not. The refusals to perform drills have almost invariably been ordered by the boys' parents.

On inspection days I was most impressed by the pride shown by parents in their "soldier lads," in their bearing, physique, and steadiness, and proud, too, of the youth and hope of their nation. Why, too, has Australia inaugurated such a policy as that of "White Australia," if it cannot, if need be, be enforced? Aggressive nations do, unfortunately, still exist, even in our Western civilisation. It is the duty of citizens to prevent such aggression as far as is in their power. This power lies, for the time being, in submitting to instruction in the proper uses of defensive weapons.

You have said, sir, that "children are a national asset of the highest possible value," and "it is good business to maintain our racial supremacy, upon which our industrial supremacy ultimately lasts." Such training as is carried out by Boy Scout troops, if standardised and placed on a national footing, and in co-operation with the elementary and secondary schools, would, I am led to think, be of "the highest possible value," physically, morally, and mentally, to the youth of this nation; and its obliteration would be a national disaster to New Zealand and Australia. I firmly believe that the Boy Scout movement is destined perhaps to remodel the Empire and the world on a basis of humanitarianism. It is the nucleus of a great citizen organisation of men and women bound together by the strongest cords of national unity. Let New Zealand and Australia amend their Defence Acts and improve their machinery; but I would ask Mr. Corder and his sympathisers to inquire and find what incalculable good some form of organised citizenship—such, for example, as exists in the Boy Scout movement—may do for the youth of a nation, morally, mentally, and physically.—I am, sir, etc.,

"THE CASE FOR NATIONAL HOUSING."

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I am sadly disappointed. I have hitherto regarded Mr. L. G. Chiozza Money as a practical social reformer, and, having read his articles on "The Case for National Housing," I discover him to be an impracticable visionary. We are asked to imagine a Government Department producing and letting at under 5s. 4d. per week a detached house, costing £460, including land, roadmaking, "and complete in point of fitments" (cupboards, window-seats, ingle-nooks, dressers, curbs, window fittings), and equal to an average house rented at £45 per annum.

Is there any allowance in this remarkable estimate for the army of officials that would inevitably arise? In what readily accessible and happy locality is it possible to obtain an eighth of an acre at £30? More amazing still is the allowance for repairs to this house of dreams, £1 12s. per annum! Imagination fails to conceive the delightfully picturesque ruins that would be handed over to the State at the end of sixty years.

Or, again, consider the State as a landlord, as the writer suggests, on a basis of a 3 per cent. profit, on an expenditure of £10,000,000, the deficit in about two years would be £100,000, and go on increasing. Do houses never get old or wear out, or are these houses to be built of some hitherto undiscovered material? Does not the taste for certain neighbourhoods change, or ideas of living alter, and that in less than sixty years? What would be the position of the State to-day that was the owner on a basis of a 3 per cent. profit of some of London's nearer and older suburbs?—I am, sir, etc., ARTHUR F. USHER,

London, E.C., September 3rd, 1913.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—May I be permitted to make a few remarks relative to Mr. Chiozza Money's £460 house and garden described in your issue of the 29th inst.?

Mr. Money states that a house and garden costing the State that sum, and let at a weekly rent of 7s. 4d., will become at the end of sixty years the absolute property of the State. The 7s. 4d. per week is to be charged to cover the repayment of the loan, with interest, viz., £17 10s. 5d. per annum, and £1 12s. for repairs—together, £19 2s. 5d. But what of the rates? In the parish in which I live the poundage is 8s. 6d. (not including a water rate), and a house let at 7s. 4d. would pay on an assessment of £11 10s., i.e., £4 17s. 9d. per annum. But the assessment of a house is not necessarily based on the actual rent paid, but, in the words of the Union Assessment Act, "the rent at which the hereditament might reasonably be expected to let from year to year, etc."

Now, in the opinion of Mr. Money, the house under consideration would command a rent at the present time of £45 per annum at the least. Accepting these figures as correct, then at 8s. 6d. in the £ on the rateable value, viz., £37 10s., the sum to be paid for rates would be £15 18s. 9d. per annum. Who would pay this? If paid by the tenant, then the comparisons made are fictitious and misleading; if paid by the State, a loss to the State of this sum annually.

I need hardly point out to any having knowledge of the requirements necessary for the upkeep of a house costing £400 and the fence of a large garden that £1 12s. yearly for these purposes is quite inadequate. If, however, this is to be the niggardly policy of the State as a landlord, then in sixty years' time there will be a good many dilapidated houses, and slums will not have become things of the past. I might mention that there are such outgoings as taxes and insurance; but I leave it at this.—I am, sir, yours, etc.,
August 30th, 1913. W. R.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Mr. Chiozza Money in these articles deserves so fully our gratitude for working out theoretical principles of reform, and so alluring is the prospective castle in the air that one is almost sorry to blow upon it. But upon his scheme in Article II. for a detached house, to be self-supporting, whilst it is being bought for the State at 7s. 4d. per week, may I point out the following omissions in the calculation?—

Cost of sewers and sewage disposal, which are absolutely indispensable for an area largely developed by houses standing on one-eighth of an acre; cost of re-decoration, which in a small house, with small rooms, is necessarily heavy—external painting alone, without any structural repairs, would absorb the greater part of the allowance he makes for repairs; cost of official supervision in building and management afterwards, which would undoubtedly be more than private management; and I may add that he makes no mention whatever of rates, which must be paid over and above by the tenant, although his readers might inadvertently compare the 7s. 4d. per week with rents which now include rates.

Government already lends to co-partnership and other building schemes for housing the working classes two-thirds of the money at 3½ per cent., and whilst they do achieve a form of development more varied than that of private enterprise, they do not at present succeed in giving any considerable benefit over private enterprise in larger or better accommodation. In this district the maximum rental for the house mentioned would be £30 per annum, and not £45.—I am, sir, etc.,

August 29th, 1913.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I have read with great pleasure Mr. Money's articles—in my opinion, the most valuable contributions, from a constructive point of view, so far made to EVERYMAN. His scheme strikes at the root of the greatest evils afflicting the country. In improving the housing of the poor we prevent the causes of disease and obviate plastering the effects, which latter course we are pursuing at the expense of millions annually, with hospitals and sanatoria, and the much-to-be-amended Insurance Act.

Give men in the black trades baths in their houses. Why enforce sanitary factories and permit insanitary homes?

I suggest that a society be formed under the auspices of EVERYMAN to develop Mr. Money's scheme of National Housing and bring it prominently before the public. I believe Mr. Money's scheme is a most statesmanlike and humane proposal, and the Government possessing the sanity to place such a scheme on the Statute Book is deserving of the esteem and reverence of Everyman and his posterity.—I am, sir, etc.,

MR. HYNDMAN AND INDIA.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—As one who has spent some years in India, may I endorse what "Anglo-Indian" says re the benefits of British rule in that country?

A little more than ten years ago the wild forest uplands of the Central Provinces were only accessible to those who were willing to rough it a great deal; the people—aboriginal Gonds and Baigas—were among the most backward of India's people. Now, thanks in great measure to the work of the British Government, combined with tact, sympathy, and infinite patience on the part of the official "log," the old order of things is passing away, and one can travel far in those Provinces, seeing contentment and progress everywhere.

Many lakhs of rupees have been spent on irrigation tanks, even in the most out-of-the-way places, so that the dread of famine is largely a thing of the past. The opening of the Satpura Railway enables farmers to send their grain to all markets. Formerly these people used to burn valuable jungle, their method of cultivation being to sow their seed in the charred earth. They have now been taught wiser methods of cultivation, and the work of preserving the jungle and exporting its produce finds employment for hundreds of people. The opening up of the country by railway and the manganese industry have been the means of bringing work and comfort to thousands who formerly only knew poverty and care. Primary schools have been opened in every district—sometimes by the missionary, in other places by Government—so that illiteracy is becoming less and less common.

I have often met the Deputy Commissioner and other officials leaving the usual roads and walking over many miles of jungle growth in order to reach the more isolated villages, and getting first-hand information of "things as they are." At all times the people

What you should do with it.

SOME people cannot resist investing their nest egg in hazardous speculations which promise a tempting profit, but only too frequently result in the entire loss of their savings. Put your money into something SAFE, and if you can get a handsome return as well, so much the better. An absolutely secure and highly profitable investment is a Canada Life Annuity. Here is an example of its value:—

A man of 68 purchasing a Canada Life Annuity for £1,000 derives therefrom an income of £127 7s. 9d. for LIFE, and his security is absolute. It amounts to Government security. The Canada Life Assurance Co. is the largest, strongest and oldest Life Office in Canada. Speaking as a missionary, I have always found the members of the Indian Services to be men who had the highest good of India's people at heart. To see an English gentleman, as I have seen—one who had had a brilliant university career, and was possessed of ample private means—patiently spending hours in a small and stuffy court, with the temperature at 116 deg. in the shade, trying to get the truth in a matter where a rich man was oppressing a poor man, shows why the great majority of the people of Hindustan are more contented and happier than ever in their history, for the presence of the British Raj means that oppression must cease.—I am, sir, etc.,

GERMAN UNIVERSITIES.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Having read with interest the article by Mr. G. Waterhouse on the German universities, I should like to take exception to a few points. No doubt, Germany has profited in her industries for some time by her protection, but to-day, of course, things are quite different, and we cannot by any means call “her policy of protection a sane one.” Quite the reverse. This is, however, a chapter for itself. Is, however, I must ask, Germany really “leading” with regard to university education? True, compared with Oxford and Cambridge, students can live cheaply, i.e., on £75 to £100, and some of them manage to do so. But what about universities in Scotland and U.S.A., where, as I hear, university education is free?

Germany may have excellent professors and lecturers, especially as regards medicine, chemistry, etc., but we should not forget that science is not quite “free.” Professors and lecturers who have come to conclusions not quite to the taste of the “higher and highest” persons have not found fair play (cf. cases David Strauss, Drews, and others). Mr. Waterhouse says, “Supervision by the university authorities there is none.” This is not quite correct. When the “Freie Studentenschaft” in Leipzig asked members of the different parties for lectures on a certain theme, the lecture of the Social Democrat was prohibited. This apart from the preference which is given to the “incorporated” students wherever possible.—I am, sir, etc.,

THE COLONIES AND CONSCRIPTION.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—May I express my appreciation of the letter of the High Commissioner for New Zealand? In my opinion the Colonials are to be warmly congratulated on getting rid of an undesirable type of “man”—the weakling who is so lacking in manliness and spirit as actually to pose as a martyr, simply because he is expected to perform certain obligations in defence of his country. It is really pathetic to read the accounts of the persecutions these poor, timid souls have endured in resisting the hardships of military service. By the way, the matter of the twenty-eight shillings, with food and accommodation, does not figure in the homesick wanderers' thrilling tale. The modern woman, on reading these tales of woe, must seriously ask herself a question: if the time is far distant when members of her sex may be called upon to perform certain duties—duties which are shirked by so many highly strung, self-indulgent effeminate who persist in calling themselves men.—I am, sir, etc.,

PATRICIA WOODLOCK.

JOHN BRIGHT*

JOHN BRIGHT is the most inspiring figure in the last century, if not in the whole history of our English politics. His persuasive genius makes him a supreme example to those who would influence popular opinion, his honesty is a standard of public life in general. Further, he was endowed with a political judgment which has often been approved and never falsified. If we disagree with such a man it can only be with some presumption and possibly some pain. When his views do not always find acceptance in our own generation, we may well inquire how far this is due to mis-interpretation or changing circumstance, how far to an actual cleavage of opinion.

The key to Bright's life-work is found in the ideal of freedom. He set out to free our trade, our church, our land, our diplomatic methods, and, above all, through the agency of the franchise, our people themselves. The large measure of his success will be appreciated by any reader of his biography, but far more by one who has also studied the whole course of our political development, and especially the conditions of present-day progress. It is only in the light of these that Bright's position becomes clear, and thus only that the whole working of his mind is laid bare. To engage our national energies in a battle against poverty and distress, gratuitously refusing to the outset to strike the shackles from our feet, was, Bright declared, an obtuse policy. The first great contest of his life proves how right he was. Senseless charity to tinker at social reform when at a stroke the Corn Laws could be repealed and every road to improvement made easier! Precisely the same attitude is to be observed in all his further operations.

At the same time State activity becomes something more than mere mechanical adjustment when the land and education are under review. Interference is advocated to a degree which would surprise those who glibly call him in support of a policy of social lethargy. Often, in fact, there is a complete misreading of his views. At any cost, he would have this country liberated. She was to have, in the first place, no artificial restrictions upon her progress; in the second, she was to be given certain positive facilities. The latter included a comprehensive franchise and an improved education; the former, reforms in our fiscal, diplomatic, and land systems. To effect even a part of this work meant such an era of legislative energy, and such a disregard of pure conservatism as popular government in this country had never contemplated before.

The idea, then, that Bright in any way deprecated legislative activity per se cannot be too strongly condemned. He had, moreover, a very high respect for Parliament, and an unwavering belief in her future capabilities.

If we bear all this in mind, and at the same time appreciate how wise was his opinion that a more free life was the condition of a more healthy one, we shall be better able to estimate his views upon State interference in general.

Now, unless Bright had foreseen that future legislation would tend increasingly to impinge upon the lives of the people there would have been no point in his earnest advocacy of an extended franchise. It was, rather, just because he had this anticipation that he laid so much stress upon the vote. He expected and he must have desired vital reforms; he only asked that they should be demanded, and in some measure outlined, by those whom they were to affect. In this respect Bright is to be labelled under no particular school, he is simply an uncompromising democrat.

Representatives of many types of political thought here part company with him; but the paradox is that those who most loudly claim the title of democrat are often among their number. If the worth of Bright's judgment anywhere emerges, it is in his belief that reform must follow popular opinion, if it does not actually draw its inspiration from it. Legislation modelled by the few may be of higher merit than that which the many will immediately approve; but compulsion has an injurious effect upon the body politic which more than counterbalances the good for which it is invoked. To bring acceptance to his principles, Bright was compelled first to convince the country. He could only break the aristocratic domination by educating the electorate, and we may venture to say that he would have been willing to do it by no other means. He cleared the path to reform, and he may at least enjoin upon us an observation of his methods, when their necessity has by his very success become less clear.

If Bright thought too little of benevolent legislators, a worse tendency is to think too much of them. But the reformer need have no quarrel with him. Let "Education" be the watchword of future progress, and "laissez-faire" may be erased from the political legacy of John Bright.

On the other hand, it is possibly not so much in any of his declarations as in the whole history of his acts that Bright offers a criticism of our Parliamentary system. He entered the Cabinet late in life, under a feeling of duty, and he never felt at ease there. The ties of office came too late to be congenial to him; perhaps they would never have been found acceptable. Yet we must again remind ourselves of the peculiar circumstances of his life. The whole marvel of the man lies in his having advocated measures far ahead of his time, and this with such persuasive power that he brought his contemporaries into line with himself. Office in itself had no attractions for him, but the dislike of office did not prevent him from accepting it if he could thereby secure the objects he had at heart.

A condition of independence is freedom of choice. Bright and Cobden were independent because they had in their own unfettered genius a force rivalling that of Cabinets. They might choose upon which to rely—their free agency alone, or the party instrument which would in its use limit their personal power.

Lesser men, no less honest, have not this choice; they must needs join with a party to carry out their aims, while they may truly believe that to stand aside altogether would be a betrayal of their faith.

Yet more puny men, to whom neither course is open, fall back on criticism, and call it independence. Our generation may well pause to look back at the conduct of a man who, though so short a term in office, was seldom out of power. Too confident in success, too bitter in failure, our public men have need of his example.

Fortunately Bright's latest biographer has given to the nation a clear narrative of his life, recognising that his acts need little comment and his character no adornment. His sharp image will endure. Read of him, and you must love him as only a small band of statesmen are loved. Such are Alexander Hamilton, Turgot, and Cobden, Bright's closest friend. They have a quality intangible and precious; for in them the warm heart and the stern principle are both dominant, yet never in conflict. They are men "made of flint and roses."

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

MADAME MARCEL TINAYRE has written a very charming novel from an essentially feminine point of view. Miss Winifred Stephens is responsible for the translation, which is admirably done, and loses but little of its style in the English language. Madeleine is a charming widow of thirty-five, with two children. Her marriage is not romantic, it was "arranged," and though her husband proved clever, considerate, and affectionate, she never felt for him a tinge of passion or of love. In possession of means, and still good-looking, she surveys men and things from a leisurely standpoint, and her reflections are witty and shrewd. Her description of women at bargain sales is inimitable: "I saw faces which were truly feminine, models by nature and expressive of brute primitive instinct; women of twenty with faces more delicate than a white rose, yet convulsed with anger and covetousness. I saw soft, maternal faces grow as hard as the countenance of Agrippina or Athaliah. I caught glances as sharp as knives, as black as streets of ill-fame at midnight, as grey and shifting as a storm-sky. Grins of anger and smiles which looked as if they would like to bite, revealed the bird of prey, the little wild beast, which, though lulled, is never tamed, and crouches ready to spring in the heart of the most attractive civilisation. . . . Desire must be gratified, victory won, possession achieved, ere the little wild beast will return to its lair. Only then will woman once again put on the mask of amiability and go away satisfied." The author's reflections on marriage are witty and cogent, as is her criticism of the suffragettes; but it is in those matters more intimately affecting the every-day life of the normal woman that she is at her best. "The woman of to-day when she lacks love lacks everything. She no longer believes in the compensations of eternal life, in the ineffable consolation imparted by the presence of her god. Barren griefs drive her to despair. Even her chastity, defended against man's desire, no longer appears to her the most heavenly of the virtues." The conclusion is interesting, though, in relation to the English woman of to-day, hardly convincing. What the author has to say about clothes is of more general interest: "Instead of conforming to fashion, an intelligent woman makes fashion conform to her. Frequently all that is needed to preserve the individual harmony of figure is the lengthening of a skirt, the widening of a sleeve, the raising or lowering of a belt." MADELEINE AT HER MIRROR (John Lane, 6s.) should appeal to a large number of women and not a few men.

Mr. Robert Hichen's latest novel, THE WAY OF AMBITION (Methuen, 6s.), is one of the strongest, most convincing pieces of work he has accomplished. Since the days of the delightful book, "The Prophet of Berkeley Square," the author has assumed an ever-increasing seriousness of view that at times has become tinged with a certain fatalism. "The Garden of Allah" persisted in tragedy, the author never gave his characters a chance to escape from the net of determinism that closed in upon them. In other of his novels, brilliant and clever though they are, one feels a certain lack of perspective; a ceaseless craving for notoriety falls on the characters like a blight; the modern craze for movement infects the most careful of his studies; an absence of repose mars some of his most telling effects. In this his latest novel there is a spaciousness of view, the insistence on petty aims that animated the characters in his former works to the destruction of

in Literature and Art

A SERIES OF SIX BEAUTIFUL BOOKS OF SPECIAL INTEREST TO "EVERYMAN" READERS.

HEY retell in prose the world's great legends, those old stories of undying interest and charm that have come down to us from the earth's earliest era; from a time when imagination was given free rein, and fancy went uncurbed.

The great world of nature and the deep facts of life, from which these stories arise, are the same to-day as thousands of years ago; hence their enduring life.

To Book-lovers

these volumes will appeal irresistibly, owing, in the first place, to the fascination of the great stories they enshrine, and to an even greater degree, because of the light these stories shed upon the work of the greatest prose writers and poets of the world, who have drawn freely and abundantly from mythology; with the result that no one can fully appreciate the best literature without a knowledge of mythology.

To Musicians

and people with musical tastes and interests these volumes come as a real boon. A knowledge of the basic idea enables one to enter into the spirit of a composer's music; to obtain a firmer grasp of his aims and objects. Practically all the librettos of Wagner's operas are founded upon mythology, while among other composers who have found inspiration from this copious source may be mentioned Gluck, Bellini, Weber, Gounod, Berlioz, Liszt, and Mendelssohn.

To those interested in Art

it will be unnecessary to point out that the most famous painters and sculptors have, from the most remote times down to the present day, drawn very largely upon mythology for subjects. As an aid in estimating their artistic achievements, an acquaintance with the attributes of the gods and heroes of ancient days is most useful.

To Stamp Collectors

the volumes also appeal because many of the postage stamps that are in use, or have been used, throughout the world, bear representations of mythological characters and heroes. A knowledge of the exploits of the originals of these figures will add a new interest to the hobby.

LAVISHLY ILLUSTRATED & ARTISTICALLY BOUND

The volumes are illustrated with numerous beautiful reproductions of famous pictures and original drawings, executed in colour and duotone. There are close upon TWO HUNDRED of these full-page plates included in the complete set of six volumes. Each volume is strongly bound in cloth richly decorated with gilt.

"T.P.'s Weekly" says:

"An understanding of the personalities of the Nibelungen would help many of those who attribute their non-comprehension of Wagner's 'Ring' to the author's philosophy rather than to unfamiliarity with the legendary background."

"The Bookman" says:

"The study of the old stories of the world is one which is becoming increasingly popular, and in the handsome volumes issued by The Gresham Publishing Company we have them set before us in a highly attractive form. Mr. Moncrieff's version of the mythological stories of Greece and Rome is written in a most fascinating manner, and one which cannot fail to claim the reader's attention from start to finish."

more permanent things, is not present in this story of ambition. It is a tale of a simple man, content to practise his art without recognition, desirous only to produce the best and finest music, indifferent whether or no he gains popular admiration and recognition. Claude Heath, the musician in question, meets Charmian, whose beauty arrests him, and he responds to her influence. The woman suffers from a detestation of the ordinary. "Secret ambition worried her mind and made her restless in body. When she looked at a crowd she sometimes felt an almost sick sensation, as of one near to drowning. Oh to rise, to be detached from all these myriads. To be a part and recognised as apart! Only that can make life worth living." The result of her marriage with Claude is fatal both to his art and to a chance of their happiness. She forces him into the arena of competition, compels him to strive for a cheap and easy success. The result is failure, blank and absolute; but it is in his treatment of the fiasco that the author shows a breadth of view absent from his former novels. He shows the impermanence of popularity, the insignificance of easy applause, and we leave the musician and his wife with a sense of the reality that they have found. "I have had my lesson," says Charmian. "I have seen the truth both of myself and of Claude. But I shall always wish Claude to succeed, not in my way but in his own, and I think he will. . . . All he went through in New York has changed him; he is a much bigger man than he was when we left England." And the author means what he says; Claude is a big man, though a hopeless failure.

The author of "Carnival" has struck a new note in his latest novel, SINISTER STREET (Martin Secker, 6s.). It is a far cry from the charming Columbine, the flower of the London streets, to a public schoolboy, but throughout the two novels runs the same strain of passionate belief in youth. Only a very young man could have penned the tragic conclusion of the Columbine, and only a young man could have so faithfully recalled the sentiments and opinions of the boy he used to be. The title, suggestive of dark and shadowy things, is explained by a quotation from Keats: "The imagination of a boy is healthy, and the mature imagination of a man is healthy; but there is a space of life between, in which the soul is in a ferment, the character undecided, the way of life uncertain, the ambition thick-sighted." It is in debatable land that Mr. Compton Mackenzie places his hero, and complexities of spirit, the aching desires and vain imaginings that beset a youth in the transition period, are faithfully and sometimes poignantly portrayed. The chapters dealing with his life at St. James's contain some of the most vital and convincing passages. The description of the school, and the characterisation of certain of the masters, suggests that the school might be St. Paul's, at which, we believe, Mr. Mackenzie was a student. There is, perhaps, a paucity of incident in a book devoted specifically to "youth," and overmuch of self-analysis, but the freshness and charm of the style balances the occasional lapses from the story.

The antithesis of Bergson's philosophy is expressed by Julien Benda in THE YOKE OF PITY (T. Fisher Unwin, 5s.). It is a study of emotional morbidity, and while the argument is based on the idea that it is impossible to lead "The Life of the Intellect" trammelled by human affections, it merely succeeds in proving that the undue indulgence of introspection with too little strenuous employment leaves a man's nature unbalanced, gives a twist to his soul, and dulls the clarity of his brain. Felix forms an attachment for a married woman; Madeline does not love her husband, and even her affection for her boy is dulled by the resemblance to his father. A creature of refined instincts and feminine attractions, Felix is the first person who has shown her the slightest pity or commiseration. She feels for him a torrential passion, to which he responds, and the two drift into a liaison that holds nothing of permanence, being based solely on sexual attraction. The tie irks him in the inevitable fashion, but, though he longs to break away, he cannot form the resolution to end the intrigue. He realises that she will suffer the miseries of a desolate heart, anticipates all she will go through, senses each pang until he is practically obsessed with the throes of another's suffering. When at last he breaks away, Felix decides to dedicate his energies to the study of the "abstract." The flesh is too strong for him, however, and he marries a woman, quiet, self-contained, who makes no great demands on him or on herself. She never attempts to penetrate into the mysteries of his studies, and he finds ineffable joy in his contemplation of existence, tempered by occasional interludes of affection. And then his mental balance is once more upset. His little daughter develops hip disease and becomes permanently crippled. Felix suffers in anticipation all the bodily torments and spiritual isolation she will feel, and so great a hold does this passion of pain obtain over him that he finds himself unable any longer to exercise the fierce tension of the mind, "in its grasp of an idea, in holding it against the hundred ideas which would gather round it and try to beat him back; all these cherished powers of his were now for ever lost and submerged in the action of his heart." And even when Suzanne gets better—still he is not happy! Nor is it likely that such a man could be happy either in the abstract world or the emotional.

O PIONEERS! (Heinemann, 6s.) This is a book that repays the reader for a more careful study than usually accompanies a novel. The author, Willa Sibert Cather, has centred the story in Nebraska, and the characters, mostly Scandinavian, are, in a subtle fashion, curiously typical of the new country, while they retain certain traits of their Viking forbears, who set sail from their native shore bent on the conquest of other and far distant lands. It is primarily the record of a contest between man and the soil, which stands to him for all the more desirable things in life. In this case the hero of the story is a woman, Alexandra by name, who, against heavy odds, and in opposition to the advice of her friends and her family, adopts the most modern methods in the cultivation of the farm left to her in trust by her father. A woman of strong affections and clear intellect, Alexandra is sufficiently independent to defy in some degree the conventions as understood in that lonely and remote spot. She takes as her assistant on the farm a man whom her brothers regard as an adventurer, and not until they tell her with a certain frank brutality that she regards Carl more as a prospective husband than as an overseer does she consent to terminate the association. Her younger brother, Emil, does not share the opinion of his elders; he realises that the brothers, who have already married and settled, have an eye to the future possession of the land that Alexandra has cultivated with a shrewdness and assiduity amounting to genius. The story of Emil and his infatuation for Marie Shabata is portrayed with an emotional force and reticence eminently typical of a country frozen by the winds from the farthest north, scorched by sudden blinding spells of heat. Marie is a delightful creature, with the temperament of a Carmen and the charm of a woman used to the companionship of the sun, the wind, and the rain. Bohemian by birth, she finds the phlegmatic temperament of her Swedish husband eminently difficult to live with. She and Emil fall in love with the irresponsibility and spontaneity of two children. It is a tragic idyll, and has a terrible ending. Frank Shabata discovers them together, shoots them both, and is sentenced to ten years' imprisonment for the crime. Alexandra marries Carl at the finish, and her closing words are typical of the spirit of the Pioneers, who have won dominion over the land they set out to conquer: "The land belongs to the future, Carl; that's the way it seems to me. . . . We come and go, but the land is always here. 'And the people who love it and understand it are the people who own it for a little while."

Mr. Arnold Bennett, in his latest novel, THE REGENT (Methuen, 6s.), has chosen that period in a man's life when on the threshold of middle age he finds he has lost the zest that is the inevitable accompaniment and compensation of youth, and for the moment finds his taste jaded, his capacity for adventure dulled. It has been said that between forty and fifty is a most dangerous age for man; for the first time, perhaps, he grows conscious of, and remembers grudgingly the years of work he has traversed, and questions the worth of what he has accomplished. Alderman Machin, known and admired to all the Five Towns, finds himself at forty-three comparatively unelated by the success of a coup in rubber, by which he nets £341. Deprived of exhilaration by a mysterious stroke of Providence, Machin finds relief from his gloom in a sense of grievance. It awaits him on the threshold of his home, and takes the form of "a dilapidated hand brush. He gazed at that brush with resentment. The offensive object would have been out of place at night full in the lobby of any house. But in the lobby of his house—the house which he had planned a dozen years earlier, to the special end of minimising domestic labour, and which he had always kept up to date with the latest devices—in his lobby, the spectacle of a vile, outworn hand-brush at tea-time amounted to a scandal." He hugs his sense of injury, recalling the fact that a short time back he had presented his wife with a marvellous electric vacuum-cleaner; "you simply attached this machine by a cord to the wall like a dog, and wave it in mysterious passes over the floor, like a fan, and the house was clean!" Machin's sense of grievance starts him off on an adventurous quest which takes him to London, and lands him with an option over a plot of land near Piccadilly Circus, where he erects a theatre called "The Regent," comes in contact with many strange people and weird things, and has a narrow escape of falling head over ears in love with a charming girl named Elsie April, to the danger of forgetting his wife Nellie and the bairns. He succeeds in keeping his admiration within bounds, and by a master stroke introduces Mrs. Machin to Miss Elsie. The meeting is delightful. Machin, who has transported his family to London, is wheeling the baby's perambulator, his other olive branches, three in number, trotting behind. Romance cannot survive the shock, and things regain their true perspective for the man and for the girl. How Machin made his theatre pay, by what a hair-breadth chance he escaped failure and snatched success from the very teeth of adversity, Mr. Bennett recounts with the racy humour and grip that make his romantic fantasias a joy to read.

Miss Isabel Clarke has evidently been a faithful student of the literature of the desert, notably Hichin's "Garden of Allah." THE SECRET CITADEL (Hutchinson and Co., 6s.) is a romance tinged with the mystery of solitude, but, though reminiscent of other authors, there is a certain charm about the descriptions that encourages the reader in his quest for a plot somewhat belated in development. It would be interesting to determine whether the author would not be more successful were she to concentrate on the art of a short story rather than allow herself the luxury of a big canvas.

Extracts from THE FIRST REVIEW:

"It is somewhat curious that no complete study of this subject has previously appeared, though many valuable contributions towards its history and criticism have been made, while a bibliography of its origins has quite recently been published by Mr. Esdale; but we may consider ourselves fortunate that the task has at length been undertaken by Professor Saintsbury. A lifetime spent in reading all the fine literature of the world, and all the remaining literature of France and England, in writing about it and teaching it, has given him a grasp of his subject that can hardly be equalled by any critic of to-day. He has never hesitated, when expressing his opinions, to sacrifice the dignity of the chair to a decisive raciness of pronouncement which leaves its mark once for all on the mind, and he has in this volume pretermitted that attempt at obtaining minute accuracy of expression by interpolated qualifications which has exasperated generations of readers—an avoidance which will be appreciated by those who remember the wild orgy of parentheses in a recent unsigned study of Balzac.

"His estimate of the true place of Disraeli, Lytton, Marryat, and Peacock, and of their influence, is very reasonable—perhaps a little hard on Disraeli; and the few words allotted to writers of less importance generally hit them off with accuracy. His criticism of Dickens, and especially of the critics of Dickens, is that of a man who cares for good writing—a taste which leads him, perhaps, to over-estimate Thackeray and to undervalue some of the moderns; and he has a good word for Anthony Trollope, who has, however, already been praised by competent judges.

"We do not know if this book will afford (in the publishers' language) 'those who might wish to devote themselves' to the composition of an English novel 'the materials for accomplishing their desire,' and rather wish we could have the advantage of the author's candid opinion on the point, but we are sure that rarely indeed has a more illuminating and pleasant text-book of the literature been offered to the public."

ART in the long Autumn evenings

ANYONE with a taste for drawing, ambition, and a little spare-time home-training can turn their talents to profitable account.

Few realise just how urgent is the demand for slick, effective sketches for Advertisements, Book and Magazine covers, etc.

From £10 to £100 is gladly paid by advertisers for a design for a poster.

Look through any good Magazine and see how many drawings are reproduced therein, try and imagine what it would look like without its wealth of pictures.

Young Artists who Earn more than Royal Academicians.

Even the advertisement pages are full of illustrations—done by artists who have learned the advertisers' simple but essential requirements, and who earn more than exhibitors at the Royal Academy. Think of the number of publications there are, all dependent upon the artists who have been wise enough to learn the technique of this new and lucrative branch of art. Consider also the ever-increasing quantities of posters, showcards, etc., study the bookstalls and the hoardings, and you may begin to realise how vast is this new field of art effort, and how profitable it is to all concerned with it.

The "crazy" poster of a few years ago, when almost any odd thing was thought good enough for the colour-printer, has given place to the sane, attractive, and essentially refined designs which appeal to people of culture and intelligence, and make fortunes for the advertisers.

The demand for simple but suitable sketches—not school of art studies or ordinary easel pictures—exceeds the supply.

If You can Draw at all.

If you can draw at all you can learn, by post, to draw for reproduction. No matter where you live you can have a London training in your own home that will teach you confidentially, thoroughly and swiftly all you need to know to earn money by art in the shortest possible time.

As you learn by post, so you can sell your sketches by post—most drawings are sold in this way. The busy artist has no time for submitting his work personally; besides, he rarely makes a successful commercial traveller.

While you are learning you can be earning if you take the P.C.C. Course. This Course has been prepared by CHAS. E. DAWSON, one of London's leading exponents of Pictorial Publicity—the teacher and art critic who has helped more men and women readers of EVERYMAN to earn money by art than any other man. Mr. Dawson personally conducts this Course, and becomes responsible to us for the success of each postal student he accepts. He criticises every exercise of the student, and his teaching, help, and advice are unlimited.

The most comprehensive Course of Art Training in the World.

The Course is adapted to your aims and needs—you are the only student in your class; it begins just where any previous training may have left off, and continues—until proficient.

It consists of:—

1. Twelve printed sections, in which are crystallised all the knowledge gained by Chas. E. Dawson during his extraordinarily varied and successful career. It took him ten years to write and illustrate this amazingly comprehensive and interesting guide.

2. A regular and progressive series of exercises, each teaching in a novel and scientific way some practical method of money-earning by-art.

3. Personal letters of criticism, replies to students' questions, hints and advice—until proficient.

With the progressive, superbly illustrated lessons in the practical professional side of designing, and the unlimited individual criticism, help and advice of Mr. Dawson, you may learn in your spare time what usually takes years to find out—just the essential facts that no Art School or hand-books ever tell.

How to Design for Reproduction—and Sell your Sketches.

You can learn, too, how to make the designs that are wanted; how, when and where to dispose of them to the utmost advantage.

The lessons are clear and easy to follow, and drudgery of study is eliminated. Gaining a practical knowledge of the profitable branches of Applied Art by our system of Postal tuition is a pastime. The Students' difficulties and doubts give place to confidence and courage, and he or she is helped to earn while learning.

Among the objects taught in the Twelve Months' Course are: Lettering, Black-and-White, Line, Wash and Body Colour; Drawing effectively Figures, Pretty Faces, Drapery, Flowers; Landscapes and Portraits in Colours; Studio Economics; Time and Labour-saving Devices, Practical Hints, etc.

Send a small Sketch in any media—pen, pencil, or colour—and we will return it to you with a personal letter from Mr. Dawson upon your chances of success in Commercially Applied Art.

We will send also a finely illustrated Prospectus of our unique Course, which teaches all you need to know to make money by Drawing for Reproduction, Designing Posters, Book and Magazine Covers, Ex Libris, Advertisements, etc.

It costs nothing and you risk nothing in sending a sketch and receiving particulars of the only System that trains you until proficient, and that has helped so many men and women readers of EVERYMAN in all parts of the world to earn money by Art.

HISTORY IN THE MAKING

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

LORD LOREBURN'S appeal for a Conference on Home Rule has not carried us much further. Both sides have rejected the proposal with emphasis. Yet it has sufficient vitality, as we think, not to be thus summarily disposed of. It is more than probable that the suggestion, which is no new one, will be revived, and at no distant date, and the party that rejects it out and out is likely to lose considerably in public opinion. The fact is that the average Englishman still inclines to the view that an effort should be made to settle the Irish question "by consent." If that effort fails, then he is prepared to solve the problem himself. But there is no doubt that he thinks it should be made, and there are not wanting indications that it will be.

Once again we are threatened with an entire dislocation of industry, an upheaval that is bound to bring ruin to thousands of wage-earners who are no parties to the original dispute. The facts are simple. The strike at Dublin, and its attendant consequences, have profoundly impressed organised labour. What is the result? Three men on the L. and N.W.R. refuse to handle traffic from Ireland's capital, and, almost immediately, we read that 5,000 men are "out." Tomorrow it may be that the five have become fifty thousand, and already we are told by a leading London daily that "the Transport Workers all over the country are threatening to break away from all control, and that a general upheaval becomes every day more menacing." It is, of course, profoundly to be hoped that this cataclysm may be avoided. All the same, the prospect is by no means reassuring, and with strikes at Manchester, Blackburn, Pontypridd, and London, it is, unfortunately, only too probable that another serious industrial struggle may result. "The solidarity of labour," the electric sympathy which spreads from the ranks of one industry to another, is one of the awkward facts which our civilisation has to assimilate. But assimilated it must be.

The final settlement of the war in the Near East must prove a bitter disappointment to all who had hoped that the area under Turkish mis-rule had been enormously reduced, and who saw in the Treaty of London a chance for those new nations whose development the "Sublime Porte" has for so long retarded. According to the Pall Mall Gazette, Turkey not only recovers Adrianople, but she retains Kirk Kilisse, while, according to our contemporary, the future frontier will include in European Turkey a very considerable tract of territory to the west. "It comes to this," says the Pall Mall, "that the Turkey in Europe provided for in the arrangement between the Porte and Bulgaria will be at least twice as large in area as that laid down in the Treaty of London." This is, indeed, a disappointing conclusion to a war that at first seemed destined to end for ever the rule of the unspeakable Turk in Europe. It is certain also to be followed, sooner or later, by the renewal of hostilities. Once having held the prize of freedom within their grasp, these vigorous young peoples are not likely to relinquish it for ever.

The article by Mr. W. V. Drummond in the North China Herald sheds a lurid light on recent events in the "flowery land." According to this writer, who speaks as one having authority, corruption in Peking is worse than ever. The revolution, in fact, has failed to effect its principal object, and the President, Yuan-Shi-Kai, is a helpless tool in the hands of the money power. The Peking Government is intent on raising the customs duties $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., in order to furnish security for fresh loans, and the morale of the whole country is suffering grievously. Meanwhile, Sun Yat Sen, the author of the Revolution, remains in exile, and his plans and his whereabouts are alike unknown.

Spelling Reform, that last infirmity of noble minds, has come prominently before the British Association, who, in the intervals of reassuring the public as to the merits of black bread, and their members of the certainty of a future life, have thrown themselves vigorously on to the horns of this vexed question. The results are not reassuring. Dr. Myers, who undertook to explain this very latest reformation to his brother scientists, was more interesting than convincing. Thus we read that "He drew all sorts of odd things on the blackboard—a chair with a beard on the seat. That was a vhrwlbhastt. There was a box—quite out of drawing. That was a holmleigh. The cat-owl on legs was a pnedrheuff. A sort of dying bladder, in its last stages of deflation, was a kearlough, and a saucepan, shaped like a cottage loaf, was a durch-roam." We do not know how these results were arrived at. Nor do we greatly care. We are satisfied that sooner than adopt them the happy English child will continue to spell c-a-t, cat. It is so much more convincing than a pnedrheuff, though it is free from any glamour that may linger round the owl.

Once more attention has been powerfully directed towards the evil of that "unregistered dentistry" which has become one of the scandals of our time, and is a positive menace to the health of the people. It appears that there are now no less than 25,000 unqualified dentists, as against 3,500 qualified practitioners, and, apart from the deplorable results that often ensue to the teeth of their victims, these unregistered dentists are not allowed to employ qualified anaesthetists, or rather, the latter are not allowed, by the rules of the medical profession, to act for them. The consequences are, as we have recently seen, frequently tragical.

DR. EMILE DILLON: A GREAT IRISH JOURNALIST

By WILLIAM LATEY

SOMEONE asked the late Mr. W. T. Stead, "Whom do you deem the most brilliant living journalist, present company excepted?" Smiling at the after-thought, he answered, "A little man who hides his light under a bushel and shuns the public gaze as the plague, but is the honoured friend of sovereigns and statesmen. I take off my hat to Dr. Dillon."

This was at least fifteen years ago; but the close of the present Balkan Wars finds Dr. Dillon adding fresh lustre to a name already famous throughout Europe. Flitting from capital to capital, he keeps his fingers on the pulse of events, and, fortified by the confidences of his friends in the Chancelleries, has illumined the intricacies of the international situation from week to week. During the abortive Balkan conference in London, Dr. Dillon was the only man able to give the outside world a true conception of what was going on, beyond the studied vacuity of official communiqués. Guided by a statesmanlike discretion, he told as much of the truth as it was good for the world to know.

Indeed, as he once told the present writer, it is only by reticence that a journalist can win confidence. "What is told you for publication and what for your own private information," he said, "is generally left to your own nice sense of discrimination. Never let your zeal for a 'scoop' make you forget, first, that you are a gentleman, and, secondly, that you will have closed more than one useful channel of intelligence, both to yourself and the journal you represent, by a breach of confidence. Be judicious always in what you print."

What has this man done to whom Mr. Stead took off his hat? Dr. Dillon is probably unique in having written leading articles in English, French, German, and Russian newspapers with equal ease. He has studied at the universities of seven European countries, and is a graduate of three. He is on intimate speaking terms with all the living European languages, and is learned in all the dead, with the possible exception of Armoric. Dr. Dillon is not only a Pressman, but a linguist, diplomatist, and littérateur as well, and has attained pre-eminence by means of unceasing toil, daring enterprise, and a spirit of adventure.

Now in his sixtieth year, he is almost as alert and vigorous as the youth who set out from Dublin (his birthplace) to win his spurs. With his mother's milk he seems to have imbibed a taste for the ancient languages of the East, for at the tender age of eight we find him studying Hebrew. His mother, be it said, was pure English, and his father a Celt of Erin.

After taking the degree of Doctor of Oriental Languages at Louvain, he returned to St. Petersburg, where he had been tutoring, and opened his journalistic career in a characteristically audacious manner. The Russian professors had just published a history of Sanskrit and Zend. The young student of twenty-six, who had made a hobby of these particular languages, coolly proceeded to write a review in a Russian paper, tearing the professors to tatters. So incensed were the pontiffs at the University that they refused him the degree he desired of Master of Oriental Languages; but he took the train to Khar-koff, and secured his degree there, together with a fine repute as an authority on old Armenian.

His advent into British journalism was by way of the Pall Mall Gazette, his scholarly style drawing instant attention. Then, in 1890, a series of articles in the Fortnightly Review, signed "E. B. Lanin," exposed unregenerate Russia so nakedly and faithfully that they caused a sad commotion in the Tsar's Ministerial circle. About this time he became attached to the Daily Telegraph, which for years has had the benefit of his services as a very special correspondent.

Dr. Dillon's exploits are legion. His vivid portrayal of the Armenian atrocities in 1895 sent a thrill of indignation through Christendom. He has a talent for disguise, his polyglot tongue enabling him to pose as the native of almost any country in Europe. In the garb of a Cossack officer, he penetrated Armenia, and saw for himself the devastation wrought under the ægis of the Red Sultan. He risked his life several times, for the Sultan's emissaries had orders to prevent by poison or pistol his ever leaving the country.

One of his coups was an interview with a condemned Kurdish chief, who, after butchering and burning helpless women and children, made the mistake of attacking a Turkish post. Doomed to die within two hours, this villain, who gloried in his misdeeds, was induced by Dr. Dillon, by means of copious bribes to his guards, to give details of his atrocities, some unfit to be printed.

It was this harrowing narrative in the Telegraph which brought Gladstone from his retirement to Chester, where he thundered, as he had thundered nearly twenty years before, at the iniquities of the callous Turk.

Further adventures befell Dr. Dillon in Crete during the insurrection which precipitated the Greco-Turkish War. While disguised as a fighting Greek monk, with rifle and bandolero, he had an encounter over which he has often chuckled since. The Concert of Europe then had as anxious a problem in Crete as was later to confront them in Scutari. A meeting took place between the Italian and Austrian Admirals on the one hand and some of the Cretan leaders on the other.

The sham monk filled the double part of interpreter and advocate, and he looked so fierce and forbidding in his warlike array that Admiral Canevaro thought it safer to relieve him of his rifle for a while. Perhaps the cream of the joke was that the two admirals, little imagining that this peasant monk was all ears and understanding, freely exchanged opinions in German, and later were astonished to find their views truly reproduced in the English Press.

At the end Admiral Canevaro reverently asked for the priest's benediction, which Dr. Dillon gave piously and conscientiously, especially as he hoped that he had converted the plenipotentiaries to the policy of annexation. Thus Dr. Dillon's leaning towards a finger in the diplomatic pie revealed itself. Then also was laid the foundation of his close friendship with M. Venizelos, now the leading statesman of Greece.

After dealing with the Dreyfus affair in brilliant style and reporting the trial single-handed, five to six columns a day, he sailed for the East, and in 1900 entered Pekin with the Allied troops, having survived great hardship from heat and flood on the march. He was nearly drowned in the Peiho River, and was being finally dragged down by the weight of his heavy cloak when a coolie caught him by the wrist just in time.

Once again he was to send a thrill through the hearts of those who read of the excesses of some of the European troops in the Chinese capital.

Dr. Dillon had made his home years before in St. Petersburg, and had become a familiar if unobtrusive figure in the sparkling salons of that city. Few portals remained shut to him, and the Tsar and his Ministers never failed in their graciousness to this gifted man. The writer remembers with what satisfaction he used to con the pages of Dr. Dillon's copy of the Daily Telegraph at his place in the Bolshaya Konushenaya—for Dr. Dillon was the only private person in St. Petersburg allowed to receive an uncensored newspaper, wholly free from Brunswick black.

Dr. Dillon has found his influence at Court very useful on occasion. The Russian Customs on the frontier is known for its severity. Once he was taking an extra large supply of new clothes with him, fresh from his London tailor, and was challenged. It is recorded that in similar circumstances a young Englishman named Labouchere overawed a crusty German Customs officer by inditing an indignant telegram to Bismarck, who would not have known him from Adam. Dr. Dillon, however, was in fact a personal friend of the Minister of the Interior, who by telegraph speedily relieved him of any further embarrassment.

While waiting, however, he saw a poor Russian relieved of the brand new pair of trousers which he was wearing. The wretched man could not pay the duty, having expended almost his last kopek on his fare. He could go neither forward nor backward, and looked the picture of misery. After thus asserting the might and majesty of the Imperial laws, the officials proved themselves good fellows at heart by clubbing together and, with the help of one or two waiting passengers, realising the amount of the duty and a bit over, so that the shivering wretch had restored to him the new trousers with a rouble or two in the pockets.

At the end of the nineteenth century far and away the most prominent man in Russia was M. Witte, and Dr. Dillon, in some masterly interviews, was the first to give a tangible idea of the character and policy of this arresting personage. At that time he looked upon the Kaiser and Witte as the greatest men in Europe. It is telling no vital secret to say that the Russian statesman often turned for advice to Dr. Dillon throughout the difficult negotiations at Portsmouth, U.S.A., and Dr. Dillon handed his own fountain pen to Count Witte to sign the Treaty of Peace between Russia and Japan in 1905. Similarly it was with his pen that the recent Treaty of Peace at Bucharest was signed.

Largely owing to his unrivalled influence, Dr. Dillon was able to send home immediately a full and graphic account of the terrible scenes in St. Petersburg on "Bloody Sunday," January 22nd, 1905, when 4,600 people were killed or wounded by troops in the streets. To this day one can see the marks of the bullets fired at the unarmed crowd who came to present a humble petition to their "Little Father."

By that time the voice of democracy was calling loudly at the gates of Tsarskoe Selo, where the Tsar lived surrounded by guards. At first Dr. Dillon's powerful pen was all in favour of a Constitution, but he found (he has since explained) the reformers so extreme and menacing in their demands that his attitude changed.

He played a more important part than is generally known in the Balkan crisis of 1910 as an amateur statesman, being as much a friend and confidant of Count Aehrenthal, the Austrian Minister, as of M. Isvolski, the Tsar's Minister for Foreign Affairs.

His thirst for hot news again led him into a tight corner in October, 1910, during the revolution in Portugal, which robbed Dom Manuel of his throne. At that time every priest was a suspect, and when Dr. Dillon emerged from a Dominican monastery at Oporto a furious crowd of marines and peasants raised a hue and cry. "Shoot him," they yelled. "He's a priest in disguise!" Rifles were already levelled and fingers at the triggers when he shouted in Spanish, "Long live the Republic!" and thus pacified the mob.

Dr. Dillon's race is not yet run, but his intimate association with the Courts of Europe must mean that his most weighty secrets, like those of Lord Knollys', will not be given to the public in our time.

RESULT OF "EVERYMAN" ESSAY COMPETITIONS

AFTER much cogitation on the part of the Competition Editor, EVERYMAN'S Prize of THREE GUINEAS for the best Essay on THE COMPOSITOR has been given to the writer of the paper appearing in this issue—

Mr. F. T. SOUDEN,
"Thornville," Fulwood Hall Lane,
Preston.

The number and the excellence of the Essays sent in, as in the case of "The Miner" Competition, were alike surprising, and bore gratifying testimony to EVERYMAN'S ubiquity, popularity, and influence. Papers were received from all parts of the British Isles, from big cities and small country towns, and every aspect of the compositor's work was discussed in clear, concise, and illuminating fashion. London was best represented; from Edinburgh, which prides itself on its position as a centre of the printing trade, disappointingly few entries were forthcoming.

Particularly good Essays were contributed by E. Symes Bond, Louth, Lincolnshire, and Fred J. Williams, Willesden. We would also single out for special mention the papers of the following:—"Artemidorus," Southwark; S. T. Ashbolt, London; B. G. Bannington, London; Arthur T. Brake, Bodmin; W. H. Driffield, London; Allan Gibb, London; James Graham, Leicester; James G. Lyon, London; J. B. Mannix, Bolton; Paul Sherard, London; B. J. Sturgess, London; T. E. Summerton and D. Walls, London.

"ROBESPIERRE" COMPETITION

THE Prize offered by EVERYMAN for the best short Essay on "THE INTERPRETATION OF ROBESPIERRE'S CHARACTER IN CARLYLE'S French Revolution" has been awarded to

Mr. WM. K. ANDERSON,
3, Ashton Terrace,
Glasgow,

whose paper is reproduced on page 722. The Essays of "Audax" (Pontefract) and J. Craig Walker (Leeds) rank next in value. Good work was also done by the following:—Charles R. Green, Liverpool; "Mary McSwein"; L. H. Smith, Bristol; H. Somerville, Leeds; L. Thomas, Coventry; May Tucker, Ashburton; Llewellyn E. Williams, Purley. The majority of the competitors found Carlyle's portraiture of the "Sea-green Incorruptible" prejudiced and unsatisfactory.

For announcement of New Essay Competition, see p. 717.

THE MAN AND HIS WORK

X.—THE COMPOSITOR * * PRIZE ESSAY BY F. T. SOUDEN

I.

THE compositor may in a special sense be called "the midwife of men's thoughts." For though he neither begets nor bears them he is in chief measure instrumental in producing them to the world, and thus giving them whatever chance of life and longevity they possess.

Perhaps he values himself accordingly. At any rate, this is certain: compositors as a class live more aloof from all other classes of weekly wage-earners than do any of those classes among themselves. In part this condition is imposed upon them. The thousands of compositors engaged on morning journals have little opportunity of cultivating social intercourse with their fellows in other employments whose work ends near the time when theirs begins. But as affecting the whole class, this aloofness undoubtedly springs from a less artificial and more direct cause. It is in the main intellectual. The compositor is bound, by the nature of his occupation, to be a man of superior intelligence. In the first instance, he was probably chosen for it, or chose it himself, because he possessed a certain type of mind—because he had an alert intelligence, was readily receptive of ideas, and perhaps combined something of the cosmopolitan sense which derives a pleasure in knowing—if only fragmentarily and miscellaneously—how the great world of human affairs is moving. At any rate, these are characteristic traits.

II.

Like the omnibus driver who took his holiday on the box beside another driver, the compositor's chief recreation is newspapers. There is a plethora of them in most offices. Often enough in an interval a man who will shortly be setting news for his own paper will be studying that which has come in a more or less beribboned condition from the sub-editor's room. One man I knew rejoiced in the remnants of a Webster's Abridged after it had closed a useful but variegated career in the proof-reader's closet.

By necessity in all cases, by choice in most, a constant stream of ideas is flowing through the compositor's brain. They irrigate it as water irrigates land. Most, no doubt, evaporates, but much also remains. Some fertilises. On the salient questions of the day the compositor has generally a considered opinion. He is not, as a rule, voluble about it, even among his comrades; indeed, often reticent. But, inveigled into argument, it is remarkable from how many sources of information he can draw to maintain a principle, to expound a doctrine, or to advocate a policy. Generally it will be found that his ideas, gathered over a wide field, often at wider intervals in time, and one would suppose chaotic enough in the mass, are evolved, and march in a rough sort of sequence. Though the compositor may never have opened a page of Whatley or Mill, he has gained the habit of logical arrangement by the regular practice of setting from manuscript with that distinctive quality, just as the children of educated parents speak correct English by most frequently hearing it. For it must not be assumed that the operation of type-setting (commonly now in newspapers by the linotype machine) is purely mechanical. The compositor is obliged to follow the sense of what he is setting, even when the copy is fair and well punctuated, since only by doing so can he save himself from the "outs" and "repetitions" which anger the proof-reader and overseer, curtail his own output, and mar his reputation for "cleanliness." With long-continued practice the act becomes more or less subconscious, but with a subconsciousness that never really sleeps. He develops also an instinct—a sort of second sense, if I may call it so, rather than a cultured virtuosity—not only for accuracy in the use of words, but of the multitude of staple quotations in use. "I don't exactly know how this is wrong, sir, but I feel somehow it is wrong," was the observation addressed to his amazed and also amused editor by a veteran of the craft, who had seen with chagrin his original query of a quotation in a leader passed over by editor, proof-reader, and overseer alike. "Feel it in your bones, perhaps," was the editor's dry comment. "No, sir, in my brains," he corrected solemnly. An undefined doubt, however, sent the editor to his authority, with the result that not only was the phrase found to be wrong in itself, but, in its application as amended, quite grotesquely wrong. When so many "howlers" are fastened on the "intelligent compositor," it is only just to indicate the "howlers" not of his concoction which he is the medium of suppressing.

III.

I hope I have given some idea how keen is the compositor's interest in his work while engaged in it. It is that of the man who looks not only to a mechanical efficiency of 6,000 to 8,000 "ens" (approximately letters) an hour, but to the mental efficiency which will invest all his work with final accuracy. Such a man is necessarily differentiated from the man who, in the modern division of labour, turns out, say, so many chair-legs an hour. The intellectual atmosphere in which he lives, moves, and has his being, the broad horizons which bend towards him with their revealing or reflecting lights—which give him so much of the far sight and the near—touch him to a sense of larger issues in the world than the man whose working life is narrowed to "the daily round, the common task," having no such "windows into the infinite."

And this may explain somewhat the aloofness which I have remarked as the compositor's general characteristic. There is ordinarily so little common ground on which he and his social equals can meet. Perhaps, too, something of the ancient feeling which elevated printing into an "art and mystery" clings to him still. And in this respect it is curious that whilst most other crafts are open to observation or are readily accessible, the printing office yet remains a veritable terra incognita to all but the relative few actively connected with it.

It is proper to state that, as a rule, the working conditions of the compositor are excellent. A material advance has been made within the last twenty or thirty years. The greater proportion of the larger metropolitan and provincial offices have been enlarged or rebuilt partly to meet the requirements of enormously augmented circulations, partly to comply with the more exacting factory laws, and partly, it would seem, because newspaper proprietors take a pride in raising stately structures which shall be both a symbol and an advertisement of their journals' influence. Light, space, and air are not spared, even on extremely valuable sites.

A great modern newspaper office hides a little world within itself, with its various ranks and conditions of workers, its vivid personal interests, jealousies, rivalries, and ambitions. Yet here, where probably more jar and fret and worry are caused in a single day than in most other industries in a month or a year, a spirit of true esprit de corps prevails. For one thing, all are directing their energies to a common end in which all are vitally concerned. One may be a very big wheel or a very small pinion in the working machinery; the same relentless power drives all equally, and that is time. It may almost be said that every definite act in a multitude of different operations has its significance by the movements of the hands across the clock face. For a quarter of an hour lost at the end may throw a whole costly edition of a morning journal on the dust heap. But so perfect is the organisation, so accurate is the adjustment of part to part, and of each part to the whole in, perhaps, the most complex and highly co-ordinated of modern industries, that this truly bad quarter of an hour rarely arrives, and then only by the most extraordinary and unforeseen accident.

IV.

Upon the compositor rests not a little of the responsibility for maintaining this efficiency. For working assiduously, as he is obliged to do, throughout the long night, it is often towards the close, when his eyes are tiring from much straining upon manuscript under the electric light, when his fingers are beginning to ache from the constant manipulation of the linotype keys, and when he feels more especially the peculiar enervation which comes from sitting close to a pot of always molten, gas-heated type-metal, that a call is suddenly made upon his very best energies. A batch of late "copy" has been received that a hurried consultation of the chiefs decides "must go in." The compositors' "takes," which were previously running out to a comfortable three, four, or more folios, are cut down to half a folio, a quarter folio, three lines, two lines. Now, more than at any time during the night, it is important that he should make no mistakes, for there may not be time to correct them; he must calculate his spacing, so as to avoid a wide hiatus between each of the words in one line and a barely perceptible division between those in the next; and he must do all in double-quick time. For the overseer or stone-hand is waiting impatiently to take his lines of type hot from the machine, drop them into the column, close all up, and send the "forme" careering on its trolley to the stereotyping room, probably with a more than usually devout sigh of thankfulness, as he throws an anxious eye upon the clock, that he is "just in time and that is all." But even on ordinary nights there is invariably some sort of rush at the end. More copy is set than the pages will hold, and the excess has to be hurriedly cut out in proof by a sub-editor, to return in greatly mangled shape to the compositor to be pieced up in type accurately, and with as few "over-runs" as possible.

Very much the same thing happens to the compositor engaged on evening papers, and, as there are several editions instead of one or two, of a somewhat aggravated character. But the experienced compositor has served an apprenticeship to thrills, and is not in general greatly discomposed by them. And he learns the value of quickness with coolness in emergencies, and the temperament thus begotten stands him in good stead in other places than the composing-room.

V.

The conditions of the compositor to-day are widely different from those which prevailed before machine composition became general. He is often something of a mechanic, and, in small offices, does take entire charge of his machine. But where four or more machines are installed, it pays to keep a special mechanic, as much to avoid breakdowns as to repair them more effectively when they occur. The compositor on the linotype is, therefore, more or less tied to his occupation, as well as to the particular type of machine. For there are several competing machines, especially the monotype, which is, in fact, two machines with two distinct processes, one of composition proper and the other of type-casting.

The old-time news compositor-at-case has to-day found his last fleeting refuge on one or other of the smaller weeklies, usually at an indifferent wage. But his brother, the "display" compositor, is rather more flourishing than before—not merely because of the vast increase in printed matter, nor because no machinery can possibly evict him, but because the growth in public taste has both raised and widened his calling. His trade has really evolved into an art. He has to be an artist in conception and execution. Unfortunately, his wages, though they have advanced, have not proportionately advanced, except in rare instances upon uniformly the highest class of work. That is probably because the supply of ability has proved equal to the demand, owing to the generally superior education the youth receives before entering an office, not unfrequently extended afterwards in night classes. Pecuniarily the positions of both linotype compositor and jobbing compositor are much on a level. Competent men may be reasonably sure of a minimum of 36s. a week, though less is paid in some small non-union offices. The best men command more, rising to anything between the figure named and more than double. On piece-work, on leading dailies, "swifts" will make up to £4 or more a week. But they are, as a rule, the cream. Vacancies, when they occur, are keenly competed for, and, naturally, the best men secure them.

There is hardly a more hard-working and there is certainly not a more thrifty and self-respecting class of the community. Candour compels one to own that it was not always so. But other times, other manners—and other beliefs upon which manners are essentially founded. That was a time when there was supposed to be much virtue in beer, when beer and brains were assumed to have some mysterious affinity. The compositor is well in front in that evolution, which has widely changed personal convictions and habits to-day. And if the test of efficiency be applied, his work in volume or quality will be found not behind that of any other class or country with which it may be compared.

THE GRAINS THAT RUN THROUGH

Do you think sometimes of the hours that we spent
In our childhood's years of gold,

When we foolishly thought 'twas the world that was young,
And ourselves who were old?

Do you think sometimes of the days of our youth
And the warm glow of the mind,
When it seemed that 'twas we who alone had found light,
And the world that was blind?

Ah, folly of childhood, and blindness of youth,
You only reckon the years,
But the grains that run through in the sand-glass of life
Are the laughter and tears.

JOHN CARLTON.

EARL PERCY'S NEW READING OF BRITISH HISTORY

I.

THE National Review published in a recent number an article by Earl Percy on the Voluntary System in British history, which should rank as one of the most remarkable pronouncements of recent years. There is one advantage in being the son of a duke: you can speak out with a frankness utterly impossible to the man in the street. If a mere commoner were to say about the achievements of the British army and of British military history one-tenth of the candid truths expressed in the National Review, he would be denounced as a traitor and as a slanderer of the nation's glory. Earl Percy, on the contrary, will be praised, and rightly so, for saying fearlessly what he believes to be true. Earl Percy's ulterior purpose is to plead for Conscription. With that plea we have nothing to do. What we are concerned with for the present is the new reading of British and Continental history, and the two contentions which he presses on the reader with a formidable array of facts.

His first contention is that the so-called voluntary principle of military service has never been voluntary at all, and that compulsion forms its very essence. And the second contention is that the so-called voluntary principle, spurious and hypocritical as it is, has broken down all through the course of British history.

II.

Let us consider Earl Percy's first proposition. He argues that the whole subject has been "overlaid with misconceptions, with empty sentiment and loose phraseology," and that "it has resulted in the glorification of an empty and ignoble sham"; that freedom has nothing to do with our system of military service, that the British soldier has really never been free to enlist, that in the past he has been driven into the army by the compulsion of the press-gang, just as at the present day he continues to be driven into the army by the compulsion of unemployment and starvation.

"When the plunder of the Spanish Main begins to diminish, the press-gang is instituted by Charles I. to provide the necessary crews for the Fleet, and from 1625 onwards this inevitable offspring of the voluntary system is used in every emergency to fill our armies and navies. When the New Model Army was formed in 1645 neither religious enthusiasm, nor love of freedom, nor the promise of regular pay proved sufficient to raise the paltry total of 22,000 men required by Parliament. No less than 8,000 had to be 'pressed.' So that more than a third of that army described by Mr. Fortescue as 'the finest force in Europe at that time' was not recruited by the voluntary system at all, but by the most unjust form of compulsion that can be conceived.

"The press-gang, which had temporarily fallen into abeyance under the Commonwealth, had been revived by Charles II., and henceforth it became a permanent recruiting agency for both services. In spite of the popular fear of Louis XIV., of Jacobitism and of Popery, the 23,000 men who followed William III. to Flanders in 1692 were composed of the lowest classes. In order to maintain them in the field, kidnapping pure and simple was sometimes resorted to. This army, though it fought splendidly, was consistently unsuccessful. It was beaten at Steenkirk and Neer-winden, and the taking of Namur was the only redeeming feature of the war. So many Dutch and English standards were captured by the French that the Prince of Condé called William 'the Upholsterer of Notre Dame.'

"In 1703, a clause is inserted in the Mutiny Act 'empowering the Queen to order the delivery from gaol of capital offenders who had been pardoned on condition of enlistment.' Whether this is a voluntary or compulsory system we can leave the 'passionate admirers' of the former to say.' At any rate, 'the competition for this class of recruit was so keen that a regular poster was kept to ensure that every regiment should profit by the windfall in its turn.' 'In the later years of the war the sweepings of the gaols were in particular request.' Another method was, to quote Mr. Fortescue again, 'the discharge of insolvent debtors from prison, who should serve or procure another to serve in the fleet or army'; another was a Recruiting Act empowering justices of the peace to 'levy as recruits all able-bodied men who had no visible employment or means of subsistence.' In practice this affected everybody who was not a voter. Even this was not enough; bounties were increased, and every parish received £3 for a recruit thus obtained. The abuses of the recruiting system became so bad that the system broke down completely in 1711. It is curious to note that an Act was brought in to compel every parish and corporation to supply a certain number of recruits, but was dropped as unworthy of a free country. Apparently a legalised press-gang was considered eminently worthy of a free country! In spite of all these measures, vast numbers of boys and old men were enlisted, who went sick at once; the burden of getting men was chiefly thrown upon officers, who had to make good out of their own pockets the loss of recruits through sickness and desertion, and the Colonial service was so unpopular that wholesale desertion could sometimes only be averted by concealing their destination from the troops."

Even more interesting is the way in which the voluntary system worked during the war of the Austrian Succession in 1741.

"The ranks were filled in great measure by professional criminals, who passed from regiment to regiment spreading everywhere the infection of discontent, debauchery, and insubordination. . . . Week after week deserters were brought out into Hyde Park, tied up to the halberds, or simply to a tree, and flogged with hundreds of lashes.' With regard to our Colonial possessions, they were garrisoned by militia raised by themselves; but in the case of the West Indies, 'the ranks of the militia were kept full by continual exportation of white "servants" from England, that is to say, of men, women, and children saved from the gaol or the gallows . . . trepanned by scoundrelly crimps, or kidnapped bodily in the streets and spirited, as the phrase went, across the Atlantic.'"

The great French war, which began in 1793 and which culminated in Waterloo, is often represented as the triumph of the voluntary principle. This is how Earl Percy reads one of the most glorious pages of British history:—

"When France declared war we had only 15,000 men in these islands. In order to raise a force for service in Holland recourse was had to enormous bounties, but even so, the vast majority were weakly boys and old men. In 1794 our forces in Flanders amounted to 30,000 men, one of the worst armies we had ever put in the field! Practically anyone who could produce a certain number of recruits was given a commission. 'Rich speculators bought the required recruits for their sons from the crimps at so much a head. The men so procured were infamous, and the officers not much better!' These officers were so ignorant of their most elementary duties that they had to receive instructions from their Austrian comrades. Many of them found the 'ennui' of a campaign insupportable without the company of their mistresses, who obstructed the line of march with the baggage of their vast establishments. Sir R. Wilson describes how morning after morning men convicted of drunkenness were brought out, tied to the halberds, and mercilessly flogged, the proceedings being superintended by officers who had not yet recovered from the preceding night's debauch. With the exception of the Guards and a very few other regiments, who distinguished themselves by such exploits as that of Lincelles, the record of the army is little short of disgraceful, and the campaign ended in total disaster. After this we took no serious part on the Continent for thirteen years. We proceeded instead to carry out our time-honoured policy of inducing other nations by means of subsidies to engage in a life and death struggle with our enemies while we reaped all the benefits."

Even Wellington's army does not find favour with Earl Percy.

"Although we were giving bounties of from £16 to £40, we could only provide Wellington in the Peninsula with an army which he described as 'the scum of the earth.' They were, in fact, frequently the sweepings of the gaols. Colborne, who fought all through these campaigns, said that a battalion was fortunate which did not possess fifty per cent. of irreclaimables in its ranks."

III.

If we are to accept Earl Percy's explanation of history, the voluntary principle has been an unmitigated failure from the days of Cromwell down to the days of Wellington, and voluntary enlistment has always been a hollow sham, and the armies recruited on that principle have never been equal to their task. But it may be objected that the press-gang and the crimp is entirely a thing of the past and irrelevant to the present political issues. Earl Percy does not think so. If the voluntary system was a sham yesterday, it is rank hypocrisy to-day.

"Some may think that because the crimp, the press-gang, and flogging are things of the past we are better off than our ancestors. On the contrary, we obtain exactly the same elements as before. Here is what another passionate admirer, Sir Ian Hamilton, says in a book written at the bidding of Lord Haldane to advertise the system. See how he does it: 'The majority of eighteen to nineteen-year-old recruits enlist because they have just ceased to be boys and are unable to find regular employment as men. About four-fifths come to us because they cannot get a job at fifteen shillings a week. . . . The reluctance of employers to take weedy, overgrown youths of seventeen or eighteen . . . is good for recruiting.' In the Annual Report on the Health of the Army for 1909 it is stated that ninety per cent. of our recruits enlist because they are out of work, and that many are, in consequence, in poor condition from want of food.

An officer with unrivalled experience of recruiting stated, in a recent lecture at the Royal United Service Institution, that five per cent. joined from a love of adventure or desire to see the world, the remainder owing to pressure of misfortune of various kinds. Seventy per cent. enlisted literally because they were hungry. He described them as 'conscripts of hunger.' We know, on the authority of Colonel Seely, that one volunteer is worth ten pressed men. Will he tell us how many pressed men one 'conscript of hunger' is worth? As it was in the days of Queen Anne, so it is now. Only we get even worse results. Let us compare the South African War with the War of the Spanish Succession, just two hundred years before. Both taxed our resources to the utmost. The latter lasted ten years, the former two years and eight months. The highest number we maintained abroad in the War of Succession was 50,000. This we did for about one year. The highest number in South Africa was about 250,000. This also for about a year. Taking the population of these islands in 1704 as eight millions and in 1900 as fifty millions, for the Dominions must be included, we find that we not only endured a much longer strain two hundred years ago, but put an even greater proportion of our population into the field. Now let us compare the fighting capacity of our 'volunteers' at these two periods. In both wars there were 'regrettable incidents' and surrenders. Of Almanza, in 1707, Mr. Fortescue says: 'The British alone lost 80 officers killed and 236 captured, of whom 92 were wounded. The sixth regiment had but 2 officers unhurt out of 23, the ninth but 1 out of 26, and other regiments suffered hardly less severely.' The rank and file suffered in proportion. At Brihuega they lost 600 out of 2,500 and all their ammunition before surrendering to a force ten times their strength. That is how the gaol-birds, the insolvent debtors, the pardoned deserters, and the victims of the crimps and press-gang fought two hundred years ago. Anyone who wishes can compare the history of their defeats and surrenders with those of our five-shillings-a-day volunteers in South Africa. It is better not to set it down in cold print."

IV.

It would carry us too far to examine critically Earl Percy's new reading of British history, but when the heir of one of the great names of English history, who is also a distinguished officer in the British army, feels in duty bound to make such unpalatable statements, it gives one furiously to think. At the same time, the trend of thought started by Earl Percy's brilliant generalisations may lead the reader much further than the author intended, and in a very different direction. Earl Percy has written his striking demonstration with the object of advocating Conscription and with a view to rousing the military spirit of the nation. But it is questionable whether Earl Percy's article is at all calculated to serve the cause of the military party. It seems much more likely to serve the cause of peace. It would not be rash to prophesy, at any rate, that Earl Percy's argument will be much more frequently quoted by the pacifists than by the champions of Conscription. And the reason is a simple one. If Earl Percy is right, the military factor, which plays so important a part in the traditional interpretation of British history, will sink into insignificance. The most famous British victories will cease to be the epoch-making triumphs glorified in text-books. If Earl Percy is right, the greatness and prosperity of Britain owe very little to those military achievements which, in his opinion, only exist in the conceit of sham patriotism.

SIR OLIVER LODGE

BY H. STANLEY ALLEN, M.A., D.Sc.

"HE that is growing great and happy by electrifying a bottle," wrote the great Dr. Johnson, "wonders how the world can be engaged by trifling prattle about war or peace." The Doctor's sarcasm fails of its point when applied to the subject of our sketch, for here we have a man of science, a man who can originate and carry out experimental investigations of the most complex nature, who is yet in the best sense a man of the world.

Sir Oliver Lodge is one of the few scientists whose name is familiar to the general public. In a vote recently carried out by a contemporary with a view to selecting the ten men in this country whose presence would most be missed, he was the only scientist whose name was mentioned in connection with the list. It is only by slow degrees that the man in the street is beginning to recognise how great is the debt which he owes to the man of science, but if slowly yet surely that indebtedness is being realised, and as we shall see it is such men as Sir Oliver who are bringing home to the public its obligations.

Sir Oliver Lodge was born in 1851 at Penkull in Staffordshire, and was educated at the Grammar School at Newport (Salop), and at University College, London. That he was no perfunctory scholar is shown by an illuminating remark which he has placed in the preface of one of his own text-books—"It is by thinking one's self on a subject that it becomes really known to one's self; it will never be really known if we only try to understand and remember what the book says." At the age of thirty he was appointed Professor of Physics at University College, Liverpool, and it was whilst he occupied this chair that much of his most important scientific work was done. From Liverpool, where he came to be honoured as one of its most distinguished citizens, he was called in 1900 to Birmingham to occupy the high position of Principal of the great University, whose growth and enterprise redound to the credit of the Midland city.

Honours have been showered upon him. He has received an honorary degree from almost every University in the Kingdom. He was awarded the Rumford Medal of the Royal Society in 1898, and was knighted in 1902.

To understand the way in which Sir Oliver Lodge has gripped the imagination of his countrymen, we must not only look at the imposing presence and the magnificent brow, which render him such a prominent figure, whether in the courts of his University or in the meetings of the Royal Society, but we must consider the fact that he has dared to be outspoken on subjects which many scientific men deem it prudent to avoid. When he addressed a vast working class audience in the Victoria Hall, Sheffield, one Sunday afternoon, three years ago, on problems of the Old Testament, it was wonderful to watch the intent eagerness with which each word of the closely reasoned speech was followed, and to hear the applause which greeted his declaration that "the man-made evil" of the world must be abolished.

He has ventured, too, to tread the thorny paths of psychical research, and it is significant to mark the facts that he was President of the Physical Society of London in 1899-1900, and was President of the Society for Psychical Research from 1901 to 1904.

As a writer and as a speaker Sir Oliver Lodge possesses the rare faculty of expressing complicated and involved results in simple yet precise language, whilst bringing his point home by means of some familiar but vivid illustration. He is reported to have said that he thinks slowly, and in public speaking he conveys the impression that each word is weighed, and the import of each sentence is carefully thought out. Thus his utterances are at once lucid and impressive.

In the realm of physics his name will always be closely associated with the properties of the mysterious æther of space, the æther which is so puzzling, alike to the layman and to the physicist, that the late Lord Salisbury once said that it was merely the nominative case of the verb "to undulate." Sir Oliver Lodge has discussed the question of the relative motion of matter and æther, and has tried to find out whether moving matter has any influence on the velocity of light in its neighbourhood. Though experiments of the most accurate kind were performed, no effect of this nature could be observed. As he has said himself, "A bare fact is nothing, or little, till it is clad in theory." It is the theoretical bearing of these results that gives them their great importance. "It is the extreme omnipresence and uniformity and universal agency of the æther of space that makes it so difficult to observe." "Its curiously elusive and intangible character, combined with its universal and unifying permeance, its apparently infinite extent, its definite and perfect properties, make the æther the most interesting, as it is by far the largest and most fundamental, ingredient in the material cosmos."

Sir Oliver has also carried out investigations on other subjects, including atmospheric electricity, and the motions of the ions in electrolysis.

Nor has he been unmindful of the practical applications of science, for whether it is a question of the clearing away of fogs, or of the growing of plants under the influence of electricity, his interest is keen, and his power of adapting means to ends remarkable. He repeated and extended the experiments by which Hertz demonstrated the existence of electro-magnetic waves, and thus carried out experiments in wireless telegraphy some years before Marconi developed the commercial use of this method of signalling. He has since effected many improvements in the apparatus for transmitting wireless messages. In all such experimental investigations, it is well to bear in mind the truth of the Bantu proverb, "You cannot count the forests in an acorn."

In an age of scepticism he has stood out stoutly for belief—belief not only in the religious but in the philosophic and scientific sense. While many prominent thinkers of the day have written in a spirit of agnosticism with regard to our scientific ideas as to the nature of matter, or electricity or æther, Sir Oliver Lodge stands for the more courageous, the more daring belief that we can arrive at some understanding, though it may be imperfect, of the realities of the physical universe.

In the memorable address which he has just delivered from the Presidential Chair of the British Association, he has pleaded eloquently for the principle of Continuity, not alone as applied in physical science, but as applied in the spiritual world in life after death. "We are deaf and blind to the Immanent Grandeūr, unless we have insight enough to recognise in the woven fabric of existence, flowing steadily from the loom in an infinite progress towards perfection, the ever-growing garment of a transcendent God."

MASTERPIECE FOR THE WEEK

THOMAS HARDY'S "TESS OF THE D'URBERVILLES." BY MARGARET HAMILTON

It has been said that Thomas Hardy is a pessimist, that in the whole range of his work he never yet has let a woman break through the iron law of convention without exacting a penalty of blood and tears; that he has a predisposition against his heroines, and that even when there is a reasonable prospect of the solution of her difficulties in a happy marriage, he makes fate in impish fashion intervene. We have all of us lived through that terrible hour of waiting so poignantly painted in "Far from the Madding Crowd," when the pretty creature goes to meet her lover Serjeant Troy at the wrong church, and watches with piteous eyes for the face that holds for her all that makes life worth the living, and we endure her sickness of suspense, the crashing sense of doom, when at last she realises that he will not come. And all the time, within a stone's throw, he is waiting at the altar rails, hungering to make good the wrong that he has done her, aching to make the girl he loves his wife before the world.

There is tragedy here, indeed, but of the pessimism that sears and scars one cannot find a trace. It was inevitable that the girl should not meet Troy at the appointed place. The same light-hearted carelessness that launched her on the episode that proved her undoing was responsible for her failure to comprehend the directions that meant so much.

The same sense of inevitability is present throughout "Tess of the D'Urbervilles." The qualities that spell her disaster are present from the first. The same loyalty that makes her so passionately faithful to her first ideal of Angel Clare is responsible for her final yielding to Alec; the self-sacrifice that makes her work as a common farm hand in the fields rather than bring discredit on her husband's name prompts her decision to accept the protection of the man who can relieve—not her—but her family from the grinding poverty that engulfs them.

Loyalty is the mainspring of her nature. It is in response to its appeal that she first goes to service. She realises the money she will earn may save the family much suffering, and in defiance of those instincts that rebel at the suggestion, she consents to go as maid in the house of Mrs. D'Urberville, who, with her son, has assumed the ancient name of its original owners. Her own feelings are never engaged in the episode with Alec; from the time she sets foot in the house she is conscious of a certain spiritual revulsion against him, a revulsion that only the knowledge of the necessities at home induces her to overcome. From the first he is inflamed by her beauty, and, later, touched to finer issues, realises in some faint degree the strength and purity of her soul. He meets Tess on her arrival, and immediately lays siege to her in the coarse fashion he affects.

"He loosened rein, and away they went a second time. D'Urberville turned his face to her, . . . and said in playful raillery, 'Now, then, put your arms round my waist again, as you did before, my beauty.'

"'Never!' said Tess, independently, holding as well as she could without touching him.

"'Let me put one little kiss on those holmberry lips, Tess; or even on that warm cheek, and I'll stop—on my honour, I will!'

"'Will nothing else do?' she cried at length in desperation, her large eyes staring at him like those of a wild animal. This dressing her up so prettily by her mother had apparently been to lamentable purpose."

It has always seemed to me that one of the most tragic things about Tess was the fact that from her earliest childhood she realised she could not look for help from her parents, but must contrive in some fashion or other to assist them. That is the one persistent strain throughout her life; her feckless father, the inimitable Sir John, rich in comedic value, was of no earthly use in the practical affairs of everyday life; her mother, a placid home-keeping creature, had no desires beyond the hope of keeping a roof over her children's heads, and finding sufficient food to keep them strong and healthy.

It was no self-indulgence that made Tess stay at The Chase. Alec's advances offended her sense of the fastidious, and, had she followed inclination, she would have left the comforts and luxuries of her surroundings, and returned to the tumble-down cottage with her feckless father, mismanaging mother, and the children.

In my view the author makes this clear in the interview between Alec and Tess on the eve of that catastrophe that, to quote Mr. Hardy's own words, "was to divide our heroine's personality thereafter from that previous self of hers who stepped from her mother's door to try her fortune at Tantridge Poultry Farm."

They are together in the forest, and Alec designs to soften her mood by recounting what he has done for her people.

"'By the by, Tess, your father has a new cob today. Somebody gave it to him.'

"'Somebody? You?'

D'Urberville nodded.

"'Oh, how very good of you that is!' she exclaimed, with a painful sense of the awkwardness at having to thank him just then.

"'And the children have some toys!'

"'I didn't know—you ever sent them anything!' she murmured, much moved. 'I almost wish you had not—yes, I almost wish it.'

"'Why, dear?'

"'It hampers me so.'

"'Tessy, don't you love me ever so little now?'

"'I'm grateful,' she reluctantly admitted. 'But I fear I do not.' The sudden vision of his passion for herself as a factor in this result so distressed her that, beginning with one slow tear, and then following with another, she wept outright."

The charge of weakness time and again has been brought against poor Tess; but that she was capable not only of the passion of self-sacrifice, but of resolute action and clear logical thought, is proved by the stand she takes up when her poor baby—the child of her unmerited suffering and misery—is in the throes of death. The baby has not been baptised, and in the stillness of the night, "when thoughts stalk outside reason, and malignant possibilities stand rock-firm as facts," she was shaken by fears of the little one's future. "She thought of the child consigned to the nethermost corner of hell as its double doom for lack of baptism and lack of legitimacy. Saw the archfiend tossing it with his three-pronged fork like the one they use for heating the oven on baking days, to which picture she added many other quaint and curious details of torment taught the young in this Christian country."

The picture of the young mother alone with a dying child, racked by unimaginable horrors, tortured with the conviction most pregnant to a mother's heart, that it was for her sin the child would suffer, is to me one of the most poignant things in the book. And then across her misery comes an idea, daring but at the same time full of wonderful solace. She will save her child the tortures of hell, rescue the sweet little body from the cruel flames, snatch him from the devil, at whatever cost to herself. Ignorant, uninstructed, yet aflame with mother-love, she dares a possibility fraught with the terrors of the unknown; she will baptise the child, even if it damn her own soul.

"Sorrow, I baptise thee in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost."

And it is this woman who has been called weak and vain.

It is in the phase that follows, when Tess goes to work at Crick's Dairy Farm, that one is fain to call upon the author to stay his hand. Angel Clare, one realises from the moment he appears, has neither the courage nor the strength necessary to the heroine's proper complement. She gives him her whole love, lavishing on his blonde and somewhat effeminate head a woman's devotion with an almost maternal patience of his fads and whimsicalities. This is the picture the author paints of her at the moment love of Clare has filled her life. "She had stretched an arm so high above her coiled-up cable of hair that he could see its satin delicacy above the sunburn; her face was flushed with sleep, and her eyelids hung heavy over their pupils. The brim-fulness of her nature breathed from her. It was a moment when a woman's soul is more incarnate than at any other time; when the most spiritual beauty bespeaks itself flesh; and sex takes the outside place in the presentation."

That she should love him is, to the girl, inevitable; that he should return that love, and, crowning mystery, seek her for his wife, fills her with joy at once terrible and amazing. "With pain that was like the bitterness of dissolution, she murmured the words of her indispensable and sworn answer as an honourable woman, "Oh, Mr. Clare—I cannot be your wife—I cannot be!"

Not without great heartsearching and struggle does Tess give way; even when at the last she yields and accepts the chance of a happiness transcendent in promise, it is as much the thought of what Clare will endure if she refuses him as desire for her own happiness that influences the decision. And though she lets him marry her in ignorance of what had happened with Alec, she confesses the truth the very evening of their wedding, gratefully responsive to his own spasm of confession—a confession that to her innocent mind is pregnant as the one she has to make. In the chapters that follow, when Clare, with the petulance of a child disappointed in a new toy, rushes away from England, careless as to what happens to the young creature he has made his wife, Tess attains the full development of her character.

It is open to her to make an appeal to Clare's parents, and to claim from them protection, if not a home. But loyalty to the husband who has left her will not permit her to ask his family's help. Once, indeed, tried to the verge of desperation by Clare's silence, hungry for news of her beloved, she makes a pilgrimage to the vicarage, determined to ask news of him. It is one of Hardy's tragic walks, when by sheer force he compels you to trace each step of the road, realise the hopes and fears, the sickening sense of the passionate pilgrim.

The family are away; Tess's journey has been in vain; the efforts she has made to appear neatly gowned and well shod in their eyes are useless; her efforts flung back in her face. "She took off the thick boots in which she had walked thus far, put on the pretty thin ones of patent leather, and, stuffing the former into the hedge by the gate-post, where she might readily find them again, descended the hill." It is these boots that the family from the parsonage discover in the hedge. "Thrown away, I suppose, by some tramp or other. . . . What a wicked thing to do! I will carry them home for some poor person." And Tess, who has heard all this, retreated down the hill.

Even then she does not lose faith that in the end her husband will come back to her, forgive her, and take her as his wife. Meantime she will work to keep herself, and ask help from no man; and to this course she would have held but for the family misfortunes, which once again play so desperate a part in her history. The feckless father has died; the mother, with her children, has neither plans nor hope. They turn to Tess for assistance, and Tess, true to her passionate loyalty, does not fail them. A last appeal she makes to Clare in one of the most wonderful letters in literature. "The daylight has nothing to show me since you are not here, and I do not like to see the rooks and starlings in the fields because I grieve to miss you who used to see them with me. I long for only one thing in heaven or earth or under the earth—to meet you, my own dear! Come to me—come to me, and save me from what threatens me! Your faithful, heartbroken Tess."

But he does not come and he does not save her, and because of her little sisters' and brothers' and mother's needs she goes to Alec, believing that her husband will never come back, and that though life holds nothing more for her, she can still make smooth the path for her people—the people for whom she would lay down her life.

The conclusion of the tragedy comes swiftly; the woman's patience breaks; face to face with reality at last, her vision stripped of the mists of sacrifice, cleared of that lust for giving that has enthralled her so long and with such fatal results, she strikes a sudden quick blow, revenging at a stroke the cruelty, the injustice, the wanton hurt that have been meted out to her.

Alec, who has "torn her life all to pieces," meets with his due reward.

And at the end, when the tragedy is played out, and Tess has paid the forfeit of her life, paid it gladly for the sake of the last days she spent with Clare, the man at whose feet she had lavished all the strength of her devotion; at the last, I say, when Clare watches for the hoisting of the black flag that tells the tale of Tess is over, the dominant impression left upon the mind is that throughout the piece as throughout life "the woman pays."

It is the conclusion of the whole matter.

(Nos. 27 to 52) is now in preparation.

EVERYMAN'S FRENCH PAGE

LES DERNIERS JOURS DE DRYDEN

"LA FÊTE D'ALEXANDRE" fut une des dernières œuvres de Dryden; toute brillante et poétique, elle était née parmi les pires tristesses. Le roi pour lequel il avait écrit était détrôné et chassé; la religion qu'il avait embrassée était méprisée et opprimée; catholique et royaliste, il était confiné dans un parti vaincu, que la nation considérait avec ressentiment et avec défiance comme l'adversaire naturel de la liberté et de la raison. Il avait perdu les deux places qui le faisaient vivre; il subsistait misérablement, chargé de famille, obligé de soutenir ses fils à l'étranger, traité en mercenaire par un libraire grossier, forcé de lui demander de l'argent pour payer une montre qu'on ne voulait pas lui laisser à crédit, priant Lord Bolingbroke de le protéger contre ses injures, vilipendé par son boutiquier quand la page promise n'était pas pleine au jour dit. Ses ennemis le persécutaient de pamphlets; le puritain Collier flagellait brutalement ses comédies; on le damnait sans pitié et en conscience.

Il était malade depuis longtemps, impotent, contraint de beaucoup écrire, réduit à exagérer la flatterie pour obtenir des grands l'argent indispensable que les éditeurs ne lui donnaient pas.* "Ce que Virgile a composé," disait-il, "dans la vigueur de son âge, dans l'abondance et le loisir, j'ai entrepris de le traduire dans le déclin de mes années; luttant contre le besoin, opprimé par la maladie, contraint dans mon génie, exposé à voir mal interpréter tout ce que je dis, avec des juges qui, à moins d'être très-équitables, sont déjà indisposés contre moi par le portrait diffamatoire qu'on a fait de mon caractère."†

Quoique bien disposé pour lui-même, il savait que sa conduite n'avait pas toujours été digne, et que tous ses écrits n'étaient pas durables. Né entre deux époques, il avait oscillé entre deux formes de vie et deux formes de pensée, n'ayant atteint la perfection ni de l'une ni de l'autre, n'ayant point trouvé dans les mœurs environnantes un soutien digne de son caractère, ni dans les idées environnantes une matière digne de son talent. S'il avait institué la critique et le bon style, cette critique n'avait trouvé place qu'en des traités pédantesques ou des préfaces décousues; ce bon style restait dépaycé dans des tragédies enflées, dispersé en des traductions multipliées, égaré en des pièces d'occasion, en des odes de commande, en des poèmes de parti, ne rencontrant que de loin en loin un souffle capable de l'employer et un sujet capable de le soutenir.

Que d'efforts pour un effet médiocre! C'est la condition naturelle de l'homme. Au bout de tout, voici venir la douleur et l'agonie. La gravelle, la goutte, depuis longtemps, ne lui laissaient plus de relâche; un érysipèle couvrit sa jambe. Vers le mois d'avril, 1700, il essaya de sortir; son pied foulé se gangréna; on voulut tenter l'opération, mais il jugea que ce qui lui restait de santé et de bonheur n'en valait pas la peine. Il mourut à soixante-neuf ans.

* On lui payait dix mille vers deux cent cinquante guinées.

† Post-scriptum de la traduction de Virgile.

DRYDEN'S LAST DAYS

"ALEXANDER'S FEAST" was one of Dryden's last works; brilliant and poetical, it was born amidst the greatest sadness. The king for whom he had written was deposed and in exile; the religion which he had embraced was despised and oppressed; a Roman Catholic and a Royalist, he was bound to a conquered party, which the nation resentfully and distrustfully considered as the natural enemy of liberty and reason. He had lost the two places which were his support; he lived wretchedly, burdened with a family, obliged to support his sons abroad; treated as a hireling by a coarse publisher, forced to ask him for money to pay for a watch which he could not get on credit, beseeching Lord Bolingbroke to protect him against Tonson's insults, rated by this shopkeeper when the promised page was not finished on the stated day. His enemies persecuted him with pamphlets; the severe Collier lashed his comedies unfeelingly; he was damned without pity, but conscientiously.

He had long been in ill-health, crippled, constrained to write much, reduced to exaggerate flattery in order to earn from the great the indispensable money which the publishers would not give him.* "What Virgil wrote in the vigour of his age, in plenty and at ease, I have undertaken to translate in my declining years; struggling with wants, oppressed with sickness, curbed in my genius, liable to be misconstrued in all I write; and my judges, if they are not very equitable, already prejudiced against me, by the lying character which has been given them of my morals."†

Although he looked at his conduct from the most favourable point of view, he knew that it had not always been worthy, and that his writings would not all endure. Born between two epochs, he had oscillated between two forms of life and two forms of thought, having reached the perfection of neither, having kept the faults of both; having discovered in surrounding manners no support worthy of his character, and in surrounding ideas no subject worthy of his talent. If he had founded criticism and good style, this criticism had only its scope in pedantic treatises or unconnected prefaces; this good style continued out of the track in inflated tragedies, dispersed over multiplied translations, scattered in occasional pieces, in odes written to order, in party poems, meeting only here and there an afflatus capable of employing it, and a subject capable of sustaining it.

What gigantic efforts to end in such a moderate result! This is the natural condition of man. The end of everything is pain and agony. For a long time gravel and gout left him no peace; erysipelas seized one of his legs. In April, 1700, he tried to go out; gangrene of the foot resulted. The doctor would have tried amputation, but Dryden decided that what remained to him of health and happiness was not worth the pain. He died at the age of sixty-nine.

* He was paid two hundred and fifty guineas for ten thousand lines.

LITERARY NOTES

OF biographies of the German Emperor there is no lack, although, of course, until his life and reign are ended no definite and standard work on Wilhelm II. can be expected. With his English mother, however, it is different, and in the forefront of their autumn announcements Messrs. J. Nisbet and Co. place a Memoir on "The Empress Frederick" (15s.). This will be published in October, and claims to be "the first sincere and complete life of the Empress Frederick to appear in either English or German, and it will undoubtedly remain the standard biography until (if ever) her private diaries and letters are given to the world." The writer—whose name for some reason is not given—has had access to a part at least of the Empress Frederick's private correspondence; he has consulted the principal memoirs and reminiscences of her time in both German and English; and he has received valuable assistance from her personal friends. Thus the book, though not an official life, bids fair to be an important historical work, shedding much light on a most interesting personality, and on events closely concerning two great nations.

* * * * *

In their autumn catalogue Sir Isaac Pitman and Sons give pride of place to a new Brontë book, "In the Footsteps of the Brontës" (16s.). The author is Mrs. Ellis H. Chadwick, whose memoir on Mrs. Gaskell is well known. Mrs. Chadwick naturally pays special attention to Charlotte and Emily Brontë's residence in Brussels, and she has obtained authoritative information dealing with that period, which reveals the reason for the long delay in the publication of the letters written by Charlotte to M. Heger. A notable feature of the book will be its illustrations, among which are a number of hitherto unpublished photographs.

* * * * *

A volume on "The Great Antarctic," by Mr. John Mackie, will be published immediately by Messrs. Jarrold and Sons. A subject so fascinating, and a pen so popular, will make a most readable book.

* * * * *

Those who have read or heard of Miss A. C. Caton's translation of Otto Ernst's "Roswitha," that charming study of childhood, will be glad to hear that this work is now being brought out in separate parts at a popular price. The first part, "Roswitha's Day," will appear on October 1, and deals with the period when that fascinating little lady was three years old. This will be followed later by "Roswitha and Philosophy," which relates to the time when Roswitha had attained the mature age of four.

* * * * *

Another interesting book of a different kind concerning children is a little volume, attractively got up by Messrs. Longmans, Green and Co. (3s. 6d.), called "Simple Garments for Children" (from four to fourteen), by M. B. Synge. The book is no ordinary dress-making manual, but a practical plea for the protection of children who suffer from a superabundance of clothing, often of an unhygienic type.

* * * * *

A remarkable volume entitled "The English Convict" has just been issued by the Prison Commissioners (9s.). The volume deals with the result of an examination that was started in 1902 by the medical authorities in our convict prisons. The measurements and physical characteristics of the prisoners are minutely recorded, and the material collected will no doubt be extensively studied by both supporters and opponents of Lombroso's contention that criminals are a type by themselves.

* * * * *

Messrs. Constable will shortly publish a book giving an account of the cannibal tribes of the north-western tributaries of the Amazon, by Capt. T. W. Whiffen, N.P., 14th Hussars, F.R.G.S., F.R.A.I., who spent several months travelling in the "Putumayo" districts. The book is of particular interest as a careful study of the life and customs of the Indian tribes which in the interval are said to have been almost exterminated. Captain Whiffen fortunately made acquaintance with tribes of these peoples before they were affected by outside influences. So primitive were these forest-dwellers that they possessed only wood or stone implements, and some knew no method of producing fire. The illustrations are from photographs taken by the author.

* * * * *

As usual, Messrs. Adam and Charles Black are bringing out during the autumn a number of finely illustrated volumes. Perhaps the most interesting of these is a book on "The Banks of the Nile" (20s.), painted by Ella Du Cane, and described by Prof. John A. Todd, formerly of the Khedivial School of Law, Cairo. In this work Egypt of to-day is depicted by pen and brush. The book also contains a bibliography and a chronological summary of the history and existing monuments of each period.

* * * * *

A volume of hitherto uncollected essays and criticisms by James Russell Lowell will be issued shortly by Messrs. Nisbet.

* * * * *

A selection from the correspondence of the late Professor Dowden is being edited by his widow, who invites those who possess any letters of literary value written by that distinguished scholar to submit them to her for consideration (at Rockdale, Orwell Road, Rathgar). The letters will be published by Messrs. J. M. Dent and Sons, who are also bringing out a volume of Dowden's poems.

NEW ESSAY COMPETITION

AS announced in last week's issue, a prize of TWO GUINEAS is offered by EVERYMAN for the best Essay, constituting

A Plea For or Against the Channel Tunnel.

Papers must not exceed 2,000 words in length (exclusive of a brief synopsis), and must reach the

COMPETITION EDITOR, "EVERYMAN,"

21, Royal Terrace, Edinburgh,

not later than October 17th. "Channel Tunnel" should be marked in the corner of envelopes. Essays sent in should be carefully paragraphed, and must be clearly written, preferably typewritten, on one side of the paper only. All entries shall become the exclusive property of the Editor, who cannot undertake to return any MS.

Next week will be published the result of EVERYMAN Competition No. 4, The Male Teacher, and the week after Competition No. 2 ("The Anglican Clergyman") will be decided.

“THE TRAGEDY OF NAN”

THE revival of Mr. Masefield's "Tragedy of Nan" at the Royal Court Theatre is a matter of unusual interest to all who care for the drama as a picture of life translated into terms that make it unmistakably artistic. The staging and acting is thoroughly adequate to the simplicity of the action, and, for its naturalness and sincerity, the more difficult to appraise. Miss Rooke was sincere and unaffected, not once trespassing into the melodramatic, to which the part of Nan offers some temptation. Mr. Rosmer as Dick Gurvil well supported her, nicely realising the none too courageous idealist in the lover's part. Mrs. Tapping earned the mead of her ungrateful rôle in inspiring a hearty repulsion for the grudging, malicious Mrs. Pargetter, and Mr. Roberts, as Gaffer Pearce, the half-mad, half-prophetic old fiddler, happily suggested the supernatural element with which his speeches are charged. He who has long known the drama becomes in time moved to all the surprises of novelty, as well as callous to the charms of the familiar. Wherefore when the hardened habitué of the theatre finds himself moved as he is not commonly moved on witnessing a drama, it is in the nature of things that he seek a reason.

"The Tragedy of Nan," like Mr. Masefield's earlier "Campden Wonder," is a domestic story laid among the small tenantry of a western county. The effectiveness of both plays lies in their minute and homely realisation of the simpler manners and the more elemental passions that animate a rural folk; and in both the tragedy is referable directly to a malevolent human will. Did not record attest the faithfulness of the story to the actual historical fact, few could believe in the possibility of so dogged and determined a wickedness as that of John Perry in "The Campden Wonder," who swears away the lives of his own mother and brother, and dies after them himself for a crime that has never been committed. It is too late in the history of art and the drama to quarrel now with any man for the choice of his subject. We are concerned not with this, but with the art itself, the drawing, with the faithfulness of shadow and light. "The Campden Wonder," in its terrible reality, save for the bitter irony of the futility of the excellent Parson, is unrelieved by a single ray of light. And we accept it as a picture in chiaroscuro. Indeed, the reading or witnessing of a performance of it leaves the hearer hopelessly dejected. There is pathos in the poor old mother's fate, so terrible, so needless; and there is an element of the heroic in the suicide of Mrs. Harrison in the sequel. But both are merely victims of circumstance and the crimes of others; there is neither lift nor light in their fate. And it is thus always with merely realistic art.

In "The Tragedy of Nan" the malevolent motive force is furnished by Mrs. Pargetter, who is possessed of a grudging hatred for her niece, the unhappy Nan, not dissimilar to John Perry's hatred for his brother. Nan, it will be remembered, is an orphan, whose father, though really innocent, ended his life on the gallows. The Pargetters have given her a "home"; but Mrs. Pargetter, jealous for her own daughter, finds nothing good that Nan can do, and never ceases to remind her that her father "was 'ung at Glorster, like the thief 'e was." In the upshot, Nan's uncle is estranged, her cousin Jenny, whom she has trusted, betrays her, and she is robbed of the man who has declared to her his love by the ingenious Mrs. Pargetter. Distracted with all this, she is sought out by an agent of the court, who declares her father's innocence, and brings her fifty pounds in satisfaction of the wrong done her. Her contemptible lover seeks a return to her affection, now that fortune and a good name have returned to her, but she kills him with a knife, and goes out to find peace and death in the harvest tide. These details will not seem impertinent if we mark in them the difference of this story.

Nan is no mere victim led to slaughter. She is a glorious, full-blooded woman, with a capacity for love, generosity, and sacrifice within her. She is young, though she has lived with sorrow; and she sees things straight, howsoever dark and crooked the ways about her. Idyllically beautiful is the scene in which she accepts the proffered love of Dick, rising to the words, "Now loose me, darling; I have had my moment, I have been happy"; and poetic is the symbolism of the rose and the unbinding of her hair. Tragically effective is the scene in which, when all her world has fallen to ruin about her, the supreme insult is offered in the "blood money" for her father's innocent sacrificed life.

NAN (going to the money bag and cutting its tape):
Yes. We'll settle. Look at it. Look at it. (She pours the gold into a heap.) Gold. Gold. Little yellow rounds of metal. Fifty little yellow rounds of metal. This. This is for a man's life. Oh, you little yellow rounds that buy things. Look at 'em. Hear 'em. (Pause.) Don't you speak to me (intensely). There was a strong man, a kind man. He was forty-nine years old. He was the best thatcher in the three counties. He was the sweetest singer. I've known teams goin' to the field stop to 'ear my dad sing. And the red-coats come. And a liar swore. And that strong man was killed. Sudden. That voice of his'n was choked out with a cord. And there was liars, and thieves, and drunken women, and dirty gentlemen. They all stood in the cold to see that man choked. They stop up all night, playing cards, so as they should 'ear 'is singin' stopped. For it goes round the voice the cord do. And they draw a nightcap down so as 'e shan't see 'is girl a-erying. (Pause.) And for that, I get little yellow round things. . . .

You 'ad me in your power. And wot was good in me you sneered at. And wot was sweet in me you soured. And wot was bright in me you dulled. I was a fly in the spider's web. And the web came round me and round me, till it was a shroud, till there was no more joy in the world. Till my 'eart was bitter as that ink, and all choked. And for that I get little yellow round things.

But above even this supreme tragic moment, expressed with not a word too much, is the subtle charm of the supernatural which runs through the drama in the maunderings of Gaffer Pearce, the old fiddler, as to his "little white vlover," whose memory he has cherished these sixty years, and his prophetic prattle about the bride whom he has met, the "gold rider," and "the tide that be comin' for some on us." It is this bright thread shot through the sombre texture of the tragedy that raises the story of Nan above the level of merely realistic art, to give to it the vitality, the uplift that belongs to things imaginatively realised.

Mr. Masefield's art in all that he has done is the art of experience. His poetry is coined out of his heart, and rings with the sincerity of the actual, the thing that can really happen.

This does not, of course, mean that Mr. Masefield's poetry is, all of it, autobiographical; much of it is, we know, of that best autobiography that tells not the things that have happened to a man, but the thoughts, the hopes, and aspirations which contact with this visible world and the men and women in it have quickened in the author's brain into an artistic form. In this day of effort and contortion, it is good somewhere to meet with so steady and so sincere a reading of life as is "The Tragedy of Nan."

DO YOU POSSESS AN ENCYCLOPÆDIA?

A Remarkable Offer.

FIRST PAYMENT 2/6 ONLY.

Knowledge is increasing so rapidly and in so many different directions that the busy man is coming to depend more and more upon a good Encyclopædia in which he can turn up all that is known upon any subject he is interested in. But it is essential that the information given should be absolutely reliable, and that the "Illustrated Chambers's Encyclopædia" is the only work at a moderate price that really serves this purpose is obvious from the following few names, taken from a list of over 1,000 famous contributors:—

1,000 Expert Contributors.

Prince Kropotkin, Viscount Haldane, S. Baring-Gould, Sir W. M. Conway, Sidney Lee, Andrew Lang, Lord Avebury, Professor Vambery, Sir Charles Warren, Professor A. B. W. Kennedy, Professor Saintsbury, Duke of Argyll, Watts Dunton, Goldwin Smith, Mrs. Fawcett, LL.D., Austin Dobson, Edmund Gosse, F. A. Gasquet, O.S.B., Bramwell Booth, Justin McCarthy, Sir W. F. Butler, Professor Caird, Dr. Andrew Wilson, Sir J. A. H. Murray, G. J. Holyoake, Herbert Spencer, Sir John Murray, Sir Edward Grey, K.G., Mrs. Annie Besant, Sir Clements Markham, Andrew Carnegie, Professor Cheyne.

Every subject is fully dealt with. In the case of the political and sociological matter the information here embodied is not otherwise obtainable save by consultation of hundreds of Blue Books and expensive Government publications. The articles on the Sciences—mental, moral, physical, natural, and of their various branches—are written by professors of those sciences in our great Universities.

The "Illustrated Chambers's" (Latest Edition) is a treasury of compact information and a reliable guide on subjects Literary, Political, Historical, Theological, Scientific, Musical, Artistic, Philosophical, and General. It is international in character. It consists of Ten Handsome Half-Leather Volumes, 200,000 subjects, with cross references, 8,000 pages of new, clear type, written by 1,000 contributors of world-wide distinction. There are 4,000 engravings, superbly reproduced, and 50 magnificent maps. There are also over 50 coloured plates, the finest ever produced in connection with any work of reference. Five thousand biographies of famous men and women are also included, with the histories of all the great movements with which many of them were associated.

Let the Children use It.

The boy or girl who has access to a reliable Encyclopædia and who is encouraged to use it on every possible occasion has a tremendous advantage over one not so situated. It is proverbial that the knowledge thus deliberately acquired is the knowledge that stays; and the youth who supplements the home lessons with additional readings on every subject is the well-informed man or woman who achieves distinction in later life.

Two Opinions.

LORD CURZON OF KEDLESTON writes—

"I have always regarded 'Chambers's Encyclopædia' as the most concise, scholarly and useful compendium of universal knowledge anywhere to be found within a similar compass."

HILAIRE BELLOC, Esq., writes—

"'Chambers's Encyclopædia' has been my principal book of reference for the last fifteen years. I have found it much the most accurate of such works, more trustworthy than others, and more comprehensive. . . . I have never found it to fail."

CAN YOU SPEAK WELL IN PUBLIC?

An Indispensable Guide to the Art of Public Speaking.

To one man the chance of making a speech affords the opportunity for an enhanced reputation; to another it is nothing but a danger. For the man who stutters and stammers, and finally sits down after a speech principally consisting of "ums" and "ers" scarcely enhances his reputation as a keen-witted member of the community, or as a man whose intelligence and resource can be depended upon in a business crisis.

For that reason, the publication of "The Book of Public Speaking" is an event of the greatest importance. For it is the first comprehensive work upon this important subject ever published in this country. It provides at once a collection of the greatest speeches of the world's greatest orators, and at the same time a reliable guide to the Art of Public Speaking, written by men who are themselves famous as speakers of the highest merit.

How to Speak in Public.

These articles and their contributors include:—

Rt. Hon. T. J. MACNAMARA, M.P., on "How to Make an Effective Speech";

ARTHUR BOURCHIER, M.A.
(the well-known Actor),
on "How to Prepare and Deliver a Speech";

J. L. GRIFFITHS
(U.S.A. Consul-General, London), on "After-Dinner Speaking";

A. C. BENSON, M.A., C.V.O., F.R.H.S.
(President of Magdalene College, Cambridge), on "The Art of Lecturing";

ALBERT CREW
(Barrister-at-Law), on "The Conduct of and Procedure at Meetings";

GENERAL EDITOR,
A. C. FOX-DAVIES (Barrister-at-Law).

But "The Book of Public Speaking" is of the greatest interest even for the man who never has to speak in public, because it presents for the first time an entirely new form of literature of enthralling interest. Its handsome covers contain the cream of the greatest speeches of modern times.

The World's Greatest Speeches.

There is hardly an orator of note of recent years who is not represented in the work; there is scarcely a subject of importance or of interest that is not dealt with in some one or more of the speeches. Political Speeches, Religious Addresses, After-Dinner Speeches, Scientific and Literary Lectures—all have been brought together to form a work of enthralling interest to all intelligent people. Among the great speakers whose speeches are included in the work are:—

Lord Rosebery
Lord Beaconsfield
H. H. Asquith
A. J. Balfour
W. E. Gladstone
Sir Edward Clarke
Andrew Lang
D. Lloyd George
Winston Churchill
Mark Twain
Spencer Leigh Hughes
Sir Henry Irving

Joseph Chamberlain
Max O'Reil
R. Waldo Emerson
Harold Cox
Woodrow Wilson
G. Bernard Shaw
Charles Dickens
John Bright
Chauncey Depew
Sir A. Conan Doyle
Sir Edward Grey
Earl Halsbury

Lord Fisher
Abraham Lincoln
Justin McCarthy
Viscount Milner
M. Poincaré
Whitelaw Reid
Theodore Roosevelt
Philip Snowden
Jan MacLaren
Augustine Birrell
Sir A. W. Pinero
Etc., etc.

For the Public Speaker.

The value of the work to the Public Speaker can hardly be over-estimated. Each one of the speeches included in the work serves as a model for the construction of a successful speech that can be studied with advantage by the practised speaker and the novice alike.

THE SHADOW-SLAYER * * BY HERMAN SCHEFFAUER

It was just after dawn, when the world seems a sweeter and a better world and the coming day still bears in its breast something of the promise of Eden.

My friend Willmott, the keeper of the El Norte Rock Lighthouse, sat beside me on a bench in his little garden to the left of the tower. The great lamp had been extinguished but half an hour ago. The low rumble of the clockwork that turned its iron bed was still. Willmott's assistant, old Owen Hughes, came out of his little cabin.

"Owen, you had better polish up the Killer to-day," cried Willmott.

He tossed him the key to the iron door of the lighthouse tower, which he always kept locked. Turning to me, Willmott remarked:

"Owen gave the name of the Shadow-Slayer or Killer to the lamp. We've been calling it that ever since."

"Joe! Joe!" shouted the old Welshman.

A slovenly, sleepy Indian appeared, and the two went into the tower. In a few moments they reappeared, carrying the huge brass lamp and the lenses of the beacon light. Owen, setting down the lamp, gave back the key to Willmott.

Then, with tam-o'-shanter set aslant upon his head, the rosy-faced old man, with his clear blue eyes and curling beard of grey, began to polish the squat oil receptacle and thick-ribbed crystals. The sun arose over the mountains of the coast, and the brass and glass stood winking fiercely in the young sunshine. As the old man polished away, with smooth, caressing motions, he chanted in a clear voice a fragment of some old sea ballad:—

"When the villagers lay slain,
And the sobbing maids were ta'en—
Over the seas we harried 'em—
The rovers of the main!
We boarded and we carried 'em,
And split their hull in twain!"

To the rolling, triumphant words he gave something of the rhythm of the seas and the shout of the surge.

"It must be a song of the old world," I said to Willmott.

"Well, it's nothing if not that," Willmott replied in his soft voice. "Owen tells me that his father, who was fisherman and village poet in some hole of a place in Wales, wrote this ballad on an old story of the chase of Morgan ap Morgan, pirate. Owen's full of songs of that sort. And, what's more, he's full of his own stories—crowded with uncanny things out of his own life and fancies. Owen's got something of the power of the bards and seers of the Cymry. To you, to me, to Han the cook, to Joe the Indian, this is El Norte Rock, off the Humboldt coast of California, but to our unacclimatised Owen it is just as much some little island with a haunted ruin near the Welsh coast. We are fairly certain that this light shines on the Pacific, but Owen is able to twist his mind into believing that it shines over St. George's Channel! Some days he forgets his English, and begins talking Welsh. The Chinaman and the Indian go shy of him in a certain mood—when he's "fey," as he calls it. Then he sees visions, hears voices, and so on. You're right about the song—Owen's an old-world man."

"But," I asked, "what brought him here, of all places?"

After a moment of hesitation, Willmott replied:

"Oh, he knew my mother in the old country. She was Welsh, you know. Then, eight years ago, I ran across him in San Francisco. The old boy became quite attached to me—says I always remind him of my mother. I found him steady and faithful, and so I asked him to come up here—after everyone else had refused."

Willmott, gazing mournfully before him out of his large brown eyes, sank into one of his strange, inscrutable spells of silence. I knew that he was thinking of the day when his defeated love for a woman had driven him to seek the seclusion of this lonely rock. After a while, he rose and said:

"I must be getting away."

He vanished into his little cottage. A little later he came out equipped for his journey to the mainland. Once a month this hermit keeper of the light made a trip to the nearest town. This was Pinnivay, which lay twelve miles inland from the coast, and was connected by a coach route with the nearest railway. It was enough for him, this monthly touch with a fragment of the outer world—enough, since the hopes of his heart had gone to wreck in the city by the Golden Gate.

Swinging his battered valise, Willmott walked to a derrick-like structure at the edge of the cliff. At the foot of this stood a stout, iron-bound basket, connected by a rope to the beam above. This rope ran down to a windlass with a crank on each side.

Owen and the Indian seized each a handle of the windlass; the basket was swung over the cliff. Willmott grasped my hand, saying, with a strange, sad wistfulness in eye and voice:

"Good-bye, Hubert. You'll forgive me for leaving you, not so? I'll be back to-morrow evening."

He stepped into the basket, holding fast to the guide-line. As the rope unwound from the creaking windlass and the pulley, the basket sank with him a hundred feet down the face of the cliff to the crumble of rock that lay piled raggedly about its bottom. Here a low and narrow spit of stone, half a mile long, connected the Rock with the mainland. When the sea ran high, the waves broke furiously across this natural mole. The derrick-hoist was the only means of access to the top of the Rock. Above the framework of the hoist there hung a small ship's bell. From this a signal wire ran down the face of the precipice to within a man's reach at the bottom.

We watched Willmott make his way hardily along the neck of jumbled stone, reach the shore, then disappear in the pines. I was now left alone upon the barren Rock with old Owen, the Chinese cook, and the Indian factotum.

El Norte Rock was a huge block of basalt, over an acre in extent, a black cube established grimly in the sea. About the base of its brutal walls lay a litter of smaller scarps and cusps of rock. The islet was situated a mile off the wild, dark-forested hills of the northern coast. In these fastnesses I had hunted deer for a month, and then come hither to spend with David Willmott the remaining fortnight of my leave of absence from my battery at the Presidio Reservation. David had been a crony of mine in the days when we both attended the old Jesuit school in San Francisco.

The lighthouse, a white, hexagonal tower, forty feet high, stood close to the edge of the stony plateau, whose surface lay almost a hundred feet above the sea. Close to its base nestled Willmott's little cottage, clean and fresh, with a tiny garden before it where flowers grew in soil brought from the mainland and fertilised with guano from the rocks. The flowers glowed with a strange brilliance in the pure, dustless air. Close to the cottage, but with its weather-beaten wall of redwood almost in line with the abrupt face of rock, was a small cabin, occupied by Owen Hughes. In the foreground a low, divided shed made a shelter for the Indian and Chinese. Overhanging the lee of the Rock stood the gallows-like contrivance of the hoist.

Out over the sea, which lay extended in sun-lashed silver and shifting indigo, a long, fluctuant black line curved in the air close to the water. From north to south it ran as far as eye could pierce, now thickened and now thinned, but never broken. To the eye it resolved itself into myriads of black dots.

Every dot was a bird. This endless swarm of flying creatures followed the coast-line at a certain distance out, as though its aerial path lay prescribed and defined, bending in as the shore bent in, setting a margin to the headlands as they jutted out. To south, the long line, seen from its rear, lay like a black bar athwart the purple promontory. During the two days I had been on the Rock, this procession of sea fowl had continued south. It never rested; it flowed on and on, a constant current of life above the currents of the sea, interminable, unflagging, without hurry and without pause. Far from the north the cloud of wings came pouring down, millions upon millions, ordered with precision, compact as an army, obedient to its chieftains and to some vast, mysterious impulse, some call of climate, some deep, resistless instinct in each tiny heart.

The birds puzzled me; I turned to Owen. He paused in his polishing, and bent his lucent blue eyes upon the distant line. A gentle smile played across his features. His eyes grew dreamy.

"Though I've looked upon the birds," said he, "for ten long years, I've never heard 'em named. But I remember when I was a lad the same long lines of black sea fowl came winding out of the north along the Welsh coast. And the good fisher-folk told how these were the shrinking souls of the damned let loose out of torment for a space to look on the places of their sins done in the flesh. And the bigger fowl you see flying along in convoy they said were arch-devils to mark that none escape. On fair days, late in the fall of the leaf, there would come flying south biggish flocks of beautiful, snow-white birds, large of body and long of wing. These they called halcyons, and some albatrosses—"

"But the halcyon is a kingfisher and not a sea-bird," I broke in.

"And they were naught but the souls of the blest—angel-beings come from Paradise to visit their old haunts of happiness. As they flew they always keened sweetly—a sad note. For out of the eyes of these birds looked the souls of milk-white maids, guileless children, hoary and sainted men, golden striplings, dear mothers, and truest lovers. And—"

Old Owen drew his vague, open eyes from the sea and fixed them earnestly upon my own.

"When one of a pair of lovers betrothed happened to die, the spirit of the dead, in the shape of the bird, would come winging low in the last hour to find its mate on earth. 'Twas to warn it, you know, then to guide it on its way to bliss."

"All this was told me by a lame shepherd on a night I'd saved him from a drunken weaver. He was a harper, and played the old true melodies of the Eisteddfod."

Owen bent once more to his work, but no longer hummed or sang his songs. Suddenly a brisk puff of wind swept over us, and there came the sharp, metallic clang of the lighthouse door as it flung itself shut in its iron frame. Owen gave a cry of alarm and sprang to his feet.

"Great God! we're locked out of the tower! Davy's got the only key! And he'll not be back till to-morrow night! It's death to the ships without a light—and the sack for all of us. And, look! there's a storm piling up in the north-west."

He pointed to the sea in the north-west quarter. Above the living stream of the birds, above the sun-dazzled floods beyond, pressed low upon the blurred and smoky horizon, stood disturbed shapings of lead-coloured clouds, bearded with black. Mingling her smoke with the threatening vapour-hulks, I saw a steamer making south, as if fleeing before the looming peril. I then turned my gaze upon the snowy, six-sided tower, which lifted its head of glass and its red helmet of a roof so calmly above the desolate rock and scurrying flood. The October sun seemed to grow wan and cold as it rested upon this silver sentinel of the sea.

Owen divined my thought.

"There's no ladder to reach the glass," said he. "The panes be heavy plate, double, and set in brass, and the pivot-sashes be bolted from within. Davy was uncommon proud of the strutting strength of the glasses!"

My eyes wandered to a thick spar that lay near the tower, a boom lost from some sloop.

"We might batter down the door with that," I remarked.

"Must!—must!" he replied.

He called the Indian and the Chinaman. The four of us lifted the heavy timber, hugging it close, then retreated some ten yards from the tower. At a word we ran the boom full tilt against the door. The tower shook, but the door stood firm. But at the third assault it yielded, the hinges flew apart, and the iron panel fell clattering into the tower.

At the same moment, following upon the sudden draught, we distinctly heard the slamming of another door above us, from within. Owen's face grew tragic.

"It's no use!" he said dolefully. "That does for the light. It's the door to the light-cell—it's of steel, with Davy's patent lock upon it. And there's not room enough betwixt it and the wall to swing a sledge-hammer a foot. There'll be no light in the tower to-night!"

"A big fire might serve the purpose of the light," I suggested. Owen shook his head.

"When I was a boy, and the old naked whale-oil flares were loth to light," he replied, "we'd burn a beacon on the head. But the fires beguiled the ships and led 'em wrong; there were wrecks."

Silence fell between us. The Indian lay down and rolled himself into another lazy posture. The Chinese carried the disembowelled fish into the house. I knew the brain of the weird old Welshman was wrestling with the problem. At last he spoke:

"When our Davy rebuilt the tower there was a lordly sheet of glass left over, which I set in the wall of my cabin against the sea. 'Twas clear as water and without a flaw. I can set my telescope there, and peer at the ships in the foulest weather. So that's given me an idea—if you'll please to follow, sir."

He led the way toward his cabin. It was a neat abode, decorated with odd shells and filled with stuffed birds and fish, old engravings and well-worn books. One corner contained Owen's trim little bed. The room was lighted by one large, brilliant sheet of glass, forming almost the entire west wall. In this, without a blemish, the sea and sky stood framed. The sill of the window was only six inches from the floor.

"Here," said the old man, pointing to the window and to a solid table before it, "here we might rig up the light. It's only a shift, but it will serve. The lamp set here and some of the prisms in their frame in front of it, and yon big mirror behind it, and we'll have a good glare. But"—and he seemed once more to be plunged into perplexity—"it's a half-minute flash—an intermittent light—the Norte Rock! A steady light would be a lie to the ships out yonder."

Like the flash of the light itself, a practical inspiration seized upon me as I caught sight of the wide green blind which lay coiled above the window. I lowered it, shut out the daylight, counted thirty seconds, then raised it. Owen beamed with satisfaction, and laughed mellowly.

"Fine! fine!" he exclaimed. "When I put up that blind to keep out the summer sun, I'd no thought it would ever be used to keep in and let out the beams of the Shadow-Slayer!"

CARLYLE ON ROBESPIERRE

PRIZE ESSAY BY W. K. ANDERSON

CARLYLE was not the type of man to do justice to Robespierre. Himself a genius, a great eye ever fixed on the horizon, and taking in the mountain peaks of humanity in its range, he had not that elasticity of accommodation that could enable him to conceive the colourless mediocrity of the valleys, and see what subtle power may be hidden there. Author and subject differ so widely in their mental qualities and capabilities that the mental field-glass of the former would have needed an exceptionally fine adjustment to have afforded him a well-proportioned view of the latter.

If one imagine the two men meeting, there would be a sort of natural antagonism between them from the beginning.

When you come to think of it, Carlyle never wrote the life of any man at any length who had not outstanding talent. Cromwell, Voltaire, Goethe, Burns, Mirabeau and the others—all were clearly masterful men, each in his way doing what was expected of him. But the more subtle qualities apart were not easily within Carlyle's field of vision. I wonder how long it took him to see Abraham Lincoln, who had the same rare combination of insight, patience and outward unattractiveness—though with humour to relieve—as Robespierre. As long as it took Seward; or longer, like Stanton perhaps? Anyway, we find an ill-proportioned figure of Robespierre in his "History of the French Revolution."

Dyspeptic Carlyle is struck by the "atrabiliar" colour of his subject, and never ceases to see him through green spectacles from beginning to end. The qualities of immediate expression, attractiveness, charm, oratory, originality, being absent in this man of colourless personality, Carlyle finds him "sea-green," "tallow-green," finally as "Green Vengeance"; a "more insupportable individual, one would say, seldom opened his mouth in any Tribune. Acrid, implacable-impotent; dull-drawling, barren as the Harmattan wind," while the qualities of longer range, morality, incorruptibility, earnestness, patience, faith, which he did possess, are become terms of reproach, "straitlacedness," "Incorruptibility" with a capital I, "anxiousness," and the "seagreen Pontiff" at the feast of the Deity.

Yet Mirabeau, who had a nearer view, said of him, "This man will do somewhat; he believes every word he says." And the public trusted him for precisely those characteristics which with Carlyle are an object of scorn; it was only when his faith had degenerated to the uncontrolled and pathological momentum of fanaticism that they failed to support him.

A "mean meagre mortal"!

A man who had a longer, more wearing period of Revolutionary service than either Mirabeau or Danton, who could be looked to with confidence when the weary Danton slackened off, who bore the humiliation of sarcasm, the disquietude of ridicule, the distress of insult, without a murmur, and died not worth a sou!

The epithet will not do.

It is no doubt true that Robespierre had not nearly the attractiveness or capabilities of Mirabeau or Danton, that in the light and shade of prominent characters of the Revolution he often cut an ungainly figure, that he was finally guilty of ambition and the most appalling excess; but it is also true—and it is here that Carlyle's emphasis fails—that with, and in spite of, all his natural deficiencies he took a consistent and leading part in a drama unique in the history of the world, that for a period he consolidated and directed the Revolutionary movement amid a sea of unspeakable intrigue and corruption, and, impoverished by his own enthusiasm, finally died a violent death prefaced by many hours of physical torture, borne at least with the dignity of silence.

MR. GALSWORTHY'S NEW PLAY, "THE FUGITIVE,"

AT THE ROYAL COURT THEATRE

CLARE DESMOND, the "fugitive," is the latest incarnation of the "femme incomprise." Her husband does not understand her. She understands him only too well. He is honest and kind, and even generous; but there is absolute incompatibility of temperament between his conventional, commonplace, prosaic nature and her unconventional, poetic, fiery and aspiring soul. On the advice of her literary friend, Mr. Malise, Clare decides to revolt and to bolt, to leave her home, or, as Malise calls it, to "spread out her wings," and like a stormy petrel to defy the tempest. She tries to earn her living as a shopgirl, and she miserably fails. She then offers her services as a typist to Malise, and having in the meantime come to love him, she accepts his offer to live with him. But the prosaic husband does not accept the arrangement, and determines to institute divorce proceedings which would ruin her lover and wreck his career as a journalist. She decides to sacrifice herself and to leave her lover, but rather than return to her husband, who proposes an amicable separation and offers to settle an allowance on her, she prefers to take to the streets. The last act shows her in a house of ill-fame, starting on her new life. But her whole nature rebels at the first contact with loathsome reality, and she poisons herself in the restaurant.

"The Fugitive" has many elements of a great play. It has many dramatic situations. It has sincerity and power and boldness. The plot is skilfully constructed, working up steadily from a somewhat halting beginning to a striking and original climax, the death scene in the restaurant.

Yet the play has glaring weaknesses, and the drama often comes dangerously near to being a melodrama.

PASSING OPPORTUNITIES!

Dear Friend,

Summer is quickly passing. With it the opportunity of giving others a holiday at the seaside or in the country. I am spending part of my holidays on the river, and already the boatmen are beginning to put away some of their boats for the winter. Going over Messrs. Huntley & Palmer's Biscuit Factory I found one department busy preparing orders for Christmas! Just signs that summer is passing, and with it the opportunity of giving a Summer Holiday to the needy.

There are not a few old people in London who years ago came up from the country. The possibility of visiting their old home and birthplace is out of the question unless the railway fares are paid. In not a few instances this has been done, and has brought genuine pleasure to the old folk.

On my return to Holloway I am arranging to take a large party of aged ones for a long day's drive into the country. This was done last year, and many who were too old and infirm to go away enjoyed a comfortable drive to the woods, and did full justice to the good things provided.

All this means expenditure. We therefore appeal for funds to enable us to continue this charity. £5 will send five adults for a fortnight; £1 5s. will give one a couple of weeks; 12s. 6d. send a needy one away for a week. Cost of day's drive and entertaining for one old person, 3s.

Donations may be sent direct to me at above address.

Yours in His Happy Service,

FRANK SWAINSON.

The psychology is often primitive, and the character of Clare is absurdly inconsistent or rather incoherent. She is in turn impossibly and sublimely heroic and miserably feeble and futile. Mr. Galsworthy may reply that Clare is not a type and an abstraction, but just an ordinary fragile woman, with high aspirations and noble impulses, and that her inconsistency is part of her character. The result is, unfortunately, that with such a character the thesis of Mr. Galsworthy becomes unconvincing. And if the writer further replied that he does not want to convince us, and that "The Fugitive" is not an Ibsenite problem-play, we can only say that ninety-five out of a hundred amongst the audience actually must read into the play a very definite argument, namely, that until middle-class women are taught to earn their living, there is little alternative for them between domestic slavery and economic slavery or prostitution. The Socialist thesis first expounded by Bebel in his famous classic may be true, but Mr. Galsworthy has not chosen the best way of persuading us of its truth.

"The Fugitive" was warmly received by a full and appreciative house. Mr. Galsworthy is very happy in his interpreters. Miss Irene Rooke plays a formidable part with subtle art and compelling charm. She is ably supported by Mr. Rosmer in the exacting role of the somewhat rhetorical and conventional journalist. Mrs. Tapping, as the charwoman, relieves the tension of the tragedy with irresistible humour.

CORRESPONDENCE

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Owing to the large number of letters received it is necessary for correspondents to write briefly if their letters are to appear.

THE CASE FOR NATIONAL HOUSING.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I am delighted with the letters on housing which appear in your issue of September 12th, for they show how fresh is the subject even to thoughtful people, and that few yet dream of what is easily attainable. I especially thank the correspondent who terms me "visionary." It is by vision that the world progresses, and there is no practical existing thing, from a spade to an aeroplane, that did not begin as a dream and excite the unwise to derision. I remember that just a few years ago, when the Daily Mail first offered a big prize for flying, it was mocked at by some of its contemporaries—the very papers which now have to publish the winning of such prizes. 'Twas ever thus.

As to rates, why should I make my housing proposals conform to our absurd rating system? Must I fit national housing to a system which no other great nation tolerates? One thing at a time. The simple answer to your correspondents on this head is that we ought to have a local income tax system, as in Germany, by virtue of which very poor people pay no local income tax at all, while poor people pay a little, and the rich pay much more than they do here.

As to officials, no army of officials would be needed; on the contrary, national housing would call for a much smaller number of "officials" than now exists. Speculative housing as now carried on is worked by an enormous army of middlemen (officials), all paid for in rent, and not one-tenth as many would be required if housing were done by the State.

As to houses wearing out, and taste changing, these are points not against national housing, but for it. Mr. Usher must try to see that the mass of decayed and obsolete houses now standing, is now a national loss, and that this national loss would be avoided if national housing obtained. Of course, houses would have to be rebuilt just as we rebuild battleships, and it would not be loss to rebuild, but gain, just as when a business man gains by scrapping an old machine and buying a new one.

As to cost of land, not only is it possible to buy land at £240 an acre in many accessible localities (I have bought it for less), but the State can take compulsory powers to buy land for housing at its agricultural price, which is negligible, and Mr. Runciman actually proposes to do this (see his recent speeches). A well-to-do friend of mine is just building a house on land, fifty minutes from a London terminus, which he has bought at £150 an acre. Moreover, the State can make any land in reason accessible by providing simple transport facilities, which raises another important national issue. It can act where individuals are helpless.

As to repairs, there was of course a clerical error in my article, which I regret to have overlooked, but it is a negligible factor in the case. I allowed one per cent. for repairs, and one per cent. on £400 is of course £4 a year. I have always lived in houses built specially for me, and my repairs have been less than this.

As to insurance, I am glad a correspondent mentioned this, for it shows how commercial ideas stultify thought. Let my correspondent reflect that the nation does not insure its warships. Insurance is the protection of an individual by pooling risk.

As to "empties," these are a trouble to an individual house owner, and they may even be a trouble to a municipality. To the nation they would be no trouble, for the whole of the nation at any given time must be living in houses, and therefore empties average as a negligible matter. The fact is that if the State began to build on the lines I have indicated the State houses would be hunted for, just as the houses at Bournville are hunted for.

As to sewers cost, this was included in my estimate of £240 an acre for developing the building land.

As to building a house at £400, I have before me a beautiful plan of a detached house at this price full of good notions, specially got out for me by a well-known architect. I could build it commercially for £400, and the State could do much better. Readers should not imagine that I wrote without data.

Lack of knowledge, lack of vision, lack of faith—these are the causes of the slow progress of democracy.—I am, sir, etc.,

L. G. CHIOZZA MONEY.

September 13th, 1913.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Do you not think the scheme I propounded at least twenty years ago, under the title of "Household Right," much preferable to Mr. Chiozza Money's? I will briefly explain it. I proposed that every householder should become the owner of his house in sixteen or twenty years by paying his rent to the State, who would during that period pay it to the landlord. To provide for moving from one house to another, or from one town to another, I suggested that whatever amount a tenant had paid in one place should be carried to his credit in the next. I also entered into the

JOHN BRIGHT.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—In your issue of August 29th occurs the following sentence:

"Mentally, we have travelled far from the position which John Bright affirmed some fifty years ago, when he stated that adulteration was a legitimate form of competition."

John Bright never stated anything of the kind.

I have been waiting to see if you would retract, and apologise for, this outrageous defamation of one of the noblest men that ever figured in British (or any other) politics. Instead of doing so, there comes this week, in the form of a review, an appreciation, meant to be laudatory, of the statesman who, according to a writer in EVERYMAN, actually declared that adulteration was a legitimate form of competition.

The John Bright who defended fraud is the same man as the John Bright whom at about the same time the Spectator described as "the Republican conscience of the House of Commons."

As I knew something of John Bright, heard many of his speeches, and for forty years closely followed his great career, I resent very strongly your groundless and uncalled for disparagement.—I am, sir, etc.,

CHINA AND OPIUM.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Dr. Sarolea, in his striking article on China and the Opium Traffic, talks of "England compelling China to buy the poisonous drug." Surely, having made a study of this very important subject, he must be aware that no insistence and no persuasion are in the slightest degree necessary. The confirmed opium toper, whether he uses the drug in the form of smoke, as an eater, drinks it in the form of laudanum, etc., or injects it subcutaneously, most certainly requires no coaxing to help him to indulge in a habit he is powerless to give up. When the use of opium becomes a habit, it, in the vast majority of cases, is a disease, and can only be cured when treated as such. The system becomes saturated with the toxic poison; in most cases the victim is compelled to take it in increasing doses, and the sudden stoppage of the usual supply leads to prolonged and agonising suffering, or immediate collapse and death.

Used in what may be termed moderation no great harm results; indeed, men live to a great age in China under such conditions. But, just as in the case of the alcoholic subject and the heavy smoker of tobacco, the man who over-indulges in opium, in any shape or form, eventually becomes either a nervous wreck or an imbecile.

So far as China is concerned, possibly something may be done by education to prevent the rising generation becoming devotees at the shrine of the poppy. It would be not only futile but fiendishly cruel to cut off the supply suddenly from those already addicted to its use. The supply, if any good result is to be hoped for, must be gradually reduced. It is doubtful, however, if even the most determined and strong-willed man can entirely overcome the habit unaided.—I am, sir, etc.,

 DESMOND MORETON.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—A prolonged study of this subject obliges me to confirm the view strongly expressed by Dr. Sarolea in EVERYMAN of August 22nd: it is a dismal chapter in British dealing with China, and the sooner it is finally ended the better for China, for us, and for humanity at large. In your issue of August 29th Mr. Whittall puts in a plea against prompt and speedy prohibition. I should like your readers to know that the Chinese Government began its reform in a gradual way, but that experience has shown them that a reform of this kind must be carried out quickly, and not by a long-drawn process. General Chang, for example, has told us of an uncle of his own, who had forfeited his position, coming to ask for a fresh start. "Not unless you abandon your opium smoking," said the nephew; "come again in three months." Thus stimulated, the elderly man braced himself up, reappeared in three months, received a small Government post, and is now on the upward march. Multiply this instance manifold, and you have the way of reform as the Chinese have learnt it.

Second, Mr. Whittall has his doubts as to the degree of evil in opium smoking, and he thinks that it is exaggerated by abolitionists. For those who share his doubt, let this fact be considered: the strong and independent empire of Japan neither suffers any of its subjects to be an opium smoker, nor permits any foreign nation to export it into Japan. Is not this evidence which it is useless to gainsay? And if so, why should not China be free to do the like, as its Government and all its leaders most earnestly desire.—I am, sir, etc.,
 A. CALDECOTT.

THE DECAY OF PARLIAMENT.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I have read your interview, Lord Robert Cecil on the above, with some dismay. He knows perfectly well that for hundreds of years laws have been passed to suit the upper classes, and the poor and middle class have been gradually but surely robbed of their heritage. Where are now the common lands that belonged to the people?—given over to the country squire!

The nation grew utterly sick of trying to get Bills through the House of Lords. Every Tory Bill went through with a polite bow from their Lordships. Will Lord Robert name one that did not?

Now he is in tears!

I have voted Tory, but I have found that the Liberals are doing more good for the nation, hence my change of attitude.

Lord Robert complains of the Liberals obeying the party Whip. Does not he and his party do the same?

New times, new Bills. He must realise that the nation has entered a new era, never, I trust, to turn back.—I am, sir, etc.,

"EVERYMAN'S" POLITICS.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I have taken every number and recommended EVERYMAN to everybody—but are you degenerating into Toryism?

The Cecilian contribution (the interview with Lord Robert Cecil) of last week is flagrantly partisan and nothing else. The Cecils think all the time wasted when all their family are not deep with both hands in the national exchequer. "Hinc illæ lachrymæ."

Then in the article about German superiority it is said that they—the Germans—have a "sane" system of Protection. Should not this have been "insane"?

THE PLIMSOLL' LINE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

DEAR SIR,—I have read with interest and also surprise the articles upon the "Tragedy of the Plimsoll Line." I remember Mr. Plimsoll during his parliamentary campaign in Liverpool. In the second article (issue of August 22nd) you say that Mr. Lloyd George, as President of the Board of Trade, "authorised the rules that destroyed Plimsoll's life-work." I have always thought that an Act of Parliament could only be undone by another Act of Parliament. How then could the Board of Trade destroy the Load Line Act? Then, again, cannot the same Board of Trade restore the Load Line Act? Information upon these two points will be welcome. (N.B.—Do any shipping companies observe the old rules?).—I am, sir, etc.,

CARDUCCI AND SATANISM.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I have just finished reading the "Life of St. Francis" ("Everyman's" 1s. edition). His praise, it seems, has been sung by Carducci in his "Santa Maria degli Angeli." If the poet really had a genuine love for St. Francis, he could not, at the time of writing the poem, have held the same sentiments which animated him when he produced his "Inno a Satana." Why? Because the Jehovah of the priests, who is to be conquered by Satan, is the Christ of the altar, in whom, and through whom, St. Francis gained all his victories against Satanic powers. Therefore, either Carducci had completely altered his attitude towards the Church, and of necessity her priests, or he chose the beautiful life as material for a sonnet merely in order to catch the popular imagination. The "occult wave" which is creeping over Europe seems to point to some form of Satanism giving life to it.—I am, sir, etc.,

DUMAS' PLACE IN LITERATURE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—My letter seems to have aroused much criticism, which to attempt to answer in detail would be impossible. However, the point which both Messieurs Dozat and Senequier and Mynherr Endepols make most of is the comparison of the style of the authors more directly in question, i.e., Dumas and Balzac.

To deal with this I think the quickest way would be to quote from a few critics who have greater insight and knowledge of this subject than the average person can hope to obtain, and their statements will have far greater weight than mine.

Firstly, let us take the views of a man who has studied both authors—Mr. W. E. Henley. To quote from his essay on Balzac; in his final summing up he says: "He was the least capable and the most self-conscious of artists, his observation was that of an inspired and very careful auctioneer; he was a visionary and a fanatic, he was gross, ignorant, morbid of mind, cruel of heart, vexed with a strain of Sadism that makes him on the whole corrupting and ignoble in effect. But he divined and invented prodigiously, if he observed and recorded tediously, and his achievement remains a phantasmagoria of desperate suggestion and strange affecting situations and inordinate effects." In another essay on Dumas: "An artist at once original and exemplary, with an incomparable instinct of selection, a constructive faculty not equalled among the men of this century.

"An understanding of what is right and what is wrong and a mastery of the materials which in their way are not to be paralleled in the works of Sir Walter himself."

To more particularly emphasise this point with regard to Balzac's style, may I quote from Taine, who has collected a few specimens of Balzac's literary style? "All the manufactories of intellectual products have discovered a spice, a special ginger, which is their peculiar enjoyment. Thence the premiums, the anticipated dividends; thence the rape of thoughts which, like slave merchants in Asia, the contractors of public wit wrest half hatched from the paternal brain and undress and drag to the feet of their brutish sultan, their Shahahabam—this terrible public, who, if not amused, cuts off their head by taking from them their feed of gold."

In another place: "Caroline is a second edition of Nebuchadnezzar; for, one day, like the royal chrysalis, she will pass from the fur of the caterpillar to the ferocity of the imperial purple." Again: "She allowed that smile of resigned women to escape her which would split granite." Elsewhere he speaks of the "fluid projections of looks that serve to touch the skin of a woman"; of the "atmosphere of Paris, in which seethes a simoon that swells the heart"; of the "co-efficient reason of events"; of "pecuniary mnemonics"; of "sentences flung out through the capillary tubes of the great female confabulation"; of "devouring ideas distilled through a bald forehead"; of "abortions in which the spawn of genius cumbers an arid strand"; of "the philosophic moors of incredulity"; of "a town troubled in its public and private intestines."

The above form indeed a "beautiful page of perfect French" (!), and these are only a few examples; many other specimens are easily to be found.

Let us now take another view of this question of Balzac's style as noted by Saintsbury. "Balzac's characters are never quite human. Despite his noble prefix, he cannot conceive or draw either a gentleman or a lady. His scheme of human character is altogether low and mean." Again, from Lawton's life of Balzac: "His characters always appear mechanical, none of them are free agents. . . His gamut of feminine physiology seems to be limited, very limited. Women of the finest mind he neither comprehended nor cared to understand."

Truly, to judge from the above extracts, "the scanning eye of modern criticism is not deceived."—I am, sir, etc.,

FOREIGN MISSIONARIES AND THEIR WORK.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Mr. F. D. Jones's essay on the work of the foreign missionary in the present day, full of interesting information as it is, seems to refer entirely to one class of workers in the mission field. Incidentally he states that before Morrison landed in China little mission work had been done in that country. Dr. Morrison went out to Canton by way of Macao in 1807. It was in 1583—more than two centuries earlier—that Matteo Ricci landed at Macao, as the pioneer of the modern missions of China, and he and his successors did great things. Morrison, in his own preparation for work in China, wisely profited by the labours of these Catholic missionaries. In the "Memoirs of Robert Morrison, D.D., by his Widow" (vol. i., p. 134), we read how on his voyage out to the East he "sat him down patiently to the Jesuit harmony of the Gospels composed in Chinese, and copied out every syllable of it for his own future use."

The Catholic missions of China form at the present moment an organisation extending through the whole country. The baptised native Catholics under their care number nearly a million and a half, the increase in the last thirty years being about a million. None are baptised until they have been subjected to a long term of instruction and probation as catechumens. The number under instruction in this way at present is over 390,000. Thus the total of adherents, baptised and unbaptised, is over a million and three-quarters. The current issue of the "China Year Book" shows that the non-Catholic organisations and agencies, some ninety in all, claim altogether 167,000 baptised native converts, and adherents who bring the total up to 324,890 in all. This total is less than that of the catechumens alone of the Catholic missions.

It is obvious from such results that there is something to be said for the methods of the Catholic missionaries. Their rule is to live the life of the people, to identify themselves with them. The annual allowance or salary to a Catholic missionary in inland China is about £20 sterling. Like St. Paul, these pioneers have neither wife nor child, and so are able to do without "salaries ranging from £90 to £400"; houses furnished in the European style, European fare, and the rest. And it is not only in China that men of the same type, following the same methods, are obtaining strikingly large results. This is an aspect of missionary enterprise of which Mr. Jones's interesting essay says nothing.—I am, sir, etc.,

A. HILLIARD ATTERIDGE.

INTERNATIONAL MORALITY.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—The under-current of thought in the latter half of the interesting article on "Private and Public Morality," by Dr. Sarolea, in EVERYMAN of August 15th, suggests that the standard of national morality which the Briton is supposed to set up for himself has been judged by the European standard. The article on the whole appears to be written through criticising un-English rather than through self-examining English spectacles. To see ourselves as others see us is always wholesome; but we sometimes take exception to the conclusions drawn. We do not deny Blücher his due at Waterloo. There are even Frenchmen who deny that they suffered defeat in that battle. Wellington looms larger in our eyes for the self-same reason that Bismarck occupies a larger place in German national life than Gladstone, or Cavour and Garibaldi in Italy than Cromwell. Blood is universally thicker than water. To be bone of our bone is more than to be our neighbours over the garden wall.

We are accused of defrauding and maligning humanity by monopolising virtues. The accusation is exaggerated. In any case, who can deny that disaster to the British race would spell catastrophe to humanity's greatest interests? The idealist knows that the influence for good exercised by our government of other lands outweighs any disadvantages it may bring. Why are the natives of the Lado Enclave so anxious to cross the border into British territory? To come lower down the Nile, is the righting of the wrongs exposed by Slatin Pasha, Father Ohrwalder, and Neufeld a piece of forgotten history? Is it reasonable to blame us for the fact that the growth of German armaments is the result of our own measures of self-defence? To cast such a stone is as illogical as to say that we alone are responsible for finding ourselves on an island which requires defence! The "good European," if he had been truly "good," would never have invaded our shores and complicated matters by trespassing on the soil of the aboriginal inhabitants. We may be "bad Europeans," but we do not forget that there are other "bad Europeans"; we even question whether there is any nation at present which can be called a "good European." While we do not maintain, however, that two blacks make a white, we demur at being judged by a standard bolstered up to hide its own many seamy sides, whereof the coup d'état of ante-Crimean days, the presumption of Austria in the "affaire" of Bosnia and Herzegovina, the scandal which drew forth the memorable "J'accuse," the insults to which British travellers on the Continent were subjected in 1900-02, the German haggling over Samoa, and the Belgian disgrace in the Congo are but a few glaring examples.—I am, sir, etc.,

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

IN THE EUROPEAN IN INDIA (Stanley Paul, 12s. 6d. net), Mr. Hervey, the well-known author of that interesting book, "Comeos of Indian Crime," sketches twenty sorts of European men, twenty sorts of European women, and twenty aspects of life on a hill-station. To each sketch is attached a little tale by way of illustration. The author, in a kindly but forcible manner, will drive his readers—and they will be many—to the conclusion that after all the European in India is not so very unlike the European in Europe; and, in the process, he will provide them with multitudinous scraps of curious information. It is, for instance, delightful to find that in India the custom of capping a neat retort with a classical quotation still survives. The dialogue must surely be very true to life, and the style is almost too easy. We strongly recommend this book to all retired Anglo-Indians. Certain pages, we are convinced, will bring back to them with a startling realism their own past experiences.

Mr. G. B. Burgin has written a certain number of novels that, while lacking dramatic force, have been characterised by an atmosphere pleasingly typical of middle-class life. His latest departure, THE LOVE THAT LASTS (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.), is based on an old theme, and the characters are well worn and more than a touch unreal. A plot that includes an adopted son, heir to a disreputable baronet of old but impoverished family, seems curiously out of date for the present day, and the figure of Levi Shielmann, the misunderstood but benevolent Jew, savours of the type of romance in favour half a century ago. The figure of the curate, the small but sturdy young man who braves the onslaught of a ferocious blood-hound and trembles and shakes at the approach of a young housemaid, is neither impressive nor believable. The same atmosphere of unreality hangs round the figure of Reba, who, consumed by an overwhelming

UNIQUE SYSTEM OF INDEPENDENT TOURS.

EVERYMAN has been fortunate in securing the services of the originator of and greatest living expert on the system of Independent Tours.

Thus we are able to offer readers a system of independent tours which is a most attractive form of touring abroad without a conductor, and yet with all the advantages of a conducted tour.

AN ATTRACTIVE SYSTEM.

The fundamental principle of this System is that the traveller should journey with as much comfort and absence of worry as if accompanied by the actual Courier.

Every traveller is supplied with a chart showing in separate columns, each day of his Tour, clearly: where he will Breakfast, where Lunch, where Dine, where Sleep, etc.

CHOOSE YOUR OWN ROUTE

After the traveller has decided on his route, we quote him a rate for the whole journey, including every necessary expense, such as Hotel Accommodation (bedroom, light, and attendance), Breakfast, Lunch, and Dinner, Railway and Steamship Fares, Conveyances to and from Hotels and Stations, Guides where necessary and wanted, Carriage Drives and Excursions, etc.

AND YOUR OWN HOTELS.

Thus, then, the traveller is supplied with a chart for his journey, and knows just how much it will cost him, and carries nothing but a case with his name on, which is his identification to Hotels, and, of course, his Railway Tickets.

No coupons are carried, and the traveller may select his own Hotel prior to starting, if he has a preference.

THE MYSTERY OF BREATH.

Positively the only book of its kind in the world. A system whereby nearly any ailment can be cured by breathing; not deep breathing, but the practice of The Twelve Breaths, also the Earthy, Airy, Watery, Fiery and Success Breaths. A splendid auxiliary to any system of physical or mental culture, improving Concentration, Memory, Will. A reader writes: "Truly magnificent: I value it highly." Another: "It is wonderful what it did for a patient suffering from spinal curvature." New and revised edition just out. Send 2/2 to-day to passion for Gaston, the adopted son of Levi, never reveals to him a hint of her affection. Thus does Reba speak to the man she loves: "It may be that I have not been diligent, have not been faithful in well-doing, have thought more of self than I should have done. Underneath this calm surface, this quiet upbringing, I feel myself a woman; and yet I am shut out from all the joys of womanhood by the duties I cannot leave, the paths by which I have surrounded myself." It is not a matter of surprise that Gaston is considerably mystified by this exordium, and hurries off to meet the woman he wishes to make his wife. Beatrice, though a conventional character, is a flesh-and-blood woman, and, having mastered her dislike of Levi, is content to marry his adopted son, though she by no means hides her delight when she learns that he is in fact the offspring of the disreputable baronet. Once the tangle of paternity is mastered, those who have a weakness for old-fashioned plots and stereotyped developments may find pleasure in reading Mr. Burgin's new novel.

THE DRAGON, by M. P. Shiel (Grant Richards, 6s.), is a variation on the plot of "The Yellow Danger," by the same author, a novel which has achieved the dignity of a sixpenny edition. The Prince of Wales and Li Ku Yu fight at school. Li becomes dictator of China, sets Europe aflame, and invades it with half the population of China. Finally, the Prince of Wales, with the aid of the Redlike Ray and other futurist implements of warfare, drives the Chinese back to their homes with prodigious slaughter. Personally, we prefer the finale of "The Yellow Danger," in which the Chinese fleet, if we remember rightly, was enticed into the maelstrom, while the Chinese army was destroyed by the introduction of cholera germs. For those who swallow strange diplomacies, the newest aeroplanes, palpitating hates, desperate loves, and the fighting of battleships that may be found in Jane, this book will provide an extravagant feast. And Mr. Shiel's imagination is marvellous; unfortunately, so is his style. His epithets are strained to crudeness, his sentences cramped and fantastic, though his "tushery" is full-flavoured. But his wit—let the reader judge.

"You were only sixteen?"

"Hardly more. Before I knew anything he had me off my feet."

"Say crushingly defeated."

"Yes! Ah, if I could only say those sorts of flashing, swift things like you!—you'd think more of me."

Perhaps. But a very excellent book of its kind.

The success of "George A. Birmingham's" humour lies in its fatuity, for he realises that the funniest things are the things that we often say are too silly to laugh at. Mr. "Birmingham's" humour is silly because it is unconscious, and it is unconscious because it is serious. In a way, THE ADVENTURES OF DR. WHITTY (Methuen, 6s.) is very like Dr. Leacock's "Mariposa," but where Dr. Leacock has just a touch of the extravagant, "George A. Birmingham" has just a touch of the obvious. But in both cases the telling of the stories makes the crooked paths straight. In "Dr. Whitty" it is not merely the telling in the Irish that makes us laugh at ourselves for laughing over such a threadbare theme as the troubles of a honeymoon couple. If Dr. Whitty had arrived in Ballintra at noon, walked slowly round the graveyard, and departed at one, we should have smiled in a way that is more appreciative than laughter had "George Birmingham" had the telling of the tale. It must be something in the ink. We have put "Dr. Whitty" on our special shelf beside "Spanish Gold" and "The Red Hand of Ulster." We can give him no better introduction.

MRS. DAY'S DAUGHTERS (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.) is a domestic type of story likely to be very popular with a certain class of readers. It is the history of a middle-class family fifty years ago, and the point of view of the young people is in striking contrast to the philosophy of the flapper of the present day. The story opens with a description of a New Year's party: "They would as soon have thought of having supper without trifle, tippy cake, and syllabub in those days as of finishing the evening without Sir Roger. Dancing had begun at 7.30. The lady at the piano was drooping with weariness. Violin and 'cello yawned over their bows; only spasmodically and half-heartedly the thrum and jingle of the tambourine fell on the ear." The mention of the tambourine sets the date to a nicety. The picture of the host, William Day, "of too restless and irritable a temperament for the rôle of looker-on," as the performer on that instrument defines in startling fashion the great gulf between the period when people gave parties in their own house, no matter what upheavals of furniture were occasioned, and the present time, when the ambition of the middle-class hostess is to entertain her friends in a restaurant. William, who "loved noise," embezzles money belonging to one of his clients, is arrested the day after the party, committed for trial, and, rather than stand imprisonment, commits suicide. There follows a period of suffering for the family, during which Deleah, the youngest daughter, plays Providence, and takes the burden of decision from her mother's weak shoulders. Deleah is the burden-bearer of the household, and not the least of her charms is the fact that she is unconscious both of her good looks and her sweetness of disposition. She is her eldest sister's unconscious rival, and, one after the other, Bessy's admirers succumb to Deleah's fascinations. A melodramatic note is struck, somewhat out of keeping with the tenor of the story, in the suicide of the grocer's assistant who kills himself for love of Deleah. The book ends with the marriage of the heroine to a rich baronet worthy of the girl's attractions. The novel lacks the grip of some of Miss Mann's earlier work, and has little of the reality that characterises her Norfolk studies; but the story is fresh and wholesome, and should achieve a certain popularity.

Mr. Conningsby-Dawson gives us an arresting study of the boyhood of one Dante Cardover. THE GARDEN WITHOUT WALLS (Heinemann, 6s.) commences with the hero's first impressions: "It happened about six in the morning, in a large red room. A bar of sunlight streamed in at the window, in which dust-motes were dancing by the thousand. A man and woman were lying in bed; I was standing in my cot, plucking at the woman with my podgy fingers. She stirred, turned, rubbed her eyes, smiled, stretched out her arms, and drew me under the bed-clothes beside her. The man slept on." Nothing, we are told, recorded in the book carries one much farther. The scene is symbolic: a little child, inarticulate, early awakened in a sunlit room, vainly striving to make life answer questions. The strength and weakness of the novel lie within that sentence. Up to the period when Dante grows to manhood the desires and emotions, the impressions life leaves on him, are recorded with notable fidelity and strength. His boyish longing to escape from the confines of the Stoke Newington garden into the world of glamour beyond, the adventures in which he embarks with Ruthita, his small girl chum, strike one as the real right thing. The chapters dealing with the children's sojourn with the gipsies, their life in the forest, Dante's adoration of Lily, the fortune-teller, are written with a vividness that makes one visualise the scene and characters with startling clearness. The latter part of the book is not so convincing. Dante drifts into a phase of morbid self-analysis. The problem of sex dominates his life; he is for ever dissecting the attractions of the different women with whom he comes in contact, and is never content to accept love and comradeship without question or a fatal reservation, which in the ultimate works his undoing. Uncle Obadiah, nicknamed the "Spuffler," is a clever piece of character drawing. An easy-going nature, he is in effect a man who has never grown up, never passed from the irresponsibility of boyhood to the settled determination of later years. He is by temperament a vagabond, and by vagabond we mean one who, to adopt the definition of the dictionary, "wanders idly." Dante is drawn towards this uncle, and at first sight seems likely to develop the same wandering tendencies; but a life devoid of monetary worries and irksome duties prevents the growth of those qualities that go to make a perfect vagabond. After a series of love affairs, wherein he inevitably misses the right woman, he finds himself—alone. Vi, the married woman on whom he has wasted years of devotion, finally decides to break with him. Ruthita, who loved him faithfully since childhood, has found consolation in a husband, and all that remains to this hero of a thousand romances is his faculty for interrogating the universe!

The author of amiable books centred round heroes of blameless life and stereotyped virtues, Mr. Morice Gerard has made a new departure in THE HEART OF A HERO (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.). This novel purports to be the love story of General Wolfe, and, whatever qualities may be wanting in the author, he cannot be said to lack courage in the selection of his subject. It needs considerable boldness to select for hero an historical personage who has already been sketched by a master in the art of fiction in one of the greatest novels of English literature. Thackeray's picture of the hero of Quebec on the eve of that memorable feat of military genius is one of the most graphic things ever penned. One sees the tall figure, immovable in its dignity, imperturbable in its disdain of fear; one hears the clear voice repeat Gray's "Elegy," of which he said he would rather be the author than take Quebec. There is nothing of the glamour that invests this study in Mr. Gerard's narrative, nor, indeed, would it be fair to look for a touch of genius in a writer so far removed from a literary giant in stature. The pity is that the author has chosen an episode that inevitably challenges comparison, and has treated it in a style that recalls certain masterpieces of fiction, and suggests a fugitive likeness in mannerism that accentuates the weakness of drama and the inadequacy of characterisation. To write successful historical novels calls for qualities of imagination of a high order. To bring before the reader the atmosphere of bygone times needs a mind responsive in the highest degree to suggestion. These qualities the author does not possess, and to attempt a novel whose main interest lies in the personality of General Wolfe is to challenge criticism and invite comparison of a kind that ensures defeat.

Mr. Gerard would do better to return to the easy paths of present-day people, of whom he writes in a readable style, with occasional flashes of genial humour.

The author of a Lame Dog's Diary—a very charming chronicle of a man of modern times—treats in his latest novel of the open spaces of the earth. SNOW UPON THE DESERT (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.) is graphically written. Mr. MacNaughten has caught the atmosphere of the hill country of India, and against the background of its mystery has painted the character of English men and English women in bold colours, tinged with a certain sentiment that carries conviction. "England is womanish in this thing also, . . . where her sons go they plant memory-scented lavender bushes; also geraniums and daisies in diamond-shaped flower-beds and straight borders, loyally preferring these to the greater abundance of the tropical growth around them." The quotation is from the introduction to the novel, and stands for the motive of the drama. The scenes in which the heroine is placed, the situations in which she finds herself, are exotic in atmosphere, tropical in emotion, but throughout the descriptions of passion runs that sober regard for English morals and English manners that is somehow typical of the English ideal. The study of Mrs. Antrobus is perhaps the most successful and at the same time the most subtle that the author has created. Pleasure-loving and at times selfish, there is a vitality and vividness about her that extorts forgiveness and affection from the most critical reader as from the most prejudiced of the many friends and enemies she made in India; and long after the image of Hercules Lascelles—who, by the by, is too charming a girl for so impossible a name—has faded from the remembrance, the picture of the woman who was possessed by an eternal hunger for things spiritual and a perpetual enslavement by things temporal stays with one. "We forgave her much after she was gone. Mrs. Antrobus was missed in India." The author has made a big stride in his literary career with the production of this book, and we shall await with interest and expectation his next development.

AUTUMN ADDITIONS

12 NEW VOLUMES IN "EVERYMAN'S LIBRARY," MAKING A FULL TOTAL OF 664 VOLUMES.

A CENTURY OF ESSAYS. An Anthology of the English Essayists.

This volume is intended as a select anthology of the English essayists, which will serve especially to illustrate life and manners. It includes some early experiments in essay-writing that appeared even before Montaigne, and is brought right up to date by the inclusion of examples from the pens of living writers.

DOSTOIEFFSKY'S LETTERS FROM THE UNDERWORLD and Other Tales. Translated by C. J. HOGARTH.

Two of the great Russian novelist's vehement and intimate stories from the life, as he himself experienced it, conceived in the depths of his sympathy for his fellow-sufferers, and inspired by master-motives.

THE FALL OF CONSTANTINOPLE. By J. M. NEALE.

In the author of this remarkable romance, which gains fresh interest when viewed in the recent threatening of Constantinople, the reader will not at once discern a famous Churchman. The Rev. J. M. Neale was the most inspired commentator we have had on the Book of Psalms, and one of the finest translators who have essayed the poems and hymns of the Greek Liturgy.

LOST ILLUSIONS. By HONORÉ DE BALZAC. With Introduction by GEORGE SAINTSBURY.

This is the brilliant if imperfect masterpiece of its writer. The tragedy of love, ambition, and the high-road to fame and Paris, was never so well written before: a great and pitiful tale.

ÆSOP'S AND OTHER FABLES. An Anthology of the Fabulists from Æsop to Lessing.

THE DIVINE PROVIDENCE. By EMANUEL SWEDENBORG.

Emerson said that the moral and spiritual insight of Swedenborg entitled him to a place among the law-givers of mankind that has been vacant for ages. In this work his divine philosophy is seen under its least mechanical and most inspiring aspects.

THE PRETENDERS AND OTHER PLAYS. By HENRIK IBSEN. Translated by R. FARQUHARSON SHARP.

"The Pretenders" is one of Ibsen's earlier and historical plays, written with imaginative realism (if the term may be permitted). The other two plays, "The Pillars of Society" and "Rosmersholm," give us his contemporary art, in its most direct and sure presentation of life, analysed, desentimentalised and laid bare to its motives.

A LITERARY AND HISTORICAL ATLAS OF AFRICA AND AUSTRALASIA. Maps designed by J. BARTHOLOMEW, F.R.G.S.

THE ORGANON OF THE RATIONAL ART OF HEALING.

By SAMUEL CHRISTIAN FRIEDRICH HAHNEMANN. Introduction by C. E. WHEELER.

Hahnemann's book is the bible of Homœopathy, and it is based on the now familiar maxim of "Similia Similibus Curantur"—Like things are cured by Like.

THE SOCIAL CONTRACT AND OTHER ESSAYS. By JEAN JACQUES ROUSSEAU. Introduction by G. D. H. COLE.

Lord Morley spoke the other day of the awakening power of this work of Rousseau's. In it we may see the fermenting of old ideas of Aristotle and Plato, relating to the Greek States, and their reconstitution with the aid of the modern spirit, as it affected the moral hope and the sentimental ethics of Rousseau.

LIFE OF W. E. GLADSTONE. By the Hon. G. W. E. RUSSELL.

LIFE IN MEXICO. By Madame CALDERON DE LA BARCA. With an introduction by HENRY BAERLEIN.

Here we have one of the most vividly entertaining books of travel and pleasant vagabondage ever put into print. It deals with the Mexico of some eighty years ago, when the mixed old and new colours were at their brightest stage of contrast.

To save uncongenial labour, to make life happier and sweeter for every human being, to increase the leisure time of the overworked—these things are the objects which inventors have striven to attain. Bell, the inventor of the telephone, placed all the world on chatting terms over the wires. He showed us how to laugh at space. Edison applied electricity and enables us to brighten the darkest night. Airmen have mastered the art of flying so what is there left

WHY, OUR GARMENTS STILL WEAR OUT.

But your Hosiery need not if you will keep pace with the times, for there is now Hosiery that is Holeproof.

WHY THIS HOSIERY IS HOLEPROOF.

The explanation of the durability of "V. & H." Holeproof Hosiery is made here, so that every person can see for himself, or herself, the genuineness of it. Your own brain will show you the truth of it. This "V. & H." Holeproof Hosiery is made in a new way from a specially privately manufactured yarn. This yarn is lighter in weight and at the same time tougher and stronger than any other brand. It is so pliable that it gives to continued pressure and wear, just as a sponge may be depressed by gripping in the hand, but still have no damage done to its fabric. There is hardly any spring or elastic stretch in ordinary hose, even of the most expensive kind, and this accounts for the rapid appearance of holes and thin places. Luxuriously comfortable, shapely and well-made, "V. & H." Holeproof Hosiery is a revelation to all.

Look at our "GUARANTEE" Ticket which is sent with every pair we sell

Then, if within that time a hole should appear, send them back to us at once with ticket, and we will present you with new hose without extra cost.

No such guarantee could be given with hose made in the ordinary way. But with "V. & H." Holeproof Hose you can be free from the fear of a hole suddenly showing—not only just at that point at the heel where the eyes of everyone can see, but at no part of "V. & H." Holeproof Hose will there be a hole. That we guarantee for two whole months.

The comfort and pleasure of good wearing hose to men conveys a sense of well-being and satisfaction all day long, while to business girls and busy house-wives, to whom the weekly darning is a long and tiresome task, the benefit is incalculable.

HISTORY IN THE MAKING

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

UNDOUBTEDLY the great overshadowing event of the week has been the review by Sir Edward Carson of the Ulster "Volunteers"—a ceremony that, as he boasted, was illegal from first to last, and which positively bristled with incitements to rebellion. There can be no question that these preparations for civil war on the part of the more militant spirits in the north-east corner have reached a point when it is essential that the Government should take action. However earnest and uncorrupted may be the motives of these patriots—and no one doubts their sincerity—it is impossible to suppose that their speeches and proceedings can be for ever ignored. At the moment, of course, the air is full of talk of compromise, and it is certain that the Government will hesitate a long time before excluding that solution of the gravest problem they have so far had to face. Even so, Ulster cannot expect immunity from the law.

The decision of the Parliamentary Committee of the Trade Union Congress to send a relief ship to Dublin with £5,000's worth of provisions appeals strongly to the imagination. There is, when all is said and done, something electric in that "solidarity of labour" of which this is so striking an indication. Not since the 'Australian Trade Unionists' cabled £10,000 to John Burns, then leading the London dockers in their memorable fight, has one had such a heartening illustration of that generosity and sympathy which makes labour kin the world o'er. On the whole the week has done well for the Trade Union movement. The recognition of the 'busmen's union is a distinct victory for combination, one that a few years ago would have seemed impossible, also, let it be noted, that, for the first time in their history, railway managers have met the representatives of the railwaymen's unions in person!

The death of Patrick Ford from pneumonia removes from the scene not only one of the most striking figures associated with Irish Nationalism, but also an influence that has tended to make a settlement of that vexed question difficult. Ford was a dynamitard; at least he was found to be something very much like it by the judges who constituted the Parnell Commission. But, narrow and fanatical as was his vision, no one doubted his sincerity or patriotism. He is the last of a generation, and with him we may say that there passes away that hatred of Great Britain which at one time poisoned our relations with the sister isle. Let us hope that in the brighter day which has dawned the misunderstandings of the past will fade away.

The splendid achievement of M. Garros, the French aviator, in flying across the Mediterranean Sea from Europe to Africa, a distance of 485 miles, which he accomplished in 7½ hours, marks a great advance on anything that has yet been done in the development of aviation, and is likely to give an immense impetus to oversea flight. It is feats like these, which show us that we are moving forward towards the conquest of the air, which reconciles us, or helps to do so, to the dreadful roll of heroes who have perished—not, we are glad to think, wholly in vain.

One of the most notable conferences that have been held in England for many a long day is that now taking place in Birmingham, under the auspices of the Brotherhood Association. "Fellowship," said the late William Morris, "is life, and the lack of it death." A true word, but none the less one marvels at the extraordinary success achieved by the associations, which have caught on all over the country. The fact is, of course, that, as somebody pointed out, there is no loneliness so terrible in the world as that of a young man who is a stranger in a great town, and the Brotherhood Association is the only organisation that attempts to meet this human, crying need of our civilisation. It is satisfactory to note that the organisation is spreading to Canada and throughout the Empire.

We hear so much nowadays of the low wages earned by women, that it is distinctly refreshing to learn that in one occupation, at all events, the well-educated young Girton girl is assured of excellent prospects and positively munificent pay. One of our leading men of business has offered to take several sweet girl graduates into the shops which his busy brain directs, and has mentally awarded them salaries that must appear almost fabulous. On the other hand, some of this gentleman's rivals express doubts as to whether college ladies could stand the strain of shop life. Who can tell? One thing at least is certain. The girl who leaves one of the 'Varsities with an expensive education can earn to-day little more than, say, £150 to £200 a year, and unless we are to conclude that education is so much mere waste, this shows a lack of adaptability on the part of our commercial system that needs rectifying.

No little interest attaches to the formation of a Woman's Municipal Party, which, we learn, has recently taken place in London. The new organisation has been brought into existence largely as a protest against the uniform neglect of the claims of women by both parties in municipal politics, and it is likely to achieve very valuable results. The organisation consists of women of all political parties, and it is intended to map out the metropolis into a number of districts, each with its separate agent. Speakers and canvassers will be supplied to women candidates without distinction of political colour, and a determined effort made to impress the arm-chair politicians with a sense of the importance of the woman's vote.

THE MAN AND HIS WORK

XI.—THE MALE TEACHER * * PRIZE ESSAY BY JOHN E. STEWART

I.

THE teacher of to-day shares with the clergyman a need which is not felt by the professions of law or medicine, in the necessity for a restatement of his position and province. He bears about with him the burden of his ancestry, which shows him to be something of a mongrel. His earliest ancestors were Churchmen, while those more recent were semi-clerics like the parish schoolmaster, and the rather less pious off-scourings of all the other professions, with the addition of men whose physical or mental incapacities precluded them from the ordinary respectable avocations, and filled the ranks of teachers with weak-minded males, veterans of the wars, and the lame and the halt in general. Such descent has to be lived down by a vastly different body of men attached to a vocation in which women outnumber them by five or six to one, and in face of political prejudice and social hypocrisy which practises a creed of fervent belief in education by despising and reviling the teacher and other agents of it. It is necessary then for the teacher to make clear his position, and assert his privilege.

II.

The teacher's ancestors knew little or nothing about the need for definite preparation. Some had preparation for other callings, most had none at all. The teacher of to-day is a craftsman and a scholar, a man with a specially professional training on a basis of general culture, prepared not only for the school, but for life, and therefore fitted for bigger and better things than the medical or legal professor, whose general training is usually of a shallow nature compared with his depth of narrow specialisation. The teacher sees life whole, and touches it at a great many points, although the limitation of human capacity permits him to confess without shame that he lives on the surface of many deep springs of thought and action. His training embraces scientific observation and research, physical, chemical, and psychological; he is trained in art and in crafts; language, literature, and music are all opened to him, and in virtue of his prospective calling he becomes interested in physiology, in hygiene, in social conditions generally, and in problems of genesis and child-development in particular. Such a training should fit a man for the noblest work and the highest respect of a community. He goes forth from college and the model school with a worthy ideal of his calling—and proceeds to find out certain things. For the sake of conciseness and good order let us look at the teacher's position with regard to what it ought to be, what men think it to be, what it actually is in the class-room, its social aspect, its rewards and its prospects.

III.

Education is the nation's affair. It is admitted to be the most important of social endeavours. The teacher, theoretically, is the most considerable influence in society, and his responsibility is ideally so grave that thinking of it ought to overcome him. The teacher in the abstract is something noble and sublime, to be held in all reverence and cherished for his work's sake; but when we take the man who is the concrete representation of this ideal personage we discern a difference. The average man looks upon the male teacher as something less than a proper man, which is to some extent accounted for by ancestry and the predominance of women teachers. The business of teaching is held—not always tacitly—to be an unworthy employment for a man of capacity, and business men consider him doomed to the continual company of his inferiors, and unfitted for meeting (as they themselves do) his peers in the battle of life. A kind of pity for the man teacher is nourished by others who do not go the length of scorning him, and this is due to the ultimate attitude of adults to child-life, akin to the pity with which a bachelor views his married brother's pains to amuse, instruct, or chastise his little ones. The sentiment is more general than will be admitted, that the custody of children is derogatory to the dignity of manhood. That is an ignorant view, based on the assumption that the child is simply an incapable adult, which he is not, but a living, developing being, completely a vital entity at any stage.

Nevertheless, if we look into the class-room we shall find much that would seem to strengthen this view. Much that the teacher has to do is on the face of it petty and trivial. Too often he is forced to become a kind of nursemaid policeman with academic distinction, but this is due to neglected parental responsibility, bad educational theories and red-tape practice, and the terrible chaos in which the teacher becomes involved in trying to keep his teaching in line with the ideals of life and progress in face of social ignorance and apathy, and the demands and counter-demands of imperial and local authorities. He must in all things become as a little child, and in doing so it is possible enough he may lose something of the wisdom of the world, which wisdom is just the barrier to that simplicity of mind and heart which was made the test for discipleship by Him in Galilee of old who said, "Except ye become as little children, ye shall not enter into the Kingdom of Heaven." This getting at the child's level need not be a condescension nor permanent intellectual descent, but its effect becomes ultimately a question for the psychologist.

One aspect of the teacher's work is to be deprecated, and that is the amount of clerical work which the increasing "mandarinism" of the Education Department and general legislation entail upon him. The routine of this filches much of the buoyancy and enthusiasm which are the salt of good teaching. Already in the daily round of corrections and registration there is sufficient of this soul-destroying work. Another difficulty of the class-room is the attitude of the parent. In all his lessons on obedience the teacher gives the parent his place, but how often does a teacher discover that his pupils have been bred to disrespect for their teacher, and often incited to open rebellion! Many working men's wives look upon the teacher as a natural enemy to be deceived and insulted at will, and the better-off people employ a kind of patronage which is an even greater insult, besides taking means which their public influence affords to revenge themselves upon a teacher for something that has occurred in the course of his duty. A higher professional standing would obviate much of that.

The teacher's hours are the envy of many men, and his holidays of as many more. These, of course, are made to meet the needs of children, but they are necessary for the teacher too, in the best interest of education. Anyone who has had experience of the average tradesman can decide whether his easy attentiveness is at all comparable with the extreme concentration that is necessary in teaching, and the mental strain of preparation and presentation. In the holidays teachers are recuperating physically from a long nerve strain. Very often they use the vacation for the widening of their experience and professional qualifications, and teachers are always ready to acknowledge their opportunities for recreation and culture. The majority of them are anxious over their professional life to a fault.

IV.

Socially, the great handicap upon the male teacher is his lack of a universally acknowledged professional standing. The test men make of professional dignity is the fee which the professor can command, and viewed thus the teacher is a poor enough professional specimen. Law and medicine have always jealously guarded the approaches of their profession. With teaching it has been far otherwise, and so many unqualified persons have found their way into its ranks that to claim professional status is to be laughed at. This is again partly a result of ancestry and partly a result of the external control of entrance to the teaching profession and the insane economies of local authorities. The teacher has not the professional freedom of law or medicine. He is ruled by the State and by a local authority. The State may delegate its supervision to a competent board, but the local authority is usually quite unfitted for realising the importance of dignifying the teacher's profession, and joins with the public it represents in demeaning him. For a man with a high professional training to be entirely subject to a body of place-hunting amateurs is a serious business for him and for education. A third-class clerk in the Education Department's Office can command more salary than the average teacher, because the belief in education is insincere and the teacher is not a professional man. The result is seen in the succession of teachers. Rarely have we two generations of male teachers in the same branch of a family. A male teacher will have his daughters into his profession, but how seldom, as in the ministry or the law, do we have son following father in what is theoretically the noblest of professions, but which, under bad influences, becomes the meanest of trades!

The kind of school in which he teaches and the class he instructs are also factors in the teacher's social standing. A teacher in a slum school, though he be there the missionary of God, is despised or pitied. The secondary school teacher with an honours degree is preferred to the primary teacher, although of these two each is as vital as the other in his own sphere. The primary teacher, says Professor Findlay, "is an artist and a craftsman"; the secondary teacher is perhaps less of that and more of a scholar.

Another prejudice which teachers are gradually wearing down is quite consistent with the view men have of his office—"Non vitæ sed scholæ." The teacher, good citizen though he be, has been almost unanimously excluded from the preferments of citizenship and participation in local government. His individuality in politics and religion has been carefully repressed, but that is passing with the growing consciousness of the teacher himself that, while he may work out his destiny in the school-room, he must not be excluded from the forum if fate should beckon him thither.

V.

The clamant need, as was hinted at the outset, is a new statement of the male teacher's position, complete emancipation from ancient prejudice, and a clear acknowledgement of his professional status by the medium of largely increased remuneration. The present male teacher, let it be admitted, is not always the best man that can be got, but he is usually the best man that can be got for the money, and when this is realised adequate remuneration will attract to the teaching profession men adequate to the responsibility of their great calling, and capable of asserting their professional prestige among all classes.

But while this is a moral necessity, there are rewards which cannot be counted in gold. The teacher who realises the privilege of his office can afford to let the cynical pity of the "wise" men fall to the ground. To have the moulding of future men and women in one's hands, to win the respect and love of children, and a place among the kindly memories of grown men and women, are things that quite outshine the little annoyances of the class-room and the pettiness of the great world. No teacher who is worth a fig could cast a balance and find it on the wrong side so long as he himself can believe in the dignity of his office and the vital function of the school in the evolution of society.

All the signs, however, point to an increased attention to the teacher. It has even been suggested that he become a civil servant. This is not the place to discuss such a proposal, but the male teacher will welcome gratefully only such reform as brings with it larger public recognition of his importance to the State, and of the need for removing every handicap to the full and free expression of his disciplined personality.

RESULT OF "EVERYMAN" ESSAY COMPETITION

THE writer of the above paper,

Mr. JOHN E. STEWART, M.A.,
37, Kildonan Street,
Coatbridge,

has been awarded the Prize of THREE GUINEAS offered by EVERYMAN for the best essay on "The Male Teacher."

The entries for this Competition were frankly disappointing in quality. Few showed a proper conception of the subject; fewer still revealed any originality. It is noteworthy that, like the prize-winner, the "runner-up" (a St. Andrews gentleman who does not wish his name published) comes from Scotland. The most diverting essay, naturally enough, is sent from Ireland (by Mr. F. E. Hodder, Belfast). The paper of Mr. W. H. Counsell, Cambridge, displays most originality, but is somewhat outside the scope and purpose of the Competition. Sound work was also done by W. D. Anderson, Newcastle-on-Tyne, and Harry Blackman, London.

Among those whose essays rose above the average may be mentioned Wm. Ferguson, Glasgow; Frederic Garfield, Plaistow; Herbert Leather, Manchester; John Joseph Murphy, Manchester; Æneas J. Murray, Dublin; John Naish, Kendal; W. Nicholas, B.A., Edinburgh; H. Pickering, London; T. K. Slade, B.Sc., Southampton; and "Walford."

WHY I WENT TO PRISON

BY GEORGE LANSBURY

IN April of this year, I was summoned to Bow Street on information supplied by one of the inspectors connected with the political department of Scotland Yard. The summons stated that I was a person who had made certain speeches which were likely to cause breach of the peace and damage to property, and I was called upon to show causes why I should not find sureties for my good behaviour. The case against me rested entirely upon quotations from speeches, one at least of which had been delivered months before. Not a scrap of evidence was adduced to show that any single person had been incited, or had committed any outrage following upon my speeches. As a matter of fact, the fact that my speeches became known was due to the presence at the meetings addressed of shorthand writers connected with Scotland Yard. And it was on the evidence supplied by these gentlemen, each of whom admitted that his report was not a verbatim one, that the magistrate called upon me to enter into my own recognisances for £1,000, and to find two securities for £500 each, to be of good behaviour for a period of twelve months.

I appealed against this decision first of all on the ground that the statute of Edward III., under which I was charged, did not apply, and, secondly, that because of this the magistrate had no jurisdiction in the matter. This appeal was heard in the early days of August, and dismissed by the judge who, while giving no opinion as to whether the magistrate had authority under the said Act, laid it down that because it had been assumed that magistrates had such authority for some centuries past, it would not be prudent or wise to upset what had been an established custom for so long. I therefore appeared again at Bow Street before Sir John Dickinson, and was given the option either of finding the securities or of going to prison. I elected to go to prison, and for the following reasons:—

First of all, I deny the right of magistrates to put any man or woman away in default of sureties when no real offence is proved against him. My reason for this is that Sir John Dickinson expressly said, and Mr. McKenna afterwards confirmed it, that I was convicted of no crime, and was therefore not in the ordinary sense a person who ought to go to prison. This being so, I claim that it is the right of every Englishman before being cast into gaol to be tried by his peers, and if found guilty then, of course, to suffer any punishment the law metes out; but this usurped power of the magistrates to close the mouths of disagreeable people is one which may be used and, in my opinion, is used in a very arbitrary manner indeed.

Secondly, I refused to find the securities because, in my opinion, those responsible for the administration of the law in respect of political offences showed bias and prejudice in my case, and took proceedings against me, while at the same time they allowed men like Sir Edward Carson, the late Duke of Abercorn, Mr. Bonar Law, and Mr. F. E. Smith to deliver both in Ireland and in this country inciting and incendiary speeches in connection with the Home Rule controversy, speeches which in Ireland had resulted in Mr. Winston Churchill being prevented speaking in Ulster Hall, and also occasioned fierce racial riots in the streets and workshops of Belfast. My contention was, and is, that if we are to have punishment for political offences, then those punishments must be inflicted all round.

There is a subsidiary reason also in what I did. And that had connection with the case of Queenie Gerald. No one, least of all myself, wishes to place this woman in a more unpleasant position than she has been, and I only mention her name because it is necessary for the explanation of my case. This lady had been found guilty of certain offences which, in the eyes of most people, are offences which at any rate call for some action on the part of the community. The only sentence passed upon her was a sentence of two months in the second division, accompanied by a suppression on the part of those in authority of all information in connection with the case. Especially was this so in regard to the names of her patrons, and I considered the time had arrived when a public protest should be made against such maladministration of justice, and so I took the opportunity of being before the magistrate to emphasise the fact that my whole attitude towards them was very much prejudiced by the fact that, in my opinion, justice in this country had ceased to be blind, and that the kind of sentence meted out to one person and another depended very much upon the social status either of the persons themselves or of their friends. So the conclusion of the matter was that I was sent down for three months.

The sequel to it all was just this. Feeling very strongly that I had been unjustly sent to prison, and being quite certain in my own mind that justice was not being meted out even-handedly in our country, I determined to resist the sentence to the full strength of my power, and I adopted the only weapon an individual has against the executive, that is, the weapon of passive resistance. I did no fighting or quarrelling, but from the moment I entered prison to the time I came out I took no food, and only two or three tiny drops of water. The result was that after three days I was released, and have not been again imprisoned. I think these facts in themselves show quite clearly the justice of the position I have taken up, for they prove conclusively that the Government themselves admit that I am not a person who should have gone to prison, and they also admit, as they tacitly admit in the case of Sir Edward Carson and his friends, that we all have a right to express our opinions, and by every means in our power to get them adopted.

Since my case has been discussed and settled by the courts, I have often been asked what I would do myself if placed in a position of power. My simple answer is this, that I believe repression is always the very worst weapon that a tyrant or a Government can use. I believe that when a nation is afraid to allow its citizens to give free expression to whatever opinions they may hold, that nation is in a pretty bad way. We in England have boasted in days gone by of our freedom of speech. I put up my fight against my prosecution because I believe that freedom of speech, freedom to utter the truth that is in us, was in danger of being suppressed. I was determined, as one man, to fight the thing out to the bitter end. I believe in days to come people will marvel that in the year 1913 a Liberal Government thought it worth while to attempt to suppress this right which many of our fathers fought and died for.

THE DISINHERITED

I.

I SAW a million rabbits
Where a thousand men might be,
Yet a bent and ancient husbandman
Was the only man to see.

And amazement leaped to a question:

"What manner of land is this?—
Voiceless and vermin-ridden,
Empty and man-forbidden,
Where the field hath forgotten the harvest,
And the furrow forgotten the plow."

(The face he turned was a Viking face,
His hair was white as the white sea-mew,
And his eye was a Viking blue.)

"I remember the time, m' marster,
When the countryside was filled
With flock and herd and folk, sir,
And a mort o' the soil was tilled;
But the lords o' the land dwelt elsewhere,
And the rents were racked and short,
So the land was leased to a millionaire
Who coveted it for sport."

"And where are the folk, O ancient friend,—
The heritors of toil,
Who clogged with their impoverishment
The profits of the soil?"

'What comes o' the birds, m' marster,
When the breath o' the winter blows!
Some o' them live and some o' them die,
And nobody counts or knows:
A many a man's turned vagabond,
And many a woman worse;
Many a young 'un's over the sea,
To be shut o' the landless curse;
And the old, they wait in the poorhouse
Their turn in the parish hearse."

II.

I saw a hundred gentlemen
Where a million men might be,
Yet gentlemen and serving men
Were the only men to see—
Save one of a tattered raiment,
Who quickened his steps from me.

But I flung out a word and checked him:

"What blight-bitten land is this?—
Wasted and weed-perverted,
Barren and man-deserted,
Where the forest reconquers the farmstead,
And the meadow succumbs to the moor."

(The stamp of his race was on his face,
As he stood there, stark and stern:
He spoke—and I heard;
But my fancy ran, far past the man,
To the clans at Bannockburn.)

"Time was—and I mind it well, sir—
When yon braes were dotted thick
With herds of kye and sheep, sir,
And many a cotter's rick;
But the laird o' the land dwelt elsewhere,
And the rents were racked and short,
So the land was sold to a millionaire
Who coveted it for sport."

"If the braes be all for the huntsman's call,
And the fallows won for the hound and gun,
Why tarry here, O landless one?"

"I was born in a crofter's cot, sir,
Not far frae where we stand,
And every year I gae m' way
Back to the bit o' land;
And I sit b' the road and remember,
Where I played as a bairn alone;
Then I look for the housie, and find there
Just a crumblin' cairn o' stone.

"They call me a tramp, and I am, sir,
And a thief when I needs maun be,
Since to beg at best and steal at worst
Is the trade that is left to me;
For the honest work I ken, sir—
The toil of the croft and the mere—
Was taen when they ousted the crofters
To re-forest the land for deer."

III.

I saw a million lackeys,
In the pomp of a liveried land,
Smug with the scorn of the flunkey
For the grime of a callous hand.

And my thought made bold to a question:

"What manner of brood is here?—
Servile and supple and slavish,
Stealthy and subtle and knavish;
Helotry feathered of peacocks,
To grace us at board and at bier."

(The eyes that I turned to clouded
With a bitterness that crowded Into the answer I heard.)

"These are men of our manufacture,
Branded as national ware;
Whatever they be, we made them,
Whatever their shame we share:
Yet their sires were English yeomen,
Who measured with mates or foemen,
For these are the issue of men who stood Shoulder to shoulder with Robin Hood."

IV.

I saw a million starvelings,
In the streets of a hundred towns,
And a million sotted fingers
That clutched at the draught that drowns.

And my doubt made bold to a question:

"What manner of men be these?—
Stunted and meagre and craven,
Brutal and rum-enslaven,
Abasing themselves to the stranger,
And whining their mendicant pleas."

(The eyes that were on me glittered
With the flash of a thought embittered,
And the voice spoke as before.)

"These are men of our manufacture,
Branded as national ware;
Whatever they be, we made them,
Whatever their shame we share:
Yet their sires were English bowmen,
And 'tis an evil omen
That such are the heirs of the men who bore
The brunt of the burden at Agincourt."

VORLEY WRIGHT.

ANNIE BESANT * * * BY C. SHERIDAN JONES

I.

THIRTY years ago, on a certain July afternoon, a remarkable event took place within the precincts of the House of Commons—an event that served to stamp the impress of a woman's personality on the British people. Inside the Chamber itself there was being enacted one of the fiercest episodes that marked the long and dramatic struggle then being waged by Charles Bradlaugh—a struggle, crowned, as we know, by a complete victory for the member for Northampton. Outside, blocking the traffic, thronging the corridors, passages and lobbies, was a crowd of many thousands, not Londoners only, but sturdy miners from the North, factory hands from Northampton, Lancashire lads from the mills, all of whom had come flocking to London in their tens of thousands to "back Charlie." To control them there was only a handful of amazed policemen, and when the rumour ran from lip to lip that their hero was being ejected by force, the few constables on the spot—there was no time to get reinforcements—despaired, for the mob, angry, sullen, and masterful, surged up into the central lobby, and, with a roar, faced about to rush the Commons. "Nothing can save it," said an old officer on duty at the doors. For the first time since the days of Lord George Gordon the Imperial Parliament was going to be stormed.

It was then that the incident I refer to occurred. A slight, rather fragile woman advanced from behind the police, who told her that she was attempting the impossible. But she went on. She held up her hand; she spoke, quietly, simply, effectively, scarcely raising her voice, and with only that one forbidding gesture. Even as she spoke the crowd paused, listened, hung back, and within a couple of minutes had drawn off orderly and subdued. That woman was Annie Besant.

II.

It must seem to Mrs. Besant nowadays a far cry indeed from those times of storm and stress; of riots and demonstrations; of repeated by-elections and prosecutions; of science classes to artisans and of fierce polemical journalism. To-day she has, to quote her own words, "struggled through the storm and found Peace beyond"—Peace and the Theosophical Society! To-day she is the central figure of a faith whose cardinal doctrine is serene detachment from the mundane affairs of life; whose message to man is to rise above the very causes in whose service her energies were poured out like water. The arch materialist has become the greatest force for occultism in the modern world; the eloquent champion of the people a firm adherent of aristocracy. And yet those who know her best see through all these and the other startling changes that have marked her life one thin but golden thread of consistency. Annie Besant is at once the child and the victim of a sympathy that causes her always to think of herself, her position, her logical justification even—last. "Looking back over my life," she once said, "I see that its keynote—through all the blunders and the blind mistakes and clumsy follies of the past—has been a longing for sacrifice to something felt as greater than the self. It has been so strong and persistent that I recognise it now as a tendency brought over from a previous life and dominating the present one. The efforts to serve have not been painful acts of self-denial, but the yielding to an overmastering desire. We do not praise the mother who, impelled by her protecting love, feeds her crying infant and stills its wailings at her breast; rather should we blame her if she turned aside from its weeping to play with some toy. And so with all those whose ears are open to the wailings of the great orphan Humanity. I now know that it is those wailings that have stirred my heart through life—that drew from me, as a child, alluring pictures of martyrdom, breathed into the girl the passion of devotion, and sent the woman out into the world to face scoff and odium."

III.

It is in these words that we have the key to all the kaleidoscopic transformations that have marked her wonderful career; that changed her from a devotee of Dean Stanley to a colleague of Bradlaugh, and then again into the disciple of Madame Blavatsky. But through it all she was obsessed with that passion for service which has, consciously or unconsciously, marked all really strong souls; that antithesis of indifference which is the essence of greatness. "To follow it," she has well said, "is not the act of a deliberate and conscious will, forcing itself into submission, and giving up with pain something the heart desires, but a joyous springing forward along the easiest path." It is this resistless, this ever-flowing sympathy that has given Mrs. Besant her unmatched power as a speaker, a power that has not perhaps been equalled in this generation, and which places her far above any other woman orator that I have ever heard. The cadence of the voice, the beauty of the gestures, so sparingly used, the wealth of language and amazing power of illustration, even the marked lucidity of the argument—all these are as nothing to the strange, hypnotic power which compels her to lose her own individuality in that of the audience, sitting silent and intent—to wake at the conclusion of her speech with a start as though released from a spell.

IV.

This intense interest in the world around her has carried Mrs. Besant far beyond her platform successes, wonderful as these have been. Her industry is almost devouring. Her power of application nothing short of astonishing. Turn to the catalogue at the British Museum and you will find no less than eight pages devoted to her works—works on subjects as varied as, to take some at random, "Occult Chemistry," "Legends and Tales," "Trade Unions," "Heat, Light and Sound." Her mind is wonderfully accurate, tireless and retentive, and she absorbs and arranges the most complex facts with a rapidity and sureness that probably only Mr. Gladstone ever approached. It may be doubted, however, if, on the critical side, she is anything like so well developed. A practised debater, she can in argument easily out-match most of her opponents; but, probing some of her later works, one finds again and again that logic is sacrificed to rhetoric. Yet she is always well grounded in the grammar of the science she is elucidating. Her science hand-books are even to-day, and after more than thirty years, among the best for students, and as an exponent of Theosophy and occultism she is, of course, unapproached by either writer or speaker.

V.

But it is more, far more, in her personality than in her writings that Mrs. Besant is a force. One may question, indeed, if fifty years hence any one of the memorable volumes that she has poured forth will be recalled. But very certain is it that no one who has ever met her or heard her speak can fail to remember the striking impression that she leaves, even on the least responsive of mankind. When she was identified with doctrines that seemed abhorrent to thousands of well-meaning folk, the simple dignity and calm repose of her bearing brought her thousands of adherents; men who had come to break up her meetings were stayed by that quiet, intent look which quelled the mob at Westminster, and were won over by a few words from that wondrous voice.

And yet, despite all these triumphs, Mrs. Besant always remained a true woman. There is a delightful touch of feminism in her autobiography which is well worth recalling. She relates how, even in the days of her greatest platform triumphs, shyness never left her. "I shrink from a quarrel in the home," she writes, "although a good fighter in public; when I have been lecturing and debating with no lack of spirit on the platform, I have preferred to go without what I wanted at the hotel rather than to ring and make the waiter fetch it; and, as the young mistress of the house, I would let careless work pass rather than bear the pain of reproving the ill-doer." Yet, as we have seen, she could on occasions display astounding courage, wonderful firmness.

VI.

One of the greatest triumphs of Mrs. Besant's life was her splendid leadership of the match girls of the East End, who, with Herbert Burrows, she brought out on strike against conditions that were probably unequalled for injustice. Mrs. Besant made the cause of the girls known to all England, and their success was practically the commencement of the modern movement for women's Trade Unionism. Her pamphlet, "White Slavery in London," stirred the nation profoundly, and led, after many years of agitation, to the abolition of that appalling industrial evil—"phossy jaw." The struggle was a desperate one. The cause of the girls seemed at first hopeless. For a fortnight Mrs. Besant worked as she had never worked before in her life, and then it was that the Match Girls' Union won recognition, and one of the most notable movements of modern times received a stimulus that is not yet exhausted.

VII.

It was from movements like these, from helping the dockers, from pleading for woman suffrage and for the poor, from organising the unemployed and helping to fight for Free Speech in Trafalgar Square, that Mrs. Besant turned to Theosophy. When she found it, it was a discredited cult, with few supporters, almost exclusively of one class; with its organisation preyed on by charlatans and its message ridiculed and misunderstood. Mrs. Besant changed all that. She made Theosophy a force in two hemispheres. She interested the people in spiritual matters as they had not been interested since the days of Wesley. Thousands of men and women to-day think of her with gratitude and affection as having changed life for them and given a new significance. Thousands have been led to think on a spiritual plane for the first time through hearing her speak.

In an age of materialism and indifference she has won converts by the hundred for a religion that was derided almost before it was known. I do not believe that there is any other man or woman alive to-day who could have survived the attempt, still less achieved the thing.

EVERYMAN AT THE THEATRE

"MARY GOES FIRST" AND THE PARTY SYSTEM

I.

I SUPPOSE that it will come with something of a shock of surprise to those of my readers who in matters theatrical take their opinions from the daily papers when I say that Mr. Henry Arthur Jones's new play—the first, by the way, that he has given us for over five years—is the most serious and purposeful effort in dramatic realism that has redeemed the London stage for many a long and empty day. Brilliant, amusing, satirical; all these epithets "Mary Goes First" has won from jaded critics and blasé first-nighters. But that the play holds a serious message for our generation, this fact has so far escaped the lynx-eyed vision of our dramatic augurs, some of whom are, if I may say so, a good deal better acquainted with the theatre than with the world outside which it is supposed to depict, and are more concerned with what happens on the stage than in real life. What do they know of drama who only drama know? The result is that a play in many respects remarkable for its boldness and sincerity is in some danger of being regarded as unimportant and conventional, though decidedly amusing.

II.

The fact is that our view of what constitutes seriousness and realism has become perverted. To be serious means, alas! to many playgoers to be dull, and to be dull is, I need hardly say, for Mr. Jones an impossible achievement. Realism has been so divorced from its true meaning that, to the man in the street and his brother of the stalls, it connotes something abnormal. The neurotic lady who in Ibsen's masterpiece leaves her husband—and her children—to go out into the night, resolved upon the solution of mental problems that have baffled the intellect of the ages; or Suderman's young artist, who "could do anything"—except work—to these and their like we readily give the name realistic and consider them with the intentness that reality always extorts. In point of fact, of course, they are purely symbolical figures, and have little direct relation to the ordinary workaday lives of ordinary workaday people, most of whom do not count the Divorce Court or its preliminaries among their troubles, and are as blissfully unconscious of the thralldom that exacerbated Nora as the critics are of the real significance of Mr. Jones's comedy.

III.

For, unless I am greatly mistaken, the comedy is in the true sense realistic in that, first of all, it does deal with problems that concern all of us vitally. Politics, as I once heard somebody say, is one of those things that you cannot leave alone. The tax-collector knocks at the door of all of us. To-day he may bring with him an insurance stamp. To-morrow—who can tell?—he may demand another threepence in the income-tax, and we may read in the papers that "the day" so long toasted, we are told, of German officers has come, and that our "Dreadnoughts" are lined up in the North Sea. You may, like the easy-going manufacturer that Mr. Jones depicts, vote politics a bore. But it is necessary; it is real; it comes home to us in a thousand ways—more pressing and more important than the income-tax; more imminent than that war which threatens the more that it recedes. And it is with politics, and politics in their most important aspect, that "Mary Goes First" is concerned.

IV.

I suppose that most of us who have been keen upon them in the past, who, like the writer, have taken long railway journeys to address excited audiences, or got wet through to the skin to bring up recalcitrant voters—most of us, I say, have during these latter years sickened somewhat at the hollowness and artificiality of what has got to be known as the Party System. The easy change of "convictions," or, rather, the deplorable lack of them; the cynical usage of the voter as a mere pawn in the game, whose prizes are honours and whose stakes are £ s. d.; the power of the machine over the man, of the caucus over the conscience—all these things, we know, are beginning to disgust, to alarm, even to paralyse earnest men of every shade of opinion and of every possible point of view. They have been denounced in dozens of speeches and criticised in innumerable pamphlets. But till now they have never been brought home to us as only the actualité of the stage can bring them home. To Mr. Jones belongs the honour of performing this difficult feat. He has lifted a corner of the curtain that hangs like a pall on English politics, and has shown us the truth; has shown us how the thing is done, how the trick is worked, how, in a word, the great political parties are "run" in the constituencies. As always, the truth has many facets. Hence the play is amusing, wonderfully diverting, and arresting to a degree. But to all real patriots, to all who care for the future of their country, nay, to all who are concerned for our civilisation, the play has a supreme, a compelling interest.

V.

It is by taking the lid off Walkinstal, a second-rate provincial town devoted to snobbery and the leather trade, that Mr. Jones reveals to us so much that is evil and secret in English public life. He does this by introducing us to Mr. Felix Galpin, a young solicitor, whose business it is to know everybody who is anybody in the leather town, and who, therefore, chief among his acquaintances counts the Whichellos. The husband is an admirable type of the easy-going, happy-go-lucky Englishman, with a flourishing business, a seat on the Town Council, and a passion for golf. It is in the restless ambition and the tireless energy of his wife Mary that we get the motif of the play. When the story opens she is aflame with indignation. For long her social pre-eminence in Walkinstal has gone unchallenged. But a rival has risen and must be crushed in the person of Lady Dodsworth, whose husband has just "earnt" a knighthood by the expenditure of several thousands on a sanatorium. This changes life for Mary, and when Lady Dodsworth, and not she, is chosen for the presidency of the Factory Girls' Protection Society, her cup of bitterness is full to overflowing. The rest of the play is devoted to her struggles to get even with the Dodsworths, and her success in going one better and capturing for her husband a baronetcy not only gives the audience infinite amusement, but it affords one a very vivid insight into the strange and mysterious recesses where politics are manufactured and candidatures decided upon, where the silver whisper of the syren counts for a good deal more than the thousand-throated plaudits of the electors.

VI.

Mary has many formidable obstacles to contend with; chief among them is her husband. How to inspire that easy-going, good-natured, and, above all, eminently sane man of the world with some of her own furious ambition; above all, how to make him really hate the Dodsworths as she hates them, that seems beyond her. For Whichello obstinately refuses to quarrel with the pompous Sir Thomas, or, for the matter of that, with anyone else, and even when the women have violently quarrelled and a libel action threatens, he is still propitiatory and amiable. Then Mary hits on a masterstroke of dissension. She deflects the conversation towards politics, having first subtly suggested to her husband that Sir Thomas is too domineering, and is, in fact, trying to sit on him. At first the suggestion falls on deaf ears, and while the men discuss the quarrel between their wives they are more or less guided by the spirit of sweet reasonableness, and the rupture that Mary longs to provoke seems quite remote. Suddenly Sir Thomas admonishes Whichello for crossing him in other matters, and at once the fat is in the fire. The women and their differences are forgotten. The men are at grips on their own account. Instantly the combative instinct that the most amiable Englishman carries about him somewhere is roused in Whichello. He repudiates alike Sir Thomas and the Tory party, and Mary is overjoyed when she hears him announce his willingness to stand as Liberal candidate for the borough. She sees victory ahead—and honours. Mr. Felix Galpin, the young solicitor, who is in love with her sister, undertakes to bring his old friend, Mr. Harvey Betts, the assistant Liberal whip, down to Walkinstal, and to interest him in the contest. The seat is to be won, and Mary is jubilant.

Then commences some of the finest comedy of the play. For Whichello is not in the least in sympathy with Liberalism. He will not give Chorley, the Labour leader, more than five minutes, and can hardly be got to see Borrowdale, the leading Non-Con, and, finally, after his wife has worked day and night on his behalf, he plunges her into the depths of despair by announcing, with decision, that Sunday golf being "barred" to him as Liberal candidate, he is going to "chuck up the sponge."

Then it is that Mary's real resourcefulness is made apparent. Her husband won't stand, but her brother-in-law-elect, the young solicitor, needs only one thing to enable him to do so—money. They will find that, and in return get the consideration which she is after. The Liberal Whip assents. Mr. Felix Galpin, a nebulous nothingarian, becomes at once an earnest Liberal, and when, two years later, he has won the seat, Mary's husband receives the baronetcy, and she goes first again.

VII.

That, in outline, is the story of the play; admittedly a slight one that at times hangs only on a thread. At the "Playhouse," of course, it is set off by that wonderful deftness of dialogue of which Mr. Jones is a master, while some of the situations, notably that in which the men forget their wives' grievances to quarrel over politics, are among the best contrived that he has given us. The acting, too, does much for the play. Miss Marie Tempest as Mary Whichello is irresistible. Mr. Llewellyn is admirable as the Whip, and Mr. George Skelton as Tamlin, the old-fashioned solicitor, is wonderfully convincing. But when all that can be claimed, alike for the acting and for the purely artistic qualities of the play, has been claimed, is there not something of supreme and paramount interest in the narrative it discloses? I think so. When the representation of a constituency like Walkinstal can be moulded to gratify the silly ambition of a shallow-minded woman of fashion, all is not well with our democracy. That is why every reader of EVERYMAN should see the play.

MASTERPIECE FOR THE WEEK

BOSWELL'S "TOUR TO THE HEBRIDES WITH SAMUEL JOHNSON." BY LIDDELL GEDDIE

I.

"How, Sir, can you ask me what obliges me to speak unfavourably of a country where I have been hospitably entertained? Who can like the Highlands?" None but Samuel Johnson could have given so crushing a reply to a harmless, conventional question. None but the eighteenth century could have paraded such an utter lack of appreciation of the "land of the mountain and the flood."

When we remember how wedded Dr. Johnson was to London, how radically prejudiced he was against Scotland, how unsuited was his unwieldy frame for "roughing it," and how abhorrent to his age were the "rude mountains" which shut out the view, we must ever marvel that Boswell succeeded in making the mighty Rambler cross the Tweed, proceed along the East coast to Inverness ride over by Loch Ness to the Western Isles, explore Skye, Coll, Mull and Iona, traverse Argyle, and finally cut across the Lowlands from Ayrshire to the Scottish capital. When we remember, further, that during the "Hundred Days" Johnson spent in Scotland under Boswell's guidance, the weather was anything but clement, that only twenty-eight years had elapsed since the Highlands were convulsed by the '45 Rebellion, that many of the Lexicographer's prejudices were nevertheless broken down or softened by the visit, and that Johnson, in after years, often declared this trip "the pleasantest part of his life," words absolutely fail to express our admiration for Boswell, the instigator, impresario, Baedeker, courier, chronicler, and fidus Achates of the Tour.

II.

Tours were fashionable in the latter half of the eighteenth century, and so were Journals or Diaries—kept, as often as not, with an eye to ultimate publication. But of all the Journals which then saw the light, none can compare with the "Journal of a Tour to the Hebrides with Samuel Johnson, LL.D.," by James Boswell, Esq.

We dare not contract that title. We cannot call it Boswell's "Hebrides"—because there is very little about the Hebrides in the Journal. The Hebrides are but a background, but a foil for Boswell's real theme—to wit, Samuel Johnson, LL.D. Sam. Johnson bulks more largely, is far more imposing to Bozzy's eyes than Ben Nevis itself. Not that Boswell had no liking for fine scenery or talent for describing places and customs. We need only read his account of the island of Coll to see that had not his colossal companion overshadowed all, we might have had a very entertaining and useful guide-book from Boswell's pen. Boswell himself had no doubt as to the most valuable part of his book—the numerous conversations in which Dr. Johnson took part, all faithfully recorded by that prince of reporters, James Boswell, Esq.

Johnson always declared that "he was not come to Scotland to see fine places, of which there were enough in England; but wild objects,—mountains—waterfalls,—peculiar manners; in short, things which he had not seen before." Boswell, on the other hand, set out on the trip, not so much to show the Highlands to Dr. Johnson as to show Dr. Johnson to the Highlands, not to see "wild objects," but to study at close quarters and in strange surroundings what for him was the embodiment of civilisation—Samuel Johnson.

The object of his Journal, therefore, was not to extol or to expatiate on the Western Isles, but to magnify his companion. In an Advertisement to the Third Edition, Boswell writes in characteristic vein:

"It would be an idle waste of time to take any particular notice of the futile remarks, to many of which a petty national resentment, unworthy of my countrymen, has given rise; remarks which have been industriously circulated in the publick prints by shallow and envious cavillers, who have endeavoured to persuade the world that Dr. Johnson's character has been lessened by recording such various instances of his lively wit and acute judgment, on every topick that was presented to his mind. In the opinion of every person of taste and knowledge that I have conversed with, it has been greatly heightened; and I will venture to predict, that this specimen of the colloquial talents and extemporaneous effusions of my illustrious fellow-traveller will become still more valuable, when, by the lapse of time, he shall have become an ancient; when all those who can now bear testimony to the transcendent powers of his mind, shall have passed away; and no other memorial of this great and good man shall remain, but the following Journal, the other anecdotes and letters preserved by his friends, and those incomparable works, which have for many years been in the highest estimation, and will be read and admired as long as the English language shall be spoken or understood."

III.

Boswell lived in a time of great portrait-painters. What Reynolds and Gainsborough and Raeburn achieved with the brush, he achieved with the pen. Better than any canvas, however réussi, his pages set before our eyes literally a "speaking likeness" of Dr. Johnson and his friends. Talking of biography, Johnson once said he did not think that the life of any literary man in England had been well written. Had he been spared to read Boswell's "Life," he would doubtless have qualified the statement. But he read the "Journal," which is a foretaste of the "Life," and we know—Boswell makes sure of that!—that he thought very highly of it. And no wonder! "Dr. Samuel Johnson's character, religious, moral, political and literary, nay his figure and manner, are, I believe" (says Boswell), "more generally known than those of any man." What was true in Johnson's own day is true in ours. We know more of him than of any other figure in our literature; and it is Boswell that we and Johnson have to thank for this. How many read Boswell's "Life"; how few read Johnson's "Lives of the Poets"! How many read Boswell's "Journal"; how few read Johnson's "Journey to the Western Islands," which deals with the self-same Tour!

IV.

Boswell was a hero-worshipper indeed, but he was no idle flatterer. So great are his admiration and affection for Ursa Major that he does not hesitate to set down his faults as well as his virtues; he has no fear that his readers will love and respect the great man a whit the less. Nay, he counts on endearing Johnson to us by reason of the very defects and foibles which he chronicles so minutely. Here is his description of his hero's outward appearance:

"His person was large, robust, I may say approaching to the gigantick, and grown unwieldy from corpulency. His countenance was naturally of the cast of an ancient statue, but somewhat disfigured by the scars of that evil, which it was formerly imagined, the royal touch could cure. He was now in his sixty-fourth year, and was become a little dull of hearing. His sight had always been somewhat weak; yet so much does mind govern, and even supply the deficiency of organs, that his perceptions were uncommonly quick and accurate. His head, and sometimes also his body, shook with a kind of motion like the effect of a palsy: he appeared to be frequently disturbed by cramps, or convulsive contractions, of the nature of that distemper called St. Vitus's dance. He wore a full suit of plain brown clothes, with twisted-hair-buttons of the same colour, a large bushy greyish wig, a plain shirt, black worsted stockings, and silver buckles. Upon this tour when journeying, he wore boots, and a very wide brown cloth great coat, with pockets which might have almost held the two volumes of his folio dictionary; and he carried in his hand a large English oak-stick."

The full-length portrait and character-study of Johnson which Boswell favours us with at the beginning of his Journal is supplemented on every page thereafter by little thumbnail sketches of the most vivid and diverting kind. We are shown "Doctor Major" in his serious moods and in his playful humours, we see him cross, we see him merry, we see him sublime, and we see him ridiculous. Now he is discussing theology or high politics with a parish minister or a Highland chief; anon he is sitting with a Celtic belle perched coquettishly on his knee! One moment we watch him pulverising his opponent in a solemn argument; the next we find him gallantly presenting a copy of "Cocker's Arithmetic" to his landlord's daughter. It was the only book he had with him, and Boswell—who plied Johnson with questions like a child—must needs know how he came to buy such a book at Inverness. "He gave me a very sufficient answer. 'Why, sir, if you are to have but one book with you upon a journey, let it be a book of science. When you have read through a book of entertainment, you know it, and it can do no more for you; but a book of science is inexhaustible.'"

'And so is Johnson's flow of talk. He can hold forth on every subject, and Boswell feeds him assiduously with topics, like a mill, for the edification of his hosts and fellow-guests. Johnson, for his part, is as interested in what he sees and hears as the Scottish Highlanders and Lowlanders are in him; and Boswell rubs his hands with glee at the success of his great venture. What joy unspeakable he derives from the sight of Dr. Johnson conversing with Flora Macdonald, or sleeping in Prince Charlie's bed, listening to the pipes with his ear close to the drone, sampling whiskey (in place of his usual lemonade) in order "to know what it is that makes a Scotsman happy," laying down the law to all and sundry on every conceivable subject, jibing at Scotland, Scotsmen and Bozzy in particular (whose leg, if the un-Johnsonian language may be permitted, he dearly loved to pull), and everywhere leaving the same impression, so admirably summed up by one of his Highland hosts, Mr. Donald M'Leod, who said: "When you see him first, you are struck with awful reverence; then you admire him; and then you love him cordially."

V.

Boswell, happily, had an infinite capacity for taking snubs. As Burke said, he had so much good humour naturally, it was scarce a virtue. To Johnson he was an invaluable companion, this ingenuous, boyish, consequential, fussy, devoted, warm-hearted fellow, shrewd yet simple, conceited yet ever considerate; "whose acuteness," Johnson assures us, "would help my inquiry, and whose gaiety of conversation and civility of manners are sufficient to counteract the inconveniences of travel in countries less hospitable than we have passed."

It is not surprising that these wayfarers were so attached to one another; each was a big man for all his littlenesses. There is one passage in the Journal which is infinitely touching, and which reveals in a flash all the weakness and the strength of the two friends. When nearing Glenelg on the mainland opposite Skye, Boswell started to ride ahead, so as to have everything ready for Johnson at the inn when he arrived. Johnson, tired, no doubt, flew in a passion at being left behind, called Boswell back and trounced him severely. Poor Bozzy only made matters worse by pretending to take his scolding lightly, and the irate Johnson declared, "Sir, had you gone on, I was thinking that I should have returned with you to Edinburgh, and then have parted from you, and never spoken to you more." Next day Boswell writes—and the passage deserves to rank with the quarrel scene between Brutus and Cassius—

"I had slept ill. Dr. Johnson's anger had affected me much. I considered that, without any intention, I might suddenly forfeit his friendship; and was impatient to see him this morning. I told him how uneasy he had made me, by what he had said. . . . He owned he had spoken to me in passion; that he would not have done what he threatened; and that, if he had, he should have been ten times worse than I; that forming intimacies would indeed be 'limning the water,' were they liable to such sudden dissolution; and he added, 'Let's think no more on't.' BOSWELL: 'Well then, Sir, I shall be easy. Remember I am to have fair warning in case of any quarrel. You are never to spring a mine upon me. It was absurd in me to believe you.' JOHNSON: 'You deserved about as much, as to believe me from night to morning.'"

The reader of Boswell's Journal, then, finds two road companions strangely dissimilar, yet each a genius in his way, and the further he journeys with them the better will he like their company; the more heartily will he be inclined to echo Johnson's remark on perusing Boswell's "Journal": "The more I read of this, I think the more highly of you."

ON his favourite subject of subordination, Johnson said: "So far is it from being true that men are naturally equal, that no two people can be half an hour together, but one shall acquire an evident superiority over the other."—From Boswell's Life of Dr. Johnson.

UN PORTRAIT DU PURITAIN

LE Puritain passait lentement dans les rucs, les yeux au ciel, les traits tirés, jaune et hagard, les cheveux ras, vêtu de brun ou de noir, sans ornements, ne s'habillant que pour se couvrir. Si quelqu'un avait les joues pleines, il passait pour tiède. Le corps entier, l'extérieur, jusqu'au ton de la voix, tout devait porter la marque de la pénitence et de la grâce. Le puritain discourait en paroles traînantes, d'un accent solennel, avec une sorte de nasillement, comme pour détruire la vivacité de la conversation et la mélodie de la voix naturelle. Ses entretiens remplis de citations bibliques, son style imité des prophètes, son nom et le nom de ses enfants, tirés de l'Écriture, témoignaient que sa pensée habitait le monde terrible des prophètes et des exterminateurs. De dedans, la contagion avait gagné le dehors. Les alarmes de la conscience s'étaient changées en lois d'Etat. La rigidité personnelle était devenue une tyrannie publique. Le puritain avait proscrit le plaisir comme un ennemi, chez autrui aussi bien que chez lui-même. Le Parlement faisait fermer les maisons de jeu, les théâtres, et fouetter les acteurs à la queue d'une charrette; les jurons étaient taxés; les arbres de mai étaient coupés; les ours dont les combats amusaient le peuple, étaient tués; le plâtre des maçons puritains rendait décentes les nudités des statues; les belles fêtes poétiques étaient interdites. Des amendes et des punitions corporelles interdisaient même aux enfants "les jeux, les danses, les sonneries de cloches, les réjouissances, les régales, les luttes, la chasse," tous les exercices et tous les amusements qui pouvaient profaner le dimanche. Les ornements, les tableaux, les statues des églises étaient arrachés ou déchirés. Le seul plaisir qu'on gardât et qu'on souffrit était le nasillement des psaumes, l'édification des sermons prolongés, l'excitation des controverses haineuses, la joie âpre et sombre de la victoire remportée sur le démon et de la tyrannie exercée contre ses fauteurs. En Ecosse, pays plus froid et plus dur, l'intolérance allait jusqu'aux derniers confins de la férocité et de la minutie, instituant une surveillance sur les pratiques privées et sur la dévotion intérieure de chaque membre de chaque famille, ôtant aux catholiques leurs enfants, imposant l'abjuration sous peine de prison perpétuelle ou de mort, amenant par troupeaux les sorcières* au bûcher. Il semblait qu'un nuage noir se fût appesanti sur la vie humaine, noyant toute lumière, éraçant toute beauté, éteignant toute joie, traversé ça et là par des éclairs d'épée et par des lueurs de torches, sous lesquels on voyait vaciller des figures de despotes moroses, de sectaires malades, d'opprimés silencieux.

IL y a une autre sorte de gloire, qui est une trop bonne opinion que nous concevons de nostre valeur. C'est un' affection inconsiderée, de quoi nous nous cherrissons, qui nous represente à nous memes autres que nous ne sommes: comme la passion amoureuse preste des beautez et graces au subject qu'elle embrasse, et fait que ceulx qui en sont esprins treuvent, d'un jugement trouble et alteré, ce qu'ils aiment autre et plus parfaict qu'il n'est.—Montaigne, "De la Presumption."

* 1648; trenté en un jour. Une d'elles avoua qu'elle avait été à une assemblée où étaient cinq cents sorcières.

THE PURITAN

THE typical Puritan walked slowly along the streets, his eyes raised towards heaven, with elongated features, yellow and haggard, with closely cropped hair, clad in brown or black, unadorned, clothed only to cover his nakedness. If a man had round cheeks, he passed for lukewarm. The whole body, the exterior, the very tone of voice, all must wear the sign of penitence and divine grace. A Puritan spoke slowly, with a solemn and somewhat nasal tone of voice, as if to destroy the vivacity of conversation and the melody of the natural voice. His speech stuffed with Scriptural quotations, his style borrowed from the prophets, his name and the names of his children drawn from the Bible, bore witness that his thoughts were confined to the terrible world of seers and ministers of divine vengeance. From within, the contagion spread outwards. The fears of conscience were converted into laws of the State. Personal asceticism grew into public tyranny. The Puritan proscribed pleasure as an enemy, for others as well as for himself. Parliament closed the gambling-houses and theatres, and had the actors whipped at the cart's tail; oaths were fined; the may-trees were cut down; the bears whose fights amused the people, were put to death; the plaster of Puritan masons reduced statues to decency; the beautiful poetic festivals were forbidden. Fines and corporal punishment shut out, even from children, games, dancing, bell-ringing, rejoicings, junketings, wrestling, the chase, all exercises and amusements which might profane the Sabbath. The ornaments, pictures, and statues in the churches were pulled down or mutilated. The only pleasure retained and permitted was the singing of psalms through the nose, the edification of long sermons, the excitement of acrimonious controversies, the harsh and sombre joy of a victory gained over the enemy of mankind, and of the tyranny exercised against the demon's supposed abettors. In Scotland, a colder and sterner land, intolerance reached the utmost limits of ferocity and pettiness, instituting a surveillance over the private life and home devotions of every member of a family, depriving Catholics of their children, imposing the abjuration of Popery under pain of perpetual imprisonment or death, dragging crowds of witches* to the stake. It seemed as though a black cloud had weighed down the life of man, drowning all light, wiping out all beauty, extinguishing all joy, pierced here and there by the glitter of the sword and by the flickering of torches, beneath which one might perceive the indistinct forms of gloomy despots, of bilious sectarians, of silent victims.

THERE is another kind of glory, which is an over-good opinion we conceive of our worth. It is an inconsiderate affection, wherewith we cherish our selves, which presents us unto our selves other than we are. As an amorous passion addeth beauties, and lendeth graces to the subject it embraceth, and maketh such as are therewith possessed, with a troubled conceit, and distracted Judgement to deem what they love, and find what they affect, to bee other, and seeme more perfect, then in trueth it is.—Florio's Translation.

* 1618; thirty in one day. One of them confessed that she had been at a gathering of more than five hundred witches.

IS ROMANISM ON THE DECLINE ?

BY HECTOR MACPHERSON

I.

IN a recent book, Father Graham—a Presbyterian clergyman who went over to Rome—admits that, so far as Scotland is concerned, Romanism is making no headway. As he puts it: "Out of a population of 5,000,000, we number only a little over half a million; of these more than 380,000 are within the arch-diocese of Glasgow, and nine-tenths of them are not Scots. The educated and professional classes, the moneyed and employing classes, the ruling and governing classes, even business men, and the best class of shopkeepers and tradesmen and workmen are practically all Protestant; to Catholics are generally left the poorest, least 'respectable' and most unremunerative forms of employment. They are like the 'whelps that eat of the crumbs that fall from the table of their masters.' In the city of Glasgow, for example, with more than 300,000 of a Catholic population, you could easily accommodate in a third-class carriage all the Catholic men who occupy positions of public prominence, trust, or responsibility in the city."

II.

Father Graham consoles himself with the thought that while Scotland is practically stagnant, "England forges ahead"; while "America advances still more quickly with 30,000 converts a year." As regards England, the Tractarian movement undoubtedly acted as a feeder to the Roman Catholic Church, which, both in numbers and prestige, received great benefit when Cardinal Newman "went over." But a perusal of Mr. Joseph McCabe's book, "Decay of the Church of Rome," will convince the reader that there is no sign to-day of Roman Catholicism "forging ahead." According to Mr. McCabe, the Romish Church in England has gained amongst the titled—the wealthy classes—but to an appalling extent it has lost among the poor. He says: "To-day the number of deliberate seceders amongst the Catholic middle-class and alert workers increases enormously. They are found in thousands in all parts of the country. Even the clergy, in spite of the great struggle that follows secession and the almost invariable calumny and bitterness that punish, abandon the Church in a remarkable proportion."

A striking evidence of the decline of Roman Catholicism in England is seen in the lowering intellectual prestige of the Church. In this respect the influence of the Tractarian movement has spent its force. "Where," says Mr. McCabe, "in the Catholic England of to-day are the successors of Wiseman, Newman, Pugin, Ward, Hope-Scott, T. Arnold, Coventry Patmore, Aubrey de Vere, and Lord Acton?" The Modernist movement might have allured to Rome a certain number of intellectualists, but all hope of this is cut off by the stern repression of the movement by the Vatican. Before the statistics produced by Mr. McCabe can be discredited Father Graham will need to produce something in the shape of evidence more substantial than rhetorical generalities.

III.

In regard to America, Father Graham produces no authority for his statement about 30,000 converts a year; he simply repeats the current opinion in Roman Catholic circles about the great progress of Romanism in America. This legend is not of yesterday. So long ago as 1836 a Roman Catholic Bishop of Charlestown, in a congress at Lyons, felt compelled to rebuke the inflated statements with regard to the progress of the Church in America. He frankly stated that instead of gain there was serious loss; within fifty years, he said, millions had been lost to the Church. Father Graham may say that since 1836 a great change has taken place, and that in America Romanism is rapidly making headway. Well, let us come nearer our own time. At the Roman Catholic Congress in connection with the Great Exhibition of 1893 Miss Elder, a niece of Archbishop Elder, of Cincinnati, spoke of the losses sustained by the Church, and put them at twenty millions. Apart from that, does Father Graham mean to assert that the spread of Roman Catholicism in America partakes of the nature of a conquest in the sense of conversions, that is, genuine additions to the Church? As a matter of fact, the great mass of the American Romanists are not converts but emigrants, transferred from some other branch of the Church—from Ireland, Austria, Italy, France, Canada, Mexico, etc. And what is significant, the clergy list is made up largely of Irish, German, French, Italian, and Polish names.

IV.

What is the intellectual status of American Roman Catholics? Father Graham talks of the great things the Church does for learning and science. How does his rhetoric contrast with the statement of Mr. McCarthy quoted by Mr. McCabe: that of the 448 Universities and Colleges in the United States only 61 are Roman Catholic; of 52,794 young men passing through a collegiate course only 5,052 are Catholic, and of 3,762 graduated students only 166 are Catholic? The Papacy is clearly not conspicuously furthering learning in the United States. The facts go to prove the truth of the conclusion reached by Mr. McCabe in his suggestive volume, after an exhaustive statistical analysis, that the Roman Catholic Church in America is largely recruited from the illiterate emigrants who flock into the country. How does the case stand in professedly Roman Catholic countries like Italy, Spain, and France? Those who are in a position to know tell us that "there can hardly be any doubt, from the confession of Catholics themselves, that Catholicism has small hold on the educated classes," and that "the professional classes and the great majority of the University students are, and have been for many years, either indifferent or hostile." The Italian Church, we are told, will soon be a body of 20,000,000 illiterates and children controlled by 24,000 clerics and dependent laymen. In Spain and Portugal the same movement of the educated mind away from the Church is recorded. The Church is said to have lost more than fifty per cent. of the Portuguese who can read, and the revolt gains with the spread of education. In his attempt to minimise the influence of the Reformation Father Graham says "that what Rome lost then she has since recovered a hundredfold in other lands."

V.

The other lands where, according to Father Graham, the Church has made conquests which more than repair the havoc of the Reformation include Spanish America. How do the people stand in the scale of intelligence? Are they in a position to give intelligent study of Romanism, or are they at the stage of ignorance and credulity most favourable to the missionary efforts of the Papacy? One-third of them, we are told, are aborigines or negroes, in whose minds Romish doctrines mingle with pagan beliefs and practices. A third are half-castes; less than one-third are whites of a lower type than the Spaniards and Portuguese. Of the remainder, the majority are either indifferent or hostile to the Romish Church. The truth seems to be that the secessions are in strict proportion to the spread of education. In the Latin worlds, including the new lands which Rome claims as a set-off to the losses of the Reformation, the Papacy succeeds only when she can keep her devotees in ignorance. Rome thrives on superstition and declines in presence of knowledge, to which she is as hostile to-day as in the dark ages.

VI.

In Germany, as in France and America, the Modernist movement is making its influence felt. There we have professors in Roman Catholic universities deliberately rejecting the claim of the Pope to be the supreme lawgiver of the world and to universal sovereignty. In reference to this, Dr. Wahrmund, Professor of Canon Law in the University of Innsbruck, says: "The Bishop of Rome, in the year of salvation 1902, is represented as the absolute lord, limited by no earthly authority, as the despot of the whole world. Never have intellectual limitation and blind fanaticism risen to such a prodigious lie." In regard to the unchangeability of the Church, to which Father Graham and the superstitious section pin their faith, Dr. Wahrmund has the following: "The pious legend that the Catholic Church, from the beginning to the present day, has not altered at all can only be maintained by him who either does not know or accepts as true the historical forgeries by which it has to be supported. If we were to let a Christian of the third century see the Catholic Church of to-day, he would certainly not be able to recognise in it the Church of his time." Consider, too, the frank criticism of the Papal idea by the late Father Tyrrell: "If the Pope to-day were to arrogate to himself all that was said to St. Peter and the apostles, he should consistently arrogate inspiration and wonder-working." He favoured "the abandonment of the claim to an oracular power by which the Pope becomes the mouth-piece of God."

VII.

In a letter to a French friend, Father Tyrrell used the following outspoken language: "I believe in the Roman Catholic Church in so far as it is Christian and Catholic; I disbelieve in it so far as it is Papal." He goes on to say that in it he sees two spirits struggling for supremacy, Christ and Anti-Christ; and at present Anti-Christ is uppermost. What a contrast between the violent internal conflicts of the Church of Rome, the war of antagonistic views, with Father Graham's dream of a united harmonious Church in which every believer sits contentedly under the Papal vine and fig-tree, none daring to make him afraid!

VOLUME II. OF "EVERYMAN"

THE second volume of EVERYMAN will shortly be ready, handsomely bound in cloth, at the price of 3s. 6d. Including some of the most notable contributions to literature, it continues the traditions of the paper, and should form, with Vol. I., the nucleus of an interesting and valuable collection. Applications should be sent to EVERYMAN Publishing Department, Messrs. J. M. Dent and Sons. Cases for binding can be obtained at 1s. 6d. A complete and detailed index to Vol. II. (Nos. 27 to 52) is now in preparation.

Meanwhile, the authorities at the Vatican are under no delusion. They know better than Father Graham that the Papacy is engaged in a life-and-death struggle. How are they meeting it? In the usual way, by the creation of artificial thunder in the shape of Encyclicals. In the old days Rome had no difficulty in resorting to the Inquisition and similar methods of suppressing what it deemed to be heresy. To-day the conditions are entirely altered. The Vatican is controlled by the spirit of Italian and Spanish Romanism, and is not a match for the independent spirit which manifests itself in American, German, and French Romanism. The Encyclical in old days meant the close of the campaign against heresy; to-day, as has been shown, it means the beginning of a campaign. Assailed by Protestantism without and Modernism within, the Roman Church is face to face with a crisis which threatens to the Papacy a more serious disruption than that of the Reformation period. In his book on Newman, in the "World's Epoch Makers" series—the most masterly and penetrative study of the great Cardinal that has yet appeared—Dr. Sarolea describes the situation in the following luminous sentences: "In the face of the reactionary attitude of the Roman Curia, a spirit of insubordination is spreading to every branch of the Church. Although France remains the centre of the movement, no country is escaping unhurt. And from the laity revolt has extended to the clergy: numberless are the priests who have made common cause with the innovators. Most disquieting of all omens, even the Jesuits, the spiritual bodyguard of Rome, are infected with the new spirit, and it is an English Jesuit, ex-Father Tyrrell (since deceased), who is one of the leaders of the Modernists.

"The conservative section amongst Roman Catholics may nourish the fond hope that the Church will emerge from this crisis as she has ever done before—Deus dabit his quoque finem. They forget that the present situation is without any analogy in history. As long as scientific truths were a monopoly of an insignificant élite, Rome could silence a troublesome opposition. But to-day, when a ubiquitous Press brings the discoveries and conclusions of modern research within reach of the millions, any attempt to quell spiritual rebellion is doomed to failure. . . . The present crisis can only end in a complete transformation of the ancient Church and in the concession of what Thiers once called 'the necessary liberties,' or in a schism which would be the disruption and dissolution of Catholicism."

EVENING CALM

A GOLDEN warmth suffuses all the west;
The sun is low: and one bright, trembling star
Sparkles above the purpling mountain's crest.
The bleatings of the sheep from folds afar
Steal softly o'er the mist-enchanted lake.
The rooks fly home across the drowsy leas:
A blackbird whistles from a distant brake,
Answered by some sweet songster in the trees.
And Heaven and Earth seemed merged—serenely one—

A symbol of that calm that is to be.
For in this hour, when Nature's Rest is won,
The Soul is hushed into tranquillity:
And feels within the twilight mystery
A sense of God, and Immortality.

GEORGE S. ASTINS.

WONDER WRITERS ON SCIENCE :

"If any one would realise that the greatest social work is that which radiates from the laboratories through the multiple activities of applied science . . . he would find a new meaning in the care of his body, his home and his habits; he would appreciate the trust he holds for the common cause in the right direction of his personal life, and he would not forget the part he has to play in safeguarding the springs of heredity and of laying his own stone well and truly in the building of the future generation."

Mr. HARRY LOWERISON, the famous authority on Education and Natural Science, reviewing this series, says:

"I would have every boy and girl brought up to reason on the facts they see. I would, in fact, have a basis of natural Science for every education. But what of those of us who have grown up without this knowledge?"

"These ten little books, this little library of modern Science, have been done by capable men and women. They are all masters in their own domain.

If you want to educate yourself, here is your chance. . . . Very heartily do I wish 'The Science History of the Universe' all the success it deserves."

What Buyers say :

Mr. J. Ward, Norton-le-Moors, Staffs:

"I have never read any books like these . . . they are well worth double the money charged for them."

Mr. Orchard, Walsall :

"I am quite satisfied . . . and rather surprised that such difficult subjects have been reduced to so readable a form."

THE SHADOW-SLAYER * * BY HERMAN SCHEFFAUER

(Concluded)

AT intervals the menacing, huge billows broke like thunder against the bastion of the rock and flung up towering pillars of torn and hissing spray, as if to rear a mocking effigy of the helpless lighthouse. The vanguard of the storm was upon us.

El Norte Rock stood like a defiant fortress amidst the pother of the hurricane. When the night closed thick upon us, we lighted the great lamp. It poured its splendour into the heart of the storm, a sphere of incandescent fire, battling with darkness, with the elements, and with death. Soon a torrid heat filled the unventilated little cabin. We thereupon set the door a little ajar, holding it in place with the broken fluke of a small anchor. The large mirror shielded our eyes from the intolerable lustre of the lamp and its withering heat. In the shadow of this shelter we sat and talked. At regular intervals old Hughes pulled upon the lengthened cord of the green blind. When he raised it we knew that a blazing star and sheaf of rays severed the night as they sprang out across the raving sea to the ships. It was as though we sat as arbiters at some august tribunal of life and death.

"You have known David long?" I asked.

"Ten years or more." After some moments he added:

"Long before that I knew his mother."

Then there was silence again, and only the tempest spoke. But soon, as if yielding to an inner urging, Owen resumed:

"I knew his mother before he was born—long before she came to this land and married Willmott. The bones of some of our common kinsfolk are now lying in holy ground near Pontardulais. I knew her for the fairest, sweetest woman in all Wales. We grew dear to each other, and were betrothed. Lucy was learned in all the fable and folklore of the land. O God, sir! she was a sweet child with a woman's heart and head! Some said she was eerie—a weaver of white magic—which is all wrought out of goodness and blessings. One summer's day, on the green waters of a bight, we saw a flock of large birds, white and lovely as swans. Lucy was sore moved at sight of 'em—said it was a glad thing for our love. She stretched out her arms, then folded 'em across her breast, saying she longed to clasp the beautiful birds. Halcyons she called 'em, and sang a stave of an old song. 'Twas fair with the thought of the golden weather, brought out of Paradise by the halcyons for all true lovers, and told how their white souls and red hearts would be joined in death by the homing of such birds. When Lucy had done with the lay, the tears were breaking from her eyes. Then and there she embraced me, making me swear by the shining sea-fowl that I'd come to her as she to me—in the last hour. But now it's she that will come to me—when my hour comes."

Owen's head of tarnished silver sank low; his voice rang strangely remote, and his hand hung down, forgetful of the cord of the blind. I gently relieved him of this and resumed the task of meting out the light. Was it a human sob I heard, or only one of the minor notes in the gigantic orchestra of the storm? There were lulls and pauses in the tempest. The little house shook in the embrace of the blast. Owen spoke on in a tremulous voice:

"An evil tongue came between us while I was gone on my first long cruise in a British frigate. There was another woman, who told Lucy I was dead. When I came back she had gone across the water to America with a band of emigrants. I never saw her again. But, years after, a kinswoman of hers told me that Lucy learned at last that I was still living, and so felt all the old longing and love for me come upon her. But then she was wife to Willmott. She was a good wife to him, but a sad woman till her death"—his voice sank to a forceful whisper—"for she never loved him! I came to California. Then, eight years ago, in the city, I chanced upon Davy, her son. Grew to love the lad. I'm minded of Lucy by Davy all the time. His voice is hers, his eyes are hers—or I'd not be here now on this God-forsaken rock with him and the two painted heathen!"

A strange swishing and pattering against the window was audible at times. It was a sound too sharp for rain.

I stood up, and saw the white spray of the charging billows in the deeps hurtling up against the glass. As I looked, there was a flash of wings in the field of light without, and a sea-gull flattened itself with a thud against the window, crumpled limply into a battered mass, and then fell into the deeps.

"A bird!" I cried, astonished; and Owen answered calmly:

"A gull astray in the storm. Sometimes they come full flight, thick as hail against the glass of the lighthouse, like moths into a candle-flame, and bash their skulls by hundreds. I've seen the base of the tower covered four deep with 'em."

"Willmott would be terribly worried," I said, "if he knew that the light was not burning in the tower."

"When he finds it out," replied Owen, shaking his head, "he'll come back at once, whether he be in the woods or the town. He can see the tower light for miles along that mountain road. He'd come right through the night and the storm. The thought of the light being dead would drive Davy mad. He'd not stop to think of his own life—it's the lives of the ships to him. He'd go to the stake for duty, sir—a noble soul! Heaven send he don't find that key till to-morrow!"

The great lamp sang and hummed as if in mockery of the elemental uproar it defied. The air of an August noon throbbled in the place. All the overwhelming, desolating sense of loneliness these two men must feel at times stoke upon me. And there was something in the simple Owen that was yet, for all his frankness, most unfathomable. The mysterious flocking of the birds and the glimpses of ancient superstitions still ruling the child-like soul of Willmott's assistant were given a ponderous emphasis and sinister meaning by the terror of the night and the torment of sea and sky. I felt stirring in me the seeds of an unknown alarm which had shamed me even as a boy, an alarm that had remained absent even amidst close-pitching shell-fire in battle. It was the blind brute savage that slept within my civilised heart. Once more he was waking and biting deeply upon the nerve of fear as he muttered to his hellish gods. I sought to engage the old Welshman in further speech, to make him roll forth some brave sea-song, but he answered more and more vaguely as, like a wounded, worried thing, the night crawled on.

At last, lifting his eyes, which, distended with dreams, had remained fixed before him, he said:

"The thought of the halcyons has taken me back to the home-country there——"

A sudden cracking sound, like a pistol-shot, broke sharply upon our ears. The wide expanse of glass in the sash was split diagonally in two! I sprang to my feet. We stared at the bright crack.

"The heat of the lamp inside, the cold spray outside, has cracked it," I said at length, as if to reassure myself; "or the straining of the frame, or the push of the wind."

Owen still stared in silence. He shook his head, his jaw fell, an expression of pitiful awe and fear came into his eyes.

"'Twas a fair glass," said he, "and must have cost a deal of money. But 'twas no heat that burst it, nor warping, nor wind. Do you know what it was, sir?"

His voice was hoarse; in awestruck tones he brought forth the words:

"A finger from the beyond! It's an old omen that has heaven's truth in it—a foretelling of the end. But when two be present, there's no telling whose life is marked."

"Well, don't worry! Perhaps it's mine," I said with a laugh.

"We call it being fcy," Owen went on; "so—so—

"Penrhyn the fisherman sat by the firelight,—
The low fire, the red fire, the fire upon the stone;
The sudden snap o' casement glass fell on his ear by night,—
The wind's cry, his wife's cry, the wife that left him lone.

Penrhyn the fisherman is one that walks in fey,—
His boat calls, the nets call, adown the flood goes he;
The fishing-fleet at evening came homing o'er the bay,
An empty boat, a broken oar, two halcyons on the sea."

The old man chanted the lines in a wild and solemn manner, and as if almost oblivious to my presence. All that had been born and bred darkly into his Cymric blood now came welling to the surface. He rose and began pacing to and fro in the narrow space behind the table, muttering to himself and whispering to unseen, haunting presences. Suddenly he stopped, lifted his finger, and exclaimed:

"Hark to that! Don't you hear the voice?"

"No," I replied, weirdly oppressed.

"There it is again, calling, calling afar!"

"It is only the storm," I shouted, as if to muster up defiance towards a whole world of Owen's unhappy ghosts.

His fine, grave face twitched with some vast emotion and wonder. A light such as might dower the eyes of martyrs at the last moment lived in his widened pupils. His gaze was bent curiously upon the glass. I, too, stared at the cracked pane, a growing terror upon me.

"It's a voice," he repeated hollowly, "a woman's voice crying, 'Owen! Owen!' A woman I know. And now I hear the bells—bells of buoys, bells of steeples——"

Then, stretching wide his arms, he advanced towards the window, tears rolling from his eyes, his breast heaving with some passionate tumult, crying aloud in anguish into the distance beyond the walls:

"I hear you! I see you! Come to me, come back, come back, my loved one; for God's love of love, come back to your Owen!"

There he stood in the fierce glare of the lamp, struck with sudden ecstacy, dead to time and place, a ghostly grandeur, an unearthly brilliance upon him. And, as I stood in an almost equal fascination, there came a mighty swoop of the winds, the cabin rocked and groaned, and the straining glass shrieked as it grated along its broken edges.

Then from the outer darkness, dazzling in the flood of the projected rays, flashed a white shape in a flurry of spray. There was a crash of glass, the shattered pane opened inward like two leaves of an unhinged door, and for an instant I saw the snowy apparition of an immense bird with wide-extended wings. Then the wind and the spray were in my face, the lamp went out, darkness and havoc and storm were in the cabin. Amidst a chaos of tumbling lenses, the overturned lamp, tables, and chairs, fluttering pinions striking blindly, and pictures torn, flapping, from the walls, I heard Owen calling out into the sea. Then a heavy body struck me in the chest, and hurled me backward into the outer night, through the door, now opened wide by the wind.

Half stunned, I regained my feet. The darkness was alive with fiery wheels of writhing colours called up in my brain by the intense light so swiftly extinguished. The Indian and Chinese came running towards me with lanterns.

We entered the cabin. Ghastly havoc was there, the floor brimming with sea-water and oil from the broken lamp, and littered with glittering fragments of broken glass. The stuffed birds and fishes were lying amidst the wreck. Feathers were still whirling in the air, the coverlet of Owen's bed, as well as the walls, were spattered with blood from the breast and wings of the gigantic bird. But of man or bird there was no sign. The great hole where the glass had been gaped black and dreadfully before us, a thunderous throat into the storm, a portal yawning into the unknown. Through this door of death Owen had passed into the world of his desire; he had gone forth on the wings of the halcyon with his dream.

The Indian darted swiftly out of the room. I followed, and saw him run to the windlass by the derrick. The bell was swinging and ringing feebly! The redskin shouted down into the darkness, then he and Han began to turn the groaning crank of the windlass. Their arms and features of bronze and gold, their set teeth and grim, distorted faces, glowing in the ruddy shine of the lantern light, gave them the look of demons lifting a fellow-spirit out of some clashing pit.

The basket appeared. From it, dripping with the sea, his black hair plastered over his bluish face like seaweed over a stone, his streaming clothes shaped to his trembling, fainting frame, Willmott staggered, a wreck, an effigy of himself, a pitiful thing, chewed in the maw of the tempest and spat forth again into life. He clutched me, his eyes stared; he cried in that high, musical voice of his, the voice, his mother's voice, which had called Owen to his end:

"The light! the light! Didn't you—didn't you hear the bell? Didn't you hear me call?—Owen! Owen!"

I held him firmly, but he tore himself loose. Tottering, reeling, and tugging madly at his pocket, he made his way to the door of the lighthouse. Vainly, with palsied and quivering hands, he sought to insert in the lock the thin, corrugated key. It slipped from his fingers and fell tinkling on the stone step. Then, inert, and heavy-weighted with his drenched clothes, the keeper of El Norte Light crumpled gently into a heap as he sank, fainting, at the foot of the ghostly tower—at the foot of the iron duty whose voice had drawn him through the storm.

LITERARY NOTES

No University is complete nowadays without a Press of its own. As a rule, the works issued by such Presses are, like those of the learned societies (such as the Early English and Scottish Text Societies, Historical Societies, and so forth), caviare to the general publisher as well as public. Thus the ordinary publisher has no reason to resent the invasion of his domain by the academic authorities; and the Universities, for their part, have the satisfaction of knowing that, if their publications are not of a popular and paying kind, they are promoting the cause of knowledge, encouraging the research work of their own staff and students and of scholars elsewhere, and taking advantage of one of the few legitimate and convincing forms of advertisement open to educational institutions of their standing.

Since its inauguration, the Publications Committee of Manchester University has shown remarkable judgment and enterprise, and the new volumes to be issued this week by the Manchester University Press will doubtless add to the prestige of the University. These include a second edition (with additions and emendations) of Professor Sedgefield's "Beowulf," a second impression of Professor Lugaro's "Modern Problems in Psychiatry" translated by Drs. Rows and Orr, Professor Canney's "Materials for Hebrew Composition," and "Naval Mutinies of 1797," by Conrad Gill, M.A., lecturer in Economic History in the University of Belfast. Mr. Gill has specially studied the bearing of these mutinies on social and political history, and traces the disaffection which brought them about to the revolutionary and humanitarian movements of the day.

Another interesting historical work dealing with the same period will be published shortly by Messrs. Constable and Co.—"The Dépôt for Prisoners of War at Norman Cross," by Thomas James Walker, M.D., F.R.C.S. This dépôt in Huntingdonshire was the first, and for twelve years the only, prison specially constructed for the custody of prisoners captured in the revolutionary and Napoleonic wars between 1799 and 1815.

Among the new books to come this autumn from Mr. Philip Lee Warner are a number of sumptuous volumes on art, archæology, and literature. In October will appear "The Book of the Dead: the Papyrus of Ani" (scribe and treasurer of the temples of Egypt about 1450 B.C.), in two volumes (£2). It is now nearly twenty years since the last edition of this work by Dr. E. A. Wallis Budge, Keeper of the Egyptian and Assyrian Antiquities in the British Museum. A completely new edition, at a reduced price, has now been prepared; supplementary chapters and sections have been added from the funeral papyri acquired by the Museum Trustees since 1892; the translations have been rewritten and the notes corrected and amplified; and the greater part of the Introduction has also been rewritten. The same publisher will bring out in October, in his series of Handbooks to Ancient Civilisation, "Antiquities of India," an account of the History and Culture of Ancient Hindustan, by Lionel D. Barnett, M.A., Litt.D., Keeper of the Department of Oriental Printed Books and Manuscripts in the British Museum (12s. 6d.); and, during the autumn, the second and third volumes of Chaucer's "Canterbury Tales," in the illustrated quarto series of the Riccardi Press Books.

A new edition (brought up to date) of Bernard Shaw's "Quintessence of Ibsenism" was published the other day. Messrs. Constable now announce a new edition of his "The Perfect Wagnerite" (3s. 6d.).

* * * * *

Mr. Heinemann will publish immediately a volume of poems entitled "The Knave of Hearts," by Arthur Symons, written during the years 1894-1908, uniform with the author's Collected Poems, issued twelve years ago.

* * * * *

The latest addition to Messrs. Constable's useful series of Modern Biographies is "Paul Bourget," by Ernest Dimnet, author of "Les Sœurs Brontë" and other works.

* * * * *

The whitewashing of notorious historical characters goes on apace. A year or two ago Claverhouse found a fervid champion to write his life, and now William Augustus, Duke of Cumberland, has found a vindicator in Mr. Evan Charteris, who has had access to the Cumberland papers at Windsor, and throws fresh light on his character in a book to be published by Mr. Edward Arnold.

* * * * *

Those who know and admire the work of Mr. W. L. Courtney as critic, journalist, dramatist, philosopher and poet will open with no small hope and curiosity the collection of short stories from his pen which is issued this week by Messrs. Chapman and Hall under the title "The Soul of a Suffragette."

THE DEPOPULATION OF FRANCE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I have read with great interest the article by W. S. Lilly on "Depopulation of France."

Being myself in sympathy with France and the French, I can join heartily with Mr. Lilly in deploring the sad state of affairs which undoubtedly exists in France at present.

Let us inquire for a moment the causes of this tendency of the Frenchman to remain celibate. M. Rossignol tells us that it is due to the lack of "will." What does this mean? Evidently we must interpret this as lack of "will to marry"; and marriage, according to him, should culminate, essentially, in a prolific production of children. True, we, as rational human beings, accept this as a definition of marriage; but what are we to say to the "vieux célibataire" who tells us that he finds the necessary sexual stimuli and satisfaction with "la femme se livrant à la prostitution" and in "les maisons tolérées," as M. Rossignol calls them. With this we must immediately see the fundamental difference between the man who resolves never to marry and produce, and the man who does marry and does produce.

Dr. Otto Weininger, that remarkable author of "Sex and Character," in differentiating between the woman with the prostitute instinct and the one with the mother instinct, says, "Die eine sieht nur den Mann, die andre sieht das Kind." We may, I venture to say, apply this similarly to the confirmed bachelor and the marrying man. The one sees only the satisfaction of his sexual appetite; the other, whilst satis-

Rosenblum's New "Rapidoral" Method (with illustrations) is the only French Method for self-tuition based on the Direct Conversational Principles, and the only one by which it is possible to acquire a colloquial knowledge of French without the help of a teacher. It is the easiest and most effective method on the French language ever published, and the cost of the Elementary Course (now ready), consisting of 25 parts, is:—

Only 10/6, post free.

What our Pupils say of the "Rapidoral" Method:

"Surprisingly easy and interesting."
 "The exercises are so wonderfully well arranged, that I cannot leave them until I know them word for word."
 "I think the little books very interesting and excellently designed for self-tuition."
 "I find the studies very interesting and agreeable."
 "I must say the lessons are excellent. The manner in which these booklets are built up shows a great amount of care and long experience in teaching."

FRENCH, GERMAN, SPANISH or ITALIAN BY PHONOGRAPH.

There is no doubt that the Phonograph is an ideal substitute for an actual native teacher. Whilst reproducing the foreign sounds in exactly the same way as a native teacher would, it has many advantages over the latter. You are not obliged to adhere to any fixed hours. It is always at your disposal. You can make it repeat your lesson as many times as you like. It never gets tired. Your lesson every day can last for five minutes or five hours. When you are tired of your lesson you can have a pleasant relaxation by using an ordinary record with a piece of music or a song; and after you have mastered the language, the outfit still has its value.

Our language records are of standard size, carefully made, and will fit any cylinder machine.

The price of a complete Outfit, consisting of 30 Records, with 6 blank cylinders, all enclosed in a handsome cabinet, together with the Text Book, is:—

£3 3s. (Easy Payments can be arranged).

fyng his natural instincts, also sees before him the sublime happiness of parentage. I think that herein lies the crux of the whole question, and it makes our problem all the more difficult.

Suppose for a moment that M. Rossignol's proposed unpractical reform measures have become law, and that we have made all marriageable men marry. Let us go a step further, and suppose they have all at least three or four children. What is the obvious result? Ill-treatment of both wife and child, frequent visits to bagnios, concubinage, and, I firmly believe, final abandonment. En bref, what I wish to impress is that where the parental instinct does not exist it is useless to enforce marriage. We should rather advocate a healthy system of training and suggestion to the child, by which it will be brought up with a feeling of its responsibility and duty as a propagator of its kind. Efforts have been made to establish such a system, but it is still in embryo. Far more strenuous work must be carried out before any sensible effect will be noticed. We recognise the dangers that beset the child in going through such a system, but, as I have said, the idea is still in its infancy.

The main point is that only by educating the child can we hope to influence the man. Congratulating Mr. Lilly on his able article, and wishing EVERYMAN every future success,—I am, sir, etc.,
Belfast. MORITZ GOLDBLATT.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—While confessing my inability to understand in what way Mr. Lilly or any of his readers are affected if it be proved that by the year 3913 A.D. the French race will have disappeared from the face of the earth, I think that perhaps something may be learned from the discussion of France's falling birth-rate, and am willing to help therein with a little impartial criticism of Mr. Lilly's views.

I would point out that, although Mr. Lilly (quite rightly, I think) places no faith in the remedies proposed by M. Rossignol, he seems to have nothing better to offer himself. His criticism of M. Rossignol's proposals, that you cannot compel people to produce children against their will, is unanswerable; but I would suggest that neither can you prevent a free community of normal men and women from producing children—that even "the most compelling force" of religion is incapable of doing that. I would further suggest that, if people will not produce children for themselves, neither will they for an abstraction variously designated "civil society" or "their country." Is not the common sense of the matter that children are produced, as the young of any animal are produced, by the force of an instinct inherent in all animal life? And if this force fails to produce its usual effect, does it not argue that there is something seriously wrong (that is, unnatural) in the conditions under which the people are living? The evident anxiety of thinking people to arrest the decline is a tacit admission that they feel that decline to be an indication of something wrong, for which somebody (perhaps themselves in some degree as citizens) is responsible. Otherwise there would be no reason for them to trouble about the matter.

Neither M. Rossignol nor Mr. Lilly seems to have any suspicion that the cause may be largely economic, but that there is a strong presumption that it is so the following quotation from a recent book by a German writer, Dr. A. Grotjahn, will show:—"How strong is the physical reproductive power of the French nation even to-day, when it can take its course unchecked by economic considerations, is proved by the example of the village of Mardic, near Dunkirk. This is a colony founded by Louis XIV., with a system of land tenure which does not permit of private ownership in the soil. The men of Mardic marry, on an average, at twenty-four years of age, immediately after having passed the obligatory service in the Navy. When a new family has thus been founded it receives for exclusive use, but not as private property, a plot of land of twenty-two acres and a section of the shore for net-fishing. . . . The families may leave to their children the land handed to them in usufruct, but they may not divide or mortgage it. The result is that Mardic possesses a prosperous population, free of material cares, which does not rack its brain on behalf of its children's fate, while the rest of the peasants and fishermen of France are particularly anxious in this respect. The births amount to 43 per 1,000 of the inhabitants, a figure which is not surpassed by any civilised people." The contrast with the general state of things in France is sufficiently striking to suggest the direction of more attention to the relation between the birth-rate and fundamental economic conditions.—I am, sir, etc., A. CLARK.

Penistone, September 15th, 1913.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—The most notable utterance in Mr. W. S. Lilly's study of M. Rossignol's "Depopulation of France" is, I consider, in the last section. He says, "The true foundation for the State is not the individual, as Rousseau and his disciples thought, but the family." In considering the question of the diminishing birth-rate the social reformer should fix his mind on the family group. If restriction had affected all classes in equal proportion the result might even have been beneficial, and a stronger, healthier race resulted. The fact is otherwise. So great has been the diminution in the size of families in all except the mechanic and labouring classes that it might almost be said that the future race is to be found in the slums and mean streets. This disproportion in the size of families within the last thirty years has created a new social inequality. The poor family, averaging perhaps five children, has become, relatively to other families, very much poorer. It is surely only right that this new inequality should be recognised and rectified, if possible. It is obvious also that the national value of these poor families has immensely increased now that other families are so much smaller. All M. Rossignol's proposals for easing the lot of those burdened with many children are worthy of careful consideration. If Mr. Lilly has succeeded in impressing on your readers that the family is the real unit for consideration, he has done good service.

To judge by their actions, public authorities are not desirous of remedying this inequality. The London County Council does not build for the large families the houses or flats necessary for health and decency. By its policy of "deterrence" (called familiarly the policy of "choke 'em off"), the poor-law authorities deliberately deprive these poor families of the medical aid and nourishment to which they are legally entitled. And now education reformers ask that, without any compensation, the elder children should be kept at school two or three years after attaining a bread-winning age!—I am, sir, etc., J. E. WATES.
Brockley, S.E.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—A propos of the very interesting article by Mr. W. S. Lilly on "The Depopulation of France," it appears to me that this often declaimed and ubiquitous question is viewed from a standpoint which, to

"COSMOPOLIS."

"COSMOPOLIS," which just twelve months ago evolved from the Foreign Literary Society, has deservedly proved a great success.

It is indeed a unique institution, and nothing seems lacking to meet the needs and tastes of everyone, from the student struggling to acquire his first knowledge of a foreign language to the connoisseur of the most advanced literature, art and drama.

Lectures, which are open to the public upon payment of a very modest fee, are held daily in various Continental languages, whilst frequent performances of plays in French, Italian, German, Spanish and Russian are given by native actors and actresses in the extremely cosy private theatre in "Cosmopolis."

With its own lecture hall, well-equipped and comfortable modern theatre, reading room, journal, publishing, teaching and translation departments, "Cosmopolis" provides everything that the lover of foreign languages and foreign life can desire; it makes study entertaining and amusement instructive.

Moreover, it is not necessary to join for any stated period of time, as the afternoon and evening lectures can be attended at one's pleasure or inclination.

Now in its second year, which has just commenced, "Cosmopolis" is a new asset to London, and it is to be hoped that its promoters, the Foreign Literary Society, Limited, will continue its excellent work and find ever-increasing support for many years to come.

A copy of "Le Messager de Cosmopolis," together with an invitation card, available for one lecture, will be sent post free to anyone desiring to know more about "Cosmopolis," by applying to the General Secretary, "Cosmopolis," 201, High Holborn, W.C. (opposite British Museum Tube Station), who will also be pleased to give any information concerning the institution to all who find it inconvenient to pay a personal visit.

say the least, is not practical. It certainly does not seem feasible to approach the subject entirely from the standpoint of "amor patriæ," and to say that childless marriages and neo-Malthusian parents are dominated by a "spurious individualism" and that the "egoistic instinct has triumphed in France at the expense of the social instinct" is, in my opinion, exaggerated nomenclature.

Whilst admitting that the family is the foundation of the State, it cannot, at the same time, be supposed that the ego gives pride of place to a constitutional machine which we call the State. Marriages are older than States, and surely any question of national utility is not, nor can it possibly be made, to rank pari passu with a marriage bargain.

It is proclaimed, with a certain amount of truth, that progress in numbers means progress in wealth, power, and civilisation, and a prolific offspring amongst the labouring population does spell prosperity by filling the workshops and factories of those who control the wealth, power, and civilisation, and, at the same time, have no personal regard for the burden of a large family for the benefit of the State.

To suggest that the State should be the chief objective in contracting a marriage is, in my opinion, absurd. A man's income will only bear a limited responsibility, and who is to say that a man with scarcely sufficient to keep himself and his wife should add a family to his liabilities? If his income permits it, all well and good; but who can point the finger at the man who has a small income and an equally small family, and suggest that he is not dealing fairly with the State in limiting his responsibilities to his means, instead of building up the State by producing "citizens" who he knows well can only become dependents of the kings of steel, coal, cotton, mines, and railways? He would then be unable to provide for them sufficiently to make them decent yeomen, with their wills and spirits unbroken by the existing system of competition and fighting for wealth and "power."

I think the question is one that should be left to the practical common sense of the people.—I am, sir, etc.,

"EVERYMAN'S" POLITICS."

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Your name is EVERYMAN. The meaning of your name is clear. Your mission is most clearly stated. No man can mistake it. Mr. Alfred Lishman has forty-nine numbers of you. He does not know your name. Or, he cannot comprehend its meaning. Your representative character is lost to him. You justify your name. You live up to your title. If your pages were closed to one-half of mankind you could not be EVERYMAN. If you only represented one phase of human life your name would be a misnomer. You would then be "Partisan." Although EVERYMAN may be "Partisan," "Partisan" cannot be EVERYMAN. That is why you are EVERYMAN. Some time ago a Conservative reader complained that you had too much Radico-Socialism in you. You appropriately replied that your pages were open to Everyman, and if one-half failed to take advantage of your columns it was not your fault.

If Mr. Lishman would take the trouble to look through previous numbers, he will find Liberalism and Socialism adequately represented by such stalwarts as Chesterton, Shaw, Vandervelde, and Chiozza Money.

Further, your recent Land Reform symposium was preponderantly Liberal.

After all, it is refreshing to read the views of those opposed to oneself. By slavishly sticking to one creed one gets narrow-minded and bigoted. At the outset EVERYMAN disclaimed any political mission. The reason you have attained the powerful position you enjoy is because you are the tool of no political party.

You have successfully filled a void. Believe me, there is no void in party politics. Politically you would be an excrescence. As you are you please the majority. Change, and for a time you would please an insignificant minority of bitter partisans.—I am, sir, etc.,

O. LEWIS ABBOTT,

Flixton, September 19th, 1913.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—What a sinner you are! In your issue of November 22nd last you are accused of introducing the cloven hoof of Roman Catholicism, and in the same issue another correspondent complains of your anti-Roman Catholic obsession. Again, May 23rd last, (Rev.) F. Docker threatens to warn his Protestant friends against your paper's unfair controversial tactics; then, July 25th, E. H. is sick of your articles by Mr. G. K. Chesterton. At last you are asked by Mr. Alfred Lishman if you are degenerating into Toryism, a question which he practically answers in the affirmative in the next clause of his letter—truly an awful transformation—and lo! your correspondent is numbered amongst the prophets, for he prognosticates that "if you lose the Liberals you will have few readers but Socialists." Well, for my own part, I am a Conservative, and therefore, according to A. L., one of those who "have not sufficient intelligence to appreciate you" (evidently he thinks he has); nevertheless, I have always thought I was able to do so, and many of my Conservative friends in this city maintain the same view with regard to themselves. But without a doubt Wisdom is no longer to be found at the fountain of Mimer, but lies concealed in the Liberal camp.

Respecting his gratuitous insults to the Cecils, from whence does he obtain his information that they "think all the time wasted when all their family are not deep with both hands in the national exchequer"? Was it the Cecil family or was it the Liberal party who voted themselves £400 per annum each out of the national exchequer, without the permission of the country?

To my mind, you have faithfully carried out the promise given in your message of October 10th, 1912, and all men who are not tainted with intolerance and bigotry will, I think, coincide with this opinion, and be ready to contribute their testimony to your unbiased attitude.—I am, sir, etc.,

ROBERT H. SMALLEY.

Manchester, September 19th, 1913.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I trust you are duly terrified by the dire but "rubbishy" threats of Alfred Lishman, whose wrath at reading your interview with one of our most gifted "Tory" leaders amounts almost to frenzy. He is so dogmatic, too! If one is a "Tory," one is lost! If EVERYMAN does not become a mere Radical "rag," its circulation will drop to "nil," since the Conservatives lack intelligence to appreciate its excellence! He says he has "recommended EVERYMAN to everybody"! I congratulate him on his unconscious humour, but deny his statement. I may also inform him that EVERYMAN's circulation amongst poor benighted "Tories" is very large indeed.

As to Alfred Lishman's aspersions of the Cecil

The ART that PAYS To-day

By J. HERBERT ARMSTRONG.

Ten persons out of every hundred have a natural taste for drawing. On an average, only one out of ten cultivates his or her talent, mainly through lack of self-confidence.

Given ambition and a taste for drawing, nothing can stand in the way of your success. Without ambition—the desire to live well and to do well—you are like a man who has a beautiful carriage, but no horse—you cannot go far.

The man or woman who knows how to design the kind of art work for which there is a real need—not just easel pictures that few can buy—is in an enviable position to-day.

Ordinary art schools teach how to paint pictures more or less indifferently well, but the average picture is a drug upon the market. The picture-painter can scarcely make a living.

PROSPEROUS TIMES FOR THE ARTIST.

Now, for each person who can afford to buy original pictures there are a thousand who can buy a reproduction of a clever sketch, either as a print for framing, or an attractive magazine cover.

There are countless advertisers who are only too anxious to buy designs of the kind they need. Owing to the perfection of printing processes, and the profitability of modern advertising, never were there such prosperous times for the artist who is willing to do the kind of work that's wanted.

In every daily paper one reads advertisements for designs suitable for reproduction as posters, showcards, etc. The demand for this work is far greater than the supply, because comparatively few have taken the trouble to learn the simple but essential requirements of drawing for reproduction.

THE "ART FOR ART'S SAKE" THEORY.

Hundreds of artists who starved on the "art for art's sake" theory are now prospering because they have been taught by London experts how to adapt their art to commerce, and how and where to sell it to the best advantage.

More and better posters, etc., are used every day, and they afford an interesting and lucrative whole or spare time occupation. It is a profession that is unique in its advantages, and the independence and rewards it brings.

Those who practise it can live or travel wherever they choose within reach of the postal service, for most designs are bought and sold by post.

In the same way, the postal system that enables the artist to sell his or her work also enables them to enjoy the advantage of an expert London training in their own homes.

The Practical Correspondence College (the all-British School of Art with the world-wide reputation) offers an individual training (by post) in commercial art, and absolutely guarantees your success.

It has two courses of instruction—one in designing posters, showcards, covers, and colour work generally; and one in black-and-white advertisement illustrations, etc. Both courses are personally conducted by Mr. Chas. E. Dawson, one of the most brilliant exponents and teachers of pictorial publicity in the world.

Each student receives special individual lessons and personal criticisms.

TIME AND TROUBLE-SAVING EXPEDIENTS.

The lessons are beautifully illustrated by hundreds of reproductions, many of them in colours, and the exclusive information, short cuts, and trouble-saving expedients that are embodied in the course have never before been published, and are unobtainable in any other way.

The scientific methods underlying Mr. Dawson's personal success are all fully explained in this course, which took him seven years to prepare and perfect.

He has taught hundreds of men and women in all parts of the world how to earn a living by art, and the unasked-for testimonials we receive daily from students pay ample tribute to the value of his personal help, instruction, and encouragement.

If you are ambitious to succeed in art, to increase your income, or to embrace art as a profession, it will pay you to know more about us and the methods which have won for us our world-wide connection and repute.

AMONG THE SUBJECTS TAUGHT are :

Drawing for Three-colour work and all modern methods of Reproduction, Lithography, Wood-cutting, Shadowgraphs, Composition, Modelling, Landscape and Portraiture in Colours, and bold, effective Black and White. Bookplates, Advertisements, Lettering. Establishing a connection. Commercial Correspondence. Dealing with Printers, Publishers, and Advertisers. How, when, and where to sell designs to the best advantage.

If you care to send a small specimen of your work—with a stamped and directed envelope—it will be returned to you within a few days, with Mr. Dawson's personal criticism and his candid opinion as to your chances of success in this new and well-paid field of art. We will also send you, free, a copy of our illustrated book, "Art, Fame, and Fortune," which explains the whole theory and practice of learning and selling art work by post.

family, let them pass; for the ignorance betrayed is as pitiable as the narrow bigotry displayed by the writer. But let us assume (what is, in fact, utterly untrue) that the article in question was "flagrantly partisan." What then? Must EVERYMAN refuse to admit any "partisan" article into its sphere of discussion? Surely not. "EVERYMAN, his Life, Work and Books," would be an ironical title indeed if such were its narrow policy. EVERYMAN wants to get as many "partisan" writers as possible—even Mr. Lishman, if he can write—irrespective of their creed or politics. There is a wide gulf between Lord Robert Cecil and H. M. Hyndman, Cecil Chesterton and James Adderley, Monsignor Benson and again Lord R. Cecil; yet this circle of writers, splendid "partisans" every one of them, have all made brilliant contributions to your unique and admirably impartial columns. The whole quest of wisdom depends on the maxim, "Audi alteram partem," which is evidently most obnoxious to your Maltonian correspondent, whose only care is to see his own face in the journalistic mirror—and no one else's.

EVERYMAN is a literary and cosmopolitan review, and, so far as I know (and I thank heaven for it), it has no avowed politics. But, even if it had, I would remind Alfred Lishman that the wise editor admits his opponents to his pages. If Mr. Lishman will consult statistics, he will also find that quite a number of Englishmen are "Tories," as he calls those who, perchance, dislike "Bethesda" in the schools, for instance; while history shows that Great Britain's destinies have been quite reasonably safe in the hands of such well-known degenerates as Pitt, Chatham, and Beaconsfield, besides a respectable number of Robert Cecils. So I, too, will "recommend EVERYMAN to everybody," à la mode de Lishman, whose "bugbear" I would desire to be, and faithfully yours,

THE VOLUNTARY SYSTEM.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—As a soldier I have read with great interest Earl Percy's new reading of British history in your issue of September 19th, and my first feelings were pride in belonging to a people the so-called offscourings of which have played such a splendid part in history, and in having formed part of a system which has been able to turn such unpromising material to such good account. But the article has also suggested another view of our voluntary system. If, as Earl Percy states, 80 per cent. of our recruits enlist because they are out of work and hungry—in other words, because they have fallen behind in the struggle for a livelihood under existing civil conditions—at any rate, our present system utilises this material, turning presumably bad citizens into undoubtedly good and useful soldiers. So long as sufficient numbers can thus be obtained, this would seem more economical than an indiscriminate compulsion, under which numbers of men endowed with qualities of civic value to the State would be diverted into a system which is notoriously well served by the apparent civil failures.

A point often brought against our system is that large numbers of men are annually discharged from the Army only to swell the ranks of the unemployed. No one asserts that every time-expired soldier becomes unemployed. But say 25 per cent. do; it would be instructive to know how many of the original 80 per cent. would have become steady, skilled workers. From the unflattering description given by Earl Percy, one may assume very few. Our system should be given credit not only for finding the best use for the 80 per cent. during a term of years, but also for having fitted a percentage of them to become steady and, in many cases, skilled workers on return to civil life. Conscription, with our large population and moderate military needs, could not utilise the whole of our resources, and it is quite certain that the undersized, underfed failures would be the last to be enlisted, and, being thus debarred from the one service they could render to the State, would largely swell the ranks of unskilled and erratic labour.—I am, sir, etc.,

ARMINIUS VAMBERY

MANY years ago, on the completion of a most interesting stay in the Turkish capital, I called upon an Englishman high up in the service of the Sultan (then Abdul Hamid II.) to say adieu. When I entered, my friend was deep in conversation with a somewhat remarkable looking man, in some language or other quite unknown to me. I was casually introduced without catching the name, and, in consideration of my ignorance, the language was at once changed to English, and the former topic resumed. Even then it was pretty well Greek to me, as it dealt with parties high up in office in the Ottoman Empire. I remained an interested listener, and as the conversation developed, I said to myself, "There is only one man you can be, and that is Arminius Vambery."

At that time Vambery was a frequent visitor to the Turkish capital, and had the reputation of being a confidential go-between, carrying strictly private communications from the various European powers direct to the Sultan, to whom he had private access. When I saw him he had just visited Yildiz Kiosk for some such purpose, and spoke in confidence, but somewhat freely, of his friend the Sultan.

Not even the renowned Von Moltke could compare with Vambery in his linguistic knowledge, and the latter had none of the taciturnity and solemn silence of the great Prussian Field Marshal. By the age of sixteen he knew Hungarian, Latin, French and German, English, Russian, Servian, and other Slavonic tongues; also the three Scandinavian languages were acquired before (at the age of twenty) he went, with some knowledge of Turkish, to Constantinople. In that, probably the most polyglot of all capitals, where Europe and Asia almost meet, he learnt in six years some twenty Oriental languages and dialects.

In 1902, finding myself in Budapest with a friend, I suggested a call upon the famous Professor of Oriental languages. After climbing up three flights of stairs in a back block of flats, we found ourselves in a modest plain reception-room, where we had a courteous and hospitable welcome. In reply to my enquiry, "Have you been recently to visit your friend on the Bosphorus?" our host said, "I go no longer to Yildiz Kiosk. I have seen too much! With my own eyes there have I seen men led out to instant execution. I value what is left of my life too greatly to trust myself in the power of so capricious a tyrant."

The conversation turned on England and English politics. Queen Victoria was not long dead, King Edward VII. not long crowned. He had known both intimately, and spoke freely of them. "Your late Queen was a great and noble woman," he said. The fact in her career that impressed him most was that when over seventy she had begun the study, with the aid of a munshi, of Hindustani, in order that she could herself write to and speak to her Indian subjects.

"Your King, too, King Edward, is a real good man," said he. "Do you know that he has, when Prince of Wales, come alone here to visit me, climbed those three long stairs to my humble abode, and sat on an ottoman drinking his cup of tea, and chatting to me just as you are doing now?"

JOHN MCEWAN.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

THE UNFORGIVING MINUTE, by Irene Burn (Fisher Unwin, 6s.), is a story of India. In this book the author tries to catch that glamour of the East that so few writers have succeeded in introducing. Mrs. Flora Annie Steel, in that beautiful love idyll, "The Hosts of the Lord," has painted the passion of India, the tragedy that lies beneath the imperial purple and flaming gold of its panoply with rare and consummate art, but with that exception we can recall no modern writer who has been able to transport us to the country of subtle and enervating charm with such complete success. The attempt in the novel under consideration falls hopelessly below the mark. There is an insistence on phrases; we are perpetually reading that "the snow shone out in a splendour for which the English language has made no due provision," and, as is usual in a novel of this type, the "rains commence" and "the rains cease" with monotonous regularity. The characterisation is conventional, and the military element is painfully suggestive of the melodrama popular some decades ago, in which the hero, when not engaged in rescuing defenceless women from savage hordes of bloodthirsty natives, is protecting a dangerous pass in the mountains against overwhelming odds. We are also treated to bursts of eloquence on that out-worn theme "the white man's burden"; we learn that there are queer things tucked away in it, "dirt and insects, fever, plague, cholera, starvation. And when he faints beneath it few in England know or care. But while strength lasts his feet do not falter, he presses onward to some dim goal far off: he may reach it or not; meanwhile, he is playing the game, while the Radical member of Parliament talks—talks." Why the author should suppose that Radicals alone express their views through the medium of speech we do not understand. We can assure her that "talk" is not confined to that particular political section, and that quite a number of Tories, Labour members, and Socialists have a great deal to say on India and other matters.

Mr. Eden Phillpotts has published a volume of short stories entitled THE OLD TIME BEFORE THEM (John Murray, 6s.). He takes us once more to Dartmoor, the setting for most of his work, and we feel again the witchery of the land, and the influence it holds for the men and women who dwell within the shadow of the moor. Mr. Phillpotts shares with Mr. Thomas Hardy the capacity for creating peasants of a racy, almost Shakespearian, humour, and it is notable that the inimitable rustics he creates belong to a generation well within the memory of man. Some of them, indeed, are of the present-day—witness the inimitable Billie Bles, one of the most delightful actors in that clever story "The Children of the Mist." The present volume is a collection of tales told around the hospitable hearth of an old inn. "'The Plume of Feathers,' or 'Just the Plume,' as we most often call it, lies down to Widecombe in Dartmoor; 'tis a terrible ancient place, and a good few of us old chaps spend our evenings there." "For Valour" is one of the cleverest sketches in the book. It is the tale of a man who has cowardice so deeply ingrained in his soul that at the very sight of combat his blood turns to water; but at the same time he is haunted with passionate desire to be a hero. "'Tis a terrible queer trick of nature as makes a man always hanker for the gift denied him," declared Butt. "If us had money, us wants health; if us have our health, we cry out for money; the farmer would like for to be a sojer; the sailor longs for the plough; the parlourmaid longs for the cooking; the cook wants to go in a bar." This happened to be the case with Andrew Blackaller, who desires to play the hero with a strength equalled only by his cowardice. Andrew, journeying across the moor, is robbed by a tramp, who "grabbed his purse, and gave him a sharp shove that pushed him backwards out of his trap." He shrieked for help—your coward has always good lungs—and, as luck would have it, Policeman Joel Ford heard his cries and stopped the tramp in his adventurous career. "The rogue was a big, heavy man, and Ford, though tall, was a light weight, thin as an adder, and no match for the sturdy villain he stopped." Joel, however, does not give in, and puts up a very good fight, until the rogue fetches him a crashing blow which stretches him upon the ground. Meanwhile, Andy "crept nearer in fear and trembling, only to see the policeman getting the worst of it. . . . Like a leaf he shook, and in a voice quavering in the wind he bleated loud and long for help." And then with inimitable art the author brings another character upon the scene—one, Sally Champion, who, possessing all the courage Andrew lacks, throws herself into the fray, "and hitting a swinging crack in the jaw as would have felled a sheep at the least. No open fingers like a female, mind you, but a good clenched fist, and all her shoulder weight behind the hit. Her arms were like iron along of her wall-building, and afore the thief could get up and go for her, she hit him again." At the conclusion of the combat the rogue is taken prisoner through the prowess of Sally, and Blackaller receives back his purse. He saves the policeman's hurts with a matter of £5, and finds solace for his own cowardice in Sally's courage. Convinced that she will be a proper mother for any man's children, he takes her to wife. "She was a female and a proper brave one, and that was all he cared about; and he longed to have her in his house as the crown of the establishment." The book is instinct with quaint humour and occasional sharp dramatic effects. Its style is admirable; indeed, Mr. Phillpotts could not, we think, achieve anything that was not polished in phrase. The book is a complement to that inimitable volume, "Widecombe Fair."

Messrs. Fisher Unwin have given us two interesting volumes of the EARLY CORRESPONDENCE OF LORD JOHN RUSSELL, 1805-1840, edited by his son, Rollo Russell. The whole key-note to the life of this great reformer lies in the declaration of equality which he made in 1831 when bringing forward his great Reform Bill: "You must show that you are determined not to be the representatives of a small class, or of a particular interest, but to form a body who, representing the people and sympathising with the people, can fairly call on the people to support the future burdens of the country, and to struggle with the future difficulties it may have to encounter." It is in the light of this declaration that we must view all his efforts at enfranchisement, his desire for justice to Dissenters, his interest in Catholic emancipation, and his broadminded policy towards the Jews. In a word, he believed in equality, and his means to gain that end were "the abolition of unfair privileges, oppressive taxation, corrupt practices, . . . and the extension of liberty, wealth, education, and peace."

The two volumes before us are, perhaps, a trifle disappointing, in view of the great achievements, the world-wide interests, and the compelling personality of Lord John Russell. In the first place, a considerable proportion of the letters are written to Russell, and shed no light on the character of the recipient, but are merely of general historical interest; and, again, to anyone who knows the speeches of Russell, the letters given in these volumes seem of very secondary importance as a revelation of the personality and ideals of the man. But as a contribution to the history of the Great Reform Period in English history, the book has undoubtedly its value, and we are grateful for the able summary of the early life of the reformer, which occupies the first hundred pages of volume one.

Of late years there has been an extraordinary increase in the publication of Memoirs, Diaries, and semi-historical works of all kinds. The movement is, on the whole, beneficial, enabling the reader to gauge, in some degree, contemporaneous opinion of the events and characters of history. But it has its obvious dangers, and the editor of such a work ought to be unsparing with his blue pencil. In the preface to Fisher Unwin's new publication, SOCIETY, POLITICS AND DIPLOMACY, 1820-1864, PASSAGES FROM THE JOURNAL OF F. W. H. CAVENDISH (15s.), we find, "I trust these memoirs will not be found by readers to be wholly devoid of interest or amusement." The humility of the editor ought, perhaps, to forestall criticism, and we can assure him that we were not wholly bored; but the justification for publishing a book of this sort ought, we feel, to be slightly less negative in character. Many of the comments of Mr. Cavendish are extraordinarily futile, when seen in the cold light of print. "We visited the Royal Apartments, which are very fine, but the silver-gilt plate exhibited greatly required cleaning." "The neighbourhood of Leipzig is famous for larks, of which we had plenty for breakfast and dinner," and endless statements as to the parties and Royal functions at which he was present. On the other hand, there are passages of some importance, especially in the latter half of the book. Evidently France and French diplomatic manoeuvres were prominent among the diarist's interests; the pages dealing with the French Revolution of 1846, the marriage of Napoleon III., and the Crimean War deserve attention. We should, however, have lost but little if the book had been condensed to half its present size. A ruthless use of the blue pencil is one of the chief duties of an editor.

Mr. W. L. Courtney has given us a clever study of a certain type of woman. THE SOUL OF A SUFFRAGETTE (Chapman and Hall, 6s.) paints Una Blockley and all for which she stands with amazing reality. We have all of us known her, the woman of five-and-thirty who has chanced on the dull side of things, who accepts life as a duty rather than as a joy, and feels in an unconscious fashion that in some inscrutable way she has been wronged. And then there comes to her a vision of the delectable mountains: "She was set on fire with the ideal championship, a cause, a wonderful new gospel of femininity, something which would redress the uneven balance and bring greater justice and fairer dealing in the world"; and as she listened her burdens seemed to fall from her. She thought she was of consequence, that there was something for her to do; work that mattered, not the dull routine that grinds on as a machine from day to day. Everything would be put right in the best of all possible worlds once women were given the vote, and, fired with the exultation of a devotee, Una throws herself heart and soul into the cause. The spirit is brave and willing, but at first the flesh shrinks from the ordeal. She finds great difficulty in screwing up her courage to a striking point when it comes to breaking the window of a harmless little jeweller, and almost runs away with the deed undone. The last moment of resolution comes to her, and she smashes a pane of glass, and finds herself surrounded by an indignant crowd, who show signs of hostility. She is rescued from the mêlée by a stranger, who takes her home and establishes a footing with the family. Friendship ripens into affection, and at first one hopes that Una will abandon militancy and decline on marriage. The crown of martyrdom, however, proves too strong an attraction. She breaks with her lover and accepts a call for active service. She is deputed to throw a bomb into a Cabinet Minister's house, the said house being empty save for two caretakers and a cat. The explosion is very ineffective and the damage inconsiderable. Una, however, is arrested and sent to prison, where she practised the hunger strike, suffered unendurable agonies of mind and body, and came out of gaol with nothing to look forward to "except the pitiful career of the chronic invalid." She is left with the dying fires of her enthusiasm for comfort, and prison life as a reflection. She might have been a happy wife and mother, but her call to militancy came at a time of dull things. Other stories in the volume show the same qualities of insight, and are written with the polished style and distinction that individualise Mr. Courtney's work.

The author of the "Rosary" has written a new book, which will doubtless be as popular with her readers as her previous efforts. THE BROKEN HALO (Putnam, 6s.) serves up the same set of sentiments that served for the "Rosary" and other of her most popular novels. The hero of the story is Dick Cameron, and his halo is his belief. He meets with a variety of sentimental adventures on his pilgrimage, loses his heart to a somewhat anæmic if fascinating syren whom he christens the "little white lady." She suffers from heart disease, and it is Dick's mission as a medical man to appear at the critical moment with a powerful restorative. There is also a vicar who is called "the fallen idol," behaves in a melodramatic fashion, but in keeping with his title, and a long-suffering and devoted servant of the name of Ellen, who waits on the little white lady hand and foot. Dr. Dick marries the syren, not, we regret to say, for her fascinations, but by reason of her money. After the ceremony he grows to care for her very deeply, and his halo, rather the worse for wear, reappears. Not, however, until his wife dies is it restored in its entirety. The author closes the story with the sug-

The following extract is from the London "Daily Express," dated June 12th, 1913.

RECORD BOOM IN CANADA.

GREAT FORTUNES MADE BY LAND OPERATORS.

£100,000 FOR £5.

"Express" Correspondent.

Montreal, May 31.

A block of land in Edmonton, Alberta, changed hands a few days ago for £100,000; twenty-one years ago the same block was sold for £5. These figures tell the story of a Canadian real estate boom without a parallel on the American Continent, and probably without an equal anywhere.

There is scarcely a clerk, shopkeeper, or wage-earner of any kind who has not feverishly invested his savings in a piece of land, hoping for a quick "turnover." It is estimated that in Winnipeg alone there are dozens of men who have made fortunes owing simply to the enormous rise in values due to the boom.

One man bought a lot in Winnipeg for £200 a few years ago; last summer he sold it for £1,000.

"The Daily Telegraph," 15th July, 1913, under the heading AMERICAN TARIFFS, quotes the Governor of Massachusetts:

"All over the United States the tendency among the principal manufacturing interests is towards the establishing of plants in Canada. This movement has been going on for many years, and it is estimated that from £60,000,000 to £100,000,000 of American capital is now invested in these Canadian plants."

This has happened in Medicine Hat. The development is so enormous that HUNDREDS OF PEOPLE are living in Tents. The houses cannot be built fast enough.

gestion that Dick may find consolation in marriage with Margaret, the wife of the fallen idol; in other words, the rector of the parish.

WHEN LOVE CALLS (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.) is a melodramatic story of adventure and crime, and as such it must be judged. It has no claims to delicate characterisation, and its psychology is often in thought. But it is written with a verve and go that carry the reader along, and though we may stop to criticise the probability of the wonderful incidents that occur at intervals in the course of its development we are sufficiently intrigued to continue reading. It is written in the first person, and Mr. A. W. Marchmont has used the form to advantage in working out certain aspects of the mystery. The love interest is subsidiary, but of sufficient vividness to give opportunities for several daintily written scenes. We confidently recommend the book to those who like somewhat startling plots and a story of action.

Sir William Magnay has published some adventurous stories in novel form, and has written several successful serials. THE PLAYERS (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.) is a new departure, in which the author definitely scores. The book is written with a lighter touch and sense of humour lacking in his previous novels, and the characterisation is careful and convincing. Mr. Pomfret, "millionaire and former proprietor of the world-renowned establishment known as Samuel Pomfret and Co., is distinctly a creation. He finds an insuperable difficulty in enunciating his h's, and flies to Mr. Mowbray Gore, Professor of Elocution, for remedy in this deficiency. "Damn the letter H!" said Mr. Pomfret. "Don't," objected his tutor, speaking from the height of perfect—perhaps too perfect—elocution, and with an easy command of the baffling consonant; "it is the most elegant letter in the alphabet. What would the English language be without it?"

"None the worse as I can see," returned his pupil with impatience. "I got on very well without it for fifty years, and made a million of money. The letter Haitch—"

"Aitch," murmured the professor.

"Aitch would never have helped me to 2s. 6d. more."

The struggles of Mr. Pomfret to fit himself for polite society and for Parliament make excellent reading, and the author is to be congratulated on his latest book.

MY WIFE'S HIDDEN LIFE (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.) does not bear the name of the author. It is perhaps as well, for his own sake, that the book is anonymous, as there is very little in it which one can praise. It is written in the first person, and is supposed to be the revelations of a husband concerning his wife, whom he feels he never really knew. The husband is a vain person of commonplace ambition and views, and the style in which the book is written fits the picture. He describes himself just: "I was five feet seven inches in height, and had the well-knit figure of a man who relieves sedentary by active outdoor life in his leisure. My face was irregularly featured, and though the fashion for clean shaving had just come into vogue my mouth and chin did not suffer thereby. I went to bed satisfied on the whole with my looks, which had hitherto not caused me much concern." We wish that the revelations of the wife's hidden feeling had contained her opinion of the attractions which caused her husband such complacency. There is much padding in this volume, and what little story there is lies hidden under a mountain of praises. On the whole, it is a tiresome book, and the psychology of the misunderstood wife is overshadowed by the vapourings of the pretentious husband.

Mrs. Alfred Praga has written a bright and readable book. LOVE AND £200 A YEAR (Werner Laurie, 2s. net) explains the mysteries of housekeeping on a small scale, and estimates the proportion of income that should be spent on table-cloths, huckaback towels, glass-cloths, etc. The advice is sugared by occasional departures into story land, and the adventures of the young couple who set up house on the princely income of £200 a year are told with a certain vivacity and charm. Excellent recipes are scattered through the volume, and Cynthia is made to perform feats of domestic economy, and to produce an excellent dinner at a phenomenally small cost.

The October issue of "Rosenblum's Anglo-French Journal" is an exceptionally good number. This unique periodical, published by Rosenblum's Language Institute, 26, High Holborn, is designed to help English-speaking people read French without that perpetual and tiresome reference to a dictionary which makes the study of a foreign language so wearisome a task. Extracts from the best French authors are included in each number, as well as topical articles relating to French politics and the affairs of everyday life. Commercial correspondence is a special feature, and a course of practical French grammar is included. The journal is as useful to the veriest beginner as the more advanced student, as the translations are graduated according to the capacity of the reader, some articles being rendered in idiomatic French, while others are translated word by word, so that those but just commencing can follow very easily. Practical and useful, the journal is invaluable to all those who desire to attain a working knowledge of the French language. A specimen copy will be sent on application to the publishers, price 1½d.

Foolscap 8vo, 1s. net.

THE FIRST 6 VOLUMES.

BALZAC. CONTES PHILOSOPHIQUES. Introduction by PAUL BOURGET.

M. Paul Bourget, who provides the introduction to this volume, sets out to locate the exact place that "Les Contes Philosophiques" occupies in Balzacian work. With his usual penetration and finished analysis, he defines the precise point at which Balzac combines the art of narration with the talents of the romance writer.

L'IMITATION DE JESUS CHRIST. Introduction by Monseigneur R. H. BENSON.

"L'Imitation" is the chief work of French Mystic Literature, and an incomparable companion to religious contemplation. The present edition is enriched by an introduction by Monseigneur Robert Hugh Benson, than whom no one is better qualified to present this work to European readers.

ALFRED DE MUSSET. POEMS.

If Alfred de Musset is not the greatest poet of French Literature, he certainly is the most loved of all recent poets. By the simplicity of his style, and his excellent sense of proportion, Musset remains classic for all time. As long as the French language is spoken, "Rolla," "La Lettre à Lamartine," the "Stances à la Malibran," the "Nuits," "L'Espoir en Dieu," will be in everybody's memory and in everybody's heart.

PENSÉES DE PASCAL. From the Brunschvigg Text. Preface by EMILE BOUTROUX. Introduction by VICTOR GIRAUD.

The text in this edition is reproduced, by permission, from that of the Brunschvigg edition. To this admirable text has been added an illuminating preface by Emile Boutroux, and a not less impressive introduction by Victor Giraud; thus it will be seen this volume represents the co-operation of the three most eminent Pascalians in France.

LA PRINCESSE DE CLEVES. By Madame DE LA FAYETTE. Introduction by Madame Lucie Félix Faure-Goyau.

When this volume first appeared in Paris, in 1678, it was immediately attributed to Rochefoucauld, but was ultimately found to be the work of his friend Madame de la Fayette. It was primarily intended as a record of the courtship of Anne of Austria and the young Louis XIV., but in addition to its historical import the work has considerable interest as a psychological study.

GUSTAVE FLAUBERT. La Tentation de Saint Antoine. Introduction by EMILE FAGUET.

"La Tentation de Saint Antoine" possesses all those qualities which have been the means of placing Flaubert high in the front rank of French fiction writers. Possessing a language, vigorous, splendid and harmonious, he exercises that supreme detachment of the artist by which he is afforded an almost unlimited survey of the object which he desires to place in the mind of his readers.

HISTORY IN THE MAKING
NOTES OF THE WEEK.

UNDOUBTEDLY the most important event of the week has been the offer by Ulster to withdraw opposition to the Home Rule Bill—on terms. Following immediately on the "reviews" and demonstrations presided over by Sir Edward Carson, and almost coinciding with the "Island conference" of Ministers, it may well be that the offer marks an epoch in the history of the Irish question. According to the Daily Mail, Ulster is prepared to let the Bill go through provided that the north-east corner is left out of the measure, and that the inhabitants, Nationalist and Orangemen alike, are under the sway of the Imperial Parliament. It remains to be seen whether this proposal will be acceptable to the Irish leader. Last Session Mr. Redmond dismissed it in the historic phrase of Parnell, "We cannot spare a single Irishman." It remains to be seen whether that view has been modified by subsequent events. If so, we are in a fair way towards settlement by consent. But will that settlement stand the test of time?

Unusual interest is likely to attach to the proceedings of the Church Congress, which was opened on Wednesday by the Primate. It is practically certain that at no distant date legislation in regard to further facilities for divorce will be introduced to Parliament, and it is anticipated in certain quarters that not only will the position of the Church be reaffirmed, but a strong appeal made to Nonconformists to join in an effort against the proposals which, it is believed, will emerge from the Royal Commission on the subject.

We have not had long to wait for the first beneficial results of the new American tariff. Already English trade is benefiting. According to the editor of the Ironmonger, millions of pounds' worth of goods are now lying in bond in the United States ports waiting the signing of the Bill. Among these are quantities of iron and steel articles manufactured in this country. Many English firms are appointing representatives in the United States, and the Midlands anticipate quite a boom in many of their industries. The removal of the 10 per cent. duty on boots and shoes will, of course, make a considerable difference to our export boot trade.

Although it attracted far less attention than it deserved, the Conference of Class Teachers, held last week at Portsmouth, was remarkable for the vigour with which it tackled questions of profound importance alike to teachers and pupils. The President denounced unsparingly the wasteful and depressing system under which a teacher is put to instruct large, unwieldy classes, so numerous that they are quite beyond the power of any one human being to manage. He also touched with real feeling on the cruelty of subjecting a starving child to the strain of tuition, and pleaded for further feeding facilities. There can be no question that, until these and other basic reforms are initiated, much of the money spent on public education is so much waste.

A decision of no little interest to the travelling public was given in the City of London Court this week, when Mr. Herman Cohen, a barrister, sued the London, Brighton and South Coast Railway for the return of excess fare paid under protest. Mr. Cohen was travelling back to London from Brighton with a week-end ticket on Saturday when he was compelled to pay the excess fare. The solicitor for the company insisted that the conditions attaching to the purchase of the ticket were clearly printed thereon, but the Registrar held that a passenger was not bound to read them. The effect of this decision, if upheld on appeal, is likely to be little less than revolutionary as regards excursionists and "trippers."

Yet another fall in the birth rate. The Registrar-General's return, issued a few days ago, is distinctly disquieting, and, coupled with the increase in the emigration figures, gives furiously to think. Last year nearly 400,000 people left these shores, and the flood of emigration is not yet on the ebb. A contemporary points out that one result of this exodus from England is that in the hosiery trade employers cannot obtain sufficient labour, although wages have risen considerably. That, of course, is not an unmixed evil, but certain it is that there is something at once pathetic and ironical in the spectacle afforded by a nation whose labourers are leaving by the shipload and whose land is going out of cultivation.

News comes from America of a remarkable educational experiment which has been initiated at the Bryn Mawr Girls' School—"the Girton," as it is described by a contemporary, "of the States." An open-air school has been built in the grounds consisting chiefly of a roof with glass sides. Fires are not to be permitted, and the girls must in winter keep warm by wearing Eskimo suits of fur. It is a theory of the head mistress, Miss Carey Thomas, that an open-air life builds up the physique and constitution of a girl as nothing else does, and she claims that her plan will be found to evolve the finest types of womanhood. We shall see.

THE MAN AND HIS WORK

XII.—THE ANGLICAN CLERGYMAN ❖ ❖ PRIZE ESSAY BY THE REV. S. C. CARPENTER

I.

THE English people are sadly the slaves of their terminology. But, on the other hand, the English mind is so far logical that the terminology is sure to have some relation to the facts. In this case the relation is historical. The label describes the ancestors of the existing facts; it accurately indicates what the bottle once contained. The humiliating circumstance that the ministers of the Church of England are known by the dull and clumsy name of clergymen is due to the fact that they used to be dull and clumsy people.

II.

Two centuries ago the Vicar of Wakefield was a good specimen of the parish priest, and even Jane Austen's Mr. Henry Tilney was by no means below the average. The Evangelical Revival, which raised so many levels, awakened a considerable section of the clergy, but did not permeate the whole body. The reason was partly because the Bishops contrived to push off most of it into Dissent, and partly because a certain intolerance and some unpleasing mannerisms aroused in those who had not fallen under its spell, not merely theological disagreement, but moral distaste. Much ground remained unbroken.

When Newman appealed to his "brethren in the Sacred Ministry" to "magnify their office," and hailed the Bishops, to their intense amazement, as "our Holy Fathers, the representatives of the Apostles, and the Angels of the Churches," his words fell on doubtful ears. The Bishops were incredulous. "I pray thee, of whom speaketh the prophet this? Of ourselves or of some other men?" The inferior clergy had likewise lost their spiritual self-respect, and mildly deprecated the sacerdotal franchise claimed in their behalf. But in twelve years the movement spread through the ministry, and when, in 1845, came the great débauché, it went on at another less learned, more popular, and, incidentally, less clerical level in places like London, Brighton, Leeds, and Frome. The ritualistic slum-parson is now a familiar and popular type.

Side by side with the Oxford Movement there was another two-fold wave of reformation. In both its aspects it was largely the creation of that great soul, Frederick Maurice. As a Liberal, Maurice, with the help of Tennyson, the Broad Church poet, was a great power with the laity fifty years ago. In some mysterious way the modern clergyman, in spite of not having read Maurice and of having (rightly) substituted Browning for Tennyson, has slowly and cautiously imbibed much of the more positive part of Maurice's teaching. Although more orthodox, he is commonly more liberal than the layman.

In the other direction the Maurician influence has been even greater. The ideals of the Christian Social Union are now largely the ideals of the clergy. It is not a question of politics. In politics they are divided. The country clergy, like most countrymen, who do not happen to be Nonconformists, are Conservative. The town parson is often Radical, sometimes Socialist. But parsons everywhere have learned to care for the material welfare of the people. They are reformers, workers, enthusiasts, and sometimes experts, on Housing, Wages, Temperance, and the like. And it is all the fruit of their faith. Their interest in the condition of the sons of men springs from their belief in the Son of Man. Their allegiance to Christ makes them care for the observance not only of Sunday, but of Saturday afternoon.

Thus the influences of Wesley, Newman, and Maurice, the three great Church reformers of the last two centuries, have created the modern clergyman. No one can ever hope to understand anything in England, least of all the clergy, until he appreciates tradition.

III.

It cannot be said that the mediæval tribute, clerus Anglicanus, stupor mundi, which indicated, apparently, a degree of erudition at which creation itself was justly staggered, is applicable to present circumstances. In the matter of learning the clergy, as in other things, contrive nowadays to avoid either of the two extremes. They may still be classed among educated, but not, as a rule, among well-educated, men. Their Public School career gave them three things—a strong but unequal sense of honour, a glowing but attenuated patriotism, and a conviction that the Greek of the New Testament was less than classical. Their University education must be divided into official and unofficial. The unofficial part of it gave them a sense of Churchmanship and a faculty for asking questions; the official part, if they were fortunate, a good introduction to Biblical criticism and to Theology as far as A.D. 461. Their Theological College did not last long enough to teach Theology to those who came straight from a Classical or Mathematical or Poll Degree, but it gave them a point of view, and in another respect it was invaluable.

It was invaluable for its devotional training. Its educational efficiency was impaired through shortness of time, inequality of previous training, and the necessity of preparing for examination, but it taught them what the jovial but not very democratic life of the University had failed to teach them—that Christians were joyous brothers and that prayer was a reality. It was not only the encouragement and example of "Princeps," "Vice," or "Chapper," but the devotion of the other men. If other men, of like passions, with the same Norfolk jackets and turned-up flannel trousers as themselves, could spend half an hour daily in meditation, keep a strict rule of life, and still be men of games and Homeric laughter, why could not they? It was the Theological College which converted them. That is why Cuddesdon means more to some of them than Trinity. It had a more intimate effect upon their life. The parish priest is often so absorbed in parochial, and sometimes non-clerical, duties that he abandons some of his primitive practice. His theology is often terribly behind-hand, and his devotions do not maintain the orderliness of that golden year; but until he loses all remembrance of the life so gently yet so faithfully presided over by a Drury, a Burrows, a Johnston, or a Randolph, his ideal will be to be a man of God.

IV.

The other part of his equipment, the knowledge of men, is much better than is commonly supposed. For business, in the sense of actual finance, he has, with notable exceptions, little aptitude. He is sometimes lazy and careless over this, and sometimes it is a grievous duty, conscientiously discharged. But in human affairs he has a wisdom all his own. His desire to have relations with all the people in the parish, and his inveterate, excellent habit of making plans for the benefit of everybody he knows, have given him deep insight into human nature. Those whom circumstances—or a supposed capacity—have made the recipients of many secrets have only themselves to blame for lack of wisdom. For the springs of human conduct have been laid bare to them, and they can always digest and co-ordinate their knowledge into wisdom on their knees.

In the modern wave of appreciation of the value of education the parson has been a leader. Modern democracy, or the sense of the value of the ordinary person, has been much aided by his patient work. In the discovery of the supreme worth to the community, firstly, of children, secondly, and only in part consequently, of women, he has been a pioneer. His democracy is not always quite disinterested; he is human, and cannot altogether escape from the desire of increasing the numbers of his congregation, his Bible-class, his C.L.B., but, on the whole, he is much more disinterested than the political electioneer. Why? Because to his natural selfishness and love of power he has added, by the grace of God, a true love of souls, that is, characters, and a true zeal for their perfection. In spite of his parochial outlook and his limited sympathies, he is a servant of men. That he has a point of view, that he faces his public when he ministers the Word or Sacraments or gives them personal advice, that he is, in fact, a sacerdotalist, is an unmixed good; it is the essence of professional efficiency.

V.

The real complaint that can be made about the clergy is that they are not professional enough. It is not that they do not work. They get up earlier in the morning than most men of the class they are supposed to belong to. They constantly have evening work which keeps them out till ten. Few of them are idle. And this though their work is not done in an office under supervision, and their earnings do not depend on their activity. But they do not organise their labours or economise their time and strength. Their sermons, much more sincere than the speeches of politicians, are much less effective, because they have not taken time to think out their topic and to put it in the most persuasive way. Some of them read badly; some sing out of tune. Of some country clergy the remark once made, no matter where, is true: "The parsons round here are very good fellows, but not very spiritual." Of some town parsons it is true that they cover their parish with a network of organisation, and have no time to get to know their people. Others are too anxious to be breezy; they are always shaking hands and cracking jokes with their parishioners, and they forget to be ambassadors of God. Others are too polite in sick-rooms, and consider the feelings of the relations rather than the sick man's soul. Others, again, are too tactful—so eager to be thought broad-minded and unshockable that the counsel of God remains unspoken and their presence has not its consecrating effect. But, on the whole, they perform, without much glory and without any great reward, an invaluable service to the community. If they only paid a little closer attention to business, and cared a little less what critics, genial or sardonic, said about them; if, in a word, they believed their own religion just a trifle more, they would be irresistible, an army terrible with banners.

For they have many natural advantages. The Bishop with his season ticket and his pleasant smile, the Dean with his scholarly features and his old-world courtesy, are an attractive pair. The Canons are said to disagree in Chapter, but Cathedral Chapters contain a good proportion of the brains of the Church, and they represent a spiritual force. The Rural Deans—not least the most remotely rural—are invariably gentlemen. The Vicar is liked because he is a kind, hard-working man, living in the sort of house and on the sort of scale that people like to see. His wife is a heroic soul, much too severely criticised. She is expected to do two people's work, and does it very well. And she would like—of course she would!—to be better dressed, but "the children are so frightfully expensive, and one has to do some entertaining." So she makes the Great Renunciation. The curates, "poor men, furnished with equanimity, living noisily in clergy-houses," are known to be what they would themselves describe as "keen."

To sum up, it may be said that the modern incumbent is neither proud nor greedy nor unduly rich. And if the modern curate is still pale it is not because he is a prig. The Anglican clergyman could face a Referendum with some confidence. And I think that most of his parishioners will speak up for him at the Day of Judgment.

RESULT OF "EVERYMAN" ESSAY COMPETITION

EVERYMAN'S Prize of THREE GUINEAS for the best Essay on THE ANGLICAN CLERGYMAN has been awarded to the writer of the above paper,

The Rev. S. C. CARPENTER,
Selwyn College, Cambridge.

Most of the Essays sent in on this subject were middling good; none were brilliant; all were respectable. Mr. A. C. Martin Cross, London, in a clever Essay, confined himself exclusively to the financial side of the Anglican clergyman's calling—a side which, strangely enough, the prize-winner—practically alone among the competitors—leaves untouched. "Beta's" paper might have gained the prize had it shown less sign of hasty composition and adhered more strictly to the word-limit prescribed. Another particularly good contribution came from Broadstairs; the writer does not wish his name disclosed.

Commendable Essays were also received from the following:—F. M. Ellis, Bournemouth; F. England, Airdrie; Rev. A. Foulkes, Steventon Vicarage, Berks; Rev. Bernard M. Hancock, Woking; Rev. A. J. Humphreys, Accrington; Rev. E. K. Venner, Chelmsford; Rev. H. A. Wilson, Kingston-on-Thames. Fewer ladies than might have been expected engaged in this competition; good Essays, however, were written by Mrs. E. M. Hardy, Rochford, and "A Parson's Wife," Liverpool.

This is the last of the series of six competitions organised with a view to furthering Everyman's knowledge of the concrete conditions of life in representative professions and industries. In every case the vast majority of the Essays came from men actually belonging to the profession or engaged in the industry under discussion. As one competitor writes:

"The discovery of new worlds has always been a specially absorbing occupation. Every trade and profession has a 'world' of its own. This is true of such industries as the growing of tea or strawberries, no less than of such professions as the stage or the bar. But each of these 'worlds' is more or less an unknown continent to those without. It is therefore a most happy thought of EVERYMAN to get the inhabitants of each 'world' at least to know of the other 'worlds.' It will also be of the utmost practical value, when we remember that though each sphere of work is a 'world' of its own, it is not a 'world' by itself."

Besides helping to make Everyman better known to himself, this series of competitions has given repeated and most gratifying evidence of the number and variety of homes where EVERYMAN is welcome.

THE RUSSIAN POLICE AND THE PRESS

BY GEORGE RAFFALOVITCH.

IN the House of Commons this year, at the time when a somewhat fictitious agitation was going on in a section of the Press about the treatment of political prisoners in Portugal, Mr. King asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs "whether he would inquire of our Ambassador in St. Petersburg as to the alleged treatment of political prisoners in Russia; whether, as indicated by interpellations in the Duma, political prisoners were flogged, loaded with chains, and kept many days in the punishment cell; and whether, in view of the bad effect on public opinion of these allegations being allowed to go without denial, he would urge the British Ambassador in St. Petersburg to bring this matter before the Russian Government without delay."

Mr. Acland, who replied, said: "I have no knowledge of the allegations in question. The hon. member asks me to make proceedings in the Duma relating to internal affairs the subject of diplomatic representations; if so, we must admit from foreign Governments representations founded upon questions put in the House of Commons about our internal affairs—a proceeding that no British Government would submit to."

Yet, in April, in reply to a somewhat similar question relating to political prisoners in Portugal, Sir Edward Grey had declared that "abuses must have a very unfavourable effect upon public opinion and sympathies."

Many a time has the prison system of Russia been investigated by people interested in the matter, professors of sociology, doctors, clergymen, and others. Roughly speaking, it can be said that the "criminal prisoner" is not worse treated than in other countries, better indeed than in many. The "political" prisoner is, on the other hand, dealt with in a manner that is altogether peculiar to Muscovite methods. This is not so much a question of justice, although Heaven knows the Muscovite idea of justice is amazing enough to the English mind, as it is one of the enormous power of the police. When I say police, I mean one of the three or four bodies which are comprised in that name, and which work in different channels. Whenever they clash, and that is not seldom, they do not clash at one another's expense, but at that of the taxpayer and their quarry.

People are wont to speak of the Russian bureaucracy as of an all-powerful body ruling the country, but that is not quite the case. There are 435,000 bureaucrats; only 91,000 of them receive more than 1,000 roubles (£104) a year. This alone shows that the evil of the Russian system of Government cannot be attributed altogether to the bureaucracy. It is the police that do the harm; I will even say more: it is the police that rule the country.

Not that the police are better paid. If they were we should not witness every day their intolerable abuse of power. Every householder and shopkeeper takes as a matter of course the periodical visits of the petty police officials who go from house to house, from shop to shop, claiming their "graft." As M. Alexinsky remarks in his book, "Modern Russia": "The higher officials do not take that trouble, their graft is sent to their homes."

If this were all, and one had merely to pay one's footing, so to speak, it might be a laughable matter, but the police have many other strings to their bow. It is seldom that a day passes without some abuse of power on their part being commented on. They control public meetings. We need go back no further than July 14th, 1913 (on the very day when the French nation commemorates its freedom); the Chairman of the Congress of Commercial Employees received a list of subjects which, he was informed, the chief of police had forbidden to be discussed either at the general or at sectional meetings of the Congress. The list of topics was as follows:—

1. General social disorganisation and the struggle against it.
2. The participation of the democracy in the organs of self-government.
3. The history of the development and the essential facts of unemployment.
4. Cultural work among Jewish employees.
5. The influence of the strike of 1905 on the actual and legal position of waiters, and the destructive influence of Reaction on the rights of the waiters' society.
6. The vicissitudes of the project of the Ministry of Trade in its various stages.
7. The legal disabilities of the proletariat.
8. The legal position of Jewish employees.

No meeting of any description can be summoned without permission of the police—not even an annual meeting of a small joint-stock company. But, even when sanctioned, the meeting must be held in the presence of a police-officer, who has the right to stop any speaker and close the meeting when he likes.

In Moscow, for example, a meeting of waiters was recently held for the purpose of preparing instructions to delegates who had been appointed to the Congress of trade employees. One of the instructions declared that the waiters were a part of the proletariat. This description called forth a warning from the police-officer who was present. A new resolution was then put before the meeting, which declared that the employees in the restaurants of Moscow cherished no hope that the legislative Chambers, as at present constituted in Russia, would ever improve their lot. This proved too much for the policeman, who at once declared the meeting closed.

The police carry the same methods into every one of their dealings with the public. Prince Meschersky wrote, not long ago, in the Grajdanim, a Conservative organ:

"Under the conditions prevailing now, the following might well be a true picture from life:—detective agents board a battleship at night to arrest a gang of non-commissioned officers who—can there be any possible doubt?—are ready to carry out, that very night, a conspiracy against their superiors. The agents find most of the sailors fast asleep. Those whom they have come to arrest in the very act of preparing the crime are fast asleep too, undressed and unarmed. But the disappointed agents declare that, owing to their precipitation, they had not given time for the sailors' criminal design to ripen.

"Such an excuse, supported by nothing but groundless hearsay, easily suggests that the 170,000,000 inhabitants of Russia might find themselves to-morrow in the same predicament. At the caprice of the detective agents, all may be hastily arrested, before even their intention to attempt some unknown political crime could be brought to light. Here lies the tragedy of the situation. Nobody requires from the Okhrana sections, or the Police Department, or, still less, from the agents picked up in the street, any proof in support of suspicion or accusation, and nobody is made responsible, even for evidently false charges.

"Nor is this all. I declare, on the authority of respectable Gendarmerie officers, that it is a sacred tradition of the Okhrana and the Political Detective Department to cast suspicion on exemplary and respected Gendarmerie officers, and to set them down as indifferent to the service, merely because they refrain from making arrests. On the other hand, favour is shown to those who can boast of the greatest number of arrests per annum. It is not the quality but the quantity of the persons arrested that is the important thing. The question of the substantiation of accusations is a secondary consideration."

An incident took place recently in the Government of Kursk which might be astounding in any other country. A case was proceeding in which a private individual named Haykin was suing a railway company. A police officer entered the court and ordered the constables by whom he was accompanied to arrest the plaintiff on the ground that, being a Jew, he was not entitled to reside at Plutiol.

It was in vain that the presiding judge pointed out that Haykin had come there in obedience to a summons from the court, and that no arrests could be affected in a court of law without the order of the presiding judge. The Commissary of Police paid no attention to these remonstrances. Haykin was carried off to the lock-up, and the judge had to suspend the sitting.

In 1907 the Russian police cost (officially, that is, for the "graft" is to be added) fifty-seven and a half million roubles; in 1912 fifty-nine and a half millions; the estimate for 1913 was sixty and a half millions. Add to this the special corps of gendarmes, with an estimated cost for 1913 of seven and three-quarter millions. It is interesting at this point to mention that the expenditure for the elementary schools throughout an Empire of 170,000,000 was sixty-seven million roubles. The cost of maintenance of the prisons is estimated for this year at thirty-seven and a quarter millions, plus one million four hundred thousand roubles for the military prisons, and nearly two-hundred thousand roubles for the naval prisons.

The police must justify their existence. When there is no case they must needs make one, and that is being done on every hand. The police-made mutinies, the police-made political plots are brought forward, and it is seldom that the police are reprimanded for their "provocations." Of course, criminal proceedings are started now and then against police inspectors who are guilty of the worst offences, but most of them escape scot free.

For instance, a constable named Yejikoff, of the Balashov district, was committed for trial at Saratov for having thrashed in the street the village headman and two peasant women for their inability to tell him where to find his sabre, which he had lost when intoxicated. This requires no comment.

When we come to the question of the Press we cannot help feeling deep sympathy for the Russian journalists. Not a week passes but newspapers' editors are fined in respect of some of the articles they publish. Often the whole edition is confiscated, and fines of five hundred roubles are frequent. The offence is usually political. In one week this year the Bourse Gazette was fined five hundred roubles for publishing an article relating to police activity in the country; the Utro, of Kharkov, a hundred and fifty roubles for commenting on the conference of the heads of the Russian detective departments. The Golos Moskvy, was fined two hundred roubles for an article on the Holy Synod, and Tolstoy's pamphlet, "Divine and Human," first published in 1907, was confiscated this year. The publisher is being prosecuted.

The Pravda, one of three Progressive papers which have just been suppressed, first appeared in April of last year. During the first year of its existence it was confiscated on forty-one occasions and fined a total sum of 7,700 roubles (£770). Three of its editors, moreover, were sentenced to imprisonment for three months without the option of a fine. In May of this year the journal was confiscated no fewer than twenty-six times.

A new Press Bill has been brought forward, but the best that can be said of it is that it is not much more detrimental to editors than the present system. Whatever its outward appearance, the result will be to increase the power of repression of the police.

Without a "black Cabinet" the police would be somewhat hampered in their duties. It was admitted this year in the Duma by the Government that the Okhrana may use postal officials to watch the correspondence of suspects. We knew already that there were many "suspects" in Russia, but it is difficult to realise that the special department at the St. Petersburg post-office examines 40,000 letters a day, and that there are similar departments in every large town. This inquisition is carried to such a length that not very long ago Mr. Lopukhin, whose name is well known in London, and who was Director of the Police Department, found among Mr. Plehve's papers copies of his own correspondence. There is the classical story of the Scotch father whose son was living in Moscow, and who sent him a money-order, which he mentioned in his letter. When it was opened by the Post Office the money-order was lost. Judge of the surprise of the Scotch youth when he opened his letter, which was, of course, somewhat late, to find a handful of Russian banknotes, which were dated only the day before. Se non e vero.

THE PILGRIMS OF WATLING STREET

NOTE.—The Watling Street Pilgrims, members of the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies, left Carlisle on June 18th. A meeting was held at Stratford on July 16th. Before July 16th my interest in the demand for Women's Suffrage was academic—in the vaguest sense of the word. I have tried in the following pages to analyse what I thought and what I saw.

W. H. L. W.

WE drove along the grey road to the market-place of the old town, for there was the gathering of the women. Buttoned and rosetted, I gained the freedom of the company, and in a little while I was cursing in all the tongues I know those journalists and tattle-bearers who had played the slanderer. Where I had looked for stern, harsh-featured women, childless and unsexed, with humour lost in hysteria and bitterness bred of despair, I found—what I shall tell.

Except for a woman with the toothache there was nothing of the serious. The market-place gurgled with brave laughter. The picnic spirit crushed all else. Some were fat—two were very fat—some were thin—two were very thin—and all laughed.

But there was a little cloud, and it was just the size of a man's hand. For round these women strayed a few men, who slipped facetious sneers and praises on the bodies of the women. Blinder than Pilate, there was nothing else they could see in that company. And of the little cloud two things may be said. I stood on the horizon of Time, and in their words I perceived the illimitable cause, the precarious future and the dragging present of the movement. Again, for a second, I distrusted my own sex and shivered in the sun of my confidence. Certain unpleasant tales held for me a new, disquieting significance. Then there came a serious, brown-faced boy, ragged and shoeless, but rosetted like myself. We smiled at each other, the whistle shrilled, and I tramped, thoughtless and happy, out of the market-place and along the grey high road. And as we tramped we talked.

Up and down the company I wandered, and first made search for bitterness, but found none. There were elder women with grave faces, dressed neatly and marching in measured time. They told me in straightforward narrative, sanely, almost coldly, of their march through Hanley—how they had walked through streets fantastic in their meanness; how they had seen dirt and a crawling degradation—the thought of it still darkened their eyes; how haggard, half-naked women and squat, verminous children had pelted them with filth and filthier invective; how the monotony of a hostile stare had dulled them into a greater tiredness than all the stretching miles of harsh cobbles—all this they told me without bitterness, but with a sort of frozen enthusiasm; and each, when she had told me, would finish with her credo: "But we shall change all that."

For a mile I tramped and suffered the supercilious giggles of those that passed by. And the empty idiocy of those giggles drove out the joyousness of the pilgrimage. So I went to a large, witty woman, who was tired and walked in little spurts, and I told her what was simmering in my mind. She only laughed a big, round laugh that left her red and scant of breath. "The poor sillies!" she gasped, cheerfully waving her paper at a man on a bicycle, who shouted a curse as he pedalled vigorously into the nothingness that he deserved. I laughed after a moment. We laughed together, and all the brave company laughed with us.

So we tramped, and I went in search of reason narrowed by a single faith. There was a girl with a body that swung to the lilt and rhythm of a marching tune. She spoke of great books, and others joined in our talking. Now, there are some of us who sit round a fire together of an evening, and smoke together, and are very clever together. But the cleverness we covertly admired, the putting together and the pulling apart, suddenly seemed hollow, since what these women said was full of clear thinking—an honesty of thought. For they did not think of the world in terms of suffrage, but suffrage in terms of the world.

So we came to a friend's house, and lunched in the garden. There were ladies, factory-hands, maids, authors, typewriting girls, graduates, but no one sneered at the manner or talk of another. Then old songs were played, and, looking round on faces that were beautiful and faces that were ugly, I saw in each the longing for home and soft things. But the whistle shrilled, and soft things were forgotten. For a moment I imagined a drawing-room full of women chattering like the little spoons in their saucers, talking at each other, rivalling each other—year following year of teas and tattle. Then I looked again at my friends of the company. Surely they are the great artists of the world; in putting soft things behind them, in knowing what they believe and in showing it, they are creating a new race and swinging the world round. No man or woman can do more.

Again we took to the white high road, and in a little while we came to a green that was in Stratford. There we sat and joked, waiting for those who were tired and had come slowly. Then, when all the company was assembled, we raised our banners and marched into Stratford singing a song. So we came to Stratford.

First, there was an hour of business. With a cool and rapid precision hospitality was shared, orders detailed, arrangements made, and the next day's march outlined. This done, we raised our banners again, and behind a band we marched to the church; there we laid a wreath on the tomb of Shakespeare. And as the elder women laid the wreath on the tomb we sat in the body of the church. The quiet of it drugged me, and after the mocking of the crowds the church itself seemed to mock.

Christianity has raised women from degradation, implanted the spirit of chivalry in men's hearts, and given men a pity for the weak and the oppressed. So said my self of yesterday. Then there flitted dimly before me the women of Hanley, haggard and half-naked, their squat, verminous children, their filth and squalor. For a moment I doubted, until I remembered how Christian men reverence the supreme woman, Christ's mother. Again there passed before my mind the men in that old market-square, and other men of Stafford, who had thrown brickbats, stones, and rotten eggs at my friends of the company. For a moment I doubted, until I remembered how eagerly Christians hug to their hearts the saying of their Lord, that he that is without sin should cast the first stone. But the doubt persisted, for I saw a man in a lordly park who took a knife and ripped up the clothing of a girl, till, naked and bleeding, she was cast out, and another who proudly waved a piteous scrap of clothing and offered it for sale. The doubt grew very strong, for surely in some holy book I had read the story of a Man whose raiment was divided among His enemies. Perhaps in our country they admire those that divided the raiment; perhaps, despite their Master's words, Christians still cast stones, not only at sinful but at innocent women; perhaps they have even forgotten that Christ's mother was a woman. The answer came clear. They have been free so long that they have forgotten to be free; they have been Christians so long that they have forgotten to be Christians. My self of yesterday returned, and the dreams ran away like frightened children. So we went to church in Stratford.

Two waggons were set in the midst of a crowd of men. There were navvies with stiff, childish faces, young chestless clerks with pale cheeks and silly lips, townsmen of good standing who had come seriously to listen, and a few bovine police, whom, for the sake of their good name, I will not further mention. Many, it seemed, were frightened of their chivary, for they had drunk much good beer to support it. Darting in and out among the crowd, countering rudeness with a smile, were women selling papers, ribbons, badges. There was a handful of rosetted men; a North Countryman who for many days had tramped with the women, because he thought it was the duty of a man to protect women from his fellows; a poet who was brave enough to believe in woman, the humanist; a dear, drunken fellow, very dirty and very drunk, who fought with us arm to arm; a boy in immaculate flannels—to him women were dancing machines, but clerks and navvies unspeakable animals; and a big, quiet man. In front of the further waggon was an old woman, twisted like her stick. The mob was eagerly patronising, full of its own humour. The men with rosettes stood a little stern, looking quickly every way at once. And the smiling women darted in and out, always selling, always smiling.

The women on the waggons began to speak, and at first the pale, chestless clerks shouted silly nothings for the sake of the shouting, turning to each other for laughter, bent on admiring themselves. But the women were very annoying, for they went on speaking, and seemed to care nothing for these clerkly jokes. No clerk who had walked out of nights in the vulgar dusk could allow these women to ignore his wit. No navy who was lord of his own home, who drank when and what he liked so long as his wife bore him brats and kept his house, would allow this denial to the insistence of his shouting.

So the shouts became a roar and the jokes a curse. The crowd yelled and surged against the waggon. The old woman shrieked harshly that she was being crushed against the wheel, and hit out stupidly with her stick. In front of the waggon the rosetted men had gathered, together with the dear, drunken fellow and the boy in immaculate flannels. Shoulder to shoulder they shoved back the mob of men, fiercely appealing for fair play. The old woman crawled away with tremulous curses on her lips. From the waggon a girl who had played the friend to man and woman for dreary years in a dreary slum shouted against the crowd that jerked violently towards the waggon.

So the women slipped down from the waggon, and the crowd went on yelling and heaving, until it had discovered there was nothing against which to heave and yell.

Then, in the darkness, the silent waggons were wheeled away, and men drank together and talked together of their famous victory. For it was a Christian town, and a town of fame in the humaner arts.

But the women who were humanists went wearily to bed, and in the morning tramped to find new chivalry in man, and talked of things that are a little greater.

LITERARY NOTES

IN the original series of English Men of Letters, the editor, John Morley, not being Irish, did not venture to include a single woman-writer among the thirty-nine literary celebrities selected for treatment. The only concession to the sex was the entrusting of one volume—Sheridan—to a woman, Mrs. Oliphant. In the new series issued by Messrs. Macmillan a more generous policy has been adopted, and the term "Men of Letters" has been interpreted so as to embrace women as well as men. George Eliot, Fanny Burney, Maria Edgeworth, and Mrs. Gaskell have already found able biographers, and next week will be published a monograph on Jane Austen, by Mr. F. Warre Cornish, Vice-Provost of Eton College.

* * * * *

A second batch of twenty volumes in that invaluable series, Bohn's Popular Library, is being issued this week by G. Bell and Sons. The new volumes (1s. each) are: "The Early Diary of Frances Burney, 1768-1778," two volumes; Carlyle's "History of the French Revolution," with Introduction by J. Holland Rose, Litt.D., three volumes; Emerson's Works, Volumes III. and IV.; "Tom Jones," two volumes; Jameson's "Shakespeare's Heroines"; "The Thoughts of Marcus Aurelius Antoninus"; Mignet's "History of the French Revolution"; Montaigne's Essays, three volumes; Ranke's "History of the Popes," three volumes; Trollope's "The Warden," with Introduction by Frederic Harrison; and Trollope's "Barchester Towers."

The completion of Messrs. T. C. and E. C. Jack's "British Bird Book" is a notable event for all ornithologists. The work, which has been several years in progress, is issued in twelve sections (10s. 6d. each), or four volumes (36s. each), and contains 200 plates in full colours from original drawings, and 200 photographs. The editor, Mr. F. B. Kirkman, has had the assistance of leading ornithologists, bird artists, and bird photographers, and both the ordinary edition and the limited édition de luxe (21s. per section; £4 4s. per volume) are sumptuous books of great artistic and scientific value.

* * * * *

'Another new volume that will interest bird lovers is Mr. M. D. Haviland's "Bird Life on the Wing," announced for early publication by Messrs. Black.

* * * * *

Messrs. Headley Brothers are adding to their Books for Garden Lovers a volume on "Garden Trees and Shrubs" (12s. 6d.), by Walter P. Wright, F.R.H.S. This will be uniform with the beautiful "Alpine Flowers and Rock Gardens" issued recently by the same publishers. Mr. Wright has divided his subject into four parts—The Beauty and Value of Shrubs and Trees; Practical; Selective; and Descriptive. The book will contain nearly a hundred plates specially prepared by eminent artists.

There are few books in English dealing in a general way with British Universities. All the more welcome, therefore, should be the volume published this week by Messrs. W. Heffer and Sons—"A History of University Reform" (10s.). The author is Mr. A. J. Tillyard, M.A., St. John's College, Cambridge. He traces the Reform movement from 1800 to the present day, and throws out suggestions towards a complete scheme of reform for his own University.

STOPFORD AUGUSTUS BROOKE

CRITIC AND CLERIC

HOW we used to loathe Stopford Brooke! Not the man, Stopford Brooke; indeed, it never occurred to us that Stopford Brooke was a man. To us Stopford Brooke was a book—only that and nothing more—a “Primer of English Literature,” an instrument for forcible feeding in the hands of an antiquated teacher. On the eve of Leaving Certificate Exams. and Inspectors’ Visits we were primed with Stopford Brooke ad nauseam. We were shamelessly egged on to commit Stopford Brooke to heart, and, although some twenty years have elapsed since then, whole pages of Stopford Brooke still remain seared upon our memories. Were I casually to ask any of my old classmates what they thought of Byron, the response, I feel sure, would come automatically: “The position of Byron as a poet is a curious one. He is partly of the past and partly of the present. Something of the school of Pope clings to him; yet no one so—” Stopford Brooke has left its mark. One of my school-fellows never mentions the name of Browning without adding à la Stopford Brooke a parenthetical “Whose wife will justly share his fame.”

Not till after we had left school did we realise that Stopford Brooke was a man. And the more we read of him and about him, the more was our prejudice and resentment against Stopford Brooke broken down. We saw that we had been visiting on the book and its writer the iniquities of the teacher. With relief and not a little contrition we found that the text-book, after all, was excellent, although the use made of it had been revolting. In a word, we recognised that, if we had been shamelessly “crammed,” we had at least been crammed on wholesome fare.

For Stopford Brooke, whatever he may seem to the immature, appeals to the adult mind as, on the whole, an eminently sane and sound critic. There is nothing bilious or bellicose about his criticism. It is always succinct—witness the aforementioned “Primer.” It is always scholarly, as one might expect from the brilliant graduate of Trinity College, Dublin. It is always marked by strong individuality, yet is never egotistical. It is always helpful and suggestive. While systematic, it is never stodgy and dull, as your systematic, professional criticism is so apt to be. An ardent Irishman, Stopford Brooke has imagination in abundance, and a rich poetic and artistic vein, but he never allows himself to be betrayed into hasty, impulsive judgments; never lets words or tropes run away with him. He has a true literary instinct. Because he himself thoroughly enjoys the good things of literature he is anxious to make his readers share his pleasure; and because he has a rare gift of expression he succeeds à merveille.

Supplement these endowments with a robust faith and a musical voice, and you have the makings of a fine preacher and inspiring lecturer. Stopford Brooke’s sermons, we can well believe, used to attract crowded congregations in London long ago. Nor was their fame ephemeral. Their form and matter fitted them for publication, as few sermons are in these days; and in Stopford Brooke’s list of works, sermons and devotional subjects outnumber, if they do not outrival in popularity, the purely literary volumes.

With the reasons which made him break away from the Anglican Church in 1880 we have here nothing to do. What alone concerns us is his quality as a teacher and a preacher. In both capacities he shows the same characteristics—a “high seriousness,” an unflinching optimism, an infectious fearlessness, a cultured eloquence. And so, in his literary lectures, we find him preaching the noble sermons, as in his inaugural address to the Shelley Society:—

“For myself, I wish that subject matter (the redemption of man) were always before the hopes and in the hearts of men. I wish the faith in it were as strong in the lives of present men as it was in the life of Shelley. The life of the poor would then be brighter, and their endurance of the iniquity of society easier. Hope would create from its own wreck the thing it contemplates. A more spiritual life would balance our materialism. The making of wealth and comfort would be less the religion of England. The idleness and worldliness of man would be more shamed into work and into simplicity. It is the nature of a great faith and hope to make life simple. Philosophy would be less narrow, science less insolent, scepticism less vain, and that opinion—the ultimate result of having neither faith nor hope nor love—that this world is the worst possible world, cease to be the last refuge and the last repose for the heart of man.”—(“Studies in Poetry,” 1907.)

Similarly, in his sermons we come upon passages worthy of the most finished literary essayist; witness the following from a sermon preached on the last Sunday of the year:—

“Some of you who are young are but beginning life. How will you live it; what shall be its means and motives? That is the gravest question as you look forward over the unvoyaged sea of years to come. And we, who are older, are glad to welcome you as you come out of the harbour of home into the tumbling billows of the main. For many years now we have sailed the seas of life, and our ships have been driven to various shores and troubled with the siege of storms, and seen strange islands and strange adventures in diverse seas, from arctic unto tropic; change and interchange of watching and labour and rest. Sunshine and shadow is life; but yet the rough sailing has been better than anchorage in a stagnant calm. Movement and passion have been our comrades; trouble has rushed into joy, joy that prophesied sorrow and fulfilled the prophecy; darkness that sunlight of a new dawn divided; rest that the labour of the tempest rescued from sloth; steady steering in the gale, to keep which true every power was tested to the last resistance; sweet harbourage where we refitted our ship, and heard, when all had been done which was needful, the singing of the land-wind in the tree tops which called us to hoist sail for a new voyage, and which to hear filled us with joy. This has been ours, and to this—to life with all its change—we welcome you.”—(“The Gospel of Joy,” 1898.)

Stopford Brooke—it seems unnecessary, somehow, to preface a respectful “Mr.” or “Dr.” or “Rev.” to the familiar title of our schooldays—Stopford Brooke was born in 1832—the year in which Goethe and Scott died. His “Primer,” which boys and girls study to-day, had a place in the school-bags of their parents before them. It was first published away back in 1876, and when it appeared Matthew Arnold praised it in one of his “Miscellaneous Essays.” And yet we young whipper-snappers at school used to detest and despise it—because our English master failed to make it human!

EVERYMAN'S FRENCH PAGE

EDMUND BURKE

BURKE n'était point entré au Parlement, comme Fox et les deux Pitts, dès l'aurore de la jeunesse, mais à trente-cinq ans, ayant eu le temps de s'instruire à fond de toutes choses, savant dans le droit, l'histoire, la philosophie, les lettres, maître d'une érudition si universelle qu'on l'a comparé à Lord Bacon. Mais ce qui le distinguait entre tous les autres, c'était une large intelligence compréhensive, qui, exercée par des études et des compositions philosophiques,* saisissait les ensembles, et, par delà les textes, les constitutions et les chiffres, apercevait la direction invisible des événements et l'esprit intime des choses, en couvrant de son dédain "ces prétendus hommes d'Etat, troupeau profane de manœuvres vulgaires, qui nient l'existence de tout ce qui n'est point grossier et matériel, et qui, bien loin d'être capables de diriger le grand mouvement d'un empire, ne sont pas dignes de tourner une roue dans la machine." Par-dessus tant de dons, il avait une de ces imaginations fécondantes et précises qui croient que la connaissance achevée est une vue intérieure, qui ne quittent point un sujet sans l'avoir revêtu de ses couleurs et de ses formes, et qui, traversant les statistiques et le fatras des documents arides, recomposent et reconstruisent devant les yeux du lecteur un pays lointain et une nation étrangère avec ses monuments, ses costumes, ses paysages et tout le détail mouvant des physionomies et des mœurs. A toute ces puissances d'esprit qui font le systématique, il ajoutait toutes les énergies du cœur qui font l'enthousiaste. Pauvre, inconnu, ayant dépensé sa jeunesse à compiler pour les libraires, il était parvenu, à force de travail et de mérite, avec une réputation pure et une conscience intacte, sans que les épreuves de sa vie obscure ou les séductions de sa vie brillante eussent entamé son indépendance ou terni la fleur de sa loyauté. Il apportait dans la politique une horreur du crime, une vivacité et une sincérité de conscience, une humanité, une sensibilité, qui ne semblent convenir qu'à un jeune homme. Il appuyait la société humaine sur des maximes de morale, réclamait pour les sentiments nobles la conduite des affaires, et semblait avoir pris à tâche de relever et d'autoriser tout ce qu'il y a de généreux dans le cœur humain. Il avait noblement combattu pour de nobles causes : contre les attentats du pouvoir en Angleterre, contre les attentats du peuple en France, contre les attentats des particuliers dans l'Inde. Il avait défendu, avec des recherches immenses et un désintéressement incontesté, les Hindous tyrannisés par l'avidité anglaise, et "ces derniers misérables cultivateurs qui survivaient attachés au sol, le dos écorché par le fermier, puis une seconde fois mis à vif par le cessionnaire, livrés, à une succession de despotismes que leur brièveté rendait plus rapaces, et flagellés ainsi de verges en verges, tant qu'on leur trouvait une dernière goutte de sang pour leur extorquer un dernier grain de riz." Il s'était fait partout le champion d'un principe et le persécuteur d'un vice, et on le voyait lancer à l'attaque toutes les forces de son étonnant savoir, de sa haute raison, de son style splendide avec l'ardeur infatigable et intempérante d'un moraliste et d'un chevalier.

* "Recherches sur l'Origine de nos Idées du Beau et du Sublime."

LES difficultés, si j'en rencontre en lisant, je n'en rongerai pas mes ongles; je les laisse là, après leur avoir fait une charge ou deux. Si je m'y plantois, je m'y perdrois, et le temps: car j'ai un esprit primesautier.—Montaigne.

EDMUND BURKE

BURKE did not enter Parliament, like Fox and the two Pitts, in the dawn of his youth, but at thirty-five, having had time to train himself thoroughly in all matters, learned in law, history, philosophy, literature, master of such a universal erudition that he has been compared to Bacon. But what distinguished him from all other men was a wide, comprehensive intellect, which, exercised by philosophical studies and writings,* seized the general aspect of things, and, beyond text, constitutions, and figures, perceived the invisible tendency of events and the inner spirit, covering with his contempt those pretended statesmen, a vulgar herd of common journeymen, denying the existence of everything not coarse or material, who, far from being capable of guiding the grand movements of an empire, are not worthy to turn the wheel of a machine.

Beyond all those gifts, he possessed one of those fertile and precise imaginations which believe that finished knowledge is an inner view, which never quit a subject without having clothed it in its colours and forms, and which, passing beyond statistics and the rubbish of dry documents, re-compose and reconstruct before the reader's eyes a distant country and a foreign nation, with its monuments, dresses, landscapes, and all the shifting detail of its aspects and manners. To all those powers of mind which constitute a man of system he added all those energies of heart which constitute an enthusiast. Poor, unknown, having spent his youth in compiling for the publishers, he rose, by dint of work and personal merit, with a pure reputation and an unscathed conscience, ere the trials of his obscure life or the seductions of his brilliant life had fettered his independence or tarnished the flower of his loyalty. He brought to politics a horror of crime, a vivacity and sincerity of conscience, a humanity, a sensibility, which seem only suitable to a young man. He based human society on maxims of morality, insisted upon a high and pure tone of feeling in the conduct of public business, and seemed to have undertaken to raise and authorise the generosity of the human heart. He fought nobly for noble causes: against the crimes of power in England, the crimes of the people in France, the crimes of monopolists in India. He defended, with immense research and unimpeached disinterestedness, the Hindoos tyrannised over by English greed, and the "remaining miserable last cultivator, who, after having his back scored by the farmer, has it again flayed by the whip of the assignee, and is thus by a ravenous, because a short-lived, succession of claimants lashed from oppressor to oppressor whilst a single drop of blood is left as the means of extorting a single grain of corn." He made himself everywhere the champion of principle and the persecutor of vice; and men saw him bring to the attack all the forces of his wonderful knowledge, his lofty reason, his splendid style, with the unwearied and unrestrained ardour of a moralist and a knight.

IF in reading I fortune to meet with any difficult point, I fret not myself about them; but after I have given them a charge or two, I leave them as I found them. Should I earnestly plod upon them I should loose both time and myself; for I have a skipping wit.—Florio's Translation.

EVERYMAN'S GUIDE TO THE BEST BOOKS

I.—HISTORY OF THE PAPACY

A.—BIBLIOGRAPHY

THERE is no period of history, not even the French Revolution, which better repays the labours of the student than the history of the Papacy. There is none which raises so many questions of universal interest, which is so closely bound up with the political and moral developments of modern Europe; there is none which makes a stronger appeal to the imagination and to the intellect.

1. The famous essay of Macaulay on Ranke's "History of the Popes" still retains its value, and may yet serve as a general introduction for the beginner.
2. The masterpiece of Ranke (three vols. in Bohn's and Bell's Library), which Macaulay discusses, has only been partly superseded by later research.
3. There is an excellent little summary in the Home University Library, 1s. (Williams and Norgate), by Dr. William Barry, from the Liberal point of view. It is one of the most illuminative volumes in an admirable series.
4. The same gifted author has given us a more comprehensive view of the subject in a volume in the "Story of the Nations" series (T. Fisher Unwin).
5. There is a great deal of invaluable and otherwise inaccessible material in Fleury's "History of the Church," that wonderful monument of erudition by the most truthful of Catholic historians, which ought to be much more read than it is.
6. Nor ought we to forget von Reumont's learned "History of the City of Rome," which has done for the Liberal Catholic what
7. Gregorovius' equally learned "History of the City of Rome" has done for the Protestant student. (Excellent English translation published by Bell.) The titles of both books are really misleading. They are in reality exhaustive histories of periods of Papal history.
8. Bishop Creighton's "History of the Popes." Although lacking in charm of style, it gives us an excellent and, on the whole, sympathetic account.
9. A lighter and brighter and more Liberal treatment of the subject will be found in John Addington Symonds' "History of the Renaissance."
10. I would strongly recommend the monographs of Villery on Savonarola and Machiavelli (2s. 6d. T. Fisher Unwin), which both throw a great deal of light on the Renaissance period.
11. The Danish Bishop Nielsen has given us in his "History of the Papacy in the 19th Century" the only complete record since the French Revolution.
12. An interesting controversial book, which, however, should be read with a great deal of suspicion, is Count von Hoensbroeck's (the ex-Jesuit's) "Das Papsthum."

13. Much more remarkable are the controversial studies of the founder of the Neo-Catholic Church, Döllinger, especially his book published under the pseudonym of "Janus," "The Pope and the Council."
14. On the subject of Vaticanism and the relations between the Vatican and the State, by far the best works are "L'Église et le Vatican," by Emile Ollivier, the famous French statesman who has just died, and
15. Laurent, "Études sur l'Histoire de l'Humanité," a mine of historical and political lore, which many a student exploits and explores without taking the trouble to express his indebtedness to the owner of the mine.
16. In conclusion, every reader ought to study the work of the greatest contemporary Catholic historian, Pastor's "History of the Popes" (English translation, published by Longmans), a monument of learning and veracity, which proves that the Vatican has given up its time-honoured policy of hushing up and economising the truth. Unfortunately Pastor's masterpiece only covers about a hundred and fifty years, albeit the most interesting period of the history of the Papacy.

We intend to give similar bibliographical directions on subjects raised in the columns of EVERYMAN. The Editor will be grateful for any suggestions pointing out glaring sins of omission and commission.

B.—QUESTIONS FOR DISCUSSION

1. How would you describe the Papal Government? Is it an aristocracy or a monarchy, absolute or constitutional, or a democracy?
2. In what respects has the Papacy changed through the ages? (Age, nationality, forms of election, constitution of the Sacred College of Cardinals.)
3. In what measure has the Papacy served the cause of civilisation?
4. Has temporal power strengthened or weakened the Papacy?
5. Discuss Dante's judgment of the Papacy.
6. Sum up the curious history of Nepotism and the rise and fall of Papal dynasties.
7. Describe the relations of the Papacy to the other Italian States.
8. Have the Popes been pre-eminent in sanctity or theological learning, or have they not rather been distinguished by worldly wisdom?
9. In what sense may the Papacy be described as being to-day "the greatest moral force of Christendom"?
10. The Papacy is described as an international institution. In what measure have the national elements—Greek, Italian, French, Spanish—affected its history?

THE BOGEY OF SEX ANTAGONISM

BY PROF. J. ARTHUR THOMSON AND MARGARET R. THOMSON

A BOGEY is a terrifying invention, devoid of reality, but capable of doing no end of mischief. One of the latest is the "sex antagonism" discovered by Mr. Walter Heape, a well-known embryologist and investigator of the physiology of reproduction, and set forth in a recently published book (Constable, 1913) which bears the name of his bogey. After a brilliant and subtle discussion of the origin of exogamy and totemism, Mr. Heape sums up thus: "It follows, if I am correct, that just as exogamy is a practical effort to satisfy a Male sexual impulse, so totemism arose from a desire, is designed to satisfy a Female maternal impulse. These two divergent impulses are at the root of sex antagonism; they exert their influence on all the laws which govern sex relations in all social communities, and are never divorced from the minds and from the actions of all healthy men and women." And on this basis he proceeds to the analysis of present day conditions. The unrest of to-day, he maintains, is due to Racial Antagonism, Class Antagonism, and Sex Antagonism—the last the most fateful of the three, for it is a family war, "strife as selfish, as brutal, as bitter, and as unrestrained as that shown in any class war between men alone."

What is the significance of the "present sex war," or, as we should say, the modern "woman's movement," (of which anarchistic violence has been a deplorable but intelligible epiphenomenon)? We must not ask the combatants what their motives are—they are too excited; nor the generals what their aims are—they have lost sight of strategy in the embarrassment of mistaken tactics; we must ask Mr. Heape. And he tells us that "no matter what each of the various sections of that movement declares, no matter what is the avowed object of the actions of any one of them, it is obvious that the driving force is engendered by desire to alter the laws which regulate the relations, and therefore the relative power of the sexes."

There is a pleasing air of finality about this pronouncement! Moreover, it is always satisfactory to have things clearly labelled, even when we do not understand them, and Mr. Heape has supplied us with labels to which we may refer the vagaries both of the Male and the Female. (We spell them with capitals because Mr. Heape does, and he is an expert. But if he had written man and woman, instead of Male and Female, would he not have been saved from the "biologism" into which, in spite of his recognised ability, brilliantly displayed in this book, he has fallen?)

But to return to our labels. That of the male reads "Exogamy," for he must go a-roving, a-roving! That of the female reads "Totemism," and it means the desire for well-endowed children and a secure home. The sexes are different down to the ground, or, rather, to the egg, and no Acts of Parliament can annul what was settled in the Garden of Eden. Social environments are ever changing, and the changes affect the two sexes differently. There is, therefore, disturbance and dissatisfaction, and these engender antagonism—antagonism to any object which may be fastened on as the cause of the disturbance. So the Females fasten their antagonism on Mr. Asquith, and the Males on Mrs. Pankhurst, and Both on Mr. George.

Mr. Heape has taken over, from Mr. Frazer of "The Golden Bough," a fine picture of the primitive savage woman striving for more "say" in the firm or symbiosis which had come about [Praise be!], and of the more or less complacent male blocking up the door. This, he says, is true to life to-day. "Sexual antagonism in the earliest days was little, if at all, different from what we are now experiencing." (We should hardly venture to quote this if it were not written by a really big biologist whom we hold in the highest esteem, except when he talks about the modern Woman's Movement.) What is wrong to-day? Simply, according to Mr. Heape, what has been wrong recurrently throughout the ages—a crisis of "sex antagonism," brought about by organic or biological causes. The male wants more liberty, for he is disturbed and damaged by being compelled to suppress his strong generative impulse [perhaps a little more simple living and a little less selfish bachelordom may be recommended without priggishness]; hence modern Exogamy! When a man marries his cook, that is the exception that proves the rule.

Similarly, according to Mr. Heape, the female is disturbed and damaged because she is leaving or is forced to leave the straight path of maternity. She plays hockey, and her recessive masculine characters develop. She shrinks from marrying the "brute beast Man," as the suffragist writer termed him, and she becomes the hysterical spinster of the militant corps, apt to be dangerously excited, apt to be antagonistic even to the interests of mothers.

All of which strikes us as perverted interpretation. There is doubtless a sex factor in the so-called sex war, but it is not the driving force with the great majority. We adhere to our belief that the driving force is the desire—the deliberate and conscious desire—to alter those social, economic, and political conditions which have in the past tended to prevent so many women from living anything like a complete human life, from being much more than an effective domestic animal or a delicious "sex-parasite." Economic changes have made it unprofitable for the daughters to remain about the home engaged in the discharge of domestic duties now often fictitious, and have also opened up suitable careers and occupations; educational opportunities, too, have made economic independence possible, and have given women more confidence and freshened self-respect; men of goodwill have become ashamed of their complicity in a patriarchate régime which has long outlived its justification—hence, we believe, what Mr. Heape calls "the present sex war," in which, by the way, many personally happy men and women are actively interested on both sides. And as to the spinsters, on whom Mr. Heape, in his theoretical pre-occupation, is so hard, among them are our sisters, and the sisters of mercy, and the sisters of the poor, Plato's children of the spirit, of whom the world is not worthy, in whom both love and maternity have been sublimed, and have found an expression no less real that it is self-detached.

In the course of civilisation man has developed a family sense which has knit him in sympathy with woman, and therefore led him to more understanding. Woman has become more of a free agent, more of a social person, more of a player and less of a pawn in the game of life, (of course, the clever women have been the players from first to last), more of a citizen in short, and she also has been led to more understanding. Faults enough there are still on both sides, but surely between the extremes of pathological luxury on the one hand, and pathological poverty on the other there has consistently been, what there is now, a vast body of men and women, happily wedded, working together with goodwill, making allowances and securing happiness, without any thought of "sex antagonism." Exogamists they are, if you will, in so far as that is expressed by genuine falling in love; totemists, if you will, in so far as that is expressed in the desire for the best endowment of the children. They are the evidences of the fact that, deeper than the bitterness that sometimes, naturally enough, besets those on whom badly regulated social changes have enforced celibacy, deeper than the repressive instincts of "the head of the house" or the bullying instincts of the imperfectly civilised "masterful man," deeper even than the self-sacrificing devotion of those who feel that a continuance of present conditions is inconsistent with their self-respect, is the primeval love of mates and their natural co-operation in the business of life.

We have ventured to express our admiration of Mr. Heape's interpretation of the origin of Exogamy and Totemism; and we agree entirely with his practical conclusion that "a woman's usefulness, her value to society, and therefore her power and her happiness depend, not on her likeness to but on her dissimilarity from man." We have, in fact, said the same thing ourselves! We think, however, that Mr. Heape has launched into these present-day troublous seas a bogey-craft called "Sex Antagonism," and, frankly, we would sink it. As regards clear thinking, our main point is that the threads of sex have been caught up and intertwined with so many others that, although the importance of no set of threads can be disregarded, the attempt to refer this or that movement to purely physiological, or purely psychological, or purely economic factors is an illegitimate abstraction and bad science.

WANTED — CONSUMERS' LEAGUES

BY OUR SPECIAL COMMISSIONER

ONE of the most valuable and stimulating suggestions that have fallen from the lips of Social Reformers for many a long day is the organisation on practical lines of those Leagues of Consumers which have elsewhere produced such remarkable results.

The idea of such leagues is by no means new. In America they have worked wonders. In France they have made their influence felt. Switzerland, Holland, Italy—all have their consumers' movements. But Great Britain, the first industrial country to organise the producer, still lags behind, with the result that the efforts of the Trade Unions to raise what are called real wages are often checkmated.

The great railway strike of 1911, for instance, while it forced wages up a peg or two, resulted in a legalised raising of charges, which must mean that prices will rise ever higher; and, to take another example, while the coal strike was partially successful in getting some of the miners an advance, the price that the nation had to pay for this essential of industry was increased out of all proportion.

In a word, Labour gained with one hand, and at

"NERVES AND THE NERVOUS."

PRACTICAL HEALTH-TALKS BY A PHYSICIAN.

ALL who suffer from "nerves"—a term which covers a multitude of ills—should find comfort and practical assistance in a book called "Nerves and the Nervous," which is written in non-technical language for the instruction of the lay-reader.

The author is Dr. Edwin Ash, who is well known as an authoritative writer on medical subjects.

"Persons whose nervous systems are weakened," he says, "are frequently quick and intelligent beyond their fellows, entering into whatever they take up with the utmost zeal, but tiring quickly before they have gone very far with it."

COMMON SIGNS OF DISORDERED NERVES.

A continued feeling of tiredness is, in fact, one of the commonest symptoms of nerve weakness. "Those who are fit and well," says the writer, "find it difficult to imagine the condition of a person who is never able to feel fresh, but is continually weighed down by that terrible feeling of slackness, which betokens that his nerve-energy is at a low ebb."

"Hundreds of nervous people," continues the author "are continually taking strong so-called tonics without deriving any permanent benefit from them. Thus, after persevering with such medicines, they begin to think that their case is hopeless, and that they will never recover their health, energy, and lost tranquillity of life."

Among the measures recommended are electricity, massage, and psychotherapy—that is, mental treatment by means of "suggestion," etc.

But as the author points out, the first stage in all such methods must be "a course of nutritive treatment directed to building up the weakened body, improving the blood, and restoring the debilitated nerve-centres."

The difficulty has hitherto been to devise a "course of nutritive treatment" which should fulfil these conditions. Within the past few years, however, the resources of modern chemistry have been invoked with triumphant success. We have now a preparation in powder form which has completely revolutionised the nutritive treatment of nervous diseases. This preparation is known as Sanatogen, and it is now invariably prescribed for all cases of nerve weakness because experience has shown that it may be relied on, in Sir Gilbert Parker's words, for "feeding the nerves, increasing the energy, and giving fresh vigour to the overworked body and mind."

In Sanatogen it has been found possible, for the first time, to combine with pure proteid material a principal ingredient of the nerve-cells themselves. The result is that, by the regular use of Sanatogen, nerve-energy is actually restored in a normal physiological manner. At the same time, Sanatogen also improves the patient's general strength by nourishing the blood plasma and muscular tissue.

THE INTERNATIONAL MEDICAL CONGRESS.

No preparation has ever been so highly honoured by the medical profession as Sanatogen. More than eighteen thousand practising physicians have given signed testimony to the preparation, and amongst them are many of the greatest specialists in Europe. It is not surprising, therefore, that Sanatogen was the only nutrient selected to receive the Grand Prix—the highest possible award—at the International Medical Congress which was held in London last August, and which, undoubtedly, embodied the highest medical and scientific opinion in the world.

Anyone desiring further information about Sanatogen should write to A. Wulff & Co., 12, Chenies Street, London, W.C., who will, if this paper is mentioned, send an interesting Booklet on the subject and also a Trial Supply of Sanatogen, without any charge.

the cost of terrible sacrifices, only what it was compelled to relinquish from the other. That anomaly, I shall presently show, Consumers' Leagues could end.

Before I do so, let us see what hopes there are of such leagues proving successful. As it seems to me, there are two great factors in their favour. First,

They Appeal Irresistibly to Women, and women, once they are really interested in anything, are a good deal swifter to take action than men. Second, they deal with definite, concrete evils in a definite, concrete way. Those evils, the twin curses of adulteration and high prices, are known to all of us, and, as I believe, the most effective way of fighting them is through these new organisations.

I will take adulteration first. Legislation has proved largely impotent in this matter. In fact, it has actually retarded reform. While the institution of standards has compelled all dealers to respect a certain minimum, these standards have been set so low, as actually to legalise a certain amount of adulteration, and this involved in many cases a reduction of quality. Take, for instance, milk. The legal standard of richness is 8.5 of non-fatty solids and 3 per cent. of fat. Much milk is naturally above this quality. But, it has been found, so says the M.O.H. for Kent, "that scientific methods are being employed to bring down the quality of milk to the extreme margin." From Cardiff, Portsmouth, and Rhyl come similar complaints. At Denbigh, butter formerly supplied with 12 per cent. of water, has now dropped to the lower legal standard of 8 per cent. Everywhere it is obvious that legal enactment fails to protect the consumer against adulteration; often it increases the evil.

But Consumers' Leagues show us a more excellent way. Not only could they protect their members against adulteration, but they could fight those high prices under which thousands of middle-class families groan to-day. However, the story of the leagues in America gives us the answer.

In America there are sixty-three Consumers' Leagues in twenty different States of the Union.

Their Principal Weapon has been the White List—and the boycott. Let me explain, when the leagues were started care was taken to organise them extraordinarily well. They caught on. They were joined by thousands of women. They were "boomed" in the papers, and the result was that, in every town where they appeared, there was a positive competition for their custom among the tradesmen who served the town—a determination to please the members at all costs. The leagues, in fact, did not need to rely upon the "boycott." Their mere formation made them a power in the land. They were able to insist on fair prices and "good goods."

Sometimes, indeed, their power became so excessive that the tradesmen themselves combined to raise prices against them. But the threat on the part of the Consumers' League to organise a competing store proved potent enough for the members to win victory, and there is no doubt that, once having gathered a huge army of purchasers together into one body—the different local leagues were federated into a most powerful central association—the promoters of these Consumers' Protection Societies had a weapon which made them to any tradesman of the get-rich-quick variety. In a word, just as the Trade Unions have caused the producer to be considered, so these Consumers' Leagues have compelled the retailer to recognise the claims of the consumer and to meet them so far as he can.

In Great Britain such leagues would have an immense future. The middle-classes have long been cut off from direct action in politics; the Consumers' Leagues locally would give them a unique chance of making themselves and their influence effective. There is not a town to-day that has not its Trades Council or its Trades Unions. But, so far as I know, there is not

One Solitary Example of a Consumers' League in existence.

Yet can there be any doubt whatever that such leagues would not command respect? They could focus an amount of enthusiasm, discipline, and, above all, of purchasing power such as no other organisations are able to control. We must remember that it is as consumers that the people are to be chiefly victimised in the future. Wages have risen during the last ten years—but prices have risen higher, and will rise higher yet. Does anyone doubt that, if the same vigilance and determination had been put out from the consumers' as from the producers' side, prices could not have been kept down, even as wages have been forced up? There is no question about it. The fact is that the divorce between consumer and producer has proved a curse to labour and to the community, and it will be impossible for the wage-earners to obtain a until they are united, not only as producers, but as consumers also.

Over and over again it has been found that organised labour has, by mere pressure and the threat of a strike, forced wages up. I venture to prophesy that, when the time comes and the Consumers' Leagues are found to be going concerns, the same pressure, intelligently and vigorously applied, can force prices down.

And they will have this crowning advantage. Woman, the home animal, cannot take an active part, as a rule, in a struggle to raise wages; she is keenly interested in an effort to lower prices. And she is, as I have said, readier, keener, more resourceful than man. She will fight for her children as no man fought yet, and, united with other women, she can make these leagues a power in the land.

Of course, it may be said that, as in America, so here, the small retailer and the trustified store may unite against the Consumers' League in maintaining prices that are artificially high. But do not let us forget that it is always possible to develop these Consumers' Leagues into actual competitors with the profiteers that they are formed to watch. The Woolwich Co-operative Society had but small beginnings. Some workmen at the Arsenal clubbed together for a chest of tea! That was the origin of one of the mightiest Co-operative Societies in the world.

Let no one think, therefore, that the possibilities of such leagues are limited to mere local pressure upon tradesmen. Facts prove the contrary. During the great national coal stoppage of two years ago prices rose to famine pitch. Slag from the pithead was sold at 10s. per ton; genuine coal at 45s. But the Coal Consumers' Society continued to supply their members at the ordinary rate! If nothing else in this article convinces, this illustration should suffice. The consumer has only to organise to win valuable economic advantage. If he will not do that, then the blame must be on his own head.

MASTERPIECE FOR THE WEEK

PASCAL'S "THOUGHTS"* ❁ ❁ BY CHARLES SAROLEA

I.

THE launching by Messrs. J. M. Dent and Sons of a French "Everyman's Library" is the sensational event of the publishing year. It is now four years since Messrs. Nelson brought out their French Collections, over the literary fortunes of which I had the honour to preside until I assumed the onerous responsibilities of EVERYMAN. The "Collection Nelson" has become world famous, and has marked a new epoch in the French publishing trade. The Scottish invasion of France is now followed up by an English invasion. The "Collection Gallia" is continuing the work of its predecessor on a different and, I think, a more ambitious and comprehensive scale, and with an ampler scope. It is placing at the disposal of all lovers of French literature exquisite shilling editions of French classics. Immediate success has already justified this bold undertaking. The Collection was only issued a few weeks ago, and already the little volumes are to be seen on every village bookstall in France and at every leading bookseller's on the Continent.

II.

It was in the fitness of things that a library of French classics should begin with one of the immortal masterpieces of the language, a masterpiece which, more than any other, can claim the credit of having first fixed the standard of French style. Of Pascal's "Thoughts" there have been editions innumerable, but the present shilling edition is likely, for many years to come, to be the favourite one with the reading public. It represents the joint labours of the three leading Pascal scholars of France. Monsieur Boutroux, the master of Bergson, and leader of the new school of French philosophy (and, by the way, a close relation of President Poincaré), and Monsieur Victor Giraud, the eminent sub-editor of the Revue des deux Mondes, have both contributed illuminative Introductions. As for the critical text of the edition itself, it has been established by Monsieur Brunschvigg, and is the result of ten years of benedictine labour and ingenious research.

III.

English students of French literature often overlook the very important fact that there are two entirely different strains running through the whole course of French literature. The most conspicuous writers are, no doubt, men of the type of Rabelais, Montaigne, Molière, Voltaire, and Anatole France, who give us, in sparkling and epigrammatic style, that incisive criticism of life which Matthew Arnold, in his famous essay on "The Literary Influence of Academies," considers as the chief function of the French mind, and who represent the purely intellectual and artistic outlook, which is so often divorced from and opposed to the moral view. It is this unbroken continuity of masters of wit and irony which has given currency to the theory that the French mind is naturally of a sceptical, cynical, and flippant turn, and that it has none of the earnestness and depth of the Teutonic mind. That theory of the superficialness of the French mind is itself based on a most superficial study of French literature. For every serious student of literature knows that, along with those masters of wit and irony, every generation of French literature has produced a succession of masters of ethical and religious thought—men of the stamp of Calvin, Bossuet, Rousseau, Châteaubriand, Lamennais—characters of intense earnestness and passionate fervour. Of those representative teachers and preachers, Pascal is perhaps the greatest, as he is certainly the most striking, personality in the Golden Age of French literature.

IV.

About the exact chronology of that Golden Age of French literature there is still, I think, a great deal of confusion of thought. To the majority of critics even to-day that Golden Age is pre-eminently the age of Louis XIV. On the contrary, to a small minority the Golden Age is the age of Richelieu. I believe that it is the minority which is right. For it is the age of Richelieu which is truly the age of reconstruction and creation. It is the age which produced everything that is greatest and most original in French culture. It is the age of Richelieu which saw the rise of the French monarchy in its modern form. It saw the establishment of the French Academy and of Port-Royal. It saw the foundation by Descartes of modern French philosophy. It saw the foundation by Corneille of the French drama.

To that age Pascal may be said to belong—a giant in a generation of giants. It is true that when the "Provincial Letters" appeared Louis XIV. had already been the nominal King of France for thirteen years. But at that date he was only eighteen years of age, and his personal rule had not begun. And it would be absurd if Louis XIV. were allowed to appropriate the fame of a writer whose genius owes all its characteristics to the discipline of an early day, and whose writings glorify every cause which it was the policy of Louis XIV. to destroy.

V.

Born in 1623, from a legal stock, belonging to the middle class, like Molière, Bossuet, and Racine, like most of the great writers of that so-called "aristocratic" age, a native of Auvergne, a country of extinct volcanoes and hardy mountaineers, Blaise Pascal was brought up in an atmosphere of piety and learning by a father of keen scientific tastes. The incidents of his education recall to us some of the circumstances in the upbringing of John Stuart Mill. A wonder child, with a marvellous disposition for mathematics, Pascal, at the age of sixteen, amazed even Descartes by his treatise on conical sections. It is to be noted in this connection that Pascal's training was almost exclusively scientific, and it is certainly remarkable that this supreme master of literary style never read more than one book of secular literature, namely, the "Essays" of Montaigne, whole pages of which are incorporated in the "Thoughts."

Blaise Pascal had to pay the penalty of his morbid precocity and of the perilous overstrain of his mental faculties. At eighteen years of age his health broke down, and we are told that after this breakdown he never knew one single day without suffering. It was under the influence of his illness and of his chance acquaintance with the Jansenists that his first "conversion" took place. He became a fervid Port-Royalist, and converted his family to his faith.

* "Pensées de Pascal" (in Collection Gallia, 1s., J. M. Dent and Sons). Introduction par Emile Boutroux et Victor Giraud. Texte de Brunschvigg.

The effects of this first "conversion" did not last, and for the next few years Pascal was diverted from exclusive absorption in religion by the distractions of society and by his interest in scientific pursuits. To this time belong his famous experiments confirming the theories of Torricelli.

In those early days Pascal little resembled the saint and enthusiast he was to become in later days. He was worldly and aggressive. He quarrelled with Descartes. He quarrelled with his admirable sister Jacqueline, and wanted to prevent her from entering the convent, partly for sordid financial reasons. During those brief years also Pascal mixed freely in Parisian society. He was a friend of libertines and freethinkers. He thought of marriage, and it is presumed that to this period belongs the "Discourse on the Passions of Love." It has also been held by many biographers that the object of Pascal's love was the sister of his friend, the Duke of Roannez, but all we know about the relations between Pascal and the Duchess of Roannez is that it was on Pascal's advice that the young lady renounced the world and entered the monastery of Port-Royal.

A carriage accident near the bridge of Neuilly, in which he was saved from imminent death by a miracle, together with a moral and intellectual crisis, brought about Pascal's second "conversion." He left Parisian society and joined the solitaries of Port-Royal. He espoused their cause against the Jesuits, and in 1656 he hurled against the Reverend Fathers the first of his eighteen "Provincial Letters." A second miracle, by which his niece, Marguerite Perrier, was cured by the touch of a thorn from the crown of Jesus Christ—a relic preserved at Port-Royal—convinced Pascal that, in defending the Port-Royalists, he was on the right side, and that Heaven was in his favour.

But a two years' ardent controversy proved too much for his highly strung constitution, already undermined. His health was ruined beyond recovery. But, together with incurable illness, ineffable happiness had come to him. Henceforward Pascal is really a newborn man. Hitherto he had been worldly; henceforth he is free from all mundane passion. He had been hard and pugnacious; he now becomes meek and charitable. He had been restless; he is now serene and smiling. He is only hard against his own self. To use the words of Professor Lanson, he "persecuted his poor body with incredible refinements of cruelty." He died in 1662, on August 19th, at thirty-nine years of age, leaving behind him the fame of one of the supreme mathematicians and physicists, as well as of one of the supreme thinkers and writers of French literature.

VI.

One must accurately recall the conditions under which Pascal's "Thoughts" were composed in order not to be misled by their character. Although conceived under the inspiration and obsession of one systematic idea, and of one settled plan, the "Thoughts" are but the disjointed notes, disjecta membra, scattered leaflets and sibylline leaves composed by an incurable invalid during the short luminous intervals in the course of a painful and lingering illness. Those leaflets, written with a trembling and fever-stricken hand, in almost illegible writing, were collected with pious care by the solitaries of Port-Royal, but they were of so bold and original a nature, and contained so many hostile references to the then all-powerful Jesuits, that the peace-loving Port-

Royalists found it necessary to expurgate all the controversial passages. It was only in our own day that the French philosopher, Victor Cousin, discovered the original manuscript, and conclusively proved that the edition of Port-Royal of 1670 had mutilated and distorted the meaning of the writer. The first revised edition based on the manuscript was published in the forties, and tried to reproduce the original plan and design of Pascal. But it must be admitted that the attempt was an impossible one. The secret of Pascal was buried with him, and all editions, even the present one, are bound to be more or less arbitrary. The "Thoughts" of Pascal are not only one of the most impressive ruins of world literature, they are also one of its most perplexing mysteries.

VII.

It has long been assumed that the "Thoughts" of Pascal have nothing in common with the "Provincial Letters," that they are devotional rather than controversial, and that the author has transported his demonstration of the truth of the Christian religion into the sublime atmosphere of philosophical and mystical contemplation. This is not so. The "Thoughts" do not constitute a breach of continuity; they are a sequel to the "Provincial Letters." They are still strongly aggressive. Pascal is still bitterly anti-Jesuitic, and, what is more, he has become more pronouncedly anti-Roman. No doubt he is emphatically anti-Protestant, speaking with horror of the heretics who reject auricular confession. But he speaks with even greater horror of the tyranny of the Papacy. And assuredly the philosopher who again and again, in a treatise which professes to be an apology of Christianity, goes out of his way to attack his opponents cannot be said to move in the serene region of pure devotion and mystic detachment.

VIII.

We must leave over for a second paper the discussion of Pascal's demonstration of the Christian religion, which is the prime object and purpose of the "Thoughts," and we take the liberty of referring to a chapter on the subject in our recent book on Cardinal Newman (T. and T. Clark, Edinburgh). We only wish, in conclusion, to draw the attention of the reader to what seems to us most truly original and epoch-making in Pascal's work. Critics have too much emphasised the duality between the scientist and the theologian. I do not see that the contradiction is as far-reaching as is generally supposed. To Pascal Science and Religion are certainly different in their object; they are not essentially different in their methods. So far from Religion being opposed to Science, in Pascal's conception it becomes itself subject to scientific treatment. Religion ceases to be an abstract logical system, or a footnote to history, or an exercise in higher criticism. It becomes experimental. To adopt the terminology of William James, used by Dr. Barry: "Religion becomes a variety of human experience." The philosophy of Religion is the interpretation of the deepest intuitions and emotions and aspirations of spiritual life. And Pascal applies all the power of a marvellous intellect to the observation and analysis of those spiritual phenomena. Nor are we pressing an accidental or artificial analogy when, in connection with Pascal, we use the vocabulary of William James's famous book. For Professor James, like Professor Boutroux and Bergson, came directly or indirectly under the influence of Pascal's genius. Pascal is really the Father of Modern Pragmatism, and the "Thoughts" of Pascal may be considered as the first as well as the most profound contribution to the new philosophy of Religion.

THE GREAT UNREST AMONG MODERN WOMEN

In the "Christian Commonwealth" of Wednesday (Oct. 1), began a series of Articles setting forth the causes and consequences of the Great Unrest Among Modern Women. Each Article will deal with a special phase of the question, supported by facts and figures, and the authority of experts. The inquiry raises a number of important questions bearing upon industrial life, home life, religion, education, and the professions; the physique of the nation, the physical and mental nature of women, and the production and care of children; the future of womanhood, and the protection they need by means of the vote, legislation, and an enlightened public conscience. As it touches modern life at all points the inquiry will have great interest for all men and women.

THE OTHER SIDE OF GERMAN UNIVERSITY EDUCATION

By E. A. PARKER

IT is, in part, as a supplement to Mr. Waterhouse's article in EVERYMAN for September 5th, on "Where Germany Leads," that I should like to add a few plain facts from personal knowledge as student in England and lecturer in an Austrian university. Briefly, Mr. Waterhouse has painted in the high lights of the picture and left out the shadows. Germany's so-called superiority to England, he says, is shown "nowhere more than in education," but there is no mention made of the child-suicides committed in appalling numbers in every great German city by youths who are crammed so as to pass the leaving examination, or "Abitur," and be freed from a year's military service or gain entrance to a University—and who fail; no mention of the hatred which German Old Boys cherish to so vast an extent for the old school where their heads were ground to powder in a way that would instantly raise a storm among English parents if their boys were treated so. (That grinding is the system's fault, not the very worthy German master's.)

I.

Then, Germany's commercial success is attributed partly to her borrowings from England. True; the success is due to the practice of German firms sending picked men to study English methods in factory and forge, and bettering these methods on the men's return, and also—and here we in England might well imitate—to the grand system of technical instruction given in colleges of University rank. We have such institutions, but not half enough, nor are ours to be compared in size with the German.

II.

As for number of universities, do not England's eleven universities and thirteen university colleges for a population of 44,000,000 compare well with Germany's twenty-one universities for 66,000,000? Indeed, if the number of universities in a country count for anything, surely Italy, with her twenty-one for 32,000,000 of population, ought to outstrip Germany in intelligence.

We are bidden admire the strength of the German university staffs—while unhappy Rostock has for many years appealed to the German Government in vain to support an English lecturer. On the other hand, Austria (synonymous with Germany in these matters), at another University, gives full support to a learned professor of certain Oriental languages who never gets a student! Behold the impartiality which obtains at State-supported universities, and also the call for some of these outlandish languages, for the teaching of which Germany is so magnified!

III.

On the material advantages that German students are said to enjoy, Mr. Waterhouse has much to say. With the suggestion on medical attendance at a low rate I am glad to be heartily at one with him. On other points, comparison with England is illuminating. Four or five shillings a year, it is said, gives a German student entrance to his university reading-room, and five shillings more entitles a Berlin student to browse in the University Library of 600,000 vols. and the Royal Prussian Library of 1,300,000 vols., while there lies also a departmental library at his command. If Birmingham be taken as the matching instance, there the student has access to the club, to a University library of 75,000 vols., his departmental library, the City Lending Library of 60,000 vols., a reference library of 250,000 vols., and a Shakespeare collection—the first in the world—of 15,000 vols.—all free.

One other most interesting point is the relative lowness of lecture-fees in Germany. This is very true and striking. The immediate result is an influx of students without parallel in England. And those students? A German professor, who honours me with his friendship, has described to me how his lecture-room at Vienna was invaded on cold winter mornings by numbers of wretchedly poor students, quite unconnected with the lecture being given, who stole in for warmth's sake. He, kind-hearted man, let them stay, but there's a commentary on the quality of numbers!

Then, after these masses of students leave their Alma Mater, what do they do? There cannot be head-work for so many, not even clerkships. Will they turn to manual labour? Not likely. "Dig I cannot, to beg I am ashamed." And so Prussia has annually to import 300,000 labourers of Polish and Slav extraction to harvest her crops, while these poor, half-baked scholars sink slowly to the under-dogs, and leaven the down-trodden with a spirit of anarchy and revolt. The German Ministry of Education knows that problem well.

IV.

Last point of all, with the question of comparative cost of rooms and living I confess total inability to cope. So far as I myself have experience, quality of rooms and food being the same, rates of living are practically the same in Germany and England, though places differ widely, living in Vienna costing half as much again as in any other Austrian city, to my knowledge.

It is as well, perhaps, that the English colony of Leipzig, "feasting on salmon and wild boar" in the Zeitzerstrasse, should be ignorant of the proven fact that in certain quarters of Berlin poverty-stricken folk creep after dark to buy for themselves at butchers' shops meat we should not give to dogs. Here, then, is a person—sane, I hope—who, with rather more than "twenty-four hours' experience of a large German town," can talk of horseflesh and black bread, for the latter I have eaten in Prussia, and the former—who knows?

In conclusion, may I thank Mr. Waterhouse for much learnt from his article, which I implicitly believe, so far as it goes? It is, however, these wretched bright-sides and half-truths about Germany and other things which make "the British public close its eyes and ears in disgust, and refuse to learn at all." Too many people in England now have inside knowledge of Germany to be disturbed by cries about our brother-country's surpassing advantages. Whatever we think of such advantages, we know of great disadvantages, and State-supported education has its full share of the latter, especially under German bureaucratic rule.

Does Mr. Waterhouse know the saying of a renowned German professor, published quite recently with other views of great Germans on their educational system, that if a German gymnasium-trained youth and an English public-school boy were dropped together in a land of black savages, the English youth would instantly set about ruling them, while the German would be quite content to be his clerk?

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Owing to the large number of letters received it is necessary for correspondents to write briefly if their letters are to appear.

IS ROMANISM ON THE DECLINE?

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I would desire to publicly thank Mr. Hector Macpherson for the many fascinating articles he has in the past (and will have, I hope, in the future) contributed to EVERYMAN from time to time. His recent article on Romanism seemed to be particularly brilliant. He opens his subject on Romanism in Scotland.

Might I trespass on your space with a few facts relative to the condition of Roman Catholicism in England?

(1) At the Wigan Roman Catholic Conference, 1891, Abbot Snow said, "We cannot with any show of reason expect many conversions in the midst of the spiritual wreck and ruin that we see amongst Roman Catholics; we scarcely dare to ask others to join a society of men of whom we ourselves are ashamed." Father Powell again declared "that while the population of London had increased by a million in twenty years, the number of Roman Catholics publicly baptised had only increased eleven annually."

Rev. T. S. Mitchell, in the Roman Catholic News, August, 1890, said, "We must not be under the impression that we gain ground. We are fast decreasing, and if we go on as we are, England will never be Roman Catholic. During the last forty years we have lost a million souls."

Cardinal Manning years ago reckoned the Roman Catholics in England at 1,400,000, and Cardinal Vaughan gave the same return in his Pastoral, June 12th, 1898. Of those about one million were Irish, 100,000 foreigners, and only 300,000 English!

(2) If this be so in England, it is certain that there is a steady decrease in Roman Catholic countries. Look at the Latin races. Even Dr. Barry wrote in the Catholic Union Gazette (February, 1897), "The despair of the (Roman) Church are the so-called Latin nations. I need not dwell upon a painful and familiar subject."

Rome terms France "the eldest son of the Church." At a recent census, out of 37,000,000 (with 650,000 Protestants), no less than 7,500,000 returned themselves as "of no religion." This is an interesting example of the result of freedom after years of spiritual bondage and corruption under the dominion of Papal Rome. The loudly-boasted increase, therefore, proves to be a fallacy when subjected to these facts. Rome still parades Newman and Manning before the public, but she omits to mention Dr. Dollinger, A. W. Hutton, and many others who have "come out." It has been calculated (S.P.C.K. Statistics) that relatively to population more Romish priests have become Protestants in the last fifty years or so than Anglican clergy have seceded to Rome.

But "Dum loquimur, fugerit invida ætas," let Rome learn from the Past, if she would succeed in the Future!—I am, sir, etc.,

Bristol.

FREDK. R. P. SUMNER.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—The "No-Popery" Tract to which we are treated by Mr. Macpherson in your issue of September 26th is a delightful instance of those reactionary symptoms which he so strongly condemns, and it contains, moreover, quite as many gratuitous assertions to the square inch as its predecessors of sixty years ago.

The points he raises are too numerous for treatment in a brief letter, but as instances of the untenable nature of his arguments I may quote those on England and France.

With a blind faith in the ignorance of his readers, he quotes the oracular McCabe:—"Where . . . are the successors of Newman, Patmore, De Vere, and Acton?" (etc.). They are, among others, Francis Thompson, Alice Meynell, John Ayscough, Mgr. Benson, Cecil Chesterton, Belloc, and Shane Leslie. There can be no talk of lowered intellectual prestige with such names as these to choose from. He further states (again echoing Mr. McCabe), "Even the clergy . . . abandon the Church in a remarkable proportion." I am afraid someone's leg has been pulled. It is in effect a remarkable proportion, but remarkably low, and I challenge your contributor to show that the total is anything like as great as that of the addition to the clergy from conversions.

As regards France, Mr. Macpherson is still more behind the times. In the face of the considerable improvement in spiritual conditions in the French Church, which has been noted on all hands, and in the face of the notable revival of Catholic literature in France during the last ten years, his position is absurd. The Catholic forces summed up in the great name of Brunetière triumphed over the irreligious elements in French literature almost a decade ago, and now it is Champol and Bazin (to cite no more) who hold the virile French mind to the exclusion of Zola and all his works.

May I, in conclusion, remind Mr. Macpherson that Modernism is dead? He complains that the Church was not elastic enough to contain it; but on the impossible supposition that Catholicism had embraced this error, would he not have been the first to hurl at us the reproach of inconsistency? It has always seemed to me that such discourteous extremists as Mr. McCabe are chiefly irritated because the Church had too firm a grasp of Christian first principles to commit the suicide for which they piously and vainly wait. Oh, the blessed words progress and education! But it was by education that the Jesuits saved Christendom at the Reformation, and in view of the panic-stricken letters on Social Reform, which appear in your excellent columns, one would think a little reaction by way of a change might result in true progress after all!—I am, sir, etc.,

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—It was with keen satisfaction that I read "Is Rome on the Decline?" I took the publication of the article as an indication that EVERYMAN is maintaining its particularly striking feature of allowing all sides to have their say. But it was with downright amusement that I noted your contributor's proofs of his thesis. Cannot the effulgent Protestant intellectuality of Mr. Macpherson allow him to realise that no quantity of unproved assertions like the following, "We are told that the Italian Church will soon be a body of 20,000,000 illiterates and children," carry any weight except with the muddle-headed? It is, however, to his credit that he does condescend to attempt to give one tangible fact. He quotes a Mr. McCabe, who in turn refers us to a Mr. McCarthy. The wonderful fact, the credit for having discovered which Mr. Macpherson and Mr. McCabe humbly and admiringly put on the shoulders of Mr. McCarthy, consists in asserting that American Roman Catholics must be a particularly ignorant body, because out of a total of 448 American Universities these Catholics can only claim sixty-one Universities as their own. But what of these American Universities? The readers of EVERYMAN will remember a recent article which indicated that so lax were the American regulations governing the formation of American Universities, that most of the Universities in that country consisted of little girls' schools, village academies, and, we suppose, "Squeers" institutions.

Getting away from great facts like that belonging to the three Macs, let us have a look at a few weighty opinions. Mr. R. J. Campbell, the notable new-theology minister, declared in the course of an interview a short while since that the thing which impressed him most in the religious life of America was: "The growth of the influence of the Roman Catholic Church since I was last there in the States, nine years ago. The Press shows more deference to Romanism than it does to Protestantism. Boston, once the home of Puritanism, is now under Catholic domination. On Thanksgiving Day the President of the United States, although not himself a Catholic, attended Mass at the Catholic Cathedral." Dr. Gore, the Anglican Bishop of Oxford, has stated that: "There is hardly anything in Europe which interests me at this moment so much as the great spiritual revival which we see taking place in the French Church. The French Church is in many ways vindicating its claim to be the Church of the country in directions which surprise us. Though doubtless the Church has lost influence in many ways, there has been, and I believe will be, a great revival."

The gentlemen quoted above are not Roman Catholics. Neither are they unfrocked priests with a stock of malignant tales of the sort usually found in the repertoire of people of the discharged-servant type. If they have any axe to grind, it is the non-Catholic one. Can anybody read what they have to say without drawing the conclusion that Roman Catholicism is not on the decline? Surely it is plain that Catholicism has not such a black outlook as Mr. Macpherson would have us believe. Mr. McCabe, upon whose testimony Mr. Macpherson in his article so much relies, has stated that: "During the protracted existence of the Church of Rome it has encountered and triumphed over many kinds of opposition. It emerged victorious from its secular struggle with polytheistic Rome and with the destructive Hellenism of Alexandria; it met confidently and rose upon the flood of barbarism that poured out over Southern Europe; it guided its fortunes safely through the age of iron that followed, and then controlled the fierce intellectual activity of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries; it subdued and repressed the Renaissance, and almost compensated its losses in the great Reformation." Is a Church of this kind likely to fail in the future? Lord Macaulay, a non-Catholic, did not think so. He believed that Roman Catholicism would last as long as the race of men. Another non-Catholic, Mr. H. G. Wells, one of the acutest thinkers of the present day, has even gone so far as to express the opinion that: "We are on the verge of one of the greatest Catholic revivals the world has ever seen." Can, I ask, all these distinguished gentlemen be wrong and Mr. Macpherson right?—I am, sir, etc.,

INTERNATIONAL MORALITY.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—In reading the interesting letter of your correspondent "H. S." in the issue of September 19th I was compelled to recognise how true are the words of Pythagoras, "It is necessary to get out of the body to think," and how aptly they apply to our British nation. "H. S." complains of Dr. Sarolea's criticising through un-English spectacles, but I maintain that it is a far graver error to examine the nations and their comparative morality through wholly English spectacles, for thus we get a still more inadequate and one-sided view of the situation. I consider Dr. Sarolea quite right in his opinion on our monopolising of virtues. The average Britisher has the blank audacity to regard the outside world as being deeply indebted to us for all its morality. This is not only national arrogance, but injustice; for justice and liberty, for instance, were preached and practised, to some extent, centuries before Britain was heard of. How, then, does the world owe us a debt for these virtues? Toward the end of the letter we are given a list of the lamentable misdeeds of other nations; but are we innocent and spotless that we should condemn them? Is our record blameless? I fear not. The "glorious Empire on which the sun never sets," and of which we boast so much on every May 24th, was not annexed by spotless hands and without bloodshed, nor has it been retained by fair and just methods. We, as a nation, are too arrogant, too much inclined to judge others by our own standard, and too heedless of Christ's advice and warning in such matters (Matthew vii. 1-5). If the writer desires a standard by which to judge the nations of the world, let him not look to the strongest military nation, nor any other nation, but to the promised perfect nation, built up on Christ's ideals; and when our nation is faultless when compared with this, then, and not till then, shall we be justified in judging our neighbours.—I am, sir, etc.,

JOHN BRIGHT.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Mr. Ellerthorpe, in your issue of September 19th, affirms that John Bright never stated that adulteration was a legitimate form of competition. May I ask Mr. Ellerthorpe for proof of his affirmation, for he gives none? I take it that he will not also affirm that he heard every public word that Mr. Bright uttered. I have a most distinct and definite recollection of the reported statement being made by Mr. Bright many years ago, and of the outcry there was at the time.—I am, sir, etc.,

"MARY GOES FIRST."

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Mr. Clifton York, in his article on this play in your columns, seems to find in it a political moral of supreme importance. What is the story in its political aspect, in short? A rich man supplies money for his wife's "brother-in-law-elect" to become Parliamentary candidate as a Liberal. The candidate specially works up his subject and gets elected by a constituency which previously returned a Tory. That is to say that it is the case of a man with little or no principles who manages to persuade an electorate to let him represent them in Parliament simply for the honour of his being an M.P.

Such a case is not an uncommon one now, but neither has it ever been an uncommon one; and it cannot easily be shown that Parliament has in the long run been very unworthy of the country. The man may make a good or a bad representative; but the question vital to the nation is whether or not the electorate has been free to choose a man, if it preferred one, with less adaptable principles. EMPLOYMENT AFTER EDUCATION.

The Views of the Duchess of Marlborough, a Solicitor-General, and Presidents of Chambers of Commerce.

Supreme Award, Section J., FESTIVAL OF EMPIRE.

Gold Medal for Secretarial Training.

Gold Medal for Special City Course.

The Festival of Empire.—For the first time in its history the claims of the College itself, as apart from the achievements of its Students, have been subjected to the rigorous ordeal of a searching examination by a British Jury. Of the Public Institutions represented at the Great Festival of Empire, which was perhaps one of the greatest conceptions of modern times, the unique distinction of the Sole Award for Secretarial and Commercial Training—that of the Gold Medal—was conferred on Kensington College by the Council, which, it will be remembered, consisted of H.R.H. Princess Louise, Duchess of Argyll, His Grace the Duke of Norfolk, His Grace the Duke of Devonshire, His Grace the Duke of Argyll, and a long list of illustrious personages.

Kensington College, it will be remembered, is "the only Institution in the world which enters into a Binding Contract to provide for every Student when qualified a choice of satisfactory appointments from which to select a congenial career."

Solicitor-General's Opinion: It does not seem so very long since this College attained its majority, when Sir Samuel Evans, then Solicitor-General, speaking from the Chair, said, "That part of the Educational system of this country which is deficient in many respects from the public point of view appears to me to be admirably done by this College." Sir Albert Rollit, on the same occasion, stated his opinion that "The College has solved one of the greatest and the most difficult of all Educational problems—that of securing Employment after Education."

The Duchess of Marlborough, who had previously watched the Students at their work with the keenest interest, commended the practical nature of the Instruction given. The Students, she considered, were not only capable of filling posts, but they were also guaranteed a good start in life.

Mr. James Munford, the Director, said there was not a single Student seeking an appointment, and such was the demand for the services of the College Graduates, that it was impossible to meet it adequately.

A Knight of the Legion of Honour and Ex-President of the British Chamber of Commerce in Paris, in opening Winter Term, said he was very much gratified to have this opportunity of saying that Kensington College stood first and foremost in its work for the preparation of young men and young women for an active and successful career.

That eminent orator, The Dean of Carlisle, said on another occasion: "Kensington College differs from any other I have heard of, inasmuch as it not only educates the Students, but provides positions for them in the world afterwards."

TRAINING.

Practical training for the practical duties of life is the Keypnote of all work at Kensington College. Special attention is given to Modern Languages. Gratifying successes at the London Chamber of Commerce and other Public Examinations eloquently testify to the thoroughness of the training in this and, in fact, all departments of the Curriculum. Not long ago the Travelling Scholarship offered by the Salters' Company, value £25, was captured by a College Student. Double Distinctions in both the Oral and Written part of the languages are the rule rather than the exception.

Sir Francis Fleming said: "There are many questions of more or less importance engaging the attention of the public at the present time, but I venture to think that there is no question which occupies public attention more deserving of our most careful consideration than that of education. There is little use in training boys and girls during the infant years of lifetime, and in spending money and time and attention upon their education, if at the termination of that time they are cast into the world with no idea as to what they are going to do and no idea of the position which they are going to fill. The object of this Institution is not only to give a higher education, which is absolutely necessary, but also to find a position in life for those who have been thus educated. It not only puts the finishing touch to the picture of education, but it finds the frame in which to put that picture so as to keep it from harm and so as to preserve it from decay."

MODEL OFFICES.

When they have finished their academical studies in the College Schools of Languages, Book-keeping and Accountancy, Shorthand and Typewriting, and have passed the necessary tests, they are transferred to the Model Offices, where for a Term they undertake the practical work of the College, thus being trained in all the duties appertaining to a Secretary, acting alternately as Reception Secretary, Telephone Secretary, Postal Secretary, Orderly Secretary, Accountant, English and Foreign Correspondent, and Superintendent of the Office; in fact, they receive such a training that it is perfectly safe to say cannot be obtained elsewhere.

KENSINGTON COLLEGE DIPLOMA.

When they have given sufficient practical proof of their ability to discharge their duties in a thoroughly efficient manner, they are granted the Kensington College Diploma, which may be truly said to be more valuable than the diploma of any other institution in the world, seeing that the holder thereof possesses the right of introduction to a dignified and remunerative appointment.

State Inauguration by a Lord Mayor of London.—Never before in the annals of any College has such a thing been known as the State Inauguration of Term by a Lord Mayor of London, yet such was the honour recently paid to Kensington College.

In a practical, sound, and businesslike speech, his Lordship alluded to the novel work which, under the able direction of Mr. Munford, during the past twenty-five years the College has been carrying on. Not only, he went on to say, did the College train the rising generation in all practical subjects necessary to achieve success, but it positively guaranteed—and this was the novel and unique feature of the College—to provide a satisfactory appointment for every qualified pupil.

GUARANTEED APPOINTMENTS.

The trouble at Kensington College is not to secure appointments for the candidates, but to keep pace with the ever-increasing applications for the services of College Graduates.

The work of this unique institution certainly carries comfort to the hearts of the parents and guardians who entrust their charges to its care.

MOTTO.

The motto adopted by the College is one suggested by the Right Hon. the Earl of Lytton, when speaking from the chair at a recent Distribution, it being a variation of Dante's inscription over the Gates of the Inferno. His Lordship suggested that the appropriate motto to inscribe over the Portals of Kensington College was, "Have every hope all ye who enter here."

The attached coupon, addressed to Miss Eva Munford, Secretary, Kensington College, 34, Gloucester Gardens, London, W., will bring by return of post an Illustrated Prospectus containing full particulars of the Guaranteed Appointment System, similar to that graciously accepted by Her Majesty Queen Alexandra, together with an illustrated souvenir similar to that also graciously accepted by her Royal Highness Princess Louise, Duchess of Argyll.

CONSULTATIONS.

Mr. James Munford, F.R.C.I., the Director, is ever ready to give his advice on the subject of a suitable career for boy or girl to all bona-fide applicants personally or by post. Appointments may be made by telephone—4348 Padd.—or otherwise.

of AUTHORSHIP.

The prize of Three Guineas offered by EVERYMAN for the best essay on "The Male Teacher" has been won by Mr. John E. Stewart, M.A., a student of the School of Authorship. The winning essay appeared in last week's issue. Once again this proves the thoroughness of S.O.A. training, and the practical nature of the courses offered. S.O.A. students are winning recognition everywhere, and in a surprisingly short time. Some of them have actually had articles accepted by leading journals before they had finished the course—and they had never written anything previously for publication.

If you aspire to become a writer of articles and short stories, or a novelist or journalist, join the S.O.A. Mr. Richard Whiteing, author of "No. 5, John Street," etc., says, "You could not have a more practical director."

The fees are low and you can study at your own convenience. Personal or postal tuition. Easy instalments if desired. Send 1d. stamp for particulars. Principal, Mr. G. H. author of the article seems to suggest, not that money has and has always had too much influence in political elections—he probably would have had the majority of men in agreement with him if he had—but he seems rather to suggest that £ s. d. has more influence now than ever before, and seems to think that the play points to the same conclusion. He is surely quite wrong, for M.P.s now get a good living wage, and consequently the electors have a better opportunity of electing the best man, and the nomination of the Whip and of the party headquarters is less likely than previously to be influenced by money considerations. The author concludes that "all is not well with our democracy," but, whether he be right or wrong, he does not convince that the play is typical of political cases which are more frequent now than in the past.

But if Mr. Henry Arthur Jones can, by means of this play, improve upon the past in the bonâ-fide representation of the democracy in Parliament, he will deserve well of his country.—I am, sir, etc.,

THE PLIMSOLL LINE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—For Mr. Blundell's information I would quote the Shipping Gazette of Wednesday, September 10th, 1913. The article is too long to quote in full, but the following will give Mr. Blundell the truth of the matter:—

"In 1893 the proportion of masters and seamen who lost their lives in wrecks was 1 in 134, or .74 per cent. In 1903 it was 1 in 233, or .43 per cent., and in 1905 1 in 249, or .40 per cent. In 1906, the year in which the present loadline came into force, it was 1 in 341, or .29 per cent. In none of the succeeding years, except last year, when 672 seamen went down with the Titanic, was the percentage greater than .40 per cent. In 1909, indeed, it was .31 per cent., and in 1908 and 1911 it was .33 per cent. Last year, with the Titanic figures included, it was .53 per cent.—a percentage which was exceeded, it should be noted, by no fewer than seven of the years prior to 1906. As we have said, we do not suggest that the loadline has anything to do with the greater safety which these figures show. We submit, however, that they are quite convincing disproof of the allegation that since the free-board regulations of 1906 came into force the lives of men have been sacrificed in order to enrich ship-owners."—I am, sir, etc.,

M. HUNTLEY.

Roker, Sunderland, September 22nd, 1913.

NATIONAL HOUSING.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Mr. Money has answered his critics in the masterly way that only Mr. Money could. But it now appears that Mr. Money's scheme was not intended for the present time, but for some future time, after three other large measures of reform have been carried out, namely, a reform of the rating system, the adoption of compulsory purchase of land at its agricultural value, and the provision of cheap transport by the State. As each of these three appears fairly remote, it would rather seem that Mr. Money has begun at the wrong end in bringing out his housing scheme at the present moment. One might perhaps be excused for wondering, in parenthesis, why, if the State can take power to buy land at less than its actual value, it cannot go all the way and take the land for nothing.

If space permitted, I would not mind debating every one of Mr. Money's points, but it will be enough to take two or three of the most important.

As to repairs, Mr. Money admits the error in the figure, but he forgets that the error was carried forward, and then when the correction is made the rent of the house becomes 8s. 3d. per week, or £21 10s. 5d. per annum, which means also an annual charge of 5s. 4d. for inhabited house duty, besides other incidents (as things are at present, that is). As Mr. Money is comparatively a young man, and he "has always lived in houses built specially for him," he has probably always abandoned them before the repairs became heavy.

As to insurance, it would be more correctly described as a distribution of the cost of repairing accidental damage. In the case of State undertakings, of course all costs are distributed, but the charge has still to be met. That is to say, the State must either pay the cost of absolutely preventing any accidental destruction of its property or bear the loss when it is so destroyed.

When a battleship is sunk we must either pay the price of a new one in additional taxation or be minus a battleship.

As to price of land, it is presumed that the operations of the State would not be confined to within fifty minutes of the London termini.

Here, in a small township of 3,400 inhabitants, on the edge of the Yorkshire moors, there is no land obtainable for building at less than double Mr. Money's price of £240 an acre. Mr. Money should not imagine that he has a monopoly of data.—I am, sir, etc.,
A. CLARK.

Penistone, September 22nd, 1913.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I withdraw my opinion of Mr. Chiozza Money. He is not an "impractical visionary," but an "impractical predatory visionary."

Nor do I like his timidity. Is land too dear? Acquire it at agricultural value. Are rates too high? Call them "local income-tax" and raise them. Is fifty minutes from town too far away to house the democracy? Build a fleet of passenger aeroplanes and add the cost "to the local income-tax." Are bricks and tiles too dear? Buy them at the cost of unburnt clay.

Just one deft touch of imagination and difficulties vanish. Happy State! No empties, no insurance, no cost of rent collection, no visits from sanitary authorities on account of infectious disease, no flitting or dirty tenants, drains and plumbing, always well-behaved, no cracked coppers or broken ranges, no leaky roofs. One per cent. per annum will cover these and many other items, and provide for the ultimate scrapping of these desirable residences.

But the discovery of the detached house costing £400, "complete in point of fitments" and of the rental value of £45 per annum, is as epoch-making as the invention of motors or aeroplanes. It must not be allowed to be buried in the comparative obscurity of your columns.

Mr. Money must arrange to read a paper at the R.I.B.A. on "Dream Dwellings" in conjunction with his architect, who might follow with "The Visionary's Villa."

As one of the poor democracy who pays local and other income-tax, I trust our progress may continue slow until wider knowledge, clearer vision, and sounder finance point to saner progress.—I am, sir, etc.,

CHARLOTTE BRONTË'S LETTERS.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Your correspondence column relating to Charlotte Brontë not yet being closed, I venture to suggest that the following extract from a letter written by her in the same year, and apparently either the same month, or only one later than the one describing to the professor her fast-failing sight, be inserted for the benefit of those readers of your pages who as yet have not familiarised themselves with her "Life" as presented to us by Mrs. Gaskell. Thus she writes to a friend:—

"Ten years ago I should have laughed at your account of the blunder you made in mistaking the bachelor doctor for a married man. I should have certainly thought you scrupulous over-much, and wondered how you could possibly regret being civil to a decent individual, merely because he happened to be single, instead of double. Now, however, I can perceive that your scruples are founded on common sense. I know that if women wish to escape the stigma of husband-seeking, they must act and look like marble or clay-cold, expressionless, bloodless; for every appearance of feeling, of joy, sorrow, friendliness, antipathy, admiration, disgust are alike construed by the world into the attempt to hook a husband. Never mind; well-meaning women have their own consciences to comfort them after all. Do not, therefore, be too much afraid of showing yourself as you are, affectionate and good-hearted; do not too harshly repress sentiments and feelings excellent in themselves, because you fear that some puppy may fancy that you are letting them come out to fascinate him; do not condemn yourself to live only by halves. . . ."

For my own part I have felt there has been something sadly lacking from all the articles written about Charlotte Brontë's correspondence with Professor Heger. To me, there seems to have been a total disregard of any Higher Power influencing and directing the hearts and minds of these two. May it not be that the all-guiding hand of God Himself arrested any outward sign of response and laid upon the lonely genius of the moors the heavy burden of unsatisfied heart-craving, lest by winning one atom of return for the immeasurable admiration she herself bestowed the strong heart of Charlotte Brontë should ever condemn itself as unworthy?

Reading one of these letters in the original French:

"Cette faiblesse de vue est pour moi une terrible privation; sans cela, savez-vous ce que je ferais, Monsieur? J'écrirais un livre et je le dédierais à mon maître de littérature, au seul maître que j'aie jamais eu—à vous, Monsieur! Je vous ai dit souvent en français combien je vous respecte, combien je suis redevable à votre bonté, à vos conseils. Je voudrais le dire une fois en anglais. Cela ne se peut pas; il ne faut pas y penser. La carrière des lettres m'est fermée. . . . N'oubliez pas de me dire comment vous vous portez, comment madame et les enfants se portent. Je compte bientôt avoir de vos nouvelles; cette idée me sourit, car le souvenir de vos bontés ne s'effacera jamais de ma mémoire, et tant que ce souvenir durera le respect que vous m'avez inspiré durera aussi. . . ."

It strikes me that the real spirit of the letters can only be judged rightly in the language in which they were written. The tender, musical terms of homage and regard in French suffer terribly when translated into our blunt, insular tongue. In any case, the translation of this particular letter omits to give us the sincere expressions of esteem and remembrance with which the writer closes.

Surely in these days, when such lives as Charlotte Brontë's are rare, those who would censure the one gleam penetrating the sullen gloom surrounding life in the Haworth parsonage—the joy of writing exquisitely phrased letters to the one being she had met whose intellect was at all on an equal with her own—must be possessed of minds as gross and calumnious as they are ignominious and contemptible.

I read Charlotte Brontë's Life for the first time seven years ago on leaving school. She was then, and still is, my ideal of English womanhood; and the whole volley of articles, letters, criticisms, etc., which these subsequent revelations have produced have aroused in me a most nauseating sense of indignation.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

THE WORLD'S DAUGHTER, by Cyril Harcourt (John Lane, 6s.), is written in the first person, and deals with an obvious and conventional type of woman. The story suffers severely from the form in which it is written; it needs the genius of a Thackeray to create a character sufficiently strong to tell other people's histories and, at the same time, preserve the aloofness which is essential for the success of a narrator. The difficulty that meets an author at the outset is just this: a first-person story must not emphasise the qualities of the teller of the tale, and yet, if his personality is too colourless, no one will care to read the book. It is the latter pitfall in which Mr. Harcourt has fallen. Throughout the piece Jerry is a colourless, almost inane individual, and his lack of grip is emphasised by the extreme stress laid on the heroine's strength of will. Ursula is supposed to be a modern tom-boy, one of those fictional characters that, stereotyped and unreal, are trotted out at intervals to bolster up a feeble plot. For the rest the story is written in a fairly easy style, with glimpses of humour and an occasional flash of characterisation that make us regret the author should have selected the out-worn theme on which he has based his performance. The lightness of touch carries one along from page to page, so that, even while we criticise, we go on reading. There is an occasional lapse into the melodramatic which at times touches the bizarre, notably the interview between Jerry and the woman of Piccadilly Circus, to whom, of all persons in the world, he turns for advice as to the best course to pursue in relation to the girl he hopes to make his wife.

Mr. A. C. Benson is more notable as a man of letters than as a novelist. When, however, he issues a work of fiction, one is sure to find a volume provocative of thought and distinguished in style. WATER-SPRINGS (Smith, Elder and Co., 6s.) opens with a felicitous description of Beaufort College, Cambridge. He sketches the old courtyard with the ivied buttresses and mullioned windows until the scene rises before you, and you visualise the charm of the place. The story centres round Howard Kennedy, Fellow and Lecturer to the College. A man of singular charm of personality, liked by the undergrads and esteemed by his contemporaries, he finds himself at forty years of age conscious of that feeling of dissatisfaction which comes on men verging on the middle period of life.

He feels he is without any vital interest, and the advent of Jack Sandys increases the discontent. Jack is a great favourite with Kennedy and with most other people. He is a typical study of youth, with all its limitations, crudities, and vanity, but possessed of that vital desire to know "real things" that carries a young man so far along the road to success. The chapters dealing with life at the 'Varsity are among the best in the book, and it is with regret that we leave the College for a small country village, whither Kennedy goes to visit his aunt and incidentally analyse his spiritual condition. Mrs. Graves, the aunt in question, is a delightful old lady, who is described as making "religion an art"; but, while her particular philosophy is admirably adapted to her own requirements, it does not suggest anything very hopeful or new. She tells Kennedy that the great thing to do is to develop the power of loving so that individuals will count but little as compared with the fact that they are there to be loved. She explains that it does not hurt her to feel that a future life may separate her from all those she cares for, so long as there are other people on whom she can lavish her affection.

"It is the power of caring that matters, more than the power of caring for particular people. . . . You see, I do not believe . . . in memory lasting. . . . When I die, I do not feel sure that I shall have any recollection of you or Maud or my own dear husband. . . . But I have learned how to love, and you have learned how to love, and we shall find others' souls to draw near to us as the ages go on; and so I look forward to death calmly enough, because wherever I am I shall have souls to love and I shall find souls to love me."

Kennedy finds a cure for the vague discontent that troubles him in the love of Maud, Jack's sister, whom he marries to his own and his aunt's contentment. The psychological analyses of the author are brilliantly thought out and expressed, and it is hardly necessary to add that the book is written in a leisured, scholarly fashion, characteristic of Mr. Benson. But, while the spiritual experiences of Kennedy are admirably dealt with, that portion of the book that deals with life at College remains the most convincing.

Miss Cynthia Stockley has published a book called THE DREAM SHIP (Constable, 6s.). It is a very mystical kind of book indeed, and at times the symbolism is of so involved a character that it is difficult to determine whether the author is alluding to things as they are or as they appear in the realm of imagination. The hero of the novel is an Irishman given over to dreams which have so strong a hold on him that he is in danger of living in a world of illusion. He is shocked back to reality by meeting one Valentine, a marvellous woman, who combines physical beauty of a rare order with unique mental attributes, and fascinations of so fatal a character that no man can resist her. She is in effect the type of syren beloved by novelists of a certain school; and one is used to find her in the guise of an adventuress. Miss Stockley goes one better, however, and depicts the woman as an entirely good as well as infinitely charming person. She is by way of being a journalist, and her abilities are stupendous. The tale of her excellences, indeed, becomes a trifle boring; such a woman never lived, on land or sea, and, as conquest follows conquest, one longs that some accident may happen to this universally adored one. Westenra, the chief mystic of the story, the Irishman above referred to, finally carries off the prize; the lady, who has already been married and whose matrimonial experiences have not been of a pleasing nature, decides she will leave the world she has dazzled so successfully and retire to South Africa, where she spent her early girlhood. Westenra, who has occupied his leisure time in making scientific discoveries calculated to revolutionise the world of industry, and is in the running for the Nobel Prize, abandons his studies at her behest and accompanies her to the Dark Continent, there to trek into remote regions where no man has trod, to hunt big game, and lead generally an idyllic existence. On the whole, our sympathies go out to the mystic, and we hope that Valentine will give her fascinations for a time a rest.

It is not often we meet with an author who has mastered the art of writing fairy stories of the type that boys and girls appreciate and eagerly devour. Mrs. Kathleen Clare Watson has written some charming tales which form the first volumes of the WONDERLAND SERIES (Jarrolds, 1s. net.). The author has realised the necessity of investing the things of everyday life with the magic potentiality that for every child lurks in familiar objects. A chair that will suddenly turn into a dragon appeals to a child much more than the advent of a fantastic creature of which he has never heard. "The Flying House," perhaps the best of the three stories, gives the genuine thrill. The adventures of the boys who go to the magic cottage are of the kind that small people dream about and hope one day to emulate, and their fearful joy when the cottage suddenly and without warning flies through the air is the real right thing. "Sea Foam," being the adventures of a doll, makes a dainty story. The children of the tales belong neither to the goody-goody type nor to the more modern cult of precocious infants; they are ordinary wholesome children, and the calmness with which they accept the magical happenings is eminently realistic. Mrs. Watson is to be congratulated on having achieved a very difficult thing. She writes real stories for real children, and brings that suggestion of mystery into her work without which no fairy story can exist.

We are accustomed to regard Mr. Maurice Hewlett as pre-eminent in the world of romance. Ever since his inimitable novel, "The Forest Lovers," his admirers have expected from him stories set in a by-gone age. He has pre-eminently the capacity for creating an atmosphere, and sets his theme with such consummate skill that we visualise not only the characters, but each detail of their surroundings. Prosper Le Gai is as much alive as any hero of modern days, yet the tale is never marred by any suggestion of other times than those in which he lives. The same magic touch is found in the "Queen's Quair" and "The Song of Renny." In his latest novel, BENDISH (Macmillan, 6s.), Mr. Hewlett makes a new departure. The story is laid in the time of William IV. and the period is that immediately preceding the passing of the Reform Bill. We are taken into an atmosphere of politics—a far cry from the green glades of the forest of mystery—and introduced to wire-pullers and intriguers galore. Bendish is a young aristocrat of brilliant attainments and quick emotions who throws himself headlong into every passing phase of interest. It is in effect a study of prodigality as applied to character. Swayed by each passing gust of enthusiasm, Bendish chops and changes, suiting his political course to the wind of temporary advantage. The character of Roger, the stolid young Englishman whose native honour and fidelity out-match the other's more showy gifts, is admirably drawn. He wins the girl on whom Bendish has finally decided to bestow his affections, and wins her at a time when the prodigal feels the most need of her sympathy. He has veered from one side to the other in the matter of reform, and at the final stage is rejected by both parties. It is when he realises that he is discredited in politics that he decides to go to Rose—one of those charming and feminine creatures that the author knows so perfectly how to draw. Brilliant as is the dialogue, witty with epigram and paradox, clever as is the novel as a whole, we are still ungrateful enough to wish that Mr. Hewlett would return to his old love and exchange the world of politics for the country of romance—a country of which he is the king.

Mrs. Elinor Glin writes in a bright style, if it occasionally deflects into a chatty channel. This author scored a merited success with the "Visits of Elizabeth," since when she has worked a little too assiduously at the same vein. THE SEQUENCE (Duckworth, 6s.) is written in the first person, and contains the usual reflections on society, with clever descriptions and sly thrusts at the conventions. The story is told by Guinevere, a woman with a tiresome husband and a love affair that occupies much of her thoughts and many pages of the book. The complications are many, and the tangle is only straightened out at the last page. We will not forestall the author by dwelling at large upon the plot. Mrs. Glin is a law unto herself, and she has secured a public that readily endorses her point of view. This story, however, is not equal to that of her previous novels. We find phrases like the following, "A strange, wild, weird joy is exalting us," constantly recurring. Indeed, adjectives of the most variegated hue pepper her pages profusely.

THE SPANISH MARRIAGE (Chatto and Windus, 6s.) is fairly successful as a historical romance. Miss Helen Mary Keynes has a happy knack of description, and though her situations are somewhat stereotyped and her plot conventional, her characterisation is careful and occasionally convincing. The mother of the hero, Lady Compton, is admirably portrayed, and the young man's antagonism against his stepfather is one of the most convincing things in the book. On the eve of her son's departure, for the first time the woman breaks down and shows him something of what she has suffered. "Lying on her palm were three small, jewelled buckles, and with a sudden stab of pain the boy recognised them for the last of those his mother had worn at her wedding seven years previously. Little by little the others had dwindled, one going to buy the boy's clothes, another to pay the repairing of the roof, and now she gave her last to him." The period of the story is 1623, and the time is well suggested. The introduction of Buckingham is a mistake, as the author has not succeeded in convincing us of his reality. She would have done better to have confined herself to characters devoid of historical importance.

Mr. C. H. Norman's volume of ESSAYS AND LETTERS ON PUBLIC AFFAIRS (Frank Palmer, 5s. net) will interest many who are unable to find themselves in agreement with some of the opinions expressed. Indeed, there are some opinions so expressed in maintaining which Mr. Norman will, we fancy, find himself in a very small minority indeed. But there will be no difference of opinion about the evident sincerity of the author or about his power of incisive writing. He lays about him with considerable vigour, attacking judges, politicians, soldiers, newspaper proprietors, and clergymen with an impartial and comprehensive anger. It is fair to add that it is quite impossible to read the book without realising that this anger is the product of a very real, if sometimes not discriminating, sense of justice. It is also fair to say that the author succeeds in drawing attention to a number of very real abuses, and that, indeed, no one who desires to get a clear view of the manifold evils of modern civilisation can afford to neglect this volume. The book would be more effective if Mr. Norman had a better sense of proportion. His principal fault is that he will constantly pass on from the able exposure of some genuine abuse to what appears a rather reckless attack upon all established institutions, good or bad. But there is enough in the book that is new and valuable to justify its title as a book that ought to be read.

Beginning with the October 1 issue, the Christian Commonwealth will devote a series of special articles to an investigation of the prevalent unrest among women. An endeavour will be made to set forth the causes and consequences of what is known as the Woman's Movement, and in the course of the inquiry many important questions bearing upon industrial life, home life, religion, education, the professions, etc., will be discussed.

An interesting programme of the University Extension Lectures for the coming session has just been issued by the University of London, South Kensington. In addition to the central courses, which will be delivered in the University Buildings and in the City, lectures will be given at about fifty local centres in different parts of London and the suburbs, including Literature, Science, Art, History, Architecture and Economics. It is interesting to note that in the direction of teaching of a non-vocational character most important work is being done by the Board, and attention is directed to the excellent group of courses arranged for diplomas in History, Literature, Economics and Social Science, and the History of Art. These extend over a period of four years, and pursue to a high level the study of each subject.

HISTORY IN THE MAKING

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Home Rule crisis still absorbs public attention to a quite extraordinary degree, and although Mr. McKenna's speech on the question shows the Government to be in an unyielding mood, the air is still charged with rumours of compromise and conferences. It is alleged, on what appears to be good authority, that the King has held a series of informal conferences with the leaders of both parties, and that as a result a Round Table meeting will take place about the middle of next month. Time will tell!

The Home Secretary's promise of legislation to enable prisoners who are fined for petty offences to pay these by instalments is good news indeed. The Act is to be of a compulsory character, and practically insists that magistrates are to give poor offenders reasonable time to pay. As Mr. McKenna pointed out in his speech, the Home Office has done its best to impress upon the occupants of the bench the extreme desirability of not sending a man to prison merely because they have not at the moment sufficient money upon them to meet his demand. They have, however, consistently ignored these recommendations, with the result that many a home has been broken up, and many a poor man driven to a career of crime. The new Bill will force the magistrates to do of necessity what they should have performed of grace. It is quite the best thing that Mr. McKenna has done since his somewhat chequered career as Home Secretary commenced.

The spectacle that Dublin affords is one surely that has scarcely ever been approached, let alone equalled, since our civilisation began. The whole city, men, women, and children, are starving, and the only relief that reaches them from the outside is the food ships sent, with splendid generosity, by the Trade Unionists of Great Britain. It is childish to pretend that this is the result of Syndicalism. It has been caused by sweating wages and housing conditions that are perfectly appalling. Whatever mistakes Mr. Larkin and his associates have made, they have at least established that fact, and their struggle against inhuman conditions has united every section of the Labour party. The miners are giving £1,000 a week. The co-operative bakers at Glasgow are arranging to despatch several hundred loaves, and the Trade Union Congress has promised £10,000.

An unlooked-for result has just attended the operations of the Aliens Act, whereby undesirables are excluded from Great Britain. There has just been sentenced to deportation one Harry Kemp, who happens to be not only an American, but a poet of some distinction. Witness the following verses:—

"I sing the song of the great clean guns that belch forth death at will.
'Ah, but the wailing mothers, the lifeless forms and still!
I sing the song of the billowing flags, the bugles that cry before.
'Ah, but the skeleton's flapping rags, the lips that speak no more!
I sing the clash of bayonets, of sabres that flash and cleave.
'And wilt thou sing the maimed ones, too, that go with pinned-up sleeve?
I sing acclaimed generals that bring the victory home.
'Ah, but the broken bodies that drip like honey-comb!
I sing of hosts triumphant, long ranks of marching men.
'And wilt thou sing the shadowy hosts that never march again?"

Surely a man who can write thus is not quite the undesirable we want to get rid of?

"Prophecy," said George Eliot, "is the most gratuitous form of error," and we are sometimes tempted to hope that the saying should prove uniformly right. There are some prophecies whose fulfilment one contemplates with dread. The same week that threatens "trousers for women" within ten years menaces us with the rival of bright and brilliant textures for men. Heliotrope socks are to be followed by gorgeous waistcoats and perhaps crimson coats. All that we can think of to say is—help! If this is to be, as we are told, the first fruit of an electric age and rarefied atmosphere, we feel disposed to start a league for the conservation of smokiness.

It is, to say the least, distinctly unfortunate that Lord Salisbury's speech at the Church Congress on "Housing Reform"—a subject in which he has shown a genuine interest—should have contained a gratuitous and foolish reference to baths in workmen's cottages being unnecessary and unwelcome. A hundred years ago, no doubt, it was possible to regard a bath as something of an exotic. Squire Weston or even Tom Jones may have indulged but rarely in that daily tub which nowadays most Englishmen appreciate. But we are no longer living in the eighteenth century, and the plain fact is that a bath has become an indispensable necessity to health and to that pride of person which is the best protective against disease. Any housing scheme that omits its provision is not worth the paper it is written on—even though backed by Lord Salisbury.

Mr. Henry Arthur Jones is rendering excellent service to the nation by the stirring addresses which he has been delivering this week "up North" on the need for an improvement in the theatre. The veteran playwright laid especial stress on that neglect of Shakespeare which is one of the most distressing features of the age. It does seem, however, that there are really signs of a stirring of the dry bones, and we note as a sign of grace that the Lord Mayor of Sheffield promised Mr. Jones the warm support of that city in his crusade.

THE NATIONALISATION OF RAILWAYS

BELGIUM'S EXAMPLE ❦ ❦ BY M. EMILE VANDERVELDE, M.P.

(Leader of the Belgian Labour Party)

I.

LAST March Mr. Asquith received a deputation of the Parliamentary Committee of the Trades Union Congress, and, among other things, the delegates asked the support of the Government in favour of the nationalisation of mines and railways.

The Prime Minister's reply was not exactly encouraging. He declared himself flatly opposed to the nationalisation of mines, and as for the railways, without being quite so hostile, he objected that, even if the transfer took place under favourable conditions, before a year was over the State administration would find itself at grips with a coalition: merchants would demand the lowering of rates; the railway staff would demand higher salaries and shorter working hours; hence there was every chance that, in the long run, all the advantages contingent upon the taking over of the railways by the State would be more than counter-balanced.

II.

That there is a germ of truth in this objection we have no intention of disputing.

Wherever the State has taken over the railways, the first years have been full of difficulties, for many reasons, notably because the public and the staff showed themselves more exacting than under the previous régime.

But this stage is long since past in Germany, in Switzerland, and the Scandinavian countries. In Italy, despite difficulties of all kinds that tend to make the working not very profitable, things are getting on not so badly. Even in France, where there was such an outcry at first when the State acquired the Chemin de Fer de l'Ouest, the situation is already satisfactory, or nearly so. And for Belgium, of which I intend to speak at greater length in this article, if the management of the railways, in many respects, leaves something to be desired, no one would dream of denying that, for the public and the personnel alike, the State administration is far preferable to exploitation by the companies.

Thus, in December, 1911, the Minister of Finance, in criticising certain details of organisation in the management, declared: "To-day no one could think of taking the running of the railways out of the hands of the State and entrusting it to private individuals." And the Premier corroborated in these terms: "That would mean provoking a revolution!"

III.

True—for the very reasons indicated by Mr. Asquith—the Belgian State Railways are not, and have never been, a very brilliant affair from the fiscal standpoint, the point of view of earnings.

Some people have thought differently. Owing to faulty bookkeeping the conviction was held that the railways were bringing in substantial profits to the Treasury. The Minister for Railways, M. Vanden Peereboom, called himself the "foster-father of the Minister of Finance." M. Helleput, one of his successors, declared that "the railway was a veritable milch-cow for the State." And on the strength of these assertions members of Parliament never ceased demanding reductions of railway rates for industry and commerce, increases of wages for railway employees, their electors.

But in his Report on the Railway Budget for 1900, and subsequent reports, M. Renkin, the Prime Minister, maintained that people had been labouring under a delusion in imagining that the railways were a generous source of revenue for the State; in reality the situation was not nearly so bright as the accounting system adopted by the administration gave reason to believe.

In Belgium, you see—unlike Switzerland, for example—there is no industrial railway budget separate from the State budget. The railway budget, in the form in which it is submitted to Parliament, is in no way a conspectus of the situation of the railways, but a bare statement of working costs, containing only expenditure estimates for the financial year. True, in its annual report the administration publishes a table of financial results comparing the net earnings of the system with its expenses, but the Reporter for 1900 maintained that this balance sheet was based on a fictitious basis, exaggerating the profits actually realised by the working of the railways.

At all events, since 1906 new rules have been adopted for the railway accounts which come much nearer the truth; and applying these new regulations retroactively to the past seventy years, the administration put the total actual surplus at 44,218,631 francs. But since then, several years having shown a deficit, the total surplus of the State railways does not exceed thirty million francs (c. £1,200,000).

Thirty million francs net profit, all charges being met, in seventy-five years' working! What better proof could there be that the yearly surpluses are not very big, and that the excess of revenue over expenditure generally just suffices to discharge the year's financial obligations?

IV.

From the fiscal point of view therefore—contrary to the experience of the Prussian railways—the advantages which State ownership offers in the case of the Belgian railways are wellnigh negligible, and if one strikes an average the profits of the system amount to a few thousand pounds per annum.

But were it otherwise—and to make it otherwise the administration need only raise rates—the profits of the railways would be merely a tax in disguise on the transport of passengers and goods. Now, we hold with M. Hubert, Reporter on the Railway Budget in 1905, that such a tax is unjustifiable, and that, as far as possible, the railways should be run at cost price.

"Railways," declared M. Hubert, "are not made to be a source of indirect taxation; they are, above all, a public service; that they demand full remuneration for the service rendered is no more than fair, and it is impossible to give advantages to travellers and transporters at the expense of the Treasury. But when expenses have been covered, as well as interest and sinking fund charges on capital, the surplus ought to be devoted to improvements of the service, reduction of rates, raising of wages or salaries, beginning with the lowest."

Such, then, in principle, is the railway policy of the Belgian State: run as near as may be at cost price; cancel any surplus in favour of the staff and the public.

We must now inquire whether the staff and the public really do derive benefit from this policy.

V.

And, first, the staff.

All other conditions being equal, the State in a democratic country tends to treat workmen better than private companies, because its employees, enjoying political rights, are in a position to use them so as to have better salaries given them or shorter working days.

But if the employées of the Belgian State Railways are, generally speaking, better paid than are, or were, the men in the service of the Belgian companies—there are two or three of these left—their situation, nevertheless, is far from being entirely satisfactory.

In the study which he has made of the salaries of the French Nord and the Belgian State Railways, M. Devys ("Les Chemins de fer de l'Etat belge," Paris, 1910) shows that wages are decidedly lower in Belgium than in France. But he very fairly points out that living is much cheaper in Belgium, so that the difference of the nominal wages is not proportionate to the difference of the real wages.

Nevertheless, one thing is certain—the bourgeois State in Belgium pays its employees poorly enough.

Only one ought not to forget, on the other hand, that workmen in State employ have more security, and are, perhaps, subjected to less strenuous work than in private industries.

As the Reporter on the Budget of 1907 remarked: "The workman or the petty functionary who enters the public service sacrifices the hope of a higher salary to the advantages of a permanent billet, with promotion, slow but sure, and a pension guaranteed. Hence those who prefer not to endure intensive labour enter State service; it follows that the State employs a larger staff than the companies, and consequently it is induced to pay them worse."

We must, however, note with M. Devys that if the workmen of the Belgian State are worse paid and more numerous than those of the French Nord line, that is no proof that their work is not so hard.

The true cause of the numerically greater importance of the Belgian staff is the more moderate tariffs of the Belgian State, which have developed traffic to enormous proportions; hence the necessity for a corresponding increase of staff.

VI.

And this brings us to the second point—the advantages which State ownership affords the public in general.

It is indisputable that the State, not having as its main object the realisation of profits, accords to the public much greater advantages and facilities than do private companies.

From this point of view nothing could be more instructive than a comparison of the Belgian railways and the French railways.

The trains in Belgium are more numerous. The system is constructed in such a manner as to give satisfaction to all districts, even where the lines built are far from productive. The carriages on the branch lines are more comfortable. Finally, the rates are not so high.

"One need only," says M. Devys (p. 166), "have travelled ever so short a distance on the French lines and on the Belgian State system to perceive the clear advantage of the latter over the former. Since the suppression of first-class compartments and the substitution of reserved seconds, the second-class carriages have become as luxurious as firsts in France, and journeys cost much less. And the passenger who one day observed to us in Lille station, 'It is delightful to travel in Belgium; it costs nothing,' seems to us to sum up in a word the comparison which no traveller in the two countries can avoid making."

Here we cannot think of giving figures. Those who take a special interest in the question will find them in the book of M. Devys, who sums up in these words:

"The conclusion to which we are forced by this study of Belgian tariffs is that they are very moderate; lower to a marked degree than French passenger rates, they are only slightly cheaper for the transport of goods. But the traffic, heavy in the case of passengers, and short-distance in the case of goods, demands a very large staff, costly material, and running expenses far higher than those of other lines, and notably of the French companies."

VII.

What we have said must not be read as an apologia for our management of the railways. No one knows its weak sides better than we do. For long years we have been demanding, in this matter, the separation of the State-Government and the State-Industrial; that is to say, the autonomy (as in Switzerland) of the railway administration, the establishment of industrial accounts, the representation of the staff on the administrative body, the abolition of a régime of excessive centralisation, and an often hidebound bureaucracy.

But, if reforms are needful—some, by the way, seem to be on the eve of accomplishment—no one, we repeat, dreams of turning back, of reverting to the old régime of private companies, with their competing systems, or their amalgamations constituting private monopolies, the inconveniences and abuses of which England knows so well.

For proof of this I need only refer to the very interesting statements made on November 10th, 1908, before the Royal Economic Society by Sir George S. Gibb, ex-director of the North-Eastern Railway. This unimpeachable witness declared that for years his study of railway questions, as well as his practical experience, had convinced him of the advantages of a well-regulated system of monopoly, and that he could not wholly disapprove of a plan which would procure for the country the advantages of this well-regulated system of monopoly, in whose efficacy he believed, even if this system had to be established under the form of State ownership.

Competition, to his mind, creates more evils than it abolishes, particularly the imperfect and half-hearted competition which exists in England so far as railways are concerned, competition which cannot be established freely on a commercial basis. He recognised that it was impracticable to bring about a unification or a very extensive combination of railways, with a wide range, under the existing system of private ownership.

Are not such words conclusive, coming as they do from a man in the business? Competition ends in monopoly; monopoly ought to be regulated in the general interest; this regulation, to be efficacious, demands the appropriation of the railways by the State, or rather by the collectivity. This evolution has already taken place, or is in progress, in all parts of the Continent. Sooner or later, it may be safely predicted, the same solution will prevail in England, in the form, probably, in which it has been adopted in South Africa and in Australia.

THE REAL COLLAPSE OF FEMINISM

BY MARGARET HAMILTON

[To realise that sex antagonism, so deftly explained away by Professor Thomson in his interesting and able article, does exist, and is a very present thing in the Woman's Movement of to-day, it is only necessary to look at the facts. The pioneers of Feminism in the 'eighties and 'nineties were untouched by any taint of resentment against man as such, and enlisted in their ranks a whole army of enthusiastic masculine supporters. Novelists, dramatists, poets, painters, speakers, and thinkers of all classes were enrolled under their banner, and voiced the gospel of the new Feminism with a trumpet call.

Men of European reputation lent their names and prestige to the movement, emblazoning the cause upon the pages of the world's great literature. Ibsen, Sudermann, Thomas Hardy, are only a few of those who supported woman's emancipation, and in terms of unrivalled force and eloquence demanded her remission from the shackles of the conventional morality that for years had meted out to her crushing punishment for acts regarded as venial in man.

But—and in this, it seems to me, lies the essential difference between the feminism of that day and its sterile descendant of the present time—woman asked for expansion of liberty, freedom of thought that she might develop her mind, her body, and her character; that she might fit herself to exercise a stronger and more beneficent influence on the generation

She was Called Upon to Mother.

She desired to acquire tolerance of judgment, to learn moderation of desire, and to discover the secret of comradeship which is the foundation of natural and healthy relations between the sexes; and she asked these things that she might be better fitted to bear and bring up her children.

Motherhood was regarded by the feminists of that day as woman's ultimate expression, and it was to fit her for that expression that she cried out for the demolition of those social conditions which stultified her energies and stifled her capacities; and that this was so we have only to turn to the literature of that period to ascertain.

Ibsen, who wrote the gospel of feminism in letters of fire, sent Nora out of her Doll's-House, away from her husband and her babies, not that she might found a colony of women or head a crusade against man, but that she might learn to be a better mother, a more efficient wife. Sudermann, in "Magda," crashes home the lesson of the play when, from her varied and somewhat sordid experiences, his heroine emerges cleansed and triumphant by reason of her motherhood. She wrings forgiveness from her critics by the strength with which

and all the injuries she has received from and inflicted upon man are expiated by her possession of the child for whom she has paid so dearly. Tess, sacrificial, blind to her interests, unselfish and devoted, never rises to such heights as when she braves supernatural powers and herself baptises her baby.

Lyndall, in "The African Farm," refuses to marry her lover on the ground that she does not feel for him a strength of devotion it is in her to bestow. She never questions the fact that wifehood and motherhood are states in which woman realises herself most completely, and while we may criticise and question the philosophy of the feminist movement of those days, no one can seriously deny that, in the main, their conduct was founded on a principle which, even if it were mistaken, was sincere.

The gospel of feminism at that time was no path of roses. Canon Barry, in his clever novel, "The New Antigone," sketches a woman of the finest type, who refuses to marry the man she loves, because she thinks that only by perpetuating freedom of contract can a union between man and woman be desirable. She lives with him as his wife, but declines to permit any legal ceremony, and the lover, despite his embarrassment and mortification, assents. This course brings on her head a series of social slights, amounting almost to persecution, but because she thinks it right she refuses to give way, and not until events change her opinion and alter her principles does she admit that marriage is the only possible solution.

Sarah Grand, in "The Heavenly Twins," shows us

The Same Thing from a Different Angle.

Evadne discovers a discreditable episode in her husband's past, and, convinced that a man who could have done what he had done would prove a most undesirable parent, refuses to live with him as his wife. This course separates her from her family, and incurs the odium of her friends. She persists in her resolution, however, and is upheld by the consciousness that, motherhood being the highest function of woman, she would be committing a sin if she had a child by a man she could not respect.

To-day we find in the Woman's Movement an entire absence of enthusiasm for maternity. The apotheosis of the spinster the woman who, by some curious process of reasoning, maintains that to bear a child is to derogate from the dignity of her position is the underlying aim of the suffragettes. Man is the enemy who seeks to filch her liberty, to impose on her the yoke that is the symbol of submission. And this antagonism to man includes an antipathy to those women who—to quote one of their own phrases—"have betrayed the cause and got married." It is, in effect, an indictment of nature vented on man; a burning resentment against the fate that caused the spinster to be born a woman.

It is this sex antagonism, the expression of the underlying revolt against motherhood, that is responsible for masculine attack on the movement of to-day. The older feminism drew support from all classes and kinds of men eager to help woman to obtain greater liberty; and the cause of their support is easy to determine. The feminists of the 'eighties and 'nineties glorified maternity, attached to it an importance which, though it sometimes led them into strange extravagances, had its roots in one of

The Strongest Passions of Human Nature.

Grant Allen, in his portrait of "The Woman Who Did," paints for us a mother crucified on the cross of her belief. Like the heroine of Canon Barry's novel, she refuses to marry her lover, and, as will be remembered, persists in her determination to the end. She is involved in the bitterest sufferings, she is maligned for her belief, and endures the obloquy meted out to the social Magdalen.

One may deplore her conclusions, dislike her opinions, deny her premises, but the fact remains that she was persecuted for righteousness' sake, inasmuch as she was punished for adherence to the doctrine that a woman was likely to be a better wife and mother were she tied to the man of her choice by love rather than law. She was concerned to fit herself for maternity, in the belief that motherhood is the most important thing of a woman's life.

To-day that belief is non-existent in the ranks of feminism. And its absence is responsible for the steady tide of masculine opposition. It is no question of votes or no votes for women. The suffrage was part of that programme of the 'eighties which enlisted the support of all sorts and conditions of men, not only dramatists and novelists, men of genius and talent, but simple and unlettered men, members of the middle class and of the working class also.

Where is that support to-day?

What Man of Genius

has concentrated on the suffrage? What attention do the militants attain from any considerable body of workmen or men of the middle class? I shall be told of resolutions at Trade Union meetings, of votes of sympathy moved at Socialist gatherings. Resolutions were passed in plenty when feminism was a real and a vital thing; but, at that time, they materialised into supporters; to-day such resolutions are of academic value only, and barren of result.

In every department of the woman's movement you find a practical advocacy of the cult of childlessness. Those bodies which advocate State interference between parent and child among the poor inevitably include among their most ardent propagandists a number of women who, devoid of offspring themselves, endeavour to take away the children of their fellows, and in order to discourage maternity penalise those unfortunate women who have followed their primitive instincts and borne their husbands a family.

The cry of the older feminism was the right of the mother to the child, and a considerable section of what was then termed the advanced movement held that it was better to dispense with a legal tie, inasmuch as the law gave an illegitimate child to its mother, while a lawful wife was dependent on her husband's decisions in regard to the child's upbringing. But the cry of the spinster has drowned the voice of Rachel weeping for her children, and on all sides are the same signs to be read.

Side by side with the glorification of childlessness the absence of comradeship has made itself felt. In the 'eighties and 'nineties woman desired greatly to be accepted by man on terms of friendship. She demanded freedom for herself, but at the same time did not seek to curtail his liberties. She did not superintend his music-halls, nor try to deprive him of his drinks. On the platform she debated with him with commendable moderation and lucidity; freedom of discussion was a plank in her platform, and the fiercest opponent of feminism was given a courteous hearing, encouraged to state his views, and invited to ask questions.

What Happens at the Suffrage Meeting of To-day?

Criticism is shrieked down, questions are limited and carefully revised by the chair, the case for the opposition is never allowed to be put. The gag that the feminists of the 'nineties removed from woman, the militants seek to impose on all opponents of their views, male or female. Again and again have they been asked why the mother of a family should be denied the vote they seek to obtain for a wealthy spinster. Again and again they have been challenged as to the political distinction between the wife of a poor clerk and the wife of a banker, and why the fact that the latter owns property should make all the difference. These questions have invariably been unanswered, save by the stereotyped reply that they demand votes for women on the same terms as men. But, in the very essence of things, their demand differs. A married man, as householder, held the vote years before the lodger franchise came into existence. Why, then, is the married woman to be held of less account? I suggest that the reason is to be found in that sex antagonism that has given rise to the cult of spinsterhood, which has grown up within the last decade to an incredible extent, and though as yet motherhood is not openly despised, it is tacitly regarded as a less desirable condition than childlessness.

And if there should be any question as to the accuracy of my statement, I draw the attention of my readers to a very salient fact. The militants have carefully excluded the married woman from their suffrage Bills, except in so far

As she Possesses Property.

It has been said that the cause of this exclusion of the wife was to be found in an undemocratic spirit, but I believe the reason lies far deeper than the desire to glorify the rich at the expense of the poor. It is a deliberate attempt to penalise marriage, and to punish a woman who becomes a wife. For clearly the only practical way in which a married woman can be qualified to vote is through her husband, and it is precisely the existence of a husband that sets the sex antagonism of the militants aflame.

You find this antagonism underlying their literature, their speeches, and their propaganda. The spinster is glorified at the expense of the mother. Over and over again the disabilities of marriage as such are preached and the joys of childlessness trumpeted. It was left to Mr. Dickinson to adjust the monstrous injustice levied against married women by the militants. In his Bill the member for St. Pancras suggested wives should be qualified as such, and the militants were forced to accept his position, but I repeat that no suffrage Bill emanating from the militants themselves provided for the wife, save and except she possessed property.

The Cult of the Childless, in the very essence of things, must meet with masculine opposition, and just as the feminism of an older date produced a rich harvest of literary and dramatic achievements, so the women's movement of to-day, with its tacit glorification of the spinster, is barren of all results. "Ye do not gather grapes from thorns, nor figs from thistles," and until the feminists realise that women's chief and most important function is to bear children, they will advance their cause not a whit.

Where is your great drama of the suffrage? What novelist has produced an immortal work preaching the gospel of the vote. The epic of the hunger strike has yet to be written, the lyric of the childless still to be sung.

Feminism has been betrayed in her own house, and her enemy is woman. In its very citadel has the cause been slain. On the altar of spinsterhood the offering has been laid, and in the name and to the glory of the barren woman have the sacrificial fires been lighted.

"EVERYMAN'S" GUIDE TO THE BEST BOOKS

Owing to pressure of space, No. II. of this series will not appear until our next issue.

HENRI FABRE, THE FIELD NATURALIST

PROVENCE, that land of the Troubadour, is to-day happy in the possession of two great poets, two veteran masters—Frederi Mistral and Henri Fabre. Applied to Fabre the scientist, the designation "poet" is no misnomer; Victor Hugo, 'tis said, dubbed him "the Insects' Homer"; Edmond Rostand greeted him as "the Virgil of the Insects"; and his disciple, Dr. C. V. Legros, has not hesitated to inscribe on the title-page of his admirable biography,* "Fabre, Poet of Science." While Mistral watched, conjured up, and recorded in verse, in his beautiful mother-tongue, the romance, the tragedies and comedies of his fellow Provençals, Fabre no less intently, no less sympathetically, no less movingly, observed and chronicled the idyll and the epic of animal life in the country of his birth. He who had himself so long sustained the struggle for existence, succeeded in identifying himself, as few men have been able, with the joys, the toil, and the travail of the insect world; and, a true interpreter of nature, he cannot but appear before us as a genuine poet.

It was an inviting but a far from easy task that Dr. Legros undertook when he began to prepare a life of Fabre, a life, to quote Fabre's own words in the preface he contributes to the volume, "not exempt from many cares, yet not very fruitful in incidents or great vicissitudes, since it has been passed very largely, in especial during the last thirty years, in the most absolute retirement and the completest silence." All the more credit for his achievement, therefore, is due to Dr. Legros, who has proved himself worthy of the task entrusted to him.

Fabre was and is no misanthropist, but he has always been singularly independent of his fellow-men. To this indomitable spirit of independence, indeed, may be attributed at least some of the neglect from which he suffered. Friends, of course, he had—among them John Stuart Mill, his neighbour at Avignon—but his most valued, life-long friends were the crickets, the bees, the ants, the caterpillars, the tiny things that skip and creep and fly. To their homes his visits were countless and prolonged:

"Seated for hours before a sprig of terebinth, his eye armed with the magnifying glass, he follows the slow manœuvres of the terebinth louse, whose proboscis cunningly distils the venom which causes the leaf to swell and produces those enormous tumours, those misshapen and monstrous galls, in which the young pass their period of slumber."

"He watches by night, by the dim light of a lantern, to copy the Scolopendra at her task, seeking to surprise the secret of her eggs; to observe the Cione constructing her capsule of goldbeater's-skin, or the Processional Caterpillar travelling head to tail along their satin trail, extinguishing his candle only when sleep at last sets his eyelids blinking. He will wake early to witness the fairy-like nocturnal resurrection of the silkworm moth; 'in order not to lose the moment when the nymph bursts her swaddling-bands'; or when the wing of the locust issues from its sheath and 'commences to sprout'; no spectacle in the world is more wonderful than the sight of 'this extraordinary anatomy in process of formation,' the unrolling of these 'bundles of tissues, cunningly folded and reduced to the smallest possible compass' in the insignificant alar stumps, which gradually unfold 'like an immense set of sails,' like the 'body-linen of the princess' of the fairy-tale, which was contained in one single hemp-seed."

Here, truly, we see an "inimitable observer," as Darwin called him, a naturalist who is at the same time a poet and a philosopher. "Geometers are made," wrote Fabre to his brother in 1852, from Corsica (where, with a salary of £72 a year, he held the Chair of Physics at the College of Ajaccio), "naturalists are born ready-made, and you know better than anyone whether natural history is not my favourite science." Two years earlier, in 1850—and it is hard to realise that Fabre, who is still alive, was already twenty-seven years old when the nineteenth century was at its turn—Fabre had written to the same correspondent in characteristic vein: "The infinitesimal calculus of Leibnitz will show you that the architecture of the Louvre is less learned than that of a snail; the eternal geometer has unrolled his transcendent spirals on the shell of the mollusc that you, like the vulgar profane, know only seasoned with spinach and Dutch cheese."

But Fabre the naturalist is already known to us through his books, and those who take up Dr. Legros's biographical study will look for information regarding the man, as well as for an appreciation of the scientist. Nor will they be disappointed. Dr. Legros gives us an exceptionally vivid picture of the man, his toil and trials, his characteristics, and his ways of life.

"François Sicard, in his faultless medal and his admirable bust, has succeeded with rare felicity in reproducing for posterity this rugged, shaven face, full of laborious years; a peasant face, stamped with originality, under the wide felt hat of Provence; touched with geniality and benevolence, yet reflecting a world of energy. Sicard has fixed for ever this strange mask; the thin cheeks, ploughed into deep furrows, the strained nose, the pendent wrinkles of the throat, the thin, shrivelled lips, with an indescribable fold of bitterness at the corners of the mouth. The hair, tossed back, falls in fine curls over the ears, revealing a high, rounded forehead, obstinate and full of thought. But what chisel, what graver could reproduce the surprising shrewdness of that gaze, eclipsed from time to time by a convulsive tremor of the eyelids! What Holbein, what Chardin could render the almost extraordinary brilliance of those black eyes, those dilated pupils: the eyes of a prophet, a seer; singularly wide and deeply set, as though gazing always upon the mystery of things, as though made expressly to scrutinise Nature and decipher her enigmas? Above the orbits, two short, bristling eyebrows seem set there to guide the vision; one, by dint of knitting itself above the magnifying-glass, has retained an indelible fold of continual attention; the other, on the contrary, always updrawn, has the look of defying the interlocutor, or foreseeing his objections, of waiting with an ever-ready return-thrust. Such is this striking physiognomy, which one who has seen it cannot forget."

It is not surprising to learn from Dr. Legros that Fabre has a particular affection for Virgil, and that he knows La Fontaine by heart. In fact, he owns himself a disciple of La Fontaine. Dealing with his style, Dr. Legros declares there is no sign of artistic writing in his books. "It is only his manner of feeling and of expressing himself that makes him so dear to us. . . . It is the lover in Fabre that draws us to him; nothing quite like his work has been seen since the days of Jean de La Fontaine." 'Tis a high compliment, but not unmerited by this great scientist, who, in the words of Rostand, "thinks as a philosopher, sees as an artist, and feels and expresses himself as a poet."

BALKAN BARBARITIES

TESTIMONY FROM THE FRONT

I.

"No State at war with another shall countenance such modes of hostility as would make mutual confidence impossible in a subsequent state of peace." So reads one of the "Preliminary Articles" drawn up by Kant in his essay on "Perpetual Peace." On this basis the era of Perpetual Peace in the Balkans would appear to be remote indeed. The wholesale charges of atrocities hurled at one another by the whilom Balkan allies bode ill for the reign of peace in the Peninsula, and bring home afresh to participants and spectators the unspeakable horrors of war.

While the passions which find vent in war are still raging, it is, of course, difficult for the onlooker to know how much or how little to believe of the awful allegations of Greeks and Bulgarians. Sentiment is so apt to colour our views. Those who were hailed as heroes and crusaders by their comrades-in-arms and by their sympathisers in Europe when the enemy was the Turk, are suddenly transformed in the eyes of their former admirers and allies into ferocious barbarians, when one Christian State turns upon another. The enmity which inspires ill deeds also inclines one belligerent to believe the very worst of the other side, with the result that atrocities are often invented as well as perpetrated in time of war. And so the would-be impartial observer finds it hard to sift fact from fiction and give credence where credence is due.

But while it would be foolish to swallow every tale of savagery circulated aent this, that, or the other Balkan army, it would be equally credulous to dismiss lightly all such stories, or to pin one's faith solely on those which tell against one particular nationality. There seems only too good reason to believe that "methods of barbarism" have been freely resorted to in the Balkan wars, and that any State bringing charges against its neighbour only lays itself open to the retort that those who live in glass-houses should not throw stones.

II.

When a Greek reports Bulgarian atrocities, or a Bulgarian reports Greek atrocities, there may be ground for suspicion or disbelief; but doubt is out of the question when miscreants attest their own misdeeds. A more gruesome document has seldom been published than a pamphlet recently issued from the Royal Printing Press at Sofia, containing facsimiles of letters written by men of the 19th Greek Infantry Regiment of the Seventh Division, which, already posted, were captured by Bulgarian troops in the vicinity of Razlog. These letters are all dated between July 11th and July 15th, 1913. Their authenticity is vouched for, not only by their reproduction in facsimile, but by the publication of the names of the senders, and the names and addresses of the addressees. Were they forgeries, it should be perfectly easy for the Greeks to prove them so. Needless to say, the passages selected for reproduction are those of a most incriminating nature. Quotations are given from over a dozen letters written by different hands, and the burden of them all is the same—About, Seek, Fire, Burn, Kill, Slay; Let not a Bulgarian live!

In common fairness to the Greeks it is only right to add at once that many of the writers express the utmost destestation of the deeds they record—and carried out. Thus, with a sore heart, Thomas Zapantiotis writes, on July 13th, from Rhodopes, to his brother, that he has no conception how war is conducted. "Villages are burned and people also; we, too, burn everything, and perform even worse deeds, like the Bulgarians."

Tsantilas Nicolaos, on the same date, sends word to his father, under the simple but proud heading—'Εν Βουλγαρία: "What a ghastly war we are waging against the Bulgarians! We have burned up everything of theirs; villages and folk, that is, we massacre them cruelly."

Panaghis Beglikis is even more horror stricken. On July 15th he writes to his brother Sotire from the borders of Bulgaria and Thrace: "How the war goes on, it is impossible to describe to you what takes place. The abominations now being committed are so fearful that they exceed anything that has happened since the days of Christ. The Greek army burns every Bulgarian village, kills every Bulgarian that is met with. The things which are taking place are indescribable. God knows where it will end, the time is come again when we devour one another." A sergeant (whose name is illegible) writes as follows from Merocostenitza, on July 12th, to Dr. Panaghi Leventi, Aliverion, Eubœa: "The two villages, Doulia and Banitza, their lurking-places, we burned down; the women, children and old men were taken out and stabbed to death without mercy or pity, cruel hearts carrying out a still more cruel order." "I kiss you and all," concludes the sergeant, and the gentle greeting adds to the grimness of his foregoing words.

Others, again, write in more callous vein, and some seem even to gloat over the bloody business they were about. Spiliotopoulos Philippos, for instance, writing to his brother and his wife—whom he kisses tenderly—cannot restrain the note of revenge and exultation: "We have burned all the villages which were abandoned by the Bulgarians. The Bulgarians burn all the Greek villages and we the Bulgarian villages, they murder and we murder, and all belonging to that nation who fall into our hands are shot. Of the 1,200 Bulgarians whom we took prisoner in Nigrita, only forty-one are left alive in the prison, and everywhere we have passed through we have left not a trace of that race behind."

Costi writes to a friend from the River Nesto, without a sign of compunction: "Here in Vrondou I took prisoner six Bulgarians and a girl; we shut them up in a gaol and made them fast; the girl was killed and so were the Bulgarians. Beforehand we put out their eyes."

Another soldier scribbles in haste to his brother: "When we catch Bulgarians, we kill them like sparrows."

III.

Obviously these letters have been published by the Bulgarians, not in the interests of peace, but in order to alienate sympathy from the Greeks, and discredit like charges brought against themselves. It is unlikely, however, that, outside Bulgaria, they will serve as a weapon of war, as a whet to race hatred. Rather should such letters tend to give pause to those who think and talk lightly of a great European war, showing as they do in the most harrowing fashion what sufferings war involves for victors and for vanquished, what moral depravity it brings out on the side of both those who win and those who lose.

THE LAND PROBLEM AND MR. LLOYD GEORGE'S CAMPAIGN

IN view of the forthcoming Land Campaign of Mr. Lloyd George, special interest attaches to a very able article which has just appeared in the October issue of the Fortnightly Review, which, by the way, maintains its position as the most stimulating and most "catholic" of our monthly magazines. The article is anonymous, and, being written by a Liberal-Unionist, does not profess to be impartial; but it states the facts of the case with an obvious desire to be fair, and, although it leaves out of account the Socialist solution and the Single Tax solution, it gives us, at least, with great lucidity, the opposite points of view of the Liberal party and of the Unionist party.

The outstanding fact of the situation is that, in the course of the last few decades, British agriculture has utterly declined and decayed. Looking at it from the point of view of economic production: "Our acreage under corn crops and vegetables has shrunk very severely. Since 1873 alone more than 3,000,000 acres, a territory as large as the entire counties of Devonshire and Norfolk combined, have been abandoned by the plough. That shrinkage of cultivated land has caused the loss of approximately £2,000,000,000 of our agricultural capital, a sum which is about three times as large as our colossal National Debt. Our national wealth is usually estimated to amount to about £12,000,000,000. We may, therefore, say that in consequence of the decline of agriculture we have lost about one-sixth of our national capital. Our population engaged in agriculture has rapidly and steadily diminished. In the course of the last sixty years Great Britain has lost fully one-half and Ireland fully three-quarters of her agricultural labourers.

"In consequence of the stagnation and decay of her rural industries, Great Britain has become dependent upon foreign countries, not only for the bulk of its bread corn, but also for the bulk of its meat, butter, cheese, eggs, fruit, etc. Home-grown food has become the luxury of the well-to-do. The working masses in town and country are becoming less and less able to buy milk for their children, for milk is far dearer in Great Britain than it is in any other land. The security of the country is endangered in case of war by its absolute dependence on imported food. Often there is only a few weeks' supply of wheat in Great Britain. The physique of the nation has been seriously deteriorating, because the great majority of the people live in the vitiated atmosphere of overcrowded towns on imported, frozen, chilled, chemically treated, or preserved, and, therefore, inferior food. Every year from 200,000 to 300,000 of our people, the healthiest and strongest of the race, emigrate from the United Kingdom and leave those of inferior physique to perpetuate the stock.

"While our towns suffer from over-population, the countryside is deserted, and its desolation is increasing from year to year. Notwithstanding the great dearth of agricultural labourers, dairy-maids, etc., the emigration of the able-bodied people from the rural districts continues at an alarming rate. The British countryside, like the Campagna of Imperial Rome, is labour-starved, and is becoming a grazing ground deserted by man."

Nor is the position less distressing from the point of view of wages and population. British agriculture is carried on by about a million men, and of these about 800,000 are agricultural labourers. Their entire weekly earnings do not exceed in England an average of 18s. 4d.; in Wales, 18s.; in Scotland, 19s. 7d.; and in Ireland, 11s. 3d. "If we assume that the family of an agricultural labourer consists on an average of five persons, we find that an income of 18s. 4d. per week comes to 6½d. per head per day for food, clothing, and shelter. In Ireland the total earnings of the agricultural labourer amount on an average only to 11s. 3d. per week, or to 1s. 7d. per day. If we again assume that the average family consists of five persons, we find that the Irish agricultural labourer has a total income equivalent to 3¾d. per head per day. That amount is scarcely sufficient to feed a good-sized dog. Agriculture is undoubtedly the worst of our sweated industries."

The conditions of British agriculture strike one as all the more deplorable if one compares them with those of other countries, such as Denmark or Belgium. Denmark, like Great Britain, is subject to Free Trade. Belgium, like Great Britain, is mainly an industrial country. Its soil is comparatively poor, and its climate is little better than that of Britain. Yet Belgium has achieved astonishing agricultural prosperity. The Belgian population of over twelve years of age engaged in agriculture was nearly as large in 1895 as in Great Britain, and to-day it is probably larger. "The weight of cereals produced per square mile of territory is three times as great in Belgium as it is in the United Kingdom, and in the production of meat, dairy produce, eggs, fruits, and vegetables, Belgium has a similar, if not a greater, superiority over this country."

Mr. Rowntree, in his notable book on "Land and Labour Lessons from Belgium," although he himself believes that the community should become a universal landlord, and although he does not support the system of Belgian land tenure, sums up the position of the Belgian agricultural labourer in the following conclusion:—"Taking the class of small holders as a whole, the writer considers their lot decidedly superior to that of the English agricultural labourer, with his hopeless outlook, and, consequently, lack of real intelligent interest in his work."

The evils of present conditions are so glaring that all political parties are agreed "that the land problem is the greatest, the gravest, and the most urgent British problem," but there is a profound difference between the land policy of the Unionist party and that of the Liberal party. The Liberals have embarked upon a socialistic land policy. They condemn the system of private ownership. They wish to make the community the Universal Landlord; they desire that the cultivators of the soil should not be owners but tenants. They assert that large holdings are more efficient than small ones, and they maintain that tenancy is the best form of tenure.

On the other hand, the Unionist land policy, as applied to agriculture, is an individualistic one. By a curious interversion of party, it is the Unionists who defend the old Liberal ideal. The Unionists are in favour of universal ownership. Their motto is, "Every man his own landlord," and they are partly in favour of creating a very large number of small properties. They point to the example of Scotland and Ireland to prove that what is wanted, above all, is to give the labourer a stake in the country, and that the land question is even more a moral and psychological question than a question of wages.

"In Scotland the wages of agricultural labourers are more than seventy per cent. higher than are the wages in Ireland, yet the proportion of agricultural labourers who emigrate from Scotland is far greater than it is from Ireland. The Irish labourers stay in the country, notwithstanding their pitifully low wages, because they hope to obtain, in course of time, a small freehold farm on which they and their family can live in peace and security. The Scottish and English agricultural labourers, although they receive wages which are sixty and seventy per cent. higher than those of the Irish agricultural labourers, leave the country in large masses because they do not care to remain serfs all their lives, with nothing to look forward to except a penurious life on an old age pension, or a sordid and degrading existence in a workhouse."

Although the agricultural question is not mainly a question of wages, the Unionists believe that wages will be increased under a system of small ownership:—

"The freehold system not only tends to attach men to the soil by bonds of interest and of affection, but it tends likewise to increase the wages of the agricultural labourers. Wages are determined by supply and demand. At present the sole demand for agricultural labourers in a district comes from a few large landowners and farmers in the neighbourhood, who may have agreed to pay a certain wage, and no more. As soon as the demand for agricultural labourers is no longer restricted to a few large men, and as soon as more intensive agriculture is introduced, keener competition for the service of the labourer will send his wages up. Last, but not least, an agricultural labourer will not consent to accept a weekly pittance instead of a wage if he can earn an adequate living as a small holder. Small holders who have children will certainly not allow them to work for other people unless they get an adequate remuneration."

Such are the underlying principles and the relative position of the two parties with regard to land reform. We shall see next week how these principles and that position will be affected and modified by the campaign of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

LITERARY NOTES

THE output of notable biographies continues unchecked. This week we have the publication of the authorised Life of Henry Labouchere (Constable, 18s.), written by his nephew, Mr. Algar Labouchere Thorold, who has had sole access to the voluminous and remarkable correspondence of Mr. Labouchere. Then Messrs. Macmillan will issue this month biographies of Lord Lytton and of Florence Nightingale, both of which may also claim to be authorised.

* * * * *

When Lord Lytton died he left directions that his Life should be written by his son. The second Lord Lytton took up the task, but died without completing it. Thirty years have elapsed since the first two volumes of the Life appeared, and now the present Lord Lytton has discharged the duty of telling the story of his grandfather's career as author and statesman. He has rewritten the whole work, only retaining the autobiographical portion covering the first twenty-five years of Lord Lytton's life and a few passages from the second Lord Lytton's version. The book is in two volumes.

* * * * *

The Life of Florence Nightingale will also be in two volumes, and has been written by Sir Edward Cook by the desire of the trustees. Sir Edward has had access to the family papers, and his work, furnished with portraits and other illustrations, is sure to appeal to a wide circle of sympathetic readers.

* * * * *

Mr. Edward Arnold is likewise bringing out a number of interesting biographies. Lord Lyons, whose life as a diplomatist is being recounted in two volumes (30s.) by the Right Hon. Lord Newton, represented Great Britain at Washington during the Civil War, was British Ambassador at Constantinople for a couple of years, and at Paris for a score (1867-1887). Another nineteenth-century diplomatist of high rank was George Villiers, fourth Earl of Clarendon, whose "Life and Letters" will appear next week (two volumes, 30s.). The work is by the Right Hon. Sir Herbert Maxwell, Bart. For November the same publisher announces a memoir on "the Father of the Irish Church," Primate Alexander, Archbishop of Armagh, edited by Eleanor Alexander (one volume, 12s. 6d.).

* * * * *

The place of honour in Bell's autumn list is occupied by a volume on "Old English China," by Mrs. Wiloughby Hodgson. An important feature of the book is its illustrations (sixteen plates in colour and sixty-five in black and white). The writer is an authority on the subject, which has many devotees in this country, and the book is expected to rank as the standard guide to collectors.

* * * * *

New books on art and famous painters appear in quick succession. Two outstanding volumes deal with Hans Holbein the Younger and Leonardo da Vinci. The former is by A. B. Chamberlain, assistant keeper of the Corporation Art Gallery, Birmingham. An exhaustive work in two volumes (George Allen and Co., £3 3s.), it contains a full biography and description of every known picture by the artist, as well as 252 illustrations (twenty-four in colour). The Da Vinci volume, by Dr. Jens Thüs (Herbert Jenkins, 42s.), is said to be a revolutionary book, the work of some twenty years of study and research, which disproves the authenticity of many works ascribed to Leonardo. It has 300 illustrations, many in tints.

CHAUCER'S "TALE OF THOPAS" * * BY LIDDELL GEDDIE

I.

MODESTY and Mockery—these are the chief seasonings with which Chaucer flavours his Tale of Sir Thopas. The Tale of Thopas, it will be remembered, is the tale which Chaucer himself tells at the bidding of his host. The Canterbury pilgrims had just heard to an end the Prioress's tale of the little Christian boy who, although his throat was cut "un-to his nekke-boon" by the Jews, kept singing "loude and clere," O Alma Redemptoris Mater. This miracle, as we may well believe, had left the whole company exceeding "sobre," and doubtless with a view to reviving the drooping spirits of his fellow-travellers, irrepresible Master Harry Bailly looked about him in search of a butt for some merry jest. His eye lights on Chaucer, whom he at once begins to chaff.

Our poet had modestly refrained from adding his own portrait to that gallery of masterpieces, The Prologue, but now the Host to some extent makes good the omission.

"What man artow?" quod he;
'Thou lokest as thou woldest finde an hare,
For ever up-on the ground I see thee stare.

Approche neer, and loke up meryly.
Now war yow, sirs, and let this man have place;
He in the waast is shape as wel as I;
This were a popet in an arm t'enbrace,
For any womman, smal and fair of face.
He seemeth elvish by his contenance,
For unto no wight dooth he daliaunce."

This description of Chaucer—portly of body, eyes downcast, shy, reserved, and abstracted in mind—tallies well with the portrait of him on the MS. of his admiring disciple Occleve. Chaucer, who must have been nearing fifty years of age when he set out from the Tabard Inn with his fellow-pilgrims, makes an excellent foil for the Host, the one so quiet and studious, the other so forward and so blunt.

II.

But Chaucer's modesty shows itself in other ways as well. Not only does he say little about himself throughout the Canterbury Tales; not only does he make such scanty personal allusions as occur of a quizzing and uncomplimentary character; not only does he poke fun at his own bashfulness; in his self-effacement he even goes so far as to put into his own mouth two tales which deliberately invite unfavourable comparison with those told by his companions. Scarce has he entered upon the "Second Fit" of Sir Thopas, when our Host breaks in with "No more of this, for Goddes dignitee," and "stinteth Chaucer of his Tale." Given another chance, Dan Chaucer narrates "a litel thing in prose," a "moral tale vertuous," the Tale of Melibee, to wit; and this time there is no stopping him. There is but one Tale in the book exceeds it in length and dulness, and that is the Persones Tale (or, rather, Sermon), the only other contribution in prose during the pilgrimage.

III.

More than modesty, however, was displayed by Chaucer when he assigned to himself, not the most enchanting, but the most boring tales in the whole collection. Consciously to take such a step showed humour, and not a little artistic cunning. It is one thing to make fun of the Romance of Chivalry, as Chaucer does in the Tale of Thopas; it is quite another thing to make fun of oneself, as Chaucer does in the Prologues to that tale and the Tale of Melibee. His burlesque of the Chanson de Geste makes us admire him, as a man of judgment, a man ahead of his times, a man with a shrewd turn for satire. His delightful self-raillery makes us love Chaucer as a man we could cherish among our best friends. "Amongst writers of genius," says Professor Legouis, in his masterly study of our poet, "the one who strikes us soonest as a friend is Chaucer."

If, as we have said, Chaucer introduces his own retiring personality only in order to throw into stronger relief by contrast the boisterous character of the Host, so we can well imagine "Chaucer's Tale of Thopas" and "Chaucer's Tale of Melibee" were subtly chosen so as to increase by their very dulness the éclat of the other tales. How skilfully he sets off the concise realism of the Prologue to Sir Thopas against the Romance à longue haleine of the Tale itself.

IV.

"Now shul we here
Some deyntee thing, me thinketh by his chere," says that "semely man our host" when Chaucer declares the only tale he knows is "a ryme I lerned longe agoon"; and we can picture Master Harry Bailly giving the Miller a wink behind Chaucer's back as he utters the sarcastic words. The Host's pleasantry prepares us for something ridiculous, and we are not disappointed. Chaucer solemnly launches forth upon one of those interminable mediæval romances of chivalry.

"Listeth, lordes, in good entent,
And I wol telle verrayment
Of mirthe and of solas;
Al of a knyght was fair and gent
In bataille and in tourneyment,
His name was Sir Thopas."

Then follows the inevitable description of Sir Thopas, no detail of his appearance, his armour, and his wardrobe being spared. Quaint tropes, conventional tags, jingling rhymes recur unmercifully.

"Sir Thopas wex a doghty swayn
Whyt was his face as payndemayn,*
His lippes rede as rose;
His rodet is lyk scarlet in grayn,
And I yow telle in good certayn
He hadde a semely nose."

Sir Thopas, of course, "priketh thurgh a fair forest," until his

"faire stede in his prikinge
So swatte that men mighte him wringe."

Sir Thopas, you see, had dreamed that an elf-queen would be his "lemman," and so he tries to espy one "by dale and eek by doune." Naturally he meets a great giant yclept Sir Olifaunt, who bars the way to the queen of Fayerye. They exchange taunts and threats, and Child Thopas courteously informs his opponent in ballad stanza:

"Tomorwe wol I mete thee
Whan I have myn armour;
And yet I hope, par ma fay,
That thou shalt with this launcegay
Abyen it ful soure;
Thy mawe
Shal I percen, if I may
Er it be fully pryme of day,
For heer thou shalt be slawe."

Whereupon Sir Thopas turns tail, and the giant spitefully flings stones at him.

* Panis Dominicus; a bread of exceptional whiteness.
† Complexion.

V.

At last, like John Gilpin, Sir Thopas "is come agayn to tounc." While he dons his armour for the dread encounter with the giant (which he now declares has three heads) his minstrels and jesters tell tales.

"Of romances that been royales
Of popes and of Cardinales,
And eek of love-lykinge."

Then he partakes of "gingerbread," "licorys," and other stimulants, puts on a clean shirt, and swears

"On ale and breed
How that ' the geaunt shal be deed,
Bitydē what bityde.'"

Once more we have a catalogue raisonné of his accoutrements, and the first fit endeth.

Evidently the listeners have already begun to whisper among themselves, for the narrator resumes—

"Now hold your mouth, par charitee,
Bothe knyght and lady free,
And herkneth to my spelle;
Of bataille and of chivalry,
And of ladyes love-drury
Anon I wol yow telle.

Men speke of romances of prys,
Of Horn child and of Ypotys,
Of Bevis and sir Gy,
Of sir Libeux and Pleyndamour;
But sir Thopas, he bereth the flour
Of royal chivalry."

Sir Thopas bestrides his good steed and sallies forth. The while his "dextrer" browses on fine herbs, Sir Thopas

"drank water of the wel
As did the knight Sir Percivel."

VI.

But this is more than our Host can stand! Brutally he interrupts—

"Thou makest me
So wery of thy verray lewednesse!
That, also wisly god my soule blesse
Mine eres aken of thy drasty² speche;
Now swiche a rym the devel I beteche³!
This may wel be rym dogerel,⁴ quod he.
'Why so?' quod I, 'why wiltow lette me'
More of my tale than another man,
Sin that it is the beste rym I can?'
'By god,' quod he, 'for pleynly, at a word,
Thy drasty ryming is nat worth a tord⁵;
Thou doost nought elles but despendest tyme,
Sir, at o word, thou shalt no lenger ryme.
Lat see wher thou canst tellen aught in geste,
Or telle in prose somwhat at the leste
In which ther be som mirthe or som doctryne.'"

This gives Chaucer a chance of revenge, and his dreary Tale of Melibeus begins straightway. This, however, we have no intention of quoting. The incomplete ballad is infinitely more entertaining than the lengthy prose homily which our Host might well have censored or "taken as read."

As for the Tale of Thopas we value it for what it tells us of Chaucer who tells it. It affords us a precious glimpse of the poet in the flesh. It is one of our first burlesques, and some find in Sir Thopas an ancestor of Don Quixote, Sir Hudibras, and other mock-heroic knights. Moreover, by its sing-song stanzas, its tediousness, its pompous solemnity, and its supernatural and unnatural characters, it teaches us to appreciate all the more highly Chaucer's wonderful realism, his endless store of humour, his critical faculty, his metrical powers, and his glorious narrative gift, as illustrated in the Canterbury Tales as a whole. And so all honour to him "who left half-told, the Story of"—Sir Thopas bold.

CITIES OF THE WORLD

NEW SERIES OF COMPETITIONS

"EVERYMAN" AND THE CIVIC SPIRIT

IN the introduction to a series of articles on Paris, which appeared in EVERYMAN in May and June, we wrote the following lines:—

"If it be desirable to extend our knowledge of other nations, so as to widen our horizon and to develop the European spirit, what may be called the Catholic and Universal spirit, it is even more important, from a practical and moral point of view, to develop the Civic spirit, to foster the love of the City. And this can best be done by showing what the City has accomplished for humanity in the past. It is my firm conviction that the City has done a great deal more than either nation or Empire, and that, therefore, to develop the civic spirit is vastly more important than to develop the national or Imperial spirit. Whoever studies the history of Athens and Rome, of Florence and Venice, of Nuremberg and Cologne, of Bruges and Antwerp, of London and Edinburgh, must come to the conclusion that it is mainly the City that has built up civilisation."

It is because we are so profoundly convinced of the importance of developing the civic spirit, and it is with a view to interesting every citizen in the community which has a prime claim on his services, that we are organising a new series of competitions on the "Cities of Great Britain, Europe, and America." We offer sixteen prizes of THREE GUINEAS each for the best Essay on each of the following cities:—

- | | |
|------------------------------|-------------------------------|
| 1. The City of London. | 9. Edinburgh. |
| 2. Glasgow. | 10. Cologne. |
| 3. New York. | 11. The East - End of London. |
| 4. Rome. | 12. Liverpool. |
| 5. Berlin. | 13. Oxford. |
| 6. Manchester. | 14. Chicago. |
| 7. Dublin. | 15. Moscow. |
| 8. The West - End of London. | 16. Jerusalem. |

Essays ought to be not less than 1,800 and not more than 2,400 words in length. The last day for sending in the papers is December 1st, 1913, for the first eight cities, and January 1st, 1914, for the second eight.

We would suggest that the subjects be treated on the lines of our series, "Countries of the World," rather than on the lines of our papers on "Paris." The papers on Paris were rather too discursive and too special. What we want is to give the reader an intelligent and concrete survey of each community, each city. After a brief historical introduction and a topographical bird's-eye view, the city ought to be studied in its various social energies. We want to be told how the city has grown, how and why it has prospered or declined, what is the distribution of its population, of its wealth and poverty, what are the economic, social and political, moral and intellectual activities of its people. It is strongly recommended that in each case a sketch map, as far as possible of a sociological nature, accompany the paper.

LA MORT DE LOUIS XVI.

LOUIS s'attendait à la mort. Lorsque Malesherbes vint tout en larmes lui annoncer l'arrêt de mort, il le trouva dans l'obscurité, les coudes appuyés sur une table, le visage dans ses mains, et livré à une profonde méditation. Au bruit qu'il fit, Louis XVI. se leva, et lui dit, "Depuis deux heures je suis occupé à chercher si pendant mon règne j'ai pu mériter de mes sujets le plus petit reproche. Eh bien, M. de Malesherbes, je vous le jure dans toute la vérité de mon cœur, comme un homme qui va paraître devant Dieu, j'ai constamment voulu le bonheur du peuple, et jamais je n'ai formé un vœu qui lui fût contraire." Il pria Malesherbes, en l'accompagnant, de ne point l'abandonner dans ses derniers instants; Malesherbes lui promit de revenir; mais il se présenta plusieurs fois, et ne put jamais pénétrer jusqu'à lui. Louis le demanda souvent, et fut affligé de ne pas le revoir. Il reçut sans trouble l'annonce de sa sentence, que vint lui signifier le ministre de la justice. Il demanda trois jours pour paraître devant Dieu, il demanda en outre d'être assisté d'un prêtre, qu'il désigna, et de communiquer librement avec sa femme et ses enfants. Ces deux dernières demandes lui furent seules accordées.

Le moment de l'entrevue fut déchirant pour cette famille désolée; celui de la séparation le fut encore bien davantage. Louis, en la quittant, promit de la revoir le lendemain; mais, rentré dans sa chambre, il sentit que cette épreuve était trop forte, et, se promenant à grands pas, il disait, "Je n'irai point." Ce fut son dernier combat; il ne pensa plus qu'à se préparer à la mort. La nuit qui précéda son supplice il eut un sommeil paisible. Réveillé à cinq heures par Cléry, auquel il en avait donné l'ordre, il fit ses suprêmes dispositions. Il communia, chargea Cléry de ses dernières paroles et de tout ce qu'il lui était permis de léguer, un anneau, un cachet, quelques cheveux. Déjà les tambours roulaient, un bruit sourd de canons traînés et de voix confuses se faisait entendre. Enfin Santerre arriva. "Vous venez me chercher," dit Louis; "je vous demande une minute." Il remit son testament à un officier municipal, demanda son chapeau, et dit d'une voix ferme, "Partons."

La voiture mit une heure pour arriver du Temple à la place de la Révolution. Une double haie de soldats bordait la route, plus de quarante mille hommes étaient sous les armes; Paris était morne. Parmi les citoyens qui assistaient à cette lamentable exécution il n'y eut ni approbation ni regrets apparents; tous furent silencieux. Arrivé sur le lieu du supplice, Louis descendit de voiture. Il monta d'un pas ferme les degrés de l'échafaud, reçut à genoux les bénédictions du prêtre, qui lui dit alors, à ce qu'on assure, "Fils de saint Louis, montez au ciel!" Il se laissa lier les mains, quoique avec répugnance; et, se portant vivement sur la gauche de l'échafaud, "Je meurs innocent," dit-il; "je pardonne à mes ennemis; et vous, peuple infortuné! . . ." Au même instant le signal du roulement fut donné, le bruit des tambours couvrit sa voix, les trois bourreaux le saisirent. A dix heures dix minutes il avait cessé de vivre. Ainsi périt, à l'âge de trente-neuf ans, après un règne de seize ans et demi, passé à chercher le bien, le meilleur mais le plus faible des monarques. Ses ancêtres lui légèrent une révolution. Plus qu'aucun d'eux il était propre à la prévenir ou à la terminer; car il était capable d'être un roi réformateur avant qu'elle éclatât, ou d'être ensuite un roi constitutionnel.

M. MIGNET.

THE DEATH OF LOUIS XVI.

LOUIS expected death. When Malesherbes came in tears to announce the sentence, he found him sitting in the dark, his elbows resting on a table, his face hidden in his hands, and in profound meditation. At the noise of his entrance, Louis rose and said, "For two hours I have been trying to discover if, during my reign, I have deserved the slightest reproach from my subjects. Well, M. de Malesherbes, I swear to you, in the truth of my heart, as a man about to appear before God, that I have constantly sought the happiness of my people, and never indulged a wish opposed to it." As Malesherbes retired Louis begged him not to forsake him in his last moments; Malesherbes promised to return; he came several times, but was never able to gain access to him. Louis asked for him frequently, and appeared distressed at not seeing him. He received without emotion the formal announcement of his sentence from the minister of justice. He asked three days to prepare to appear before God; and also to be allowed the services of a priest, whom he named, and permission to communicate freely with his wife and children. Only the last two requests were granted.

The interview was a distressing scene for this desolate family; but the moment of separation was far more so. Louis, on parting with his family, promised to see them again the next day; but, on reaching his room, he felt that the trial would be too much, and, pacing up and down violently, exclaimed, "I will not go." This was his last struggle; the rest of his time was spent in preparing for death. The night before the execution he slept calmly. Cléry awoke him, as he had been ordered, at five, and received his last instructions. He received the communion, commissioned Cléry with his dying words and all he was allowed to bequeath, a ring, a seal, and some hair. The drums were already beating, and the dull sound of moving cannon and of confused voices might be heard. At length Santerre arrived. "You have come for me," said Louis; "I ask one moment." He deposited his will in the hands of the municipal officer, asked for his hat, and said in a firm tone, "Let us go."

The carriage was an hour on its way from the Temple to the Place de la Révolution. A double row of soldiers lined the road; more than forty thousand men were under arms. Paris presented a gloomy aspect. The citizens present at the execution manifested neither applause nor regrets; all were silent. On reaching the place of execution, Louis alighted from his carriage. He ascended the scaffold with a firm step, and knelt to receive the benediction of the priest, who is recorded to have said, "Son of Saint Louis, ascend to heaven!" With some repugnance he submitted to the binding of his hands, and walked hastily to the left of the scaffold; "I die innocent," said he; "I forgive my enemies; and you, unfortunate people. . . ." Here, at a signal, the drums and trumpets drowned his voice, and the three executioners seized him. At ten minutes past ten he had ceased to live. Thus perished, at the age of thirty-nine, after a reign of sixteen years and a half spent in endeavouring to do good, the best but weakest of monarchs. His ancestors bequeathed to him a revolution. He was better calculated than any of them to prevent and terminate it; for he was capable of becoming a reformer-king before it broke out, or of becoming a constitutional king afterwards.

THE MEDICAL CONGRESS AND THE CURE OF CONSUMPTION.

DR. EDWIN W. ALABONE'S TREATMENT.

The recent Medical Congress, at which all the leading physicians of the world took part, has most decisively proved that "TUBERCULIN," the much-vaunted remedy for Consumption, is not only powerless to cure that disease, but that its use is harmful. So much has been heard of this supposed remedy that its proved uselessness must be a great disappointment to many sufferers who had read of its supposed success.

Dr. Mackenzie, Consulting Physician to the Brompton Hospital, in his speech at the above Congress, gave a general survey of the history and results of "TUBERCULIN TREATMENT," stating there was no cure in Tuberculin for Consumption, and he could speak with experience, he having for years used it in a large number of cases; that he used it in every possible way, and in carefully selected subjects; that he had heard of "cures," but he wanted to see them reproduced in the Hospitals. What is needed is practical proofs—deeds, not words.

Professor Dr. Kempner, of the University of Berlin, gave similar evidence, and Sir James Fowler, Consulting Physician to the Brompton Hospital, King Edward VII. Sanatorium, and the Middlesex Hospital, stated that under the Insurance Act, a system of so-called Dispensaries was being established throughout the country, and at these and in Sanatoria, Tuberculin treatment was being extensively employed by medical men, many of whom have had but little experience of its use and of the great dangers attending it. He had come to the conclusion that the use of Tuberculin, in any form, in the treatment of pulmonary tuberculosis was not free from danger. Sir St. Clair Thompson, Professor of Laryngology, King's College Hospital, said that his expectations of Tuberculin treatment for tuberculosis of the larynx had not been fulfilled.

The above is the opinion of all who have conscientiously used Tuberculin, yet patients under the Insurance Act are still being treated by this useless and dangerous method.

Dr. Mackenzie's remark that what he wanted was to "see 'cures' reproduced in the Hospitals," must seem most ironical to those who are conversant with the facts concerning the "Alabone Treatment of Consumption," and Dr. Alabone's beneficent offer to the Brompton Hospital, which was that he would supply that Hospital with his inhalers and inhalants free of cost for twelve months, would superintend the wards allotted to him, and so let the physicians there and the outside public have evidence of the "cures" his treatment effects. In addition to this, Colonel Hon. Le Poer Trench (whose wife, after being given up by a Brompton Hospital physician to die in Consumption, was perfectly restored to health by Dr. Alabone's treatment) made the generous offer of a thousand pounds to the Hospital if Dr. Alabone's offer were accepted. Surely nothing could have been fairer or more straightforward, and one would have imagined the authorities would have gladly embraced such an opportunity; but although it seems scarcely credible, yet this offer was refused, and so suffering humanity was debarred the benefit of treatment which has saved thousands of lives.

In the face of these facts it seems hard to believe that Dr. Mackenzie could have been in earnest when he made his remarks.

However that may be, the fact remains that the success of Dr. Alabone's treatment has spread over the world, and in every part is being practised with the most encouraging results, case after case given up as perfectly incurable being cured; and it is an important fact to note that these are not imaginary cures, where the patients relapsed after giving up the treatment, as is the case with those sent from Sanatoria, but they are permanent, as patients in all positions of life testify to, after periods of five to twenty years and more.

The reader may naturally ask, Why is this so? The answer is simple and practical: by a special patent inhaling machine Dr. Alabone has succeeded in reducing his specific inhalants into such a condition that when inhaled they reach the actual seat of the disease, and so it is being treated "locally" as well as constitutionally, a method the superiority of which must appeal to all.

It may be mentioned here that there is not the slightest danger of any kind incurred. This point must be emphasised, as it has been circulated that the inhalants were dangerous and made patients worse. Such statements are absolutely untrue in connection with Dr. Alabone's treatment, and must have referred to Tuberculin, Sanatoria, and other treatments, which, as may be noted above, are acknowledged to be a menace to the life of the patient. It may, therefore, be safely deduced from all the foregoing remarks that Dr. Alabone's is the only reliable cure, and should further evidence as to its efficacy be desired, it will be found in the voluntary testimony of eminent divines and leading members of the legal, medical, and other professions, and of all grades of Society who have had personal experience of the satisfactory results of the treatment.

Space does not permit us to quote these testimonies, but our readers will find full details in the following work:—

GIUSEPPE VERDI: 1813-1901

By J. CUTHBERT HADDEN

IT is a hundred years to-day (October 10th) since the most striking phenomenon in the whole history of opera was born. The most striking phenomenon: it is a good deal to claim this distinction for Giuseppe Verdi, but the claim is justified by the fact. For when did the world ever see a composer who, beginning with a success before he was well out of his teens, lived to present a consummate masterpiece, written with all the verve and vitality of youth, on the borders of the fourscore?

Moreover, Verdi's artistic progress was as astonishing as his artistic vitality. More than sixty years ago Verdi enjoyed a European reputation as the composer of works like "Il Trovatore" and "La Traviata," which are now the types of an exploded operatic system. Had Verdi stopped there, he would have gone to his grave merely as the representative of a far-off fact in the history of opera. But Verdi did not stop there; and it is just because he did not that his career is so full of artistic significance. The man who led in opera sixty years back assumed for the second time, when almost an octogenarian, the chief place on the lyric stage, and, with his "Falstaff," achieved a success right across the Continent of Europe. An instance of this kind is without parallel in the records of music.

Consider what opera was when Verdi began to write—while Wagner was yet unheard of as a composer. Opera was a purely conventional, purely traditional product: a "careless, haphazard combination of more or less ingenious concerted pieces, with a string of meaningless pretty tunes, written as show pieces for the singers." The singer was, in fact, the chief personage; the composer merely a servant. The opera itself was not a serious art form. Text and music had no necessary connection; and the librettos were often so unworthy of musical setting that the French had a saying: "Whatever is too stupid to be spoken may be sung!" Dramatic fidelity was not so much as hinted at.

Wagner changed all that, and made it impossible for ever. But Wagner (though born the same year) was practically non-existent for Verdi when Verdi began composing. The stars of the operatic world were then his own countrymen, notably Rossini, Bellini, and Donizetti. Since these had proved themselves by works which had gone to the heart of the public, Verdi naturally took them as models for his earlier operas, the design of which is simply to tickle the ear, to provide the singers with an opportunity of exhibiting their voices and their wardrobes. In "Rigoletto" (1851) Verdi did indeed give some indications that he had begun to chafe under the traditional yoke; but when "Il Trovatore" followed two years later, it was found that he had fallen back into the old rut. In "La Traviata," again, there is the same lack of feeling for appropriateness, the same striving after meretricious effect. No one with any pretensions to artistic culture could patiently listen to "Traviata" or "Trovatore" now.

So far, then, Verdi had achieved only a little higher level than Bellini and Donizetti. But see what happened. For many years it seemed as if the works of which I have spoken had brought his triumphs to a close. But in reality he was only maturing—preparing the artistic world for a surprise of which it had not dreamt him capable. By the production of "Aida" in 1871 was revealed an altogether new Verdi. The old conventions were, to a great extent, left behind. Elementary rhythms and harmonies, cheap dance tunes, boisterous instrumentation, and operatic clap-trap in general were all finally abandoned. This opera gave him, as nothing else was likely to give him, his proper place among the great composers, and if he had laid down his pen at that stage he would still have been entitled to the regard of posterity as the composer of the best opera hitherto written by an Italian.

But Verdi was not content to rest on his laurels. Sixteen years after "Aida," when the composer was seventy-three, came "Otello," in which he made such a stride upward as to stamp himself with the character of a new genius. In this magnificent work, every one of the recognised forms of the traditional school were abandoned. Dramatic truthfulness everywhere asserted itself, and the orchestration, now quite independent of the voices, was immensely rich and expressive. Finally, we had the crowning achievement of "Falstaff"—a positively miraculous production for an octogenarian. Its youthful vigour is amazing. The music is as fresh and spontaneous as if it were the work of a young man in the blush of his first love, yet it is full of the wisdom and experience of him who is the epitome of more than half a century of Italian opera.

It would be an interesting question to discuss in detail how much the later Verdi was influenced by Wagner. He certainly adopted several formulæ of the Wagnerian music-drama creed. But he did not by any means swallow all its articles of faith. He went his own way, his style becoming broader and stronger, his thoughts ripier, richer, and more elevated, his hand firmer and stronger; but he consulted his own judgment and arrived at his own ends, not those of another.

In England Verdi was curiously long in making his way. At home, in Italy, he had only to get an opera produced at La Scala to have the whole of musical Milan humming his tunes next morning.

When "Rigoletto" was produced in London, the Times critic declared it to be "the most feeble opera of Signor Verdi with which we have had the advantage to be acquainted: the most uninspired, the barest, and the most destitute of ingenious contrivance." If the statement had been made in regard to any of the now-forgotten first works of Verdi, it would have been within the mark. But the second-period operas, of which "Rigoletto" is the best specimen, began a new phase of the development of the composer's genius, and they have so many merits of a kind that the English critics can hardly be forgiven for not recognising them.

In any case, they should have seen that these works contained the elements of popularity. They were full of melody; and melody, after all, whatever may be said to the contrary, is the one thing that appeals to the masses. And it is just here that Verdi scored. His gift of melody was, to the common ear, absolutely convincing. Without that gift, he might have written with all the science and skill of Bach and Wagner, and yet have gone unappreciated. With its possession—and he possessed it in a remarkable degree—he gained a place in the hearts of the people which he is likely to retain for long.

THE THIEF

A STUDY IN SUBJECTIVE POVERTY

IT was Shirley Landon. I knew his back, and I detected the curl of his hair behind his ears. His good, carelessly worn clothes formed a strong contrast to the shabby gentility of the half-starved, eager-eyed youth who stood mumbling thanks by the side of the prosperous author.

What arrested my attention was the acting of a pretty little scene outside a second-hand bookshop in Charing Cross Road. The thin, shabby youth had been fingering the pages of a book with the intensity of one hungering for possession, when Shirley Landon said to him:

"Would you like that book?" and, before the amazed youth could respond, Landon had bought it for him and was hurriedly pursuing his way down Charing Cross Road.

In a few paces I came up with him. We were old friends, and so, without wasting time to comment on the weather or on health, I said, as though we had been carrying on a long conversation, broken only for a brief moment:

"What impelled you to do that?"

"Ah!" he answered with a sigh. "It was a vision of myself, a ghost which stalks by my side whenever I see a hungry-eyed, poorly clad youth clamouring to be let into the Republic into which I have forced myself."

He stressed the word "forced" with a fierce intonation. His utterance came with feverish intensity. He waited for a moment, and then continued:

"In spite of illustrated interviews, no one has yet glimpsed into one chapter of my autobiography. I think I should like to reveal it to you. Yes! Come to my club—no, not to the cursed club; let us talk here. Privacy can only be found in the crowded streets.

"As a youth I was a thief. I stole my way into literature." (He said this with exulting, sad eyes.) "My knowledge of literature was built upon what I filched from booksellers' shelves. My father, as you know, kept a small shop in a Cumberland hillside village. I had no other education save that afforded to me by the national school. That is to say, I had no education at all. Few books came into my hands. I craved for more, and determined to go into a city of books. At fourteen I walked into Newcastle and found a job at a coal office for a few shillings a week. Its ugly, mean streets were to me the streets of Paradise, for they contained bookshops.

"I haunted these shops, and, though I cut down my allowance for food to the lowest possible limit of subsistence, I was never able to satisfy my appetite for literature. In those days there were no public libraries.

"I remember one day—it was the dinner hour—when, after eating avidly my lunch of bread and cheese and becoming penniless, I was attracted to a bookshop with trays of books exposed outside the shop, and no one apparently in charge of them. I began to turn over the pages of a second-hand book. It contained the prose writings of Heine. I said to myself, 'I must have this book.' I looked around. No one was watching me. I furtively slipped the book into my pocket and walked away.

"That was the beginning of my career as a thief, which I pursued with enterprise and cunning. I would resort to all sorts of subterfuges, pretend to be about to ask the price of a book just as the shopman was accosting a customer, then would apologetically step on one side, and at the right moment saunter away down the street. . . . The person I feared most was a youth as shabby as myself who was placed in charge of the books in the front of a shop. I began to be conscious that this youth suspected me, but I still had to go to the shop—as a moth has to fly to a candle—in spite of my fatalistic apprehension that I should singe my wings.

"One day I felt this boy watching me from the corners of his eyes as I turned over the pages of Jeremy Taylor's 'Holy Living and Holy Dying.' Suddenly he dived into the shop. Immediately he had disappeared I calmly slipped the book into my pocket and began to walk away with the abstracted look of the bookworm, which, I am afraid, I took some pains to cultivate.

"The boy rushed out and, catching hold of the lapels of my coat, exclaimed, 'Ere, you give up that book.'

"What book?' I said with an air of great surprise.

"This one,' he said, clutching at my pocket. "'Oly Livin'." You're a fine 'oly Joc, you are.

"I'm sorry,' I stuttered. 'I must have thought it was a book of my own that I was reading. How much is it?'

"'Ow much? I like that, I do. 'Arf a crown; but I've a good mind to give you in charge. You lifted it, you did. I watched you through the window.'

"I was nervously handling the money in my pocket, knowing full well that, instead of thirty pence, I had only three.

"I don't think I have quite enough,' I answered, ignoring his remarks. 'I will come to-morrow and buy this book.'

"I advise you not to come 'ere again. I've a good mind to call a slop.'

"I walked away very flushed, and I gave that shop a wide berth in future. But I took so many risks that it was inevitable that I should one day be caught.

"The day came when I was caught red-handed bearing away a volume of A. J. Symonds' 'Renaissance in Italy.' 'Perhaps,' commented Landon reflectively, 'a youth with a desire for learning, seeking to capture and make his own the beautiful in Art, might have stood a better chance to acquire knowledge or skill in the Age of the Despots than in democratic England, where education is "free." The book was 7s. 6d., and I possessed 2d., so it was obvious I was a thief. I was given in charge, ignominiously taken to a police station, and cast into a cell. There was no one I dared appeal to for bail.

"The next morning everything that happened in the magistrates' court became seared into my soul. Whilst waiting for my turn I forgot my troubles in listening to the terrible tragedies of mean streets. . . . I should, perhaps, have got off lightly but for the extra evidence brought forward with the zeal of an amateur detective by the youth who first detected me in theft, and who now showed me up in the light of a confirmed thief.

"It was the days before the First Offenders Act, and I was given a fortnight's imprisonment. In prison I learnt the Psalms of David by heart. When I left my ill-lighted study behind me I became 'Shirley Landon,' and started my career as a journalist."

This hidden page in the autobiography of the famous writer revealed to me the springs of those many acts of kindness of his to poor students; and it also showed me what inspired him to make those savage attacks in his books on the seats of learning which have become appropriated by the sons of the rich, shutting out "indigent scholars" from the acquisition of knowledge.

CHRISTIANITY AND SOCIALISM

BY DR. DEARMER

IN the chapter on "Religion and Politics," in his volume "Conservatism," Lord Hugh Cecil deals in a stimulating way with the moral teaching of the New Testament. He emphasises one side of this great question in a way with which I almost entirely agree, though I should like to see the other side emphasised with equal strength. A friend, however, has been struck by two statements, and has asked me to discuss them in the pages of EVERYMAN. They are:—"This teaching [of the Gospel] is in the highest degree individualistic"; and "There is not a word of Socialism in the New Testament." I apologise for taking the words from their context, which most truly declares that "Christianity has been and is the principal source and vitalising energy of social reform." I do so because my friend, and doubtless many other readers, have done the same, and because these two sentences do represent one aspect of Lord Hugh Cecil's argument, and to many of his party they are axioms of life. They are also very interesting, very provocative of thought.

Now our agreement or disagreement with these two statements will depend on the meaning we attach to the words "Individualism" and "Socialism"; for this discussion, like most others, is apt to be obscured by the use of ambiguous terms. And no term is used so ambiguously as that terrible word Socialism! To some it means Labour unrest and extreme views generally; to some excessive State control; to some Anarchism, which is the exact opposite of State control; some bracket it with Syndicalism, to which also it supplies an antithesis; some confuse it with Communism, which differs from it in denying private property; some associate it with irreligion and free love, others with Christianity and the most austere morality. It used to be taken as the opposite to laissez-faire, the interference, that is, of the State to prevent things taking their free course; and in this sense it is almost true, in the famous words of Sir William Harcourt, that "we are all Socialists now"—with the exception of the Editor of the Spectator, who consistently maintains the old Manchester Individualism.

The strict economic definition of Socialism is "the collective ownership of the means of Production and Distribution." But there are many who would let the word "Collectivism" do duty for this economic ideal, and would define Socialism in ethical terms, saying that its central idea is "that the goal of human endeavour is the common well-being of all alike." Thus one of the Socialist mottoes is "Each for all, and all for each"; and this St. Paul has expressed by saying, "Let no man seek his own, but each his neighbour's good." In such a sense as this no doubt Lord Hugh would not object to be called a Socialist.

The late Bishop Westcott defined Socialism and Individualism in these words:—

Socialism, he said, was "a theory of life, and not only a theory of economics. In this sense Socialism is the opposite of Individualism, and it is by contrast with Individualism that the true character of Socialism can best be discerned. Individualism and Socialism correspond with opposite views of humanity. Individualism regards humanity as made up of disconnected atoms; Socialism regards it as an organic whole, a vital unity formed by the combination of contributory members mutually interdependent.

"It follows that Socialism differs from Individualism both in method and in aim. The method of Socialism is co-operation, the method of Individualism is competition. The one regards man as working with man for a common end, the other regards man as working against man for private gain. The aim of Socialism is the fulfilment of service, the aim of Individualism is the attainment of some personal advantage, riches, or place, or fame. Socialism seeks such an organisation of life as shall secure for every one the most complete development of his powers; Individualism seeks primarily the satisfaction of the particular wants of each one in the hope that the pursuit of private interest will in the end secure public welfare."

I have quoted this at length because it was deliberately published and republished as a manifesto by a great leader of religion, who weighed his words well, and was a high authority on the meaning of words. It is a lesson to us on the importance of a right use of terms. Here he claims for Socialism that it stands for a theory and a method of life that is far more fundamental and enduring than any political system or economic doctrine. He also defines Individualism in a way that would prevent, I hope, Lord Hugh Cecil and all the readers of EVERYMAN from including themselves in that definition. Yet, be it remembered, there are multitudes of business men and working men who are Individualists in Bishop Westcott's sense (and that without his saving clause at the end about "public welfare"): the talk one hears in the train among men going up to the City is generally based upon this Individualist assumption. That men work against each other for private gain, that multitudes regard humanity as made up of warring atoms, that they seek no common service or common end—this is the canker of our civilisation, and makes much of our civilisation unchristian.

In this sense, Christ was certainly not an Individualist, but a Socialist, and His true followers must be Socialists too. But in the economic sense Christ was neither a Socialist nor an Individualist; for these economic theories are for an age, and His teaching is for all time. He gave us certain principles, which are as fresh and as true (and as difficult) as when He first spoke them; and each age must apply them according to its conditions. That is the whole essence of Christianity: it is not a law but an inspiration; and the duty of every Christian is to grip the spirit of Christ, and, overcoming the selfish and acquisitive instincts of the natural man, to carry out as best he can the principles of the Gospel in the economic, social, and political conditions of his age. Many think that this leads them to Collectivism at the present day: others do not. The ideal state will continue to arouse differences of opinion, because it must always be a conjecture. But we shall find, as we have done in the past, one step after another made clear to us, as one problem after another becomes ripe for solution. If only we are true to the Christian ethic, we shall become stronger in our work of redeeming human society, because more and more we shall have all good men actively on the same side, and among such men none is more valuable in the public life of to-day than Lord Hugh Cecil. Is he an Individualist? Yes, in the sense which he gives to the word all Christians must be Individualists. But that I must leave to another article.

HOW TO BECOME A WRITER

By O. B.

IT is becoming widely recognised that, to succeed as a writer, specialised training is essential. By "drifting" into a literary or journalistic career success may often be won, it is true, but the steady increase in the number of men writers who enter the field equipped with special training is making it more and more difficult for the untrained man or woman to get a first footing. And in Journalism, the first successful step counts for more than is the case in any other profession.

Success in journalism goes by merit, and the remuneration for this work makes it an attractive profession for those who feel they have some aptitude for writing. Even as an occasional occupation, it may be the means of adding substantially to one's existing income.

Mr. COULSON KERNAHAN

in a recent article, says: "The young man and the young woman with literary aspirations are told by the croaker of to-day that literature is a profession in which it is impossible to earn a living. That is not my experience, nor is it the experience of many another writer whose name might be mentioned here. But I make bold to assert that at no time were critics and the public more ready to recognise and to encourage new talent."

Mr. HAROLD BEGBIE

in an article in The Author, says: "There is not an editor in London who is not anxiously searching for writers with something to say."

Whatever aptitude or talent a man or woman may possess, some practical training is absolutely indispensable. Training at the hands of a responsible journalist saves the literary aspirant much needless disappointment and failure; it shortens the road to success by giving the beginner the benefit of the guidance of experience.

The training in Free Lance Journalism and Story Writing, provided by the Practical Correspondence College, of 77, Thanet House, Strand, is of a particularly interesting and valuable character. It is conducted entirely by correspondence, and the long and successful experience of the College has enabled it to attain a very high degree of perfection in this method of tuition. The course is personally conducted by a well-known author-journalist, who possesses that rare gift of imparting to others the knowledge which he himself has acquired only by long and varied experience. The training is not cut and dried—there are no dull, dogmatic text-books—it is, on the contrary, adapted to the special aims and abilities of each student. Its object is to guide the beginner safely past the many rocks on which he would otherwise probably come to grief, or, at best, be greatly impeded thereby.

The student is taught how to convert his thoughts, ideas, and experiences into a saleable commodity. He is shown how to produce the kind of MSS. editors want, and how and where to submit his productions. It is no uncommon occurrence for students of the College to earn whilst learning many times the fee paid for it. As the demand for capable writers shows no signs of diminishing, but is, rather, increasing, every would-be writer will be well advised to send for particulars of the unique training now available. Address the Secretary, Practical Correspondence College, 77, Thanet House, Strand, W.C.

CASH AND THE CAMERA

By W. NICHOLLS

WHEN an amateur photographer takes a camera away on his holidays he seldom thinks that he can cover the entire cost of that holiday by selling some of his prints for reproduction. But he can! That is, of course, if he has taken the sort of pictures that the editors want.

The pity of it all is that the holiday-making amateur doesn't take the trouble to find out the difference between the pictures that sell and the pictures that nobody wants.

For some amateurs there seems to be a fascination in snapping the shutter, for there is precious little interest in most of the pictures that are produced on a holiday. Look over your own prints from the negatives that you made last month, or whenever you took your holidays. Perhaps there are half a dozen that could be sold if you knew where to place them; but as for the others—well, they may possess a certain personal interest for a while, but by this time next year you will be wondering why on earth you ever took them.

And yet if you had been in possession of certain information (which you can acquire quite readily by taking a little trouble), you might have brought back a couple of dozen pictures that would have been interesting and profitable—pictures that you would have enjoyed taking, and which you could have obtained anywhere, no matter whether you spent your holiday at the seaside or in a country village.

Take a seaside beach, for instance. There may be fifty amateur photographers using cameras in all directions, and yet a man—or a woman—with the knowledge of what is wanted, will go along that beach and capture a dozen subjects that will be accepted on sight.

It is just the same in the country. I have stood about on a country road, and within an hour I've taken half a dozen pictures without moving fifty yards, for which I have received over £15 10s. in reproduction fees, and yet if I had not known definitely what I wanted, and how I intended taking those pictures, I should have said it was simply a rotten place for picture making at all.

Now, the Practical Correspondence College can, by its course of instruction in Press photography, put anyone who can turn out good clean photographs in the way of making money. The lessons are taught by post, and the fee charged is most moderate. No students are enrolled unless it is evident from their work that they can be put on a profitable basis. Six prints must be forwarded to the Principal, Mr. Vincent Lockwood, at 77, Thanet House, Strand, London, W.C., and they will be submitted to the Director of Tuition. A detailed criticism of each print is then sent free of charge, and a booklet giving all particulars of the course.

Neither book nor criticism costs the inquirer anything, and all prints are returned. You are under no obligation to enrol, and if you find the matter does not interest you it can be dropped then and there.

GERMAN UNIVERSITY EDUCATION.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—In your issue of October 3rd, Mr. E. 'A.' Parker accuses me of painting only the high lights and leaving out the shadows in my recent article on German University Education. Quite so. It would take more than a page of EVERYMAN to give both the bright and the shady sides of any subject. As a matter of fact, I had intended my article, which was written over a year ago, to be the first of a series, provided I could find a paper willing to accept them. I assure Mr. Parker that I was by no means ignorant of the points he raises, and that most of them would have received adequate treatment in due course. However, as one does not usually go to the trouble of writing a second article until a home has been found for the first, the project remained unfinished. Indeed, owing to absence in America and recent illness, I was unaware until this week that my article had appeared, and it is therefore with a rueful feeling of chagrin that I see myself bombarded with shot from my own locker.

Most of Mr. Parker's observations are very true, but also very irrelevant. May I therefore claim a little space to deal briefly with his main contentions?

(1) I am blamed for not mentioning the number of "child-suicides committed in appalling numbers in every great German city by youths who are crammed so as to pass the leaving examination, or 'Abitur,' and be freed from a year's military service, or gain entrance to a University—and fail." I am quite aware of such reports, but I would point out (a) that the boys commit suicide because, by failing to pass the examination, they fail to escape the full rigours of military service, not because they are disappointed with their failure to qualify for the University. Why should I be expected to go out of my way to discuss compulsory military service in an article dealing with some of the advantages of the German University educational system? (b) Even if the latter reason were correct, it would be Mr. Parker's business to prove that English boys would also commit suicide under similar circumstances. So far I have received no accounts of boys committing suicide en masse on failing to pass the London Matriculation Examination. (c) My article dealt specifically with University education, i.e., after the "Abitur" had been passed, and I therefore feel no qualms of conscience for omitting all reference to an alleged result of the German elementary and secondary school systems.

(2) Mr. Parker seems to expect that because I mentioned the number of German Universities I ought also to have given the number of English and Italian Universities, and compared them on the basis of population. I am afraid he entirely misses the point. What I said was that in spite of the fact that the University of Berlin possesses such a quantity of men of European reputation, yet Germany has twenty other Universities, which, so I implied, can also produce equally important men, and I instanced five scholars now working in Leipzig. I do not think this can be said of any other country in Europe. (May I add parenthetically, to forestall indignant contradiction, that I have no desire to run down my own?) If Mr. Parker wishes to attack my argument, he must select some other European country, find a University in it with a staff as strong in scholars of European reputation as Berlin, establish the fact that the particular country also possesses a number of other Universities more or less proportionate to the population, and then show that each or the majority of these smaller Universities can also boast of scholars of the same class.

(3) My critic claims that I have no right to admire the strength of the German University teaching staffs, because "unhappy Rostock has for many years appealed in vain to the German Government to support an English lecturer." Let me observe (a) the "German Government" has nothing to do with the case. The University of Rostock is supported by the Government of the Grand Duchy of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, just as the University of Berlin is a Prussian institution, Leipzig a Saxon one, etc. (b) Mecklenburg is notoriously one of the most backward States of the German Empire. The wonder is that it has a University at all. (c) About fifty miles due east is the Prussian University of Greifswald, where there is an English lecturer, in addition to a professor. (d) Rostock and Greifswald are the two smallest German Universities, each having rather less than a thousand students. (e) I am confident that Rostock has a Professor of English. Not having my official list at hand, I cannot give his name. (f) If Mr. Parker thinks it regrettable that Rostock has no English lecturer, what has he to say of Cambridge, which had no Professor of German until 1909, no Professor of English Literature until 1910, is still without a Professor of French, and has small prospect of ever getting a Professor of Russian? What has he to say of the Scottish Universities, which have not a single Professor of French or German?

(4) Mr. Parker tells us that "Austria (synonymous with Germany in these matters) gives full support to a learned professor of certain Oriental languages who never gets a student." Considering that three of Austria's eight Universities are entirely Slavonic, I think it is rather rash to postulate this similarity with Germany. I am fairly familiar with Austria from Bodenbach and Innsbruck to Triest and Belgrade, and my own opinion is that Austria, even German-Austria, is vastly different from Germany. True, the comparison is limited to educational matters, but even then there is much room for doubt. In any case, I fail to see that the fact that one Austrian professor has no students has any bearing on my remarks on the German University system. If Mr. Parker will discover me a German professor in the same predicament, he will be a little nearer the point. But let him refer again to that portion of my article in which I stated that in 1910-11 the University of Berlin provided, inter alia, twelve courses of lectures in Chinese, six in Japanese, seven in Turkish, and thirteen in modern Arabic. Does any English University offer such facilities? Has Germany larger interests in China than we? Is Germany the ally of Japan? Is Germany in closer relation with Turkey and Egypt than Britain? Or are all these languages too "outlandish" for us to lavish professorships upon them?

(5) I mentioned that for a very small sum the Berlin student has access to two very large libraries. To this Mr. Parker replies that the Birmingham student enjoys the free use of five (much smaller) libraries. I did not think it necessary to add that the Berlin student can also make use, if he wishes, of the various large public libraries. However, Mr. Parker must know from experience that half a dozen small libraries are often quite useless, whereas one of 500,000 volumes will usually satisfy the needs of the most exacting research student. I could add much more, with which my critic would probably agree, but I prefer to deal with this subject another time.

(6) Mr. Parker suggests, not without reason, that low University expenses entail an influx of undesirable students, who unfit themselves for manual labour and end miserably. But has not the same argument been advanced at every stage in the process of making education cheaper? And are we much the worse for the increasing ease with which we can make our way to the fountain of knowledge? I fear Mr. Parker's statement of the problem is too simple. There are so many other factors to be considered, upbringing, race characteristics, climate, economic conditions, etc.

(7) My statements with reference to food were given merely to show that the German student—and, indeed, the general public—can obtain a remarkably satisfying meal for a remarkably moderate price. My reference to salmon and wild boar was made simply because the British public does not usually associate such luxuries with shilling dinners. As to black bread, of which there are many varieties, of course Mr. Parker has eaten it. Everybody eats it in Germany, and one of my chief regrets is that I cannot have it every day in England. But I do not see that, in explaining how the German student lives, I was morally bound to investigate the meat supply of Rixdorf or Moabit. Mr. Parker might, just as logically, have found fault with me because, while I state that the average German student pays twenty-five shillings a month for room, breakfast, and attendance, I omit to give the average number of inmates per room in the tenement houses beyond the Jannowitz Brücke.

In conclusion, may I state the opinion quite frankly that in dealing with Germany or any other country from which we can learn, if we will, it is not always advisable to give the shady sides along with the high lights. Often it is of vital interest to awaken the spirit of curiosity and investigation, which can then be left to discriminate between the good and the bad. Personally, I feel I am doing my own country a better service in indicating, to the best of my knowledge, those features in which, I believe, foreign countries possess an advantage over us rather than those in which we are their superiors. We are too prone to regard anything not English with complacent indifference, and often too lazy to learn when on our travels.—I am, sir, etc.,

THE PLIMSOLL' LINE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—Mr. M. Huntley, in his letter to you under date 22nd ult., attempted to prove too much.

If, as he and the Shipping Gazette suggested, the "load line" has nothing to do with the question of safety at sea, then why is it that the Board of Trade have appointed a Committee to consider the adequacy or otherwise of the line in question?

I prefer to take my figures, not from the Shipping Gazette, but from the Board of Trade, whose President stated in the House of Commons that last year 3,000 seamen lost their lives in British ships, this being equal to a rate of 1 in 76, as compared with 1 in 106 and 1 in 112 for the two years preceding.

The Shipping Gazette gives no authority for their figures, and until they do the statement of a responsible Government official must hold the field.

That statement indicates an appalling condition of things which no juggling with figures can minimise.

In regard to Mr. Blundell's inquiry, of course the Act of Parliament enforcing the observance of the load line has not been abolished; but the regulations enjoined by that Act have been tampered with, with the disastrous results that were commented upon by

Mr. W. T. Lewis, the Stipendiary Magistrate of Cardiff—an unbiased authority—in giving the finding of “the Board of Trade inquiry into the loss of the North Briton, off Ushant,” last year. This is what he said of the drowned crew:—

“Without a murmur or a cry they perished in the seas. Their lives were sacrificed to 130 tons additional freight. . . . Personally, I have no hesitation in saying that the reduction of the free-board—that is, of the distance between the main deck and the old salt-water load-line mark—has greatly reduced a vessel’s safety at sea, and I hold with the Court when it suggests that recent disasters call for a revision of the rules.”

Comment is unnecessary.—I am, sir, etc.,
YOUR SPECIAL COMMISSIONER.
October 8th, 1913.

JOHN BRIGHT.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I am very sorry if I have appeared to your correspondent, Mr. Ellerthorpe, to have done injustice to the memory of the late John Bright.

It is, however, a fact that, as I stated, we have travelled far from the days when that statesman made his celebrated speech in criticism of the motion introduced into Parliament on March 5th, 1869, asking for more stringent regulations regarding the false weights and measures.

Mr. Bright then said:

“My own impression with regard to this adulteration is that it arises from the very great, and, perhaps, inevitable competition in business. . . . The noble lord appears to ask that something much more extensive than stringent should be done by Parliament (‘that is exactly what we, after an interval of forty years, are asking now’). The fact is, it is vain to attempt by the power of Parliament to penetrate into, and to track out, evils such as these on which the noble lord is dwelling at such length. It is quite impossible that you should have the over-right of the shops by inspectors, and that you can organise a body of persons to go into shops and buy sugar, pickles, and Cayenne pepper to get them analysed, and then to raise complaints against shopkeepers, and bring them before the magistrates. If men in their private businesses were to be tracked by Government officers and inspectors every hour of the day, life would not be worth having, and I should recommend them to remove to another country where they would not be subjected to such annoyance.”

Really, have I done John Bright such grave injustice after all?—I am, sir, etc.,

THE WRITER OF THE NOTE.

THE RUSSIAN POLICE AND THE PRESS.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—The writer of the article, “The Russian Police and the Press,” has directed attention to a subject that has temporarily been lost sight of in this country. He unquestionably has an intimate knowledge of the subject, and he should be able to produce valuable information on other aspects of this question. It is time England revised her attitude towards Russian influence on our foreign policy. The way in which the St. Petersburg Government has succeeded in forcing English public opinion into hostility to Turkey, in spite of generations of experience that the support of the Turks is the only safeguard for our Empire, cannot fail to astound anyone who knows the facts.—I am, sir, etc.,
F. V. S. B.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—It is a powerful tribute to the perspicacity of EVERYMAN that an important subject presently ignored by every other public organ has been openly discussed in the columns of your excellent publication. Mr. George Raffalovitch has stripped aside the web of self-deception which has been self-woven around our

CAN YOU SPEAK WELL IN PUBLIC?

An Indispensable Guide to the Art of Public Speaking.

To one man the chance of making a speech affords the opportunity for an enhanced reputation; to another it is nothing but a danger. For the man who stutters and stammers, and finally sits down after a speech principally consisting of “ums” and “ers” scarcely enhances his reputation as a keen-witted member of the community, or as a man whose intelligence and resource can be depended upon in a business crisis.

For that reason, the publication of “The Book of Public Speaking” is an event of the greatest importance. For it is the first comprehensive work upon this important subject ever published in this country. It provides at once a collection of the greatest speeches of the world’s greatest orators, and at the same time a reliable guide to the Art of Public Speaking, written by men who are themselves famous as speakers of the highest merit.

How to Speak in Public.

These articles and their contributors include:—

- | | |
|--|--|
| Rt. Hon. T. J. MACNAMARA, M.P., on “How to Make an Effective Speech”; | A. C. BENSON, M.A., C.V.O., F.R.H.S. (President of Magdalene College, Cambridge), on “The Art of Lecturing”; |
| ARTHUR BOURCHIER, M.A. (the well-known Actor), on “How to Prepare and Deliver a Speech”; | ALBERT CREW (Barrister-at-Law), on “The Conduct of and Procedure at Meetings”; |
| J. L. GRIFFITHS (U.S.A. Consul-General, London), on “After-Dinner Speaking”; | GENERAL EDITOR, A. C. FOX-DAVIES (Barrister-at-Law) |

But “The Book of Public Speaking” is of the greatest interest even for the man who never has to speak in public, because it presents for the first time an entirely new form of literature of enthralling interest. Its handsome covers contain the cream of the greatest speeches of modern times.

The World’s Greatest Speeches.

There is hardly an orator of note of recent years who is not represented in the work; there is scarcely a subject of importance or of interest that is not dealt with in some one or more of the speeches. Political Speeches, Religious Addresses, After-Dinner Speeches, Scientific and Literary Lectures—all have been brought together to form a work of enthralling interest to all intelligent people. Among the great speakers whose speeches are included in the work are:—

- | | | |
|----------------------|--------------------|--------------------|
| Lord Rosebery | Joseph Chamberlain | Lord Fisher |
| Lord Beaconsfield | Max O’Rell | Abraham Lincoln |
| H. H. Asquith | R. Waldo Emerson | Justin McCarthy |
| A. J. Balfour | Harold Cox | Viscount Milner |
| W. E. Gladstone | Woodrow Wilson | M. Poincaré |
| Sir Edward Clarke | G. Bernard Shaw | Whitelaw Reid |
| Andrew Lang | Charles Dickens | Theodore Roosevelt |
| D. Lloyd George | John Bright | Philip Snowden |
| Winston Churchill | Chauncey Depew | Ian Maclaren |
| Mark Twain | Sir A. Conan Doyle | Augustine Birrell |
| Spencer Leigh Hughes | Sir Edward Grey | Sir A. W. Pinero |
| Sir Henry Irving | Earl Halsbury | Etc., etc. |

For the Public Speaker.

The value of the work to the Public Speaker can hardly be over-estimated. Each one of the speeches included in the work serves as a model for the construction of a successful speech that can be studied with advantage by the practised speaker and the novice alike.

A FREE BOOK.

Government organs in respect of Russia. Russia remains the standing disgrace to modern Europe; a land of cold repression, of unblushing interference with every sort of popular activity, of mediæval methods perpetuated at the very doors of twentieth-century enlightenment. This land of antique and cruel Christianity is held up as the champion of Europe against the "Unspeakable Turk," who, for his part, is guiltless of practically every type of despotism quoted by Mr. Raffalovitch. I much prefer the Turk.—I am, sir, etc.,

"EVERYMAN'S" GUIDE TO THE BEST BOOKS.—I. HISTORY OF THE PAPACY.
To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—I have no "glaring sins of omission or commission" to point out. The only possible additions that occur to me are the relevant parts of the Cambridge Modern History, which are excellent.

I desire, however, to congratulate you on the idea, and to say how greatly I, for one, will appreciate a series on these lines. I had occasion, just a year ago, to hunt out books on this very subject. I am surprised to find to what an extent I succeeded in tracking out what was "best," but what an amount of trouble I should have been saved if your "guide" had appeared a year earlier!—and you have suggestions which are quite new to me, and would have been very welcome.

Might I suggest that you follow out in every case what you have done in some—give the publisher and the price, and, in the case of foreign books, say whether an English translation exists.—I am, sir, etc.,

Glasgow, October 4th, 1913. WM. T. RODGER.

IS ROMANISM ON THE DECLINE?

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—"Father Graham will need to produce something in the shape of evidence more substantial than rhetorical generalities," writes Mr. Macpherson. Yet later in the same article we find such luminous proofs of sweeping assertions as the following:—"Those who are in a position to know tell us," etc., "We are told," "The Church is said," "The truth seems to be," etc. Medice, cura te ipsum. Surely, Mr. Macpherson, you have not lost all sense of humour as well as respect for logic? Even those of your readers who are not of "the superstitious section" can hardly be expected to demand proof positive from Father Graham and yet accept your ipse dixit without demur. As to the canons of literary etiquette, "Father Graham and the superstitious section" might do for a street corner in Liverpool or Belfast, but one does not expect it from a literary critic in a literary paper. Some other phrases are interesting. "The Papacy succeeds only when she keeps her devotees in ignorance" presupposes a profound knowledge of history, especially of the chapters which deal with the foundation of the great Universities of Europe and the work of the teaching Orders. But there is better still to come. "Rome thrives on superstition and declines in the presence of knowledge, to which she is as hostile today as in the dark ages." Capital, Mr. Macpherson! Of course, you need not trouble to "produce something in the shape of evidence more substantial than rhetorical generalities." But, sir, were those "dark ages" really so dark? "Those who are in a position to know" pretend that they were not as black as they are painted. The champion of documentary evidence will send me an ultimatum and demand my proofs. Dreading the cannon of his irresistible logic and his irrepressible humour, I shall capitulate, honourably, of course, for Mr. Macpherson will grant me that some people still live in the dark. In another letter I may deal with his "facts."—I am, sir, etc.,

LONELY IN LONDON.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—In your issue of September 26th, under "Notes of the Week," is the following:—"The fact is, of course, that, as somebody pointed out, there is no loneliness so terrible as that of a young man who is a stranger in a great town, and the Brotherhood Association is the only organisation that attempts to meet this human, crying need of our civilisation." We have the greatest regard for, and appreciation of, the efforts of all other organisations working for men, and we recognise fully the admirable and extensive work now done by the Brotherhood Association. But when that organisation is referred to as representing the sole attempt to meet the social needs of lonely young men, we feel that it is necessary to claim such recognition for the Young Men's Christian Association as is its due on the ground of membership, methods, success, and world-wide range. More than a million men are included in our ranks; the work is housed in 9,105 centres, with buildings and equipment valued at £16,750,000. Eighteen hundred men are giving their lives to this service as secretaries. Many thousands of young men actually live in happy fellowship in our hostels, and the large proportion of our million members find society, entertainment, educational privileges, and opportunities for service with us. Our buildings are open seven days a week, and this gives us our supreme opportunity with men.—I am, sir, etc.,

ARTHUR K. YAPP,
General Secretary.

DUMAS' PLACE IN LITERATURE.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—The controversy as to the merits of Dumas is interesting, as it raises the point of "style" against "matter."

The chief merit of the romances of Dumas consists in his effective development of his story, his dramatic situations and his inventiveness. In this department of literature, the most creative power, he shows the master hand, and his language, if not possessing the literary flavour of the best writers, is clear, direct and descriptive. It is not fair argument to say that in translation the "style" or "nuance" of the original is lost, and to accuse those who cannot read the French original of not being able to judge. We know that every work is best in the original; as Don Quixote says, "Translation is like the wrong side of tapestry." But in judging a work we must take into account the matter more than the form. The amount of fine romance in Dumas is very large, and therein consists his greatness.

The fault of Balzac is his false views of values. His minute analyses of the thoughts and sentiments of his characters obtrude themselves out of all place in his stories, and the situations he creates are often unreal and even dull. In "Eugénie Grandet" the characters are uninteresting, and in "Le Lys dans la Vallée" and "La Femme de Trente Ans" the men are so unvirile, if I may use the word, as to repel the reader.

As I read French practically with the same facility as English, it will not do to blame translation. The creations of Dumas are bright, manly and interesting; those of Balzac are moody, uninteresting, and often mawkish. No amount of fine writing will make a

Have you a Bookplate?

I design and engrave Bookplates to incorporate any desired feature, each design being original work, specially drawn for each plate. Pencil sketch showing suggested treatment sent for approval in all cases. The cost varies, of course, according to the amount of work involved and the method of engraving, ranging from 17s. 6d. for design, plate and 100 proofs complete in the case of a simple design, to several guineas for the best work on copper-plate; but in all cases I feel sure my prices are much lower than are usually charged for equally good work.

On request I will send specimens free to any address at home or abroad. It generally takes about three weeks to complete the design, plates and 100 proofs, but as Bookplates are increasingly recognised as most suitable gifts, it is sometimes necessary to complete in less time: I do this whenever possible.

ULSTER.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—In your last issue, referring to Ulster in "Notes of the Week"—after acknowledging the sincerity of the opponents of Home Rule—you say, "Even so, Ulster cannot expect immunity from the law." Of course, the Bill is not yet an Act of Parliament, so that the question of breaking a law which does not exist cannot at present arise.

In the same issue there is an article entitled "Is Romanism on the Decline?" The writer arrives at the conclusion at which every thinking man is bound to arrive, viz., that "Rome thrives on superstition and declines in presence of knowledge, to which she is as hostile to-day as in the dark ages."

It is because the overwhelming majority of members in the proposed Irish Parliament would be elected by the adherents of this Church—for the most part the peasants of the south and west—all of them under the power of the priest—that I and my co-religionists Protest against being handed over to such a reactionary form of government.

We object in this twentieth century to having the hands of the clock put back, just at the time when our unfortunate and hitherto unhappy country is recovering from the misrule and mismanagement of the past, and when all the wrongs perpetrated in a less enlightened age have been righted.—I am, sir, etc.,

PROGRESS.

SPELLING REFORM.

To the Editor of EVERYMAN.

SIR,—You dismiss spelling reform as "that last infirmity of noble minds," but surely there is something to be said in its favour!

To-day the entire golf world is acclaiming the new star which has suddenly appeared in its firmament. But while writers are ready enough to pen the name of Francis Ouimet, it is noteworthy that most speakers prefer to hedge and to refer to "that young American."

Though the literate adult is seldom thus at fault, it affords a splendid example of what confronts the average child at every turn. If he spells words wrongly he loses marks, while if he pronounces them wrongly he runs the still greater risk of being laughed at. The child of the leisured classes may have opportunities of hearing new words pronounced at home, but the average Board-school child is not so happily placed; and since it is impossible for him to reason from sound to sign, or vice versa, both his written and spoken vocabularies suffer from chronic starvation. At present no Englishman can tell with certainty how to pronounce any word which he has seen written but has not heard spoken, nor how to spell any word which he has heard spoken but has not seen written.

Truly, we live in a mad world!—I am, sir, etc., September 21st, 1913. W. H. THOMPSON.

VOLUME II. OF "EVERYMAN"

THE second volume of EVERYMAN will shortly be ready, handsomely bound in cloth, at the price of 3s. 6d. Including some of the most notable contributions to literature, it continues the traditions of the paper, and should form, with Vol. I., the nucleus of an interesting and valuable collection. Applications should be sent to EVERYMAN Publishing Department, Messrs. J. M. Dent and Sons. Cases for binding can be obtained at 1s. 6d. A complete and detailed index to Vol. II. (Nos. 27 to 52) is now in preparation.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

Miss Ethel Turner opens her latest novel, THE SECRET OF THE SEA (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.), with a dramatic scene. The story begins with a dainty episode between the third officer of the Volsatian and a blue-eyed girl in a gauzy ball gown.

"This was all at nine o'clock, or thereabouts. At ten o'clock the girl in the gauzy frock was tossing a freezing little corpse at the foot of an iceberg, and the third officer, who had seen her go to that fate, was standing at the davits of a boat with a smoking revolver in his hand."

There follows a cleverly written scene, in which there is the usual rush for the boats, terminating in the death of the young officer, who, before he is shot by a terrified passenger, throws into the boat the last of seven babies! After this the story settles into stereotyped lines, and we have once more the old, old tale of disputed identity. There are two sets of twins, one patrician, the other plebeian, and, like Frederick in the inimitable "Pirates of Penzance," the true heir to the earldom is only discovered after great difficulty and long years. One grows tired of patrician heirs in search of a peerage, and the complications that ensue when four children rather than two are involved in the muddle are somewhat of a weariness of the flesh. The author has a pretty style, and has written one or two novels distinguished by a freshness and simplicity that renders it the more regrettable that she should have fallen back on one of the very oldest plots that have been inflicted on the novel reader. It seems an irresistible temptation to fictionists to tell the tale of the man or woman who assumes another's identity. We would strongly urge Miss Turner not again to fall into what may be termed the easiest way of writing a romance.

The study of Angelina Peachy by Mrs. Henry Dudeney, in SET TO PARTNERS (Heinemann, 6s.), opens with a charming sketch of a little child brought up in an alien environment. "Angelina lay wide-eyed and candidly listening in the wide bed. . . . She felt to-night, listening to those two maidservants as they sat by the fire, light as air, strong as a strand of silk, smooth as a rose petal; . . . she told herself, lying here quite still and feeling sleepy to her very toes, that to-night for her was making history." The subject of the maids' discussion is the faults and foibles of the Peachy household. Timothy, the father, is an Irishman, who, in despair at the amorous vagaries of his mother, selected for his wife a woman strenuously unattractive and morally invincible. Grandmamma Peachy, a beautiful, witty, and wicked old lady, resides with her son, and between her and the proper English wife there reigns an unending feud, the more bitter because it rarely flames out in words. Angela inherits her grandmother's beauty and attractiveness, and Timothy is troubled that she will also share the old lady's fascinations for the other sex, and something of her liking for masculine variety. The opening chapters of the book are the best. Angela's secretiveness, her intuitive comprehension of the thoughts and feelings of Timothy and her mother, her appreciation of the temperamental antagonism existing between husband and wife are wonderfully portrayed; but though she has an uncanny aptitude for realising emotional atmosphere, she still remains a healthy, normal child, with a love of those things that make the sum total of a small person's existence. Angelina as woman is not so convincing. She drifts into a love affair with Antony Finch, and with something of Grandmamma Peachy's love of amorous adventure, consents to live with him as his wife only on the condition that there shall be no legal tie between them. They are to separate when one or the other wishes to do so. This arrangement lasts for seven years, during which a child is born, who, however, does not live. At the end of that time the inevitable happens. The next man appears upon the scene, and Angelina leaves Antony and takes a trip with Julius. She is recalled, however, by Antony's misfortunes. He loses his money, his house is burnt down, and he is stricken with paralysis. Meanwhile Julius has decided that he must make his fortune before he finally joins his life with the woman he loves. So for the time being he disappears from the story, and Angelina sets to work to keep Antony and herself. They go to a small seaside town, where she starts business as a dealer in old china, and earns enough to keep the paralysed Antony and herself. She accepts the situation with heroism, and works unremittingly, refusing to allow herself any regret. As if this were not enough, the poor pilgrim of love is visited by a further penalty. Julius returns not only penniless, but blind! Friendless and forlorn, he accepts her hospitality, and the poor woman has now two men to keep. The great defect in the book lies in the drawing of the men. It is possible to imagine a decent man accepting the fact that a woman supports him in the case of Antony. He was quite willing to marry her, and for seven years, to all intents and purposes, they were man and wife. But that a woman sensitive as Angelina could ever have been permanently attracted by Julius is inconceivable, and the spectacle of the blind lover content to owe food and lodging to the efforts of the woman he is supposed to have loved is an unpleasant one. We feel that the author has been very hard on poor Angelina, and the only gleam of comfort one gets is in the concluding paragraph, which suggests that though her experiences have been disconcerting, if not absolutely crushing, when the time comes she will go on her pilgrimage again. She is writing a letter to her favourite saint, and thus expresses herself:

Do you Filter your Food?

The water you drink is carefully filtered again and again in order to remove all trace of impurities. What about the food you eat? Every variety of food you take contains some substances which the digestive system rejects. If these waste products passed immediately out of the system all would be well. But they do not. Our modern sedentary mode of life is the cause of their remaining for a while in the digestive tract and fermenting there—they set up Indigestion, Flatulence, Acidity, and contaminate the blood, giving rise to Bad Complexions, Pimples and Blisters.

"I shall, my saint, put away this letter in the box with the other two, and I will not write you again, unless they die, those two dear men. Then my sense of adventure will not only awake, but take action, and there will be new sides to show." If in the future Mrs. Dudeney proceeds with the story of this much-tried heroine, we sincerely hope that she will not impose on Angelina the task of supporting a deaf man. Let us at least trust that her next lover will possess not only the full complement of limbs, but his vision and his hearing.

JOAN THURSDAY (Grant Richards, 6s.) is a story of a girl who fought her way up from obscurity and sordid surroundings to the dizzy pinnacle of success. The scene is in America, and the girl is essentially the type that one associates with the go-ahead Yankee. Her character is intimately portrayed, and the touch of sex antagonism which the author subtly suggests is undeniably clever. Joan bitterly resents her father's attitude to all the family, and the brutal indifference to the comfort of his women-folk seems to the girl reflected in the attitude of "man" to woman generally. "They call themselves men; she despised them all, all! beasts! . . . What had she ever done? It was not as if this was the first time; they were always persecuting her: hardly a day passed . . . well, anyway, never a week . . . it was not her fault if she was pretty: she never even so much as looked at them; . . . she did not believe that there was a decent fellow living. . . ." The father is a Dickensian person, without that touch of the grotesque that makes all people possible to the magician who created Micawber. He has a great idea of propriety, and when Joan, losing her job in a drapery store, announces her intention of going on the stage, he becomes violent. He is unable to browbeat the girl, and avenges himself on her independence by demanding that she leave his house that night. Her adventures in search of a living are well told, and her final admission into the ranks of the theatrical profession is devoid of the usual easy time which accompanies the conventional heroine who takes the town by storm. To the end, however, the old antagonism is present in her, and the undesirable advances made to her on the stage do not tend to soften her views. The touch of melodrama, introduced with the shooting of Mathias, the unpleasant theatrical manager, who for a time captures Joan's regard, is well handled, but, in spite of treatment, is a little bizarre. The book is a clever one, and the attitude of the girl's mind is expressed with a fidelity and clearness that should carry the author far. We shall await with interest Mr. Louis J. Vance's next work.

Few districts in England can rival Salisbury Plain in archaeological, historical, and scenic interest combined. It is, indeed, a country with a character all its own, as Miss Ella Noyes says in the introductory chapter to her "Salisbury Plain: Its Stones, Cathedral, City, Villages, and Folk" (London: J. M. Dent and Sons, 10s. 6d.); and the charming illustrations in colour and line which Miss Dora Noyes contributes to the volume, themselves go far to bear out the claim. Miss Noyes takes us to Stonehenge, the greatest mystery of a mysterious region; she shows us Old Sarum, the Cathedral and city of Salisbury, the Avon Valley and Willeybourn and Wilton; she guides us across the Plain and round its edge, and introduces us to shepherds on the downs and rustics in the villages. And all that she describes so well in words, Miss Dora Noyes makes still more inviting with her brush.

Mr. H. B. Holt has produced a very fascinating volume by tracing the history and exploits of the MOUNTED POLICE OF NATAL (John Murray, 15s. 6d.). This remarkable body of fighting men, which has seen so much heavy service, from the time of the great Zulu War to that of the last war with the South African Republics, was first organised by Major-General Sir J. G. Dartnell, who contributes a valuable introduction to the present volume. Its organisation presented many difficulties. It had to be recruited in the first instance from the sort of wanderers and ne'er-do-wells that are so readily found hanging about a new country in search of what fortune may send. A good deal of strict discipline was needed to turn such men into police and virtually—for a policeman's duties in Natal in those days were by no means pacific—into soldiers; but all experience proves that such men, when once disciplined, can be made a fine body of warriors, and the experience of Natal fully confirmed this generalisation. Mr. Holt takes the corps through the whole history of its exploits against enemies, black and white, foreign and domestic, down to the present time. The narrative is picturesque and eminently readable, as well as peculiarly fascinating to all who are interested in the development of our South African Empire.

HEARTS COURAGEOUS (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.) is a story of Virginia in the eighteenth century, and deals with the War of Independence. The action of the tale is hampered by the stilted fashion in which the characters at times are made to speak. Anne, the heroine, is alluding to the Governor of the Colony, whom "his Majesty is pleased to put over his colonials, levying on their leaf and swearing at their buckskins." She breaks out into passionate denunciation of this personage, but the fire of her emotion suffers greatly in her method of expression. "Think you he knows one wit more of this Virginia than does the King, a thousand leagues away?" Again and again this stilted phraseology occurs; but apart from this defect the story goes with a swing; there is plenty of fighting and love, romantic adventures and hairbreadth escapes. And for those who like this kind of fare the book should prove very popular.

The high-water mark in the production of encyclopaedic dictionaries has just been registered by the appearance of the Funk and Wagnalls' NEW STANDARD DICTIONARY, Salisbury Square. Nearly 400 expert specialists from many countries have laboured for years in the production of this work, which now represents a total of about £300,000 in cash expenditure. An announcement regarding the distribution of advance copies of this production appears elsewhere in this issue of EVERYMAN, and it is very well worth the attention of all our readers.

FAIRFAX AND HIS PRIDE (Chatto and Windus, 6s.), by Miss Marie Van Vorst, would have made a clever study at a fourth of its length. The scene is in America. Fairfax is a Southerner by birth, and possessed of a pride in his own strength and resources that occasionally deviates into egomania. He is an artist by temperament, and when quite a boy moulds some clever statuettes in clay. He goes into the studio of a famous sculptor, who picks his brains, steals his designs, and finally claims as his own Antony's best work. Unable to prove the wrong that has been done him, he revenges himself upon society by going as a fireman. Finally he drifts back again into art, makes a big reputation as a sculptor in Paris, returns to America, is claimed as a great artist, and marries his cousin Bella, who has adored him since he was a child.

Mrs. Wilfred Ward has written a very remarkable book. HORACE BLAKE (Hutchinson and Co., 6s.) is a study of a type of artist around whom there has ranged much controversy. Blake holds the theory that, for art's sake, all things are not only lawful, but expedient. He is a realist, and believes in studying first hand the characters he portrays. It is within the bounds of his philosophy that, should he wish to draw a man of upright life who suddenly gives way to theft, if the type were not ready to hand, he would take steps to create it, and lay himself out to tempt a man to steal in order that he might depict the emotional conflict in his soul. All things being justified by art, it is not surprising to learn that he treats his wife in an inconceivable, inhuman fashion. Kate, the daughter of a Freethinker and a woman of a rare honesty of character, does her best to atone for her husband's misdeeds. She is intensely ambitious for his success, and no work is too arduous for her, no sacrifice too great. She accepts the theory that, in the case of genius, art transcends morality, and though she shudders at the thought of what he does during his periodical disappearances from home, she never remonstrates with him or tries to thwart his purpose. They pass through a hard time of poverty and failure, and when, after years of effort, he attains success and makes money like water by the success of his plays, he is stricken with a mysterious illness. At the moment when London is on fire over his latest production he receives his death warrant, leaves England and goes to a remote village in France. He refuses to allow his wife to accompany him, and sends for their daughter, a girl of eighteen, who, with a male nurse, is his sole companion. Arrived in Brittany, his appetite for emotional variety is gratified by religion. In other words, not having strength further to sin, he seeks sensuous gratification in the practice of Catholicism, and he is finally received back into the Church of which he was originally a member. His conversion follows on the writing of a play deriding religion in a most flagrant fashion. He has, indeed, attained a large part of his success by showing up religious shams and satirising in bitter fashion the cant of hypocrisy. His return to Catholicism is not signalled by any alteration in his attitude towards other people, and he does not send for his wife till he knows his life is rapidly closing, though he realises she is eating her heart out at her absence. Not until a few hours before his death does he send for her, and then it is too late. She arrives to find him dead. Trix, the daughter, has been his last conquest, for, apart from his moral obliquity, Blake was a most fascinating and magnetic man. The girl, who has a tolerant contempt for her mother, insists on publishing her views on the last phase of her father, describing him as a tender, beautiful soul, and this persistence on her part brings about a tragedy. Kate's sister Ann, who has brought the girl up, tells her the truth. She is Blake's illegitimate daughter, the child of Nancy Potter, a young actress whom Blake deliberately ruined that he might study the character of a Puritan, who finally succumbs to temptation, from life. In horror of what he has done, Kate had gone to the girl, stayed with her until her child was born, and adopted the baby as her own. In the scene between Kate and Trix, after the girl knows the truth, the art of the author touches high-water mark. With a wonderful insight, she chooses the instant that Trix knows Kate is not her mother for the girl to feel the love of a daughter for the woman who had shielded her for nearly twenty years. "Horace Blake" is one of the most notable novels of the year, and the author has achieved a remarkable success.

NEW "SIMPLIFIED" SYSTEM OF LEARNING.

10,000 Free Lessons in Latin, English and Logic are to be presented to readers of EVERYMAN.

This course has been decided upon by the Directors of the SCHOOL OF SIMPLIFIED STUDY as a test-demonstration of the new "SIMPLIFIED" system of acquiring a scholarly knowledge of Logic and Languages, which are the very keystones of our present-day thought and speech.

To-day there are surprisingly few who have this knowledge. WHY? Because of the difficulties of the older systems of teaching and acquiring these languages. Instead of the path of the student being made dull or monotonous by the obstacles that hitherto rendered his progress almost impossible, there is now a sheer delight in the very speed with which a knowledge of Latin, English or Logic may be acquired.

Every lesson is a step on the path of progress to efficiency. It is impossible for a student to sit down to a "SIMPLIFIED" lesson, even for five minutes, without feeling that he has literally absorbed into the machinery of his brain that which will be for ever after a useful part of his mental equipment.

A PLEASURE, NOT A TASK.

The method originated by the Rev. J. C. Wilcox, M.A. (of St. John's College, Cambridge) is changing the study of Languages and Logic from a task into a rare pleasure. Numerous students under the system have written to say that they are quite sorry when the course of study has been completed, for the lessons had become one of the most enjoyable features of their daily life.

Students who are looking forward with anxiety to future examinations in these difficult subjects will find the burden of

Never mind if you have been disappointed after trying other methods. Others have been the same, and only as a very forlorn hope have many decided to try the "SIMPLIFIED" system of the Rev. J. C. Wilcox. The "SIMPLIFIED" System is a science in itself, at once the essence of simplicity, yet an absolutely thorough and scholarly system. It smoothes away all those difficulties which are so perplexing to the often disheartened student

I've learnt more in four months than in years with the old methods. If I had only known of this simplified system before, what drudgery I might have saved myself!

worry fall from their shoulders the moment they become acquainted with this delightfully easy "SIMPLIFIED" system of mastering all their intricacies.

WHAT 20 MINUTES A DAY WILL DO.

An additional pleasure attached to this system is that it can be acquired in those odd moments which fall even to the busiest of men. You can study it in your own home. You can learn it on a railway journey. You can make all the slack minutes of your life of value to you. You are not asked to devote hours of study daily to the subject. By studying for twenty minutes each day you will make surprising progress. You may study at your own convenience. It is not necessary to complete a course within a definite period.
